The Rothschilds were anxious to maintain their friendly relations with the Humboldt brothers. Solomon also did his best to be agreeable to them whenever possible. Meeting Caroline von Humboldt at Carlsbad on one occasion, he overwhelmed her with attentions. She wrote to her husband: "I have had several callers, and among others Herr von Rothschild, the brother of the one who is looking after your affairs at Frankfort. He made some exceedingly comic remarks to me. He thanked me, in the course of his conversation, for receiving him, and said, 'Your Excellency ought to come to Frankfort again. We could do with a lady like you there.' It sounded extraordinarily funny. He also asked me whether he could be of use to me in the matter of money and said that his purse was at my disposal." [11]

The Prussian loan, which the brothers Humboldt arranged with the Rothschilds, furnished another excellent illustration of the way in which the three brothers worked together.

While Solomon and Nathan were dealing with that business in London, Amschel Meyer was meeting an awkward situation at Frankfort. In the case of propositions which the firm did not like, they could excuse themselves by pointing out the difficulty of obtaining the agreement of all the brothers—that is, of five persons who usually were widely separated from one another—this agreement being necessary for any substantial transaction.

These tactics were adopted in a matter involving the Crown Prince of Hesse, who was constantly at loggerheads with his father. The elector was now seventy-five years old, and failing. In contrast to his parsimonious father, the crown prince had made himself popular by a manner of life from which many persons profited. This involved very heavy expenditure, and the heir's need of money was all the greater since the appanage allotted to him by his father was—according to his ideas at any rate—ludicrously inadequate. The consequence was that the prince found his way to the firm which owed its rise and prosperity to his father. He applied to Rothschild for a loan.

Naturally, this was done quite in secret, without the knowledge or consent of the elector. At the beginning of 1818 the prince requested a loan of 200,000 reichsthalers, which the House of Rothschild granted; but before six months had expired he asked for a further advance of 300,000 reichsthalers. On this occasion he remarked that the House of Rothschild had the fullest information regarding the elector's affairs, and could therefore easily provide for the subsequent repayment of the loan.

Carl Rothschild happened to be in Cassel at the time. The prince immediately summoned him, and informed him that he had again applied to his firm for money, making the same remark to him as he had made to the firm. Carl Rothschild left the audience chamber in reflective mood. He thought it exceedingly strange that the prince should already have incurred further debts, and he was somewhat annoyed at the remark which he had made in asking for the loan. There was a risk that the old. elector might come to hear of his son's borrowings, and they would arouse his indignation not only with his son but also with the firm of Rothschild. Carl Rothschild met a chamberlain in the anteroom, and made some remark which may have sounded ill-tempered about the request for a further loan.

After returning to Frankfort Carl took counsel with Amschel, who was there alone; the result was embodied in the following letter:[12]

MOST EXCELLENT PRINCE!
We have the honor to acknowledge your Highness's most gracious letter of 28th ultimo. We must confess that having but recently handed to your Highness the considerable loan of 200,000 reichsthalers, we did not expect to be asked for a still greater amount. Your Highness will be graciously aware that we can act only in agreement with our absent brothers, and we shall therefore not fail to communicate to them your Highness's letter, asking them for their views. In the meantime we would most submissively beg for a gracious explanation of the following passage in your Highness's letter, in which your Highness is pleased to state: "You have the best possible knowledge of the elector's business here, and it is therefore particularly easy for you to reimburse yourselves through discounting bills."
Our knowledge of the elector's affairs extends only to such business as we are entrusted to carry out. It is impossible for us to retain a single farthing and to apply it in the interest of your Highness, for we furnish the fullest accounts of the smallest transaction and send them to Cassel.

This letter was to fulfil a double object: it would stave off the prince for the time being, and it would also be a protection against any reproaches from the elector if the matter leaked out.
The letter displeased the prince exceedingly; he perceived the rebuke and would have liked to reply indignantly. But he restrained his feelings as he still hoped to get money from the Rothschilds. However, he felt that in these circumstances it was difficult for him to carry on the negotiations personally. He accordingly selected Buderus as a go-between, requesting him to keep the matter strictly secret from the elector.
"Having learned of the chance arrival of Baron Carl von Rothschild," the prince wrote to Buderus,[13] anticipating the future title of the family, "I felt that I should inform him of the application I had made to his firm, and did so most politely. He, however, replied in a most unfriendly way, and permitted himself to make remarks behind my back which are not consonant with my honor." The young prince stated that nevertheless he still had confidence in the firm, and begged Buderus to use his influence to help him out of the awkward situation. He suggested that the Rothschilds' letter must be based upon a misapprehension. "I for my part," he continued, "could of course never have thought of such a thing, my intention being to indicate to him that he would be fully secured as he would have me more or less in his hands."

Buderus hastened to carry out the wishes of the heir to the throne, his future master. He went to Frankfort and remonstrated with Carl Rothschild for making the remark to which the elector's heir had taken exception. Carl Rothschild protested that he had made no remark regarding the further loan to anyone excepting Holzforster, the gentleman in waiting, who was kept fully informed of the financial affairs of the heir. Buderus reported to the young prince: [14] "I have succeeded in persuading Finanzrat Carl, who was the only one of the brothers at Frankfort, temporarily to advance a few thousand friedrichdors. Finanzrat Solomon of London has gone to a spa, and Finanzrat Amschel is also traveling. It will require a month to obtain the replies of the absent brothers."

However, the heir to the throne was persistent. He immediately informed Buderus that he was not going to be fobbed off with a few thousand friedrichdors, and added a remark which savored strongly of a threat.

"I know," [15] he wrote, "that these gentlemen will be entirely guided by what you say, and my gratitude in future to Privy Councilor von Carlshausen will be commensurate with his readiness to do me a service now."

The letter went on to make proposals as to how the 300,000 reichsthalers might in spite of everything be obtained from Rothschild.

The faithful Buderus felt very bitter about this ungracious reply. He could not force the banking firm to hand out money at the point of the bayonet. "I most humbly assure your Highness,"[16] he replied, "that the will to carry out your desires is not lacking, and that I would spare myself no labor or sacrifice to that end, for I find my greatest satisfaction in the success of my endeavors. Nevertheless, with the best will in the world I am unable to dispose of another person's property, or to dictate to him how he should deal with it."

Buderus reported that he had immediately sent a further pressing request to the firm of Rothschild, and had received the following communication from Carl:[17] "I am anxious to accede to his Highness's request, and assure you that if it depended on me alone there would be no obstacle to its being immediately granted. However, in the present instance consultation with all my brothers, who are now away, is particularly necessary. Our funds have been to an extent tied up in the recent negotiations for considerable loans, and I am unable to my infinite regret . . . immediately to come to a decision. Nevertheless, your Excellency may be assured that we shall make every possible effort to satisfy his Highness's requirements."

Meanwhile Solomon had returned to Frankfort, and it was decided after all to advance the prince the money he wanted on very special security. By a deed dated October 15, 1818, he mortgaged not only "all his real and personal property to the exclusion of nothing whatsoever," but also any property of which he might become possessed in the future in any way whatever.[17]

Three months had scarcely elapsed when the prince was again in need of money. He himself felt that Carlshausen would think it strange that he should already want another 100,000 gulden; and he first tried to see whether he could "acquire" the money from his father's friend, a lady whose politeness led him to expect that she would not refuse his request.[18] The Countess von Hessenstein evaded the question of a loan in her reply.

The young prince would have gladly paid the firm of Rothschild ten percent interest if only he could have got the money. Von Carlshausen was instructed by the Rothschilds to inform him that the firm never accepted interest at ten percent as this would be a usurious rate. Thereupon the prince wrote as follows to his father's loyal servant:

"I am well aware that the House of Rothschild can loan no capital sums in cash at five percent without loss, and at the same time that the prestige of the firm is too great to allow them to take a higher rate of interest—a fact which is entirely to their credit, although in these times no objection could be made to the higher rate. I am therefore confident that your Excellency will, with your usual kindness, use your good offices with the House of Rothschild to persuade them to grant me a further loan of four hundred thousand thalers."[19]

This request moved the firm of Rothschild to indignation. "Your letter," they wrote to Carlshausen, "arrived at the same time with the letter embodying the resolve of our brother at Berlin, in accordance with which it is plainly impossible for us to provide a sum exceeding the five hundred thousand reichsthalers in cash already advanced, especially in view of the fact that we have had to make the most exhaustive efforts to provide that sum."[20]

The use of the word "resolve" in this letter calls for special comment, this word usually being reserved for the decisions of sovereign rulers; also, it was apparently not so "plainly" impossible to advance the money, for on April 1, 1819, this third loan was also granted and the prince received the money he wanted.

Scarcely two years later the elector died; his son succeeded to the government and to his father's great possessions, and the Rothschilds had their money repaid in full with all interest due.

A far-reaching political development now diverted the firm's attention from such minor loan transactions, concentrating it exclusively upon the higher politics of Europe. The victorious powers had decided to meet in a congress at Aix-la-Chapelle, there to establish new relations with the France of the Restoration, as well as to discuss the question whether the armies of occupation should be withdrawn, and alleviation granted for the indemnities to be paid. England and the eastern powers were still suspicious of France; and the interest aroused by this congress was so great that the monarchs of the Holy Alliance attended it in person, while England was represented by the two foremost men of the day, Lord Castlereagh and Wellington.

Metternich meant to use this opportunity to secure the support of the tsar and the King of Prussia for his schemes by playing on their fears of revolution and general upheaval. Besides the numerous statesmen, the most prominent bankers and merchants of Europe flocked to Aix-la-Chapelle, scenting prey. Most of them traveled through Frankfort and availed themselves of the opportunity of getting into touch with the financial wire-pullers in the commercial center of Germany. Metternich too had come to Frankfort on September 3, 1818, accompanied by Gentz.

Gentz was his secretary and adviser in money matters; but he was interested not only in his country's but also in his own personal advantage. With rare candor he notes in his diary that in 1815 he received a purse with three hundred ducats and one with eight hundred ducats from Russia, and that Prussia had given him—an Austrian civil servant—eight hundred ducats and two hundred gold napoleons as a gratuity.[21] He was also quite open about the fact that the Jewish banker Lamel had given him money and that Parish had given him a share of the Austrian loan of May, 1818. Gentz called such transactions "pleasant financial dealings."[22] His way of referring to them is so candid that one gets the impression that the circumstances of those times prevented his being in the least conscious of anything improper in such gifts.

Prince Metternich came into contact with all the local magnates at Frankfort, including Bethmann. He seems not yet to have met Rothschild personally at this time, hut this defect was more than made good by his right-hand man Frederick von Gentz. The brothers Rothschild were well aware of the great influence that Gentz exerted upon Metternich in matters concerning the state finances, and through him upon the minister of finance, Count Stadion. They knew also that Gentz was bribable, whereas they naturally did not venture to approach Metternich in such a way.

Amschel Meyer and Carl Rothschild therefore called on Gentz immediately after his arrival. This visit resulted in verbal agreements of a financial nature; and they also requested him to use his influence with the prince toward securing his support in the question of the Frankfort Jews; for at that time the senate[23] was attempting to dispute the competence of the diet to deal with the Jewish problem, arguing that it was a purely local matter. The pressure brought to bear by the Rothschilds upon Gentz, and through him upon Metternich, resulted in the senate's objection being disallowed, and a commission of the diet being appointed to mediate between the two parties.

This decision, taken on September 10, 1818, moved the brothers to call on Gentz again on September 12, and to "engage his interest" by a further detailed exposition of the whole matter. Gentz suggested that Hardenberg should have his attention called to the subject again as he would meet Metternich at Aix-la-Chapelle and would be able to discuss it with him. The brothers needed no pressing to do this, and wrote to Hardenberg in the following terms:

"Your Highness's gracious sentiments toward us, as well as your well-known tolerance in matters of religious opinion, gives us reason to hope that you will graciously grant this letter your favorable consideration. The question at issue is the final decision in the matter of our position as citizens. This is a most important question for us now, since the welfare of those who confess our faith depends upon it, and is constantly occupying our thoughts. We are exceedingly anxious not to let pass the opportunity of the meeting between your Highness and his Highness the Prince von Metternich to ask that he should come to a final favorable decision regarding our destiny, and we await his decision in confidence. In venturing to appeal as strongly as possible to your Highness we hope that it may be vouchsafed to us to look with confidence to the future."[24]

During the sixteen days which Gentz spent at Frankfort the brothers Rothschild very frequently came to see him; he was invited to dine with the Rothschilds at five o'clock on September 22, Frau Herz and General Volzoven being among those present at the dinner. Amschel made no slight effort to have distinguished people at his table; but, as Johann Smidt, Mayor of Bremen, stated,[25] it was not in accordance with contemporary customs and manners to admit a Jew to so-called good society. No Christian banker or merchant of Frankfort had yet invited a Jew, not even one of the Rothschild brothers, to dine, and the delegates to the diet did not do so either. However, several people were beginning to depart from this tradition, and accepted invitations from the Rothschilds, either from an absence of prejudice, or from motives of personal interest.

Gentz arrived at Aix-la-Chapelle September 25, a few days after Metternich. A brilliant society had met in that city for the congress. Besides monarchs and statesmen, it included financial magnates such as Baring and Hope, who were negotiating the French loans in connection with the payment of the war indemnity. The firm of Rothschild had sent two brothers to Aix-la-Chapelle, Solomon and Carl. The latter was accompanied by his bride, the beautiful and intelligent Adelheid Herz, whom he had married on September 16, so that his business journey to the congress coincided with his honeymoon. In the case of the House of Rothschild even the most important personal considerations had to yield to important business, and to such a unique opportunity for forming extensive new connections.

Through Gentz, Metternich was brought into actual touch with the two brothers at Aix-la-Chapelle. Gentz fell completely under their influence, and his diary constantly records their visits. On October 27 Solomon handed him eight hundred ducats, which he stated he had won by speculating for him in British funds.[28]

On November 2, Gentz again records[27] "pleasant financial dealings" with Solomon, and on November 12 the brothers, together with Gentz and Parish, lunched with Metternich. In spite of his heavy work in keeping the minutes of the congress, Gentz spent the whole of the next day working on a memorandum stating the case for the Jews of Frankfort, no doubt in return for financial considerations. He called upon Carl's young wife, who was highly flattered to be waited upon by the secretary and confidant of the man who was playing the leading role in the illustrious assembly. At the Rothschilds' request, Gentz supported Dr. Buchholz, whom the Jews had sent to Aix-la-Chapelle to secure a favorable decision. Even if this proved fruitless, the European Areopagus was at any rate led to view the question in dispute from a friendly angle.

The congress broke up on November 14, 1818. Its conclusion brought profit to the House of Rothschild, although the principal parts among the bankers had been played, not by them, but by Baring and Hope. The Rothschilds, however, took over bills from that firm. They had successfully put forward the demands of small princes and above all through Gentz they had obtained a profound insight into the activities of the men who were the determining factors in European politics. Moreover, they had formed invaluable connections for the future of their House; and more especially they had made the closer acquaintance of Metternich, the most powerful man in Europe at the time. The brothers therefore left Aix-la-Chapelle in a state of high satisfaction.

Gentz was no less satisfied. He had been widely complimented for his work during the congress and had collected two orders, as well as six thousand ducats. He also attached great value to having "taken part in the most instructive conversation with the most powerful men in the commercial world, while the intimate secrets of the greatest financial dealings that have ever been transacted between men were negotiated in his little room."[28]

It is true that Gentz liked to see himself in a romantic light, and was wont to exaggerate anything with which he had to do; but the negotiations at Aix-la-Chapelle as to the manner in which France should pay the 270 million francs of war indemnity still outstanding did in fact constitute a formidable financial transaction. Metternich returned home with his sovereign, but Gentz returned at the end of November via Frankfort, where he spent about a week.

His diary shows that the first week in December, 1818, was spent in almost daily visits to or from the Rothschilds, and in long conversations and discussions with the members of the banking family. Hour after hour Gentz worked in favor of the Jews of Frankfort. To this period must be attributed the conclusion of the agreement that was so profitable to both, providing the Rothschilds with an important source of political information and a connection with Metternich, while enabling Gentz to carry on his extravagant manner of life, and to indulge in his expensive middle-aged amour with Fanny Elssler. The relationship continued until his death.

From Frankfort Gentz proceeded home via Munich, where he received a letter from his friend Adam Mtiller.

The public had learned something of the part played by the brothers Rothschild during the past critical years, and Gentz had told Mtiller more. Mtiller, as a result, suggested that his friend describe in a short sketch the rise of the House of Rothschild.[29]

Gentz replied as follows: "I was delighted with your idea of a monograph on the Rothschilds. It is one of the brightest and most happy notions that I have heard for some time. The word is all the more appropriate since the Rothschilds really do constitute a special species plantarum with its own characteristics. They are vulgar, ignorant Jews, outwardly presentable. In their craft they act entirely in accordance with the principles of naturalism, having no suspicion of a higher order of things; but they are gifted with a remarkable instinct which causes them always to choose the right, and of two rights, the better. Their enormous wealth (they are the richest people in Europe) is entirely the result of this instinct which the public are wont to call luck.

"Now that I have seen everything at close quarters, Baring's most profound reasoning inspires me with less confidence than the sound judgment of one of the more intelligent Rothschilds—for among the five brothers there is one whose intelligence is wanting and another whose intelligence is weak. If Baring and Hope ever fail, I can state with confidence that it will be because they have thought themselves cleverer than Rothschild and have not followed his advice. I am writing to you con amore aboutt these people and their business, because they were my recreation at Aix-la-Chapelle and at the same time I learned a great deal from them."

These remarks of Gentz's are valuable because they occur in a confidential private letter to a friend. We shall see later how differently Gentz was to speak about the same Rothschilds in a work destined for publication for which he received a princely fee from the family.

While the International Congress temporarily brought the three brothers, Amschel, Solomon, and Carl into the foreground, James in Paris and Nathan in London had not been inactive. Nathan in particular had succeeded in carrying on his activities in dealing with large loans, and had issued twelve million pounds of English State Loan. This business does not itself appear to have brought much profit to the firm of Rothschild, but it secured its prestige in the eyes of the British Treasury, and demonstrated to the whole world that in the face of native competition it had maintained its position as the banker of England—a nation which now, after Napoleon's overthrow, was rejoicing in its undisputed political power and wealth.

James in Paris was in constant close association with Barbier, the chairman of the Austrian Liquidation Committee in that city. He continued his efforts in rivalry with other firms, to secure the handling of the war indemnity, and so extended his business.

While the House was thus prospering throughout the world, its existence was suddenly most seriously threatened in the home town of Frankfort. The family had just lost one of its best friends there—the man to whom must properly be ascribed the important part of having first held the ladder on which the House of Rothschild had climbed to such heights. On August 3, 1819, while sitting at his desk in Hanau, Buderus had a stroke.

A short glance at the papers which he left shows that he had spent his whole life in meticulous devotion to the exacting work of accountancy. The son of a poor schoolmaster, he had risen to the rank of privy councilor and head of the treasury. He had acquired a fine estate and was possessed of about one and a half million gulden.[30]

All this was, however, a trifling reward, when one considers the services he rendered to the elector during the Napoleonic period, and the enormous portions of the elector's possessions he rescued.

His devotion to duty had not made him popular, for he was reproached with having acted with too great harshness in the elector's interests. Von Carlshausen seems to have realized this at the end of his days, and there is a suggestion of self-justification in the concluding sentence of his will, which reads as follows:

"I have done what was in my power to provide for my dear children. I have considered no sacrifice and no effort to be too great where the furtherance of their happiness has been concerned, and my whole life has been a consistent endeavor to place their welfare on a firm foundation. God has blessed my efforts . . . and you, my dear children, hearken to and follow a father's last counsel: guard carefully the property which I, with God's help, have industriously acquired. It is burdened neither by the tears of the oppressed nor by the curses of the defrauded. Endeavor to increase and secure it through economy, order, industry, wisdom, clemency, and piety. Shun greed and usurious avarice that blights all virtue. Have naught to do with unjust acquisitions. Always remember that contentment is the crown of riches."[31]

The House of Rothschild owed an infinite debt of gratitude to the dead man. It is true that under the contract he had had his share in the business, and to this fact indeed he owed the greater part of his wealth. But this was of small account in comparison with the services which he had rendered in excluding all rival firms from the rich elector's business, and with the possibilities which he had created of applying the elector's money to consolidate the credit of the banking firm and to secure its great business.

It was in its native town that the rise of the House had aroused the greatest envy and hatred. A Frankfort police report of that time gives a fairly good picture of popular feeling in the old imperial city:

"The occasion of a day of penitence,"[32] the report runs, "being held to commemorate a big fire that occurred at Frankfort a hundred years ago, through which four hundred houses were destroyed, clearly brings out the feelings of the Christian inhabitants against the Jews. According to the story, much property is supposed to have been stolen by them. In general, any opportunity for showing envy and ill-will is welcomed, all sense of justice being forgotten, although many rich Jews are a source of substantial income to Christians. Any right-thinking person will condemn the fact, for instance, that a caricature ridiculing his ennoblement[33] was recently pinned to the door of the Jewish banker Rothschild at Frankfort.

"Rothschild, although he indulges somewhat in display, provides many people with an opportunity of earning money thereby, and is exceedingly benevolent to the poor whether they be Christians or Jews. The capacity of this Jewish commercial and banking firm is shown by the fact that it has taken over a loan for England, of which we have just been informed. It is noteworthy that the firm of Rothschild secured the business in competition against others. A few days ago the firm on receiving a special message from Vienna bought fifteen thousand Metalliques; the price of Austrian securities immediately rose, and the stockbrokers got extraordinarily busy."

The revelation of the firm's power had the most exaggerated results. In such a highly emotional period as Germany was passing through, a rapid development of this kind was bound to have a particularly exasperating effect upon contemporaries and rivals. All thinking people in Germany were greatly stirred by the desire for freedom and national unity. On March 23, 1819, a fanatic's dagger cost Kotzebue his life because of his attacks on the national party. The emotion, artificially held in check by Metternich, everywhere vented itself upon the Jews.

A farce called "Unser Verkehr" ("Our Neighbors") was played throughout Germany, which, to the uproarious applause of the spectators, ridiculed the manners and customs of the Jews.[34] The author was unknown, and everybody said that the House of Rothschild had offered a reward for his discovery.

In August, 1819, the Conferences of Ministers, over which Metternich presided, met at Carlsbad to decide upon the notorious measures against any movement of liberation; the resulting excitement found an outlet in a violent outbreak of popular passion against the Jews. Wiirzburg was the first town in which acts of violence were perpetrated. The populace gathered together in groups which marched past the Jews' houses, smashing windows and breaking down doors. They began to loot. "Hepp! Hepp! Down with the Jews!"[35] resounded through the streets. Similar scenes occurred in Bamberg and other towns.

The Jews of Frankfort were all the more dismayed by these occurrences, as there had been menacing signs of a similar movement developing in that city. Amschel Meyer Rothschild and his two brothers, who on account of their wealth were likely to be the principal object of any attack, began to feel that their lives were seriously threatened, and to consider the question of flight.

One of the brothers seems to have spoken of their intentions to an Austrian official, for, writing on August 6, a secretary of legation at Frankfort reports as follows:[36]

"I have the honor tentatively to inform you that I have learned from a reliable source that the Jewish banking firm of Rothschild here intends to leave Frankfort for good ; they are going to apply, through the imperial minister of finance Count von Stadion for permission to settle in Vienna. Their intention is still a close secret here.

When they give effect to it, it will cause an enormous sensation both among the municipal authorities and in the whole business community, and the splendor of Frankfort will be considerably dimmed. It will probably serve to heighten the bitter feeling against the Jews, and the departure of the Rothschilds will be a fatal blow to them."

Frankfort soon caught the contagion of the anti-Jewish disturbances in the other cities of Germany. They were all the more likely to culminate in deeds of violence in that city since the populace knew that in its hatred of the Jews it enjoyed the sympathy of the highest authorities in the town. The occasion for the outbreak was a trifling one. On the evening of August 10, 1819, some youths walked through the Jewish quarter provocatively shouting "Hepp, Hepp!" Several Jews who happened to be standing at their doors joined to drive the youths out of their street, and beat one of the brawlers who had fallen into their hands. Thereupon the rumor spread through Frankfort like lightning that a Christian had been killed by the Jews.

Crowds collected instantaneously and moved shouting through the Jewish quarter, breaking up windows and shops with stones. The house of the Rothschilds was also attacked, and all their window-panes lay scattered about the streets. The family had had to take refuge in the back room, where they listened trembling to the threatening shouts of the mob.

On the morning of the nth, the words "Hepp, hepp," the slogan for driving out the loathed Jew, were inscribed in large letters at all the street corners. Thereupon several wealthy Israelites left the inhospitable town of Frankfort, and the brothers Rothschild nearly followed their example. As the disturbances increased the senate began to be alarmed that the Jew-baiting might develop into a general rising. The available troops were called up to hold the excited populace in check. Moreover, the delegates to the diet, feeling particularly concerned about the attacks on the House of Rothschild, which had important financial connections with most of the governments represented at the diet, demanded that counter-measures should be taken. A general resolution of the diet was proposed, requiring the senate to take strong measures to protect the security and property of the Jews.

Count Buol would certainly have been acting in accordance with the wishes of Prince Metternich in pressing energetically, at any rate on behalf of Austria, for such measures to be taken by the senate. Buol, however, who was hostile to the Jews, hesitated and waited for instructions. Not so the Prussian representative, Counselor of Embassy Himly. On the very morning of August 11 he gave a "most worshipful council of the free city of Frankfort to understand[37] that he had the fullest confidence that the council would take the most appropriate measures for punishing the attack made upon the house of the royal Prussian commercial advisers, Meyer Amschel von Rothschild and Sons, and would assure their persons and property adequate protection against similar risks in the future." Himly added, "The undersigned kindly requests the earliest possible information regarding the measures which an honorable council have taken in this matter."

The mayors Metzler and von Usemer replied that the disturbances in the Jewish quarter had immediately subsided, and that the senate had taken the strongest measures to prevent their recurrence. The senate added to this statement that the protection of the laws extended to all the inhabitants, and therefore also to the merchants Rothschild, and that the events of the previous night would be reviewed most strictly, and the ringleaders punished.[38] This read well, but bore little relation to reality, for although actual attacks upon the houses of the Jews ceased, the hatred of their inhabitants had come into the open, and this kept the Jews in a state of anxiety.

James in Paris had heard with great alarm of what had occurred at Frankfort, and had urged his brother to leave his home. "You will have read in the public press," he wrote to David Parish at Carlsbad, "how on the night of the 10th of this month mobs collected in the streets of Frankfort and poured forth threats and imprecations upon the Jewish community. Prompt measures on the part of a praiseworthy senate have scattered the ring-leaders and, according to the last reports I have received, have restored order.

"You can readily imagine that such occurrences are as unpleasant as they are unexpected nowadays. What can be the result of such disturbances? Surely they can have the effect only of causing all the rich people of our nation to leave Germany and transfer their property to France and England. I myself have advised my brother at Frankfort to shut down his house and to come here. If we make a start I am convinced that all well-to-do people will follow our example, and I question whether the sovereigns of Germany will be pleased with a development that will make it necessary for them to apply to France or England when they are in need of funds.

"Who buys state bonds in Germany, and who has endeavored to raise the rate of exchange if it be not our nation? Has not our example engendered a certain confidence in state loans, so that Christian firms have also taken heart and invested part of their money in all kinds of securities? The Jewish community in Germany is not allowed to learn the various crafts, so that there is nothing left for them to do but to become dealers in money ana stocks.

"A man generally has the greatest confidence in the securities of the country in which he lives; if the peace of the rich in Germany be disturbed, they will find themselves forced to emigrate for their safety; and they will certainly not take any interest in the funds of a country where their life has been obviously endangered. The object of the agitators at Frankfort seems to have been provisionally to collect all the Israelites into a single street; if they had succeeded in doing this, might it not have led to a general massacre? In that case would the public have had any scruples about plundering their houses?

"I need not point out to you how undesirable such an occurrence would be, especially at a time when our house might be holding large sums for the account of the Austrian or Prussian court. It seems to me to be really necessary that Austria or Prussia should devise measures to be applied by the senate at Frankfort for energetically dealing with occurrences such as those of the 10th of this month, and thus making each man secure in his possessions.

"I am sure you will be so good as to speak to his Highness Prince Metternich about this matter, and your friendship for me makes me feel confident that you will appeal to him strongly on behalf of our nation. I am informed that Herr von Bethmann was particularly conspicuous among those who endeavored to restore order."[39]

The advice which James gave from abroad did not take into account the important interests that would have to be sacrificed if the firm that was so deeply rooted in its native city, where it was the center of an intricate network of business connections, were to change its headquarters. The brothers who were resident at Frankfort did certainly consider the question of leaving the town, but when order had been restored they gave up the idea for the time. Amschel Meyer, as head of the firm, was tied to Frankfort. But in Solomon and Carl, who were freer to move about, the events at Frankfort had produced a certain uneasiness, which made them inclined to welcome any future opportunity for settling elsewhere.

Baron von Handel attentively noted the results of the Jewish disturbances. Some rich Jewish firms such as Ellissen and Speyer did actually transfer their headquarters to the Hessian town of Offenbach close by; and a persistent rumor was maintained that the Rothschilds would follow them.

"The great and rich House of Rothschild," Handel reported to Metternich, "is supposed to be not entirely averse to the idea of leaving here; and if they should do so, they would probably take up permanent residence in Paris or London, where they already have branches. The question suggests itself whether it would not be in our interests to offer them the prospect of a good reception in the I. and R. states, and to induce the House to emigrate to Vienna."[40]

This report was communicated to the committee of the treasury dealing with commercial affairs at Vienna.[41] The next day another letter from Handel arrived, stating that the inclination of the Rothschild banking firm to leave Frankfort was becoming more and more marked. The treasury committee for commercial affairs transmitted these to the ministry of finance and the interior for their information and observation, adding[42] that Amschel von Rothschild spent a hundred and fifty thousand gulden on his household alone and that he gave twenty thousand gulden a year to the poor. The committee were of opinion that the firm of Rothschild was at liberty to apply to be received in the I. and R. states. Count Stadion thereupon wrote the following to the minister of the interior, Count Saurau:

"The president of the treasury committee has informed me in the enclosed letter of his intention to invite the Frankfort firm of Rothschild to settle in Vienna, and also of the means whereby, subject to my agreement, he proposes to prepare the way to this end. The settlement of the House of Rothschild within the Austrian dominions would without doubt be of great advantage, and the proposal is therefore deserving of every support, although Hofrat von Handel's letter does not suggest that the House have expressed any desire to emigrate to the Austrian dominions. It merely raises the question whether an effort should be made to induce them to do so."[43]

As the reception of the Jewish families was a matter that concerned the minister of the interior, Stadion referred the suggestion to him, with the request that he approve it. Count Saurau sent his reply direct to the president of the treasury committee, conveying his decision to Stadion in the form of a copy of that letter, which read as follows:[44]

I venture first to call your Excellency's attention to the fact . . . that it is still quite uncertain whether the firm of Rothschild intends to leave Frankfort. Still less may we infer (from the reports) any clearly expressed preference for settling in Vienna. It would seem indeed exceedingly doubtful whether the House of Rothschild would choose for permanent residence a place where its principal would, in view of his religious persuasion, be subject to more restrictions than in any other state. Your Excellency must be aware that foreign Israelites may reside here only on obtaining the special "toleration" permit, which cannot be issued until they have duly received the provisional authorization for wholesale trading.

The department is not competent to make an exception to the I. and R. regulations regarding this matter, and its action would be limited ... to approving the request of the House of Rothschild for permission to reside, if submitted. In view of the complicated conditions, which are not likely to attract the House of Rothschild, it would seem especially desirable to avoid any step that suggested an invitation, and to leave it to them to apply, since special exceptions can be made only with the personal approval of the emperor. Meanwhile your Excellency may rest assured that we are far too well aware of the advantages that would in many respects accrue to the imperial state of Austria through the settlement of such an eminent firm within its borders, not to advise his Majesty most emphatically to give his consent as soon as a formal or definite application in this matter is received.

Handel was accordingly instructed that if the House of Rothschild made inquiries at the legation he was to indicate that they should submit an application. In any case, the report of the department revealed that it desired the House of Rothschild to emigrate to Vienna.

This was all the more remarkable as the position of the Jews in Austria was far from being an enviable one. They had not the right of owning land in any part of the imperial dominions; law and custom excluded them from administration and the courts, from the practice of the law and from the teaching profession, from all higher posts in the army, and from any political functions and offices. They were restricted in the matter of marriages; they had to pay poll tax and report themselves to the Jewish office, and foreign Jews were allowed to remain in the country only for a short period.

Such were the circumstances in which the highest officials in the state of Austria were trying to induce a foreign Jewish family to settle in the country. But that family was enormously rich; its financial influence was immense; and money overcame all other considerations. Soon a Rothschild House was to be established in Vienna too.

Frankfort was becoming exceedingly uncomfortable for the Rothschild family. The brothers were constantly receiving anonymous threats. One letter[45] informed them of the day on which Amschel was to be murdered by a secret society formed for the purpose of driving the Jews out of Frankfort. In spite of all this the firm continued to carry on its business undisturbed, the Austrian side of it particularly developing with the help of Metternich and Stadion.

Austrian affairs were chiefly left to Solomon. In mid-July of that year the firm of Rothschild had undertaken jointly with Gontard to arrange for the transfer from Naples of large sums of money which that kingdom had owed Austria since the intervention of 1815. Also sums to the value of about three million francs, payable in satisfaction of Austria's claims upon France, were transmitted to Vienna, the firm of Rothschild receiving one percent of the payments effected.[46] Finally, the brothers had heard from a confidential source in Milan that there was an amount of money in the state treasury there[47] which the government wished to transfer to Vienna. They immediately offered to carry this out.

It involved a transmission of two million lira in gold Coins, and Solomon, who was again staying at Vienna, quickly got into personal touch with the treasury in order to discuss the best means of sending this sum from Milan to Vienna through exchange operations. The firm of Rothschild stated that they would undertake the transfer of any sum whatever at the cheapest rate possible, and that they could arrange the business to the greatest advantage of the imperial interests.[48] For this service they and the firm of Gontard received one-half percent commission and one-eighth percent brokerage, so that for the simple transmission of the money from Milan to Vienna they received 12,933 lira in gold.

Their extensive transactions necessitated a voluminous correspondence, the rapid transmission of which was a difficult problem under the primitive conditions of those times. It was not only that posts were slow and far between; there were special dangers attached to the postal service because the contents of correspondence was not treated as inviolable. A large part of Germany was still served by the Thurn and Taxis post bureaus which were divided into lodges and non-lodges,[49] according as their officials were or were not the confidential agents of the Viennese Cipher Service.

If a letter came to a lodge office, it was carefully opened before being sent on, read through, and any important passages were copied. As these "intercepts," as they were called, were always laid before the authorities, such action, often abused, was greatly feared. Even Count Stadion did not hesitate[50] personally to invent "intercepts" in order to ruin persons who were a nuisance to him. Sometimes the couriers themselves intercepted letters in transit.

"Such inspection," Bethmann wrote on the occasion of a visit to Vienna,[51] "is inevitable, and Rothschild and Parish are as little able to avoid it as Herr von Geymiiller, although the latter enjoys the full confidence of Prince Metternich. Solomon Rothschild yesterday told me that his brother had recently again received three letters from him in one day."

The brothers Rothschild naturally thoroughly understood the position. As they had a great deal to say to one another that they did not wish anyone else to hear and also attached great importance to the speedy receipt of news in advance of normal methods, they decided to have their own system of couriers. They would be reimbursed for the heavy expense of this arrangement at one stroke if their firm thereby received early news of any political event that might affect the exchange.

An example of this occurred when the Duke of Berry was murdered. The duke was the nephew of the King of France, and as Louis XVIII had no children, the hopes of the Bourbons were centered upon him. As he was leaving the opera on February 13, 1820, he was assassinated by a political fanatic who thought to save France by exterminating the Bourbons. According to Handel's statement[52] the Rothschilds heard of this long before anyone else; they made appropriate arrangements for themselves, and then made the event known. This resulted in an immediate fall in all state securities, and produced "general consternation."

The courier system was at first inaugurated between the three brothers in London, Frankfort, and Paris. When the business with Austria accumulated, and Solomon's visits there grew more and more lengthy, the couriers extended their route to include Vienna.

The Austrian representatives in London, Frankfort, and Paris, being in constant communication with the House of Rothschild, soon realized that reports could be more speedily sent in this manner and, as remarks on numerous documents showed, frequently entrusted the Rothschild couriers with the most important and secret letters, without considering whether the Rothschilds might turn the tables and themselves "intercept" the state communications. This certainly cannot be proved, but it is highly probable, for on one occasion, when the brothers entrusted a letter to an ambassador, the letter was immediately "perused." Proof of this is furnished by the following two letters: on November 28, 1819,[53] Handel reported as follows to Metternich: "The banker Carl von Rothschild, who left for Vienna today, asked us to put several letters to various German ministers meeting at Vienna, which he had been asked to take with him, in a packet and seal it with the embassy seal, so that he could bring them over the frontier without risk. I made no difficulty about acceding to the request of Herr von Rothschild—who like other Jews is exceedingly timid but is a person of sound character—because this favor made it possible to see the contents of the letters. Rothschild duly sent them to me and although I had not time to peruse them all, I was able to scan the more important." The other letter was from[54] Le Monnier, the secretary of legation at Frankfort, to the director of the secret service department at Vienna. It ran as follows: "Herr Rothschild [no doubt Amschel Meyer], whom I often meet at Count Buol's as well as at Baron von Handel's, has asked me to allow him to send his letters to his brother in my bag. I did not raise any objection as I did not think it advisable to refuse; but I venture to suggest that you should inform the secret service department of this fact so that they may look out for these letters and intercept all those under my address."

It is not at all unlikely that the brothers Rothschild, who must be credited with a reasonable amount of intelligence, sometimes deliberately had letters sent through the embassies in order to put them in possession of facts which had been invented or adapted for definite purposes.

The financial position of all the states which had been engaged in prolonged military operations much needed to be set in order, now that peace and tranquillity had returned. In Austria, Stadion was dealing with this problem in collaboration with Metternich. Metternich was personally concerned to see that Stadion was profitably occupied in the financial matters, to which he had been sidetracked when the chancellor succeeded to the Foreign Office. His rival would then feel that he had plenty to do, and the financial strengthening of the monarchy would assist the policy of the chancellor. There were thus two men controlling the destinies of Austria who were well disposed to the Jews in general and to the House of Rothschild in particular.

In 1816, in addition to the interest-bearing state debt, there was an almost equal amount of paper money in circulation which was worth a quarter less than its face value. Stadion's efforts were directed toward preventing any further fall in value, through the issue of loans and other measures such as the founding of a national bank. The Metalliques loan, so called because the interest on the bonds was payable in precious metal, constituted a beginning. Stadion was in agreement with Metternich that the House of Rothschild should always be treated with consideration politically, with a view to inducing it also to participate in a loan. Since these were Metternich's plans, it is not strange that he should have been much

Frankfort was described as a center of unrest[55] in the reports from the delegates at this period. This was quite enough reason for Metternich, who scented revolution and upheaval everywhere, to feel displeased with that city. He accordingly intervened to prevent the diet from leaving the settlement of the Jewish problem to the municipal departments. Metternich and Stadion also decided to accede to the request made a year and a day previously that Nathan should be appointed consul in London. On March 3, 1820, the emperor gave his formal sanction in this matter.[56]

The ambassador in London, Prince von Esterhazy, was instructed [57] to inform Nathan of his new sphere of activity, and to encourage him "through friendly advice and any other suitable means to carry out his duties in the manner which the state expected." Official instructions were simultaneously sent to Nathan in London[58] informing him not merely that he should duly carry out the duties imposed upon him by the I. and R. embassy, hut that he should, without waiting to be asked, regularly convey to them any information he received regarding events that might directly or indirectly affect the government's policy.

On Metternich's instructions Handel, the minister at Frankfort, had in November, 1819,[59] entered into negotiations with Rothschild for the big loan that Austria wanted to place with the firm.

Since that time the distinctions and favors already described had with deliberate intent been accorded to the House of Rothschild. Nathan now had a position in the consular corps of the British capital, a fact which was exceedinghy valuable to him both socially and in business. He was able to give Amschel powerful support in his struggle for the rights of the Frankfort Jews.

The ground had thus been well prepared for a favorable reception of the Austrian loan. The national bank required about 55,000,000 gulden in order to withdraw the paper money from circulation. On April 4 the emperor had authorized the minister of finance to issue the loan, which in accordance with Stadion's suggestion was to be done in two parts. On April 7 the first 20,000,000 gulden were, in accordance with Solomon's suggestion, issued to the firms of Rothschild and Parish in the form of a lottery loan, a method which was still unusual at that time, and which never failed of its effect upon the general public.

Nothing was said at the time of the negotiations that were already in progress for the issue of a further 35,000-gulden loan; and everyone subscribed to this loan in the confident belief that it would be the only lottery loan for the time being. The conditions were very oppressive to the Austrian state, although the redemption of the loan extended over quite a long period; under the agreement, the state had to repay in all 38,000,000 in return for the 20,000,000 then advanced. This naturally produced an adverse opinion in the general public, which was ignorant as to the general financial position and Stadion's intentions, and had only these figures to go upon.

A contemporary police report states[60] that the announcement of the Rothschild lottery loan had had a very bad effect upon public sentiment. The government's credit when it had scarcely begun to recover was appreciably lowered.

"As far as the Rothschild loan is concerned," the report continued, "I feel a genuine difficulty in deciding where to commence with my description of the exceedingly unfavorable impression . . . made by this financial operation, not only upon the Viennese public, but also upon the inhabitants of all the provinces. It would not be in accordance with the modesty due from one in my position to record the harsh expressions used by the opponents of this measure in. describing it as a monument of frivolity, caprice, and self-interest—indeed as being an immoral transaction. There have probably not been such numerous critics and opponents of any previous financial operation.

"I heard a guest at an At Home exclaim, 'This loan is one of the most wicked things that have been done at the expense of our pockets for twenty years, and that is saying a great deal!' One thing generally felt about this loan is that the manner in which it was made public inevitably made it unpopular from the start. To notify the inhabitants of a state that 20,000,000 were being borrowed from a foreign Jew, for which 38,000,000—very nearly double the amount—would have to be repaid, is regarded as treating one's subjects as beneath contempt. ... It is felt that the announcement of the loan in the "Wiener Zeitung amounted to the finance minister's saying: 'I am well aware that your expenditure being greater than your income you have not enough money to pay your taxes. Now in order that in future you may be still less able to pay them I shall still further limit the amount of money in circulation and therefore your income. In return for this benefit you will have to pay 38 millions to the Jew Rothschild.'"

The writer of this report emphasized the fact that there appeared to be no conceivable excuse for excluding the public from participating directly in such an advantageous financial speculation as the lottery loan, and for putting it in the hands of a foreign Jew. Citizens were being compelled to purchase the lottery bonds from foreign Jews at a premium of from 10% to 18%.

"I am assured by bankers here," the report continued, "that the profit which the contractors have made out of this loan is enormous. To the four millions granted them by way of commission must be added what they will realize through the sale of the bonds, which they do not issue at under 100 gulden. The Rothschild who is living here himself admits that this profit will increase from year to year, and that he hopes the bonds will rise to 200 by the second drawing, and to 400 by the tenth drawing! And this is not at all unlikely, since Rothschild is holding back the sale of the bonds, thereby increasing his chances of a tremendous gain.

"The whole transaction is felt to be a shameful Jewish swindle arranged between the Rothschilds and the crown agent Joel. The latter is supposed to have persuaded the minister of finance, or rather his department, to agree to it, and in return Joel or Joelson is alleged to have received 1,000 bonds, Count Stadion 2,000, and Burgermeister, the secretary of the treasury, 500. I personally regard all these statements as slanders without any foundation. The feeling about the loan was so bitter at first that a proposal was made among all ranks of society to form leagues, the members of which should pledge themselves not to take bonds exceeding the value of 100 gulden from the Rothschilds."

There were other critics who did not deny that Stadion's intentions were honest, but gave him to understand that they believed the minister of finance had been hopelessly done.

The figures contained in this police report somewhat exaggerated the facts, but expressed the feeling of the public that enormous profits had been made out of this business. In spite of the declared boycott there was an extraordinarily brisk demand for the Rothschild lottery, bonds. The offices were literally besieged with applicants, and the bonds soon rose to no, 120, 150, and even higher.

The Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung had published articles by Gentz and other agents of the Rothschilds, which under the title "Financial Letters" recommended the "exceptionally favorable lottery." Enticed by these developments, Stadion decided in accordance with the authorization which he had received, to issue the further 35,000,000 gulden four months after the first loan. Rothschild and Parish paid out 35,000,000 gulden of convention currency in cash in twelve monthly instalments, in return for acknowledgments of indebtedness. The terms were such that the state would have to repay 76,821,515 gulden as capital and interest in return for the 35,000,000 gulden which it had received. In addition the state paid a commission of 4%, amounting to 1,400,000 gulden.

These conditions which were approved by Emperor Francis made the loan one of the most lucrative transactions of the time. For the firm not merely exploited the public's gambling instincts to sell the bonds at a good price, it also influenced the rate of exchange through its connections with the principal bourses. It was obvious that the Rothschilds would have to reckon with the fall In the price of the twenty-million issue as soon as it became known that a further loan of thirty-five millions was to be made so soon afterwards. But before this was made public they had placed the original issue at a price well above par, so that when the second loan was issued the earlier bonds were almost all in other people's hands.

There was naturally at once a storm of indignation against the enterprising bankers; but the first issue soon recovered, and the bonds of both issues were eagerly sought. The public indignation subsided; the Austrian State had its millions in cash; and the Rothschilds remained in undisturbed possession of their profits.

The negotiations necessitated by these important and extensive transactions had made essential the continuous presence in Vienna of a member of the Rothschild House. The discussions were carried on almost exclusively by Solomon Rothschild, although he was acting in concert with his brothers. This enormous business, however, required constant personal attention in its further stages also; and it was therefore necessary for Solomon to try to obtain some permanent pied a terre at Vienna. The laws of the country did not allow a foreign Jew to buy a house of his own, and perhaps such was not his original intention. The firm did not yet contemplate establishing a branch similar to those in London and Paris, although this was done eventually as the result of its intimate association with the finance and policy of Austria.

Solomon Rothschild had taken up his quarters in one of the leading hostelries of Vienna, known as the Hotel of the Roman Emperor, No. 1 Renngasse. It had some of the most distinguished visitors at that time, including the King of Wurttemberg in the year 1820. This was the only hotel with a large concert room,[61] and its acoustic properties were excellent. Beethoven often gave recitals there, and occasionally he stayed, it is supposed, at the Roman Emperor.

Solomon lived at the hotel until he was given the freedom of the city of Vienna. Eventually, it is true, he was the only guest in the hotel, for he occupied all the rooms. In the end he bought the building, as well as the house next it, No. 3 Renngasse. This is still in the possession of the family, while an insurance company acquired what was once the Roman Emperor Hotel.

Meanwhile Metternich's confidence in the firm of Rothschild had increased. The family perceived this, and when they saw any signs of big business they would let him know through Gentz that they would like to carry it out. James had learned in Paris that the allies had decided in 1815 to put aside twenty million francs of the Paris war indemnity for the erection of a fourth confederate fortress on the Rhine.[62]

James in Paris and Solomon in Vienna immediately offered to send this money to Frankfort so that the diet might have it available in current coin at their headquarters. Metternich was unduly attracted by the firm's offer to transmit the funds without charging commission or anything for expenses, and overlooked the profit to be derived on the rate of exchange. He therefore decided jointly with the Prussian secretary of state that this business should be carried through by the firm of Rothschild.

The two brothers, by a concerted arrangement, each made an offer that, if the money were left in their hands, the one in Paris would pay 3 1/2% and the one in Vienna would pay 3% until the building work on the fortress actually commenced. That might be a long time yet, as indeed events proved. Barbier observed in this connection (in a letter to Buol)[63] that in carrying out Metternich's instructions he had arranged that the diet should retain the right to demand security for the twenty millions from the House of Rothschild if this sum were deposited with them.

"The House of Rothschild," he wrote, "is undoubtedly one of the richest and best-established firms in Europe, but we thought it wiser to take this precaution as over twenty million francs are involved, which may be on deposit with them for quite a long period if the construction of the new fortress should be still further delayed."

Thus while the government itself paid 5% for ready money it left this large sum on deposit with the firm of Rothschild at 3 1/2% interest for an indefinite time. The banking firm got the advantage of this unexpectedly cheap money just when important political events in the South of Europe threatened to disturb the peaceful atmosphere that had been prevailing since the Congress of Vienna.

The Liberals in Spain had forced the promise of a constitution from King Ferdinand VII, who had been reinstated there. Civil war continued in that country, while the victory which the Liberals had won infected the excitable population in other lands similarly oppressed. Revolution broke out in the kingdom of Naples, where the nationalistic aims of the secret league of the Carbonari had affected wide circles of the population. On his restoration by the Austrians in 1815 King Ferdinand I, an upholder of the principle of absolute autocracy, gladly accepted Metternich's condition that he should make no concessions to the Liberals, and should govern in accordance with the Metternich system. Now, however, that he was threatened by popular rising, he yielded all along the line and made the ringleader, General Pepe, commander-in-chief, and pledged himself to a constitution on the Spanish model.

A similar movement was making progress in the island of Sicily, where the king's ministers had to make way for new men who were popular with the Carbonari. One of these ministers was the brilliant Luigi Cavaliere de Medici, who managed to maintain order in the finances in spite of the extravagances of the ruling family, and the privileges of the nobility and priesthood.

Metternich, who was watching over Europe like a guardian angel, resented any signs of resistance to his "principle of legitimacy." He had been deeply disturbed by the news from Italy, which was within Austria's sphere of interest. If the revolutionary spirit should spread from Naples to the North and infect the territories that were under Austrian dominion, there was no saying what the results might be. He saw that his political system, his influence, which already extended through the whole of Europe, and the very existence of all the old legitimist monarchies were endangered. He felt that every effort must be made to meet this peril, and summoned another conference of monarchs to consider the point. The conference met at Troppau in October, 1820, to discuss the principles to be applied if revolutionaries tried to impose changes in the form of government anywhere in Europe.

The congress was moved to Laibach, and Metternich arranged that the King of Naples should be asked to attend. Scarcely had the king crossed the frontiers of his revolutionary country before he forgot all the concessions he had granted to the people, and assured the envoy of the eastern powers that they had been wrung from him by force, and that he loathed constitution and Carbonarism. The congress decided in January, 1821, in spite of the objections made by England and France, to restore order in Ferdinand's kingdom by occupying Naples. Metternich had succeeded in a masterly manner in gaining over the tsar to his point of view.

"It is a matter of indifference," he stated to that monarch,[64] "whether the word be Bonaparte or the sovereignty of the people; they are equally dangerous and must therefore both be resisted. The Neapolitan revolt, and everything connected with it, must be completely stamped out, or else the powers themselves will be destroyed."

Metternich concentrated absolutely on his one great political object, the overthrow of revolution. The troops and money necessary for this purpose had to be forthcoming, and it was up to generals and financiers to see to the ways and means.

The news of Metternich's plans, involving as they did heavy additional expenditure, came as a severe shock to Stadion, who had done so much to put Austria's finances on a sound basis. He saw the edifice which he had spent rears to erect shaken to its foundations. The revolutions had also affected the bourses, and state securities were falling in price. Metternich, however, succeeded in being so convincing through his influence with the press, and the passionate communications sent by him from Laibach, that even those who had reason to be alarmed about their property became adherents of Metternich's plans of armed intervention in Naples. The chancellor had inquired of Stadion as to how the money could be found, and whether Naples would subscribe to a loan. Stadion sent the following confidential letter in reply:[65]

"Even our financiers, led by Rothschild and Parish, are anxious to see our troops across the Po at the earliest possible moment, and marching on Naples. I have written to Count von Mercy regarding the Neapolitan loan.

I suppose you have spoken only to Rothschild about it? I have never mentioned it to Parish, because I do not know how far Rothschild wants him to come into such a business (parceque je ne sais en combien Rothschild voudmis de lui dans une pareille affaire). In any case it is essential to lay our plans carefully so that the money does not merely come in at one door to go out of the other."

As Stadion considered the matter more closely, he began to feel distinctly uneasy. In normal circumstances the deficit for the year 1821 would have amounted to eight million gulden; but very heavy additional sums of money were now required for the expeditionary force to Italy, and the greater part of this cash would have to be found immediately. As Stadion came to consider the heavy demands made upon the treasury by Metternich's policy, he felt a growing sense of bitterness. Metternich, the chancellor whose financial ideas did not extend much beyond a general realization that a state no less than a private individual must have money, carried out his policy without any consideration of the cost. Stadion was expected to produce the necessary funds as if by magic, and he really was at a loss how to do it.

The chancellor advised Stadion to see the Rothschilds, and urged him to discuss with the brothers the means for raising the amount necessary for the campaign. The emigrant Jews from Frankfort had suddenly become the sheet-anchor for Austria's two leading statesmen, one of whom exercised an influence upon the destinies of Europe extending far beyond the boundaries of the imperial dominions.

While at Laibach, Metternich had asked Count Nesselrode, the Russian minister for foreign affairs, who was just about to leave for Vienna, to urge Stadion to ask Solomon Rothschild to come himself to Laibach and express his personal opinion there regarding the issue of loans to Russia and Austria. The chancellor also wrote a letter to Solomon Rothschild on January 29, 1821, making this suggestion, but Solomon was not prepared to leave Vienna at a time when the political situation was such that prices on the bourse were fluctuating violently from day to day. He therefore wrote the following letter to Count Nesselrode:[66]

YOUR EXCELLENCY:
With reference to the business matter under consideration, I venture most respectfully to observe that a discussion on this matter at Laibach, and my presence there, might give rise to numerous and probably highly inaccurate newspaper reports. Persons with base motives would unearth the fact that a loan to the most gracious of monarchs was being discussed; rumor would be piled upon rumor, and this would not be at all agreeable in the highest quarters. For this reason I submissively venture to suggest to your Excellency—and Finance Minister Count von Stadion agrees with my proposal—that the business be negotiated here with our finance minister. My continued presence here would dissipate all rumors, while everything would be carried on under the strictest seal of secrecy, and the business could be transacted in peace and quietness.

Solomon Rothschild sent a similar communication to Count Stadion at the same time, and the count immediately wrote[67] to Metternich to say that in his opinion Solomon's contention that neither he nor any other banker should'go to the congress at Laibach was absolutely sound. "In addition to the arguments which he has brought forward," he wrote, "I submit that the following points have to be taken into consideration. The loan in question (which ought to cover the costs of the expedition), can be only a Neapolitan loan, guaranteed for the greater security of the powers. It can be prepared under these conditions, but its formal conclusion must take place in Naples, after our troops have entered the city and occupied it. . . . Until that moment the public must know nothing whatever about it; for the loan would go very badly if we were only like the person in the fable offering the bear's skin, and it could be issued only on very unfavorable terms. It would immediately suggest that we were in lack of money, which fortunately is not yet the case; but the mere belief that we were would seriously damage not only our credit but our political position generally.

"Rothschild is here able to control his business and his correspondence from the center, and day by day, in collaboration with our finance department and his business friends, to decide upon the steps or transactions that seem to him appropriate to prevailing conditions. He cannot carry on his work effectively anywhere but here, while it is only here that we can examine the means that he adopts to carry out the wishes and intentions of the governments. These means must be brought into harmony with our general system of credit, since the loan is destined ultimately to find its way into the Austrian Treasury. . . .

"I feel myself compelled to observe that whatever view one takes of the situation Austria alone will have to bear the burdens of the military operations until Naples is occupied. When we get there it appears to me that the three following matters will have to be dealt with: first, our troops will have to be entirely maintained by that country; secondly, we shall have to obtain compensation for the costs otherwise incurred through their stay in the kingdom of Naples; and thirdly, we shall have to obtain an indemnity that will partially make good our advances.

"Rothschild believes that if the sum exceeds—the loan ought not to be too heavy—one million pounds, or about twenty-four million francs, cela se pourrait faire pour ainsi dire une bonne fortune a Londres. I have not yet gone far enough into the matter to be able to judge how far his hopes are well founded."

At the same time Solomon wrote the following letter to Metternich:

Your Highness was graciously pleased to send me your command of the 29th ultimo. Although it gives me great pleasure to show my zeal in fulfilling your Highness's wishes at all times, and happy though I always am to wait upon you, I feel it my duty to avoid doing anything which would attract attention. ... A journey to Laibach at this time would arouse such attention, and would give rise to all kinds of conjectures. . . .
Ever devoted to your Highness's commands I beg to remain in deepest respect Your Highness's Most Obedient Servant,
S. M. VON ROTHSCHILD.[68]

Stadion's letter had revealed the whole plan that was to be carried out: Naples was to pay everything, and Rothschild was to arrange loans at the expense of that country, the proceeds of which were to be applied for paying for Austria's unwanted intervention.
Meanwhile things had begun to move. The Austrian, General Frimont, crossed the Po on February 5, 1821, with 43,000 men, and began to march on Naples. Solomon Rothschild perceived with satisfaction that Austria's statesmen were dependent on him for finance, and saw the prospect of realizing substantial profits. He accordingly hastened to place sums at their disposal, with a view to securing the possible business at Naples entirely for himself.
Stadion wrote to Metternich:[69] "Rothschild and Parish"—who had apparently, against Rothschild's wishes, been informed of this affair by Gentz—"are provisionally offering to make me advances and to transfer sums direct to Naples apart from the loan. Rothschild is already concluding agreements in Paris and London for this purpose, or at any rate he says he is."

A week later Stadion wrote saying:[70] "For some days Rothschild has been effecting transfers of money to one or several banking firms (in Naples), and by the time we get there about three million francs will be available. These can be immediately placed at the disposal of our government. I only wish that I could always be informed of the requirements in good time so that I could make the necessary arrangements. Until the day before yesterday nobody asked for a single gulden of cash for the whole march of our troops from the Po to the Neapolitan frontier; and then a courier arrived demanding an urgent credit of 250,000 gulden at Florence. It seems to me that this should have been foreseen and provided for a long time ago. Fortunately, Rothschild has money and credit everywhere, and he was therefore able immediately to provide me with the advance I wanted, as well as an additional advance of 100,000 gulden. . . ."

Stadion was already relying largely upon the House of Rothschild, which rendered that statesman the most welcome services in his embarrassment, although certainly not without cherishing the hope that they would be duly rewarded. The finance minister had sent Metternich a detailed scheme regarding the contemplated Neapolitan loan.

"I am awaiting," he wrote to the chancellor, "your reply to my last memorandum regarding the Neapolitan loan, so that I may carry the matter further with my friend Solomon Rothschild. It is absolutely impossible for him to travel to Naples, and he is asking one of his brothers to come over from Frankfort and go on to Naples. This brother is expected by the end of the month. He has also written to Paris to say that a confidential servant of his firm—by name Salicey—who is thoroughly familiar with Naples, should proceed there without delay."[71] public had been kept completely in the dark for ten days regarding the progress of events and the present position of the troops.

Solomon had realized that it was absolutely essential that a member of his firm should go to Naples. It was not exactly pleasant to go there as there was a revolution in progress, and the Austrian troops would have some hard fighting; nevertheless Solomon summoned Carl, the only one of the five brothers who so far had no independent sphere of his own.

Carl had, since his youngest days, been accustomed to making long journeys on his father's business. Now at the age of thirty-three a promising field for his activities was offered him, although it was in a country that he had only once casually visited, and the language of which he did not know. This, however, did not affect the matter, for it seemed to be a merely provisional arrangement, and Carl little guessed that Naples would come to be his permanent place of abode. On March 1, Carl Rothschild arrived at Vienna from Frankfort and immediately called on Stadion.

"Un petit frere Rothschild," Stadion reported to Metternich,[72] "has just arrived here on his way to Naples. I am engaged in working out with the two brothers the most important conditions regarding the loan which they will issue. I hope to send young Rothschild to Laibach Wednesday, or at the latest next Thursday. You will there be able, my dear prince, to inform him whither he should then proceed. I hope that it will be to Naples, and that you will have occasion to send him as speedily as possible."

On March 6, Carl did in fact go to Laibach. Stadion was hoping that in the course of its advance the army would acquire a few millions for the Austrian Treasury, which was sadly in need of them. "I have to point out," he wrote, "that the declaration of war by Naples without a shot having been fired is sufficient ground for us to declare our right to indemnity from the date when our troops crossed the Po."[73]

Meanwhile the Austrian army was approaching the Abruzzi, which was the easiest territory between Austria and Naples for the enemy to defend. Its march was somewhat delayed through the insufficiency of provisions and of money. Count Ficquelmont, who was accompanying the army on his way to take up his duties as ambassador at Naples, wrote: "We are all suffering acutely from the disastrous shortage of money." Application was made at Rome to Torlonia and other banking firms, but in vain. A stirring appeal was made by Metternich with a view to remedying these evils. On receiving a report from Vienna, Metternich had published a statement regarding the whole expedition, in order to pacify the Viennese public, who did not understand what business Austria had in Naples. Count Sedlnitzky welcomed this step, wishing the chancellor luck in carrying on his policy on the grand scale, and reported:[74]

"Through an arrangement made in the nick of time by the thoroughly worthy House of Rothschild and other firms, regarding Wertheimer's failure, the market here has been saved from being flooded with Metalliques bonds, and a gradual rise in their value as well as in that of other state securities has been effected. This has had an excellent effect upon public opinion in the middle classes and in the business world."

The minister of police considered the critics and malcontents to be especially numerous among so-called men of learning, and even in several higher circles and in the army. "Nevertheless," he wrote, "we may count ourselves fortunate, if we compare public sentiment here with that in other countries."

Stadion, however, who was constantly receiving applications for money, was not equally satisfied. He viewed the future with dismay, and was utterly at a loss to see how he could provide the money for everything that was being done. He suddenly heard that a general had stated during the court ball that the emperor had recently commanded the pay of the Neapolitan Expeditionary Force to be increased, and a new recruiting law to be carried into effect which would add almost 100,000 men to the strength of the army.

"I was absolutely overwhelmed with surprise," he wrote in alarm to Metternich,[75] "by this news, and by the manner in which I learned it. If this is true, it will involve a permanent additional expenditure on our armies of more than ten millions. I have not got this money and I see no prospect of getting it. Things cannot go on like this. I feel that I have already reached the utmost limit of what is possible. . . .

"It is very easy to send out handbills, but in order to translate them into reality the emperor must find a man who can feed fifteen thousand men with five loaves. I cannot refrain from protesting against the way things are being done. His Majesty does not allow himself to spend even two hundred florins on his gardens; he does not sanction a pension to save a poor family from hunger without sometimes consulting me several times in the matter. And now we are to have an additional expenditure of ten million which it is difficult to justify. . . , So far from consulting me in fixing this sum, which is far beyond anything we can possibly raise, it was not even thought worth while to inform me of the decision.

"In such circumstances my position, which I have always regarded as the great misfortune of my life, has become quite impossible. For years I have been refused the means . . . of putting things straight, but at the same time I am regarded as an inexhaustible source of money., I am required to fill the glass at any moment it is put before me. Such a method of proceeding certainly puts an end to my responsibility in the matter. Even if, after all the other sacrifices I have made, I cast aside the last shreds of any respect that I may enjoy in the world, this will not bring additional revenue to the monarchy or save it from financial disaster.

"I write to you today, my dear prince, in the bitterness of my heart. It is difficult to remain calm under such conditions. Besides, I feel it to be my duty to state the unvarnished truth, when, as in the present instance, the truth is of such importance. Farewell, my dear prince, make such use of this letter as you think fit."

In some such mood as this, Stadion wrote two memoranda regarding the general financial position of the country, and sent them to Metternich. "The problem is," he submitted,[76] "how to save at least some part of our existence. I cannot possibly conceal from you any longer that I am weighed down and oppressed by a load of misfortune. I have reached the point when I fear that any day I may find that I am quite impotent and helpless to do any more work. I will carry on with the strength that remains to me, until I drop. But do not expect any great services from a man who is weakened as I am."

The finance minister's panic left Metternich unmoved. Clear before him lay the path that he had recognized as the right one, and had ruthlessly followed. He was determined not to deviate from it until he reached his goal.

"We have embarked upon a great undertaking, one that contains the possibilities of greater results than any of our times," he wrote to General Count von Bubna.[77] "It is great, for upon its success or failure the whole future depends; not merely the future of the Austrian monarchy but that of the whole of Europe. ... It was impossible for us to take any other action, for it is a matter of life or death. . . .

"Everything now depends upon success. I hope that one or two hard blows will decide the issue. If not, the result will be the same as if we had ventured nothing; the revolution will engulf, first Italy, and then the world.

I will spare no effort until I am killed myself. . . . Meanwhile, farewell. I shall not see you this year, but I shall certainly see you next year unless the world has been destroyed."

While Metternich was using proud words such as these, he was being besieged with the most urgent requests from the army to furnish money for its innumerable needs.

In the meantime Carl Rothschild had arrived at Laibach and had called on Gentz, who immediately informed his princely master of young Rothschild's arrival. Metternich asked Carl, through Gentz, whether he would be prepared to travel in his service, and whether he was able, without any loss of time, to make payments to the army. The chancellor also desired to know how moneys could be speedily and safely conveyed to Rome.

Carl replied as follows: "I have the honor to reply to your Princely Highness's gracious inquiry of today that I am prepared to undertake the journey at once to any place where your Princely Highness may bid me go, and to do everything in my power to see that the payments which you have graciously commissioned me to make to the army are carried out with the greatest possible speed and precision. If your Princely Highness will most graciously inform me what sums, and at whose disposition you wish them placed in Rome, I will then . . . send a special messenger to instruct Signor B. Paccard, a member of a firm who is in Milan, to transfer any sums required to Rome without delay, and if necessary to travel there himself. ... I have only to add, with all humble respect, that we will, on this occasion as always, use our endeavors to satisfy the wishes of his Majesty, which indeed is always our sole aim."[78]

Carl Meyer von Rothschild, who thus came into prominence, was personally the least gifted of the five brothers. He had little talent for adapting himself to his environment, had an awkward manner, and was over-strict in his observance of the religious practices of an orthodox Jew. His principal asset was a pretty and intelligent wife, who won everybody's affection and thereby made people forget many of her husband's errors. In spite of the distance which separated them, Carl remained, at any rate in really important transactions, under the control of his brothers James and Solomon.

Meanwhile the Austrian army had advanced almost without a battle. The encounter at Rieti was just a small skirmish and was described by Ambassador Count Ficquelmont as the most ridiculous thing he had ever seen. "Our advance is uninspiring," he reported,[79] "as we are completely unopposed, but our political victory is all the greater."

Everything therefore seemed to be proceeding satisfactorily, when a very bad piece of news was received. After his return King Victor Emmanuel had inaugurated a severely reactionary regime in Piedmont. For example he made the possession of a certain amount of property a necessary qualification for being allowed to learn to read and write; he had the botanical gardens at Turin destroyed, and wanted to destroy the marvelous bridge over the Po, simply because they were the works of Napoleon. He naturally opposed all nationalistic movements among young people. The risings in Spain and Naples were accordingly joyfully welcomed in Piedmont.

When the Austrian troops started for the South, a rising broke out in Alessandria too, the object of which was to secure a constitution, and the abdication of the autocratic king. The news of these events caused dismay at Laibach. The assembled diplomats were like a swarm of bees that has been disturbed. Gentz reported:[80] "This unexpected news is a very hard blow to me and to all of us. I remained with the prince until half-past four in a kind of stupor, and then I tried to eat something.

Rothschild came to me in a state of great emotion; I had enough sang-froid to be able to calm him."

Carl Rothschild was just about to start for Italy in accordance with Metternich's wishes, and these events caused him the most serious alarm. The impression made at Vienna was no less profound. Stadion completely lost his nerve. "The situation is terrifying," he wrote to Metternich.[81] "Never, not even in the darkest hours of the revolutionary wars, has an event produced such an effect on the Vienna bourse as the latest news from Italy. ... If the enemy were at the gates there could not be more unreasoning panic. The whole of the population of Vienna is rushing to the bourse to get rid of our public securities. . . . Our credit (which has only just been established) is on the eve of vanishing completely. I shall be forced to suspend the conversion of paper money into cash or banknotes on demand. To do so would be exceedingly painful to me, for it would mean destroying in one day the labors of the five preceding years. . . .

"This is the first step to our destruction. It is impossible that a loan should be considered either at home or abroad at a time when our securities are becoming worthless. . . . Judging from the way things are going we shall have to give up all hope of getting any financial assistance from Naples. . . . There is so much popular unrest of a very marked character that each day may bring a fresh catastrophe and make further desperate measures necessary."

During this period Stadion repeatedly called in Solomon to examine the situation with him and ask his advice. If, however, he hoped for comfort from him, he was doomed to some disappointment. Solomon too had suffered from the sudden fall in the value of securities, and could not himself help being somewhat affected by the general panic. It was not until he received reassuring news from his three brothers in the West of Europe, that he was able to take a less gloomy view of the situation.

The panic reached its height on March 22. On that day Stadion wrote again to Metternich, describing the complications in Naples and Piedmont as amounting to the destruction of Austria.[82] He wrote: "If all the misfortunes that appear imminent today come upon us at once, I must confess I see no hope of salvation. Nevertheless we must try to put an end to the Naples adventure as speedily as possible, and thus at least save the army's honor. All troops should be withdrawn to within our frontiers and kept in readiness to meet attacks from abroad and from the revolutionary spirit at home."

Metternich said nothing, but proceeded to set troops in motion for quelling the revolt. It was Stadion's business and not his to raise the necessary money. The former had already spent money which was earmarked for the year 1822, and his pronounced sense of responsibility caused him to take a darker view of recent events than was strictly justified. Metternich, however, infected his imperial master, who was staying with him at Laibach, with his own spirit of resolute calm, and the emperor wrote a reassuring letter to the King of Naples. The king had just left Laibach, having borrowed the money for the journey to Florence from the Emperor Francis, as he had no funds himself. While assuring the king that his interests were identical with his own, the emperor did not forget about the repayment of the journey money, and issued instructions that the cash should immediately be provided out of the Rothschild loan which was being planned in Naples.[83]

On March 24 the expeditionary force had entered Naples without encountering serious resistance. The news of this event put an end to the rising in Piedmont; Lombardy remained quiet; and the general information received at Laibach gave reason to hope that the whole movement would die down. In a short time Metternich was able to feel that he had reestablished his system in both countries. It was now possible completely to reassure Carl, and to persuade him that the journey to Florence, where the King of Naples was still staying with his retinue, was absolutely safe. Before he started on the further journey to the capital at the foot of Vesuvius, the Austrian troops there would have reestablished complete order and security.

It was on March 23 that Gentz had made these reassuring observations to Carl Rothschild, using the opportunity to ask for a small personal loan. Carl, who was not so quick at appreciating Gentz's influence as his brothers had been, made difficulties, with the result that, to use his own words, "an unpleasant discussion" ensued.

When he got back home Rothschild learned that Metternich wished him to leave for Florence on the following day. He felt some misgivings regarding the disobliging attitude he had adopted toward the right-hand man of the all-powerful chancellor; and he thought that his brother Solomon would be annoyed with him if he had parted from Gentz in ill-will. He accordingly called on Gentz late that evening in order, as the latter put it, "to make good his error."

Metternich had given Carl Rothschild a letter of introduction to the Austrian general, Baron Vincent, who was staying at Florence with the King of Naples. The general had long known of the Austrian government's financial intentions regarding a loan to be issued in Naples. He knew that the Allies had agreed with the king at Laibach that the costs of the expedition should be borne by the kingdom of Naples from the moment when the army crossed the Po, and that the cost of maintaining the army in Naples should also be borne by that kingdom. Metternich had sent Vincent the following instructions on the matter as early as March 1, 1821:

"The point regarding the loan is of great importance for our finances. We wish to facilitate the work of the Neapolitan government so that they will be able to provide for the first needs of our army and fulfil some of their obligations to us. Count Stadion has already entered into negotiations on this matter with the House of Rothschild. ... It is desirable in our financial interests that this house should be given the preference, and the king also is prepared to proceed on these lines. The firm has the necessary means at its disposal, and I therefore believe that it will be possible speedily to come to terms with it. . . .

"It would be redundant to point out to your Excellency that the fact that Count Stadion was compelled to make enormous advances to the Neapolitan Expeditionary Force has made him exceedingly anxious to insure that these moneys shall be gradually repaid. He is the more concerned about this since, if the monarchy were to incur such a heavy loss, the resulting financial embarrassment might produce results which nobody can foresee."[84]

Shortly before Carl Rothschild's departure Metternich followed up these instructions with a letter[85] stating that Rothschild was coming only in order to negotiate for the Neapolitan loan. Although this firm had not yet put forward definite terms, Metternich wrote, it was desirable that the Neapolitan government should hand over to the House of Rothschild bonds coming within the scheme of their general system of credit at a fixed price, and leave it to the firm to reimburse itself by issuing these bonds at its own risk at a price which would yield it a profit.

Should the House of Rothschild demand a guarantee from Austria for the due carrying out of the obligations of the Neapolitan government, Vincent was authorized to accept such a condition if it was necessary. He was urged, however, to ask Rothschild to put his proposals into writing, and to press for a speedy conclusion of the agreement. This was urgent in the interests of Austria's finances. In general he should show courtesy to Carl Rothschild and introduce him to the Neapolitan minister, Prince Ruffo, so that Rothschild could deal direct with him. Metternich concluded by saying:

"We must naturally take no direct part in these business negotiations, but we are very much interested in their success. The loan is destined to cover a part of the costs of the expedition, as well as to meet the expenses of maintaining and paying our army. You are invited, therefore, if Herr von Rothschild's first proposals are accepted by the Neapolitan minister, to facilitate the conclusion of their business through your good offices."

Carl Rothschild arrived in Florence on March 31.

On Vincent's introduction he had a short interview with Prince Ruffo,[86] but he was coolly received and was not given any explanation as to the minister's intentions. He had to wait for news from James, who had been requested by Solomon to express his views regarding the Neapolitan business. Vincent advised Rothschild to go to Naples and inform himself as to the prospect on the spot, for Ruffo had been absent so long that he was completely uninformed as to the financial situation. The Ambassador took the opportunity of borrowing 1,000 ducats[87] on the government's account, the advance for his official expenses having long been exhausted. Rothschild gladly lent the desired amount.

Although the agreements were kept secret, and nobody knew that that firm had been granted absolute priority, the news of a loan to be issued by Naples became known in other banking circles. A Milanese, by name Barbaia, approached Vincent, and in agreement with certain French firms offered[88] to advance thirty millions to the Neapolitan government at an issue price of 60%. "My fear is," Vincent replied, "that this may conflict with our arragements with the House of Rothschild and confuse them." Barbaia was not a negligible rival. He was already known to the King of Naples, and was received by him in Florence on this occasion too. Vincent as speedily as possible gave Carl Rothschild precise information regarding the offer.[89] "You will," he remarked, "be in a better position than anyone else to say what value should be attached to this offer."

This problem itself naturally did not engage Carl's very close attention, but it was valuable to him to be informed of his rivals' plans as speedily and accurately as possible, in order to be able to take appropriate counter-measures.

On April 6 he proceeded to Naples. Vincent gave him a letter to Ambassador Count Ficquelmont, informing the count of the offer being made by Barbaia, and of Austria's anxiety that the loan should be intrusted to the firm of Rothschild. The king himself did not yet dare to return to Naples. In accordance with Metternich's instructions the general commanding at Naples meanwhile restrained the newly installed government from considering loans proposed by various Italian banking firms before Rothschild should have arrived. When he arrived on April 12, Count Ficquelmont immediately introduced him to the government, who informed him that they wished to take up a loan of twelve million ducats—about twenty million gulden.

Under pressure from the Austrian general the government had ignored Barbaia's offers, although the Milanese had brought a letter from the King of Naples recommending him. The king had instinctively felt that the House of Rothschild would act in Austria's interests rather than his own; but he was king only by the grace of Austria, and that country could call the tune.

The House of Rothschild stated that they were prepared to grant a loan of ten million ducats.[90] They added that they would at first make only six millions available, the balance to be paid when they had placed the six million. The bonds were to be issued at 54; 3% commission was to be paid; and an undertaking was to be given that during the continuance of the agreement no new loan should be issued. Moreover, in any future loans the firm was to be given the preference before any other. For sinking-fund purposes and for greater security they demanded that the state domains should be pledged.

These were hard conditions. Public securities then stood at 60%, so that the issue price was very low, and all the more favorable to the Rothschilds, as they intended to issue the state bonds (which had hitherto been dealt with only on the Naples bourse) and, through their London and Paris houses, to put them on the market in those cities. The Neapolitan finance minister, Marchese d'Andrea, considered the proposals to be far less advantageous than those of certain Neapolitan firms, and therefore entirely unacceptable. The minister was of opinion that instead of helping the state the conditions would be a serious blow to its credit, since it was impossible to place any confidence in a government that sold its securities at such a low rate. He held that there was no reason for selling bonds at 54 when the ruling price was 60. The government was not so pressed for money as those appeared to believe who put such proposals forward.[91]

Meanwhile, news had been received that the revolution at Naples had collapsed.

Ficquelmont summoned Carl Rothschild and told him that Austria was desirous that the House of Rothschild should handle the loan. The ambassador requested him not to make it too difficult for Austria to bring the necessary pressure to bear upon the Neapolitan government, but to moderate his terms somewhat.

Rothschild replied that his first proposals were not his last word in the matter; he had been asked to make an offer, and he had done so by way of opening negotiations. The good news received from Piedmont made it possible for him now to offer better conditions. The ambassador also asked Rothschild to avoid, if possible, saying anything about a guarantee by the powers. Carl promised to do what he could, and Ficquelmont assured him of his full and very powerful support with the Neapolitan government. That government owed its very existence to the Austrians, and it was obvious that it would have. to conclude the agreement with those whom the Austrians wished.

The ambassador at Naples had completely understood what was in the minds of the leading men at Vienna. "If the House of Rothschild carries through a loan of any kind," he wrote to Metternich,[92] "that fact will provide us with the necessary security. As we have not yet made any direct or positive demand for reimbursement of our expenses, I did not feel that it was possible to include in the terms of the loan any explicit condition regarding direct payments to Austria [by the House of Rothschild]. Herr Rothschild, who always keeps our interests in view in the negotiations, has therefore inserted the words in his draft terms, 'payable to those who shall be authorized to receive the money.' This condition will become applicable when our direct negotiations have settled the amount to be paid to us."

The ambassador was anxious that the Neapolitan finances should be spared as much as possible so that there should not be any doubt as to Naples' ability to pay the expenses of Austria's expeditionary force. "If the current expenses for the maintenance of our army," Ficquelmont wrote to Metternich, "can be met out of the ordinary revenue of the state, the whole amount of the loan could be paid into our treasury, except perhaps the first two or three instalments, which the government will require ... in order to put the taxing system in order."

Shortly afterwards the loan was issued, 16,000,000 ducats being taken up at 60 ducats for the 100 ducat bond. Rothschild allowed other Italian banking firms to take some small part in it in order to keep active opposition down. The government pledged itself not to issue any further loan before 1824, and if it required to issue further loans, to give the House of Rothschild the preference.

Carl joyfully reported the conclusion of the business to Metternich.[93] He emphasized that in accordance with Metternich's wishes he had made no mention of a guarantee by the powers, writing: "Moreover, I hope that, if peace only lasts for a little while, the loan will soon be fully subscribed, and it will not be necessary to ask for guarantees for the balance, as in that case all state securities will rise in value, and the Neapolitan securities will follow suit . . ."

The plan had succeeded, and Austria had thereby put the House of Rothschild in the saddle at Naples. This was not done from motives of disinterested friendship, and the brothers Rothschild paid for the privilege—with Neapolitan money. Meanwhile the forces of reaction were playing havoc at Naples. People were arrested in thousands, the death penalty and long terms of imprisonment were meted out to the Carbonari and the revolutionary officers. A strict censorship was also instituted. These conditions continued after the return of the king, and as all these things were being done under the protection of Austrian bayonets, the foreign troops did not gain any sympathy in the country. All classes, excepting the conservative upper class, regarded them as undesirable guests; and resentment against the Austrians was heightened by the fact that they were using a clever foreigner to force the country itself to pay for their occupation.

About this time death came to the man in whose service the Rothschild family had grown great. On February 27, 1821, the Elector of Hesse had a heart attack. With the words,[94] "I shall lose this battle," he expired. His death had nothing like the importance to the Rothschild family that it would have had about ten years earlier, when their transactions with the elector constituted almost their only, and certainly their most important, business.

The new elector spent a great deal of money, but he had not the commercial ability of his father, and the relationship with the Rothschilds was limited to casual transactions of minor importance. Amschel at Frankfort carried on the business of making loans on an extensive scale to princes and other important personages whom he desired to cultivate. James and Nathan put the Neapolitan securities on the market in London and Paris, making the interest due in London payable in British currency, a fact which induced many people to invest their money in these securities, carrying as they did a high rate of interest. The result was that soon after their issue they rose considerably in price.

Nathan was clever at securing people's support, and at getting publicity for himself. A young clerk from the commercial department of the treasury at Vienna, by name Anton Laurin, had been sent to study in England for some months during the summer of 1820, and was naturally referred to the Austrian consul in London, Nathan Rothschild. Nathan showed a great deal of kindness to Laurin, as he naturally assumed that he would send a report home. He acted as his mentor, and invited him frequently to dinner and supper.

He was so successful in securing the young man's affection that Laurin gave the most ecstatic not to say extravagant and almost tedious accounts of him when he returned home. He sent in such an enthusiastic report to his chief that the latter decided to convey the essential points in it to the emperor, with the request that Nathan should be specially commended.

After recounting how Nathan had helped Laurin, the president of the commercial department of the treasury proceeded to state in his memorandum to the sovereign: "Laurin at the same time reports as to the disinterested work done by this consul, and as to his efforts to be of effective assistance to Austria's credit, industry, and commerce. He states that Rothschild waives all consular fees, actively assists Austrian subjects . . . has secured a quotation for Austrian state securities on the London stock exchange, helps Austrian sailors generously . . . from his private resources. Nathan is prepared with his own ships to establish a direct service between London and Trieste; he has sent a collection of seeds of rare foreign plants for your Majesty's gardens, as well as several articles of interest in industry and the arts for the Polytechnic Institute without asking for any payment; he is still collecting models and various objects of this kind with a view to bequeathing them to that institute.

"It is not for me to express an opinion as to the value of the services rendered to the credit of the Austrian state by Consul Rothschild; in this connection I can but humbly lay before your Majesty the London stock-exchange report for the 6th ultimo, which he has sent me. In this your Majesty may be graciously pleased to observe that Austrian state debentures are specially mentioned, together with their price, under the designation Austrian Loan. The other efforts referred to above by Consul Rothschild for facilitating and extending Austrian trade, the industrious and disinterested manner in which he carries out the duties of the consulate, so graciously intrusted to him by your Majesty, his generous help to unemployed Austrian sailors, and his efforts to enrich your Majesty's gardens and the Polytechnic Institute deserve proper recognition.

"Through establishing a direct monetary exchange on London, Rothschild has indisputably greatly facilitated commercial and financial transactions. If he succeeds, as he undoubtedly will, in view of the disinterested patriotism of his aims and methods, in establishing direct communication between London and Trieste, the beneficial results to our commerce will be even more marked. Through carrying out this one conception he will earn the well-deserved gratitude of a considerable portion of the Austrian trading community and consuming public...

"I hope that your Majesty may graciously realize from a perusal of these few lines what an important and beneficial influence upon the trade and industry of the monarchy the nomination of this man as Austrian consul is having. . . . Our former consuls in this country, which is so uniquely adapted to trade and industry, did . . . absolutely nothing for the monarchy, confining their activities to collecting substantial fees from our subjects. . . , The newly appointed consul, Rothschild, has in a very short time done more than all his predecessors put together. I therefore feel it to be my duty to hiring his meritorious activities to your Majesty's knowledge, and at the same time most dutifully to beg that your Majesty's satisfaction may accordingly be conveyed to him." [95]

In his memorandum to the emperor of March 6, 1821,[96] Count Stadion confirmed the statements of Ritter von Stahl, adding that the Rothschilds also deserved praise for the greater facility with which, under the existing critical conditions, the financial requirements of the army in Italy could be met.

These two documents were also sent to Count Zichy for his observations, who passed them to Privy Councilor Baron von Lederer, who gave his opinion in the same skeptical vein he had used when the ennoblement of the family was under consideration.

"The alleged special services of Nathan Meyer Rothschild," he wrote,[97] "are connected partly with his activities as Austrian consul in London, and partly with his relation to the finance departments. If it is due to Rothschild that Austrian government securities are quoted in London stock-exchange reports, and if the transfer of money to Italy has been facilitated through the good offices of the House of Rothschild it must be remembered that the interests of the brothers Rothschild are identical with those of the finance departments.

"The brothers Rothschild are at the head of the business which concluded the last two loans with the Austrian financial administration, so that they are clearly interested in obtaining a market for Austrian securities abroad, and particularly in London. When banking firms undertake to remit money they are rewarded by a commission set aside for the purpose, and are able to profit by differences in the rate of exchange. I would therefore attach more importance to Nathan Meyer Rothschild's disinterested manner of carrying out his duties as Austrian consul, and would venture immediately to concur in the proposal that he should be acquainted of his Majesty's satisfaction, if I did not feel that the occasion for doing so is somewhat unsuitable.

"A clerk of the commercial department of the treasury, by name Laurin, obtains leave to travel to England. He is given a letter of introduction to Nathan Meyer Rothschild, who receives him in a friendly manner, and supports him in his endeavors to extend his knowledge in the fields of industry and commerce. He returns full of praise of the way he has been received, and takes the opportunity of commenting in high terms on Nathan Meyer Rothschild's disinterested and zealous conduct as consul.

"I am far from wishing to cast any doubt upon the facts that he brings forward, but as he made the journey purely as a private person, and not on any official mission, it was not his business to put these facts forward through official channels, and to take the responsibility for their accuracy. In my humble opinion the statement he volunteered should merely have led to an inquiry on the matter being made through the Austrian Embassy; and it seems to me that this omission can still be rectified."

The emperor, who was not yet fully aware how deeply leading statesmen had committed themselves to the House of Rothschild, did indeed command that further information should be asked for regarding Laurin's statements that Rothschild carried out his duties in such a disinterested manner. Ritter von Stahl, however, stuck to his guns, and was particularly emphatic in pressing the interests of the House of Rothschild. As he knew that James in Paris desired the dignity of an Austrian consul-general, for the same reasons as his brother in London, he suggested, on March 30, that James should be appointed.

The highest quarters did not give any immediate decision in this matter, but the Neapolitan revolution occurred shortly afterwards, involving the close cooperation between Metternich and the House of Rothschild. It was no longer thought either desirable or possible to refuse the brothers anything, as it depended upon their attitude whether or not Austria should recover the money spent on the expeditionary force. Solomon gave his brother James at Paris to understand that he should renew his application to be appointed consul-general, for now was the critical moment, as the Austrian government was more or less in a cleft stick. As it was under an obligation to the House and closely associated with it, it could not turn the request down.

James asked Solomon, as he stood so well in Vienna, to put forward the request himself. Solomon drafted a petition to the emperor, and handed it to Stadion, who, in consideration of the indispensability of Solomon and his family, conveyed it to the emperor with the following memorandum:[98]

"I venture to support this petition, which your Majesty was previously not pleased to entertain, for the following reasons, which relate particularly to present circumstances, and to conditions obtaining during the last few years. Your Majesty is fully aware of the highly important services which the House of Rothschild or, more accurately, the various Rothschild firms established in the principal capitals of Europe have rendered in the complicated difficulties of the present time.

"To the energy and resources of the Rothschilds, to their tireless efforts to apply large sums of money at points where they were immediately required to stem the tide of events, I owe the fact that I have been able continuously, in all places, and at the right moment, to provide what was necessary for military operations, without interfering with our internal services or the measures to restore our credit. In the precarious state of Austria's finances resulting from recent events, it was only thus that popular feeling and the government's credit could be maintained at the point where they now stand. Through the Rothschilds' clever management, the cost of the extensive monetary movements during the military operations was low compared with any other method of remitting money.

"Through the great services which the Rothschild firms have rendered to us during a most eventful period, their existence has become most intimately bound up with that of the Austrian monarchy. They have incurred the envy and hatred, and to a certain extent the persecution of the whole Liberal party in Europe; and although the extent of their wealth, their firmly established reputation throughout Europe, and their constant rectitude in business matters have so far protected them from the consequences of malicious intrigues, it is really essential that their services should be recognized by our court and that they should enjoy the explicit protection of your Majesty in the principal markets of the world, in order that they may have the necessary strength to resist all these machinations and to continue as useful to the monarchy in the future as they have been in the past.

"This is particularly the case in Paris as being the headquarters of all Liberal activities in Europe, and the city in whose bourse the loans of all states are handled, with no inconsiderable effect upon their value.

"The president of the commercial department of the treasury has laid before your Majesty proofs of what has been done to promote our trade by the Rothschild who has been appointed consul-general in London. Even more successful have been his efforts to develop a market for the sale of our securities in England and to establish arrangements for directly discounting bills of exchange between Great Britain and the Austrian markets.

"Paris is as indifferent as London to religious distinctions, and the appointment of one of the brothers Rothschild as Austrian consul-general in Paris should be of real service to the commercial and financial interests of the monarchy. Moreover, Rothschild waives the right to any emoluments connected with such an appointment, which he desires only for the distinction attaching to the office as being likely to afford him some protection against the hatred and persecution of the Liberal party in that city."

There was much truth in Stadion's report. The Rothschilds had in fact made themselves unpopular with the more Liberal section of the public abroad, through the contracts which they had made everywhere with the re-established reactionary governments. Stadion was not aware that in spite of their particularly conservative sentiment, especially in Austria, they cultivated relations with the other parties as well, lent money here and there, and thus secured themselves against a political reaction such as was always possible.

The envy of other firms was increasing to a prodigious extent as the power of their house grew. In Paris their position was particularly delicate. For the Bourbon kingdom, with the weak Louis XVIII and the Ultras, who were all the more powerful, was far from popular, and the strictly royalist minister, Villele, who was at the head of the government, was hated by a large part of the population. The brothers Rothschild, however, had necessarily become intimately connected with the new regime and, moreover, as the bankers of the Holy Alliance, they were sending French gold abroad in large amounts.

James Rothschild was often the target of veiled attacks, and once he felt actually constrained to call upon the prefect of police to lodge a complaint regarding the large number of threatening anonymous letters which he was receiving." Through being appointed consul-general he hoped not merely to raise his social prestige, but also to achieve greater security under international law. It is true it was not realized at the court either of Paris or of Vienna that James Rothschild was in close association with the liberal-minded Duke Louis Philippe of Orleans (afterwards King of France). James frequently advised him in money matters, and was very often a guest in his house.

Emperor Francis referred James Rothschild's application to be appointed consul-general to the commercial department of the treasury, with the instruction that they should let him have their observations upon it. Ritter von Stahl did not need to be asked twice to do this. He immediately transmitted the application to Stadion with the following observations: [100]

"England and France are by far the most cultivated states in Europe; in them agriculture, industry, and commerce flourish in the greatest harmony, and it is therefore most important for us to have in their capitals commercial agents who are experienced men, and enjoy an extensive credit. ... As far as commercial and industrial matters are concerned, I cannot suggest a more suitable person for his Majesty than the head of the Paris House, James von Rothschild.

"I made his personal acquaintance during his last stay here; he is a young man of parts, who is intimately acquainted with several members of the Polytechnical Institute in Paris, and of the Conservatoire des Arts et Metiers, as well as with many of the most cultured French manufacturers and business men. Moreover, he expressed to me his readiness, as his brother in London had done, to cooperate in every possible way in promoting our industry and commerce. For this purpose he immediately ordered some interesting machines, which he is giving to our Polytechnic Institute, assuring me that he did not wish in any way to lag behind his brother in London in proof of his devotion to the House of Austria.

"Finally, the consideration that James Rothschild is a Jew seems, in my humble opinion, to constitute no greater difficulty than in the case of his brother in London. It is true that in the decision regarding the appointment of the London Rothschild as consul, which decision is attached to the application, your Majesty expressly laid down that it would have to continue to be the rule that no Israelite should be appointed consul. Yet if the exception made by your Majesty in favor of the London Rothschild has proved in the highest degree beneficial, it is likely to be no less so in the case of the Paris Rothschild.

"In Paris, too, the consuls . . . have no specially representative character . . . and as, under the French constitution, the Israelites enjoy the same rights of citizenship as all other French subjects in France, I am of opinion that your Majesty may graciously permit an exception to the rule to be made in the case of James von Rothschild such as you have graciously permitted to be made in regard to the London Rothschild.

"While the commercial and industrial reasons for acceding to James von Rothschild's request are weighty, the financial considerations are still more important. This point it is not necessary for me to labor; your Excellency is fully aware that since the recent crucial events in Italy the combined Rothschild houses have rendered far greater services than they had rendered even at the time when his Majesty, with your Excellency's approval, was graciously pleased to appoint the London Rothschild to the office of consul. It is certainly a factor of no small importance in the success of such vital operations to have the support of all these wealthy firms."

In conclusion, Ritter von Stahl strongly urged that Metternich should be asked to express an opinion as to whether there was any objection to the proposal from a political point of view, so that a further report to his Majesty might be made as speedily as possible.

Metternich duly wrote to Herr von Stahl:[101] "As all considerations of a commercial, industrial, and financial nature make it desirable to grant this application, I have to add only that from a political point of view there is no reason why Solomon von Rothschild's wish should not be granted."

On August 11, 1821, James von Rothschild was duly appointed consul-general in Paris. Thus another of the five brothers had climbed a rung in the ladder of social position.

Immediate payment for his Majesty's favor was required. Since the Austrian army had entered Naples, the Neapolitan government had met all its expenses, including pay; but ten days after so whole-heartedly supporting the petition, Metternich instructed Count Ficquelmont in Naples to get from that government the money that had been expended from the moment when the army crossed the Po. The finance minister had already pressed impatiently to be indemnified for these expenses.[102] The advances already made were estimated at 4,650,000 gulden, and the money was to be repaid in Vienna in six monthly instalments, commencing on August 1, 1821.[103] Metternich sent a private letter to the count, together with these instructions.[104]

"The ministry of finance," wrote the chancellor, "attaches very great importance to the punctual and reliable repayment of the moneys which you are hereby instructed to demand from the Neapolitan government, and it will not tolerate any further excuses for delay. With this end in view, it has concluded an agreement with the House of Rothschild under which . . . Herr Rothschild in Naples has been authorized to make an arrangement with the government in order to facilitate these payments. ... I have the honor to request you to get into communication with Herr Rothschild on this matter, and to support such proposals as he may consider it desirable to submit to the Neapolitan government. The object of these proposals; will be to make it easier for the government to effect a payment that might cause it some embarrassment without the assistance of this banking firm, and at the same time to facilitate the punctual receipt of a considerable sum of money by our treasury, in the payment of which no further delay can be suffered, as it constitutes a part of our annual budget."

Although he did not succeed in arranging for the Neapolitan government to repay the whole of this amount, Count Ficquelmont managed to obtain compensation to the extent of 4,000,000 gulden, 500,000 to be payable on August 31, 700,000 in each of the following three months, and 1,400,000 in January, 1822.[105] The first amount was paid to Carl Rothschild and transmitted by him through his brother Solomon to the Austrian government. It had been possible to make this payment out of existing funds, but further payments were to be met out of the loan of the House of Rothschild.[106] Thus part of the money subscribed for the loan never reached the Neapolitan Treasury at all, but was made over to Austria direct by the House of Rothschild, although Naples bore the whole burden of the loan.

The government of that kingdom at this time made the request of Carl Rothschild that in consideration of certain additional advantages he would, if possible, make his loan payments to them earlier than was provided for under the agreement. Rothschild agreed, on condition that he was allowed to deduct the first two instalments of 700,000 gulden, and transmit them direct to Austria. Carl reported the conclusion of this agreement to Count Ficquelmont, stating:

"I am accordingly glad to be in a position ... to give your Excellency the assurance that the first two payments are secured, and that I shall be making payments to your Excellency, instead of my brother making them in Vienna.

Your Excellency will no doubt realize that this was the principal reason which led me to fall in with the suggestion—at some sacrifice to myself. For I was thus able to satisfy your Excellency's wish that the payments in question should be secured to the I. and R. Treasury, and at the same time furnish further proof that I am always prepared to make every effort in the interest of his Majesty's service. As for the balance of 1,400,000 gulden (out of the total of 4,000,000 gulden) due in January, I shall try to deal with this sum in a new loan which the royal government of Naples intends to issue shortly. . . ," Carl Rothschild had thus endeavored to meet the convenience of all parties. He made it easier for the Austrians to recover their expenses, and he paid the instalment on the loan to the Neapolitans before the agreed dates. He himself did not do badly, for in June, 1821, the bonds he had underwritten at 60, already stood at 76 1/2! The court of Naples had been in such urgent need of the advance payments on account of the loan that when Carl agreed to make them, he received a special letter from the finance minister.[107]

"His Majesty," the letter ran, "has instructed me to communicate to you in his royal name, his full and gracious satisfaction with the consideration you have shown in the matters affecting the treasury."

The king's debts to the emperor were also settled through the House of Rothschild by making a deduction from the loan. The balance, so far as it was not used in the maintenance of the Austrian army, was not spent either carefully or usefully. In spite of all the loans, therefore, the country continued to be oppressed by financial stringency; and the Neapolitan ministers were constantly complaining of the annual charges (amounting to nine million ducats) for maintaining the Austrian army, which made any reasoned finance impossible. But Austria insisted upon its pound of flesh, and Stadion's attitude was positively petty when Carl Rothschild transmitted the moneys to Austria in bills due in three months. The finance minister demanded immediate payment in cash, as Naples was required to pay the money free of all charges in Vienna. Carl took the stand that without his intervention and willingness, the Neapolitan government would have been absolutely unable to carry out the obligation it had incurred to the Austrian court to pay four million gulden, so that he had felt himself justified in adopting this method of remitting the money.[108] Henceforward, however, he paid in cash, and simply debited the expense of remitting the money and the loss on exchange to the Neapolitan treasury.

In such circumstances the first loan was naturally soon exhausted, and the Neapolitan finance minister found it necessary to apply to Carl Rothschild for a second loan. After lengthy negotiations a loan of the nominal amount of 16,800,000 ducats was arranged at the end of November, 1821, which in view of a wider market and the resulting improvement in price was underwritten at 67.3 in spite of the fact that the state's indebtedness had increased.

When the amount of 1,400,000 gulden fell due on the last day of January, 1822, the finance minister himself asked Rothschild to make the payment out of the loan,[109] as Naples was not able to find the money; for the support of the Austrian troops was a constant heavy burden on the treasury. Stadion's financial program with regard to Naples was carried through quite ruthlessly; and Metternich was able to point out to the finance minister that thanks to the Rothschild intervention, which he had advised, the undertaking that Stadion had so much dreaded had been completely financed by Naples.

Metternich fully appreciated the services rendered by the House of Rothschild, and was prepared at Solomon's urgent request to devote greater energy henceforward to securing the emanicipation of the Jews. Slowly but surely, the rich Jewish bankers, who had been brought into touch by the Rothschilds with the delegates to the diet at Frankfort, improved their social position. Severely though they had been shunned before, the change became apparent during the first months of 1820. The Rothschilds and other representatives of the commercial world gave big dinners, and the bearers of the most noble names, as well as persons in every kind of high office, were seen at their tables. In this way they often acquired items of news that they could turn to account in business.

"Since arriving here," the Bremen burgomaster Smidt wrote from Frankfort,[110] "I have found to my great astonishment that people like the Bethmanns, Gontards, Brentanos eat and drink with prominent Jews, invite them to their houses and are invited back. When I expressed my surprise I was told that no financial transaction of any importance could be carried through without the cooperation of these people, they had to be treated as friends and it was not desirable to fall out with them. Having regard to these facts the Rothschilds have been invited by some of the ambassadors."

During this period Amschel Meyer Rothschild's wife was invited to a ball at the Prussian Legation in Frankfort. Smidt specifically recorded his opinion regarding the Rothschild family in a report of a conversation with the delegate to the diet, Count Buol.[111]

"This house," he observed, "has through its enormous financial transactions and its banking and credit connections, actually achieved the position of a real power. It has to such an extent acquired control of the general money-market that it is in a position either to hinder or to promote, as it feels inclined, the movements and operations of potentates, and even of the greatest European powers. Austria needs the Rothschilds' help for her present demonstration against Naples; and Prussia would long ago have had to discard her constitution if the House of Rothchild had not made it possible for her to put off the evil day. Several medium and small states have also had recourse to its financial power in their difficulties. This puts it in a strong position to ask for favors, especially for a favor of such an apparently trivial nature as the protection of a few dozen Jews in a small state."

At the end of May, 1820, Metternich sent a dispatch to the reluctant Buol instructing him to support most of the Jews' wishes in the diet. Buol, however, was inclined to follow out his own predilections, so that there was no immediate change in the situation; indeed the senate showed a tendency to revert to increased harshness in dealing with the Jews. Thereupon Metternich firmly admonished Buol to put an end to this state of affairs, with the result that the diet sent a kind of ultimatum to the senate.

The chancellor went even further; he traveled to Frankfort himself, and decided publicly to honor the Rothschilds there by accepting an invitation to dine with them. He had let Amschel Meyer know this through Solomon at Vienna, who had just come into prominence again through an action which had won sympathetic recognition in high quarters. The I. and R. Court Theatre at the Karntner Tor was again without a lessee, and the only applicant, Dominik Barbaia, was unable to find the deposit of fifty thousand gulden in cash required under the terms of the lease. The House of Rothschild stated that they were prepared to guarantee and pay this amount to the I. and R. Treasury, whereby, as the document of guarantee stated, "the further continuance of an entertainment worthy of the dignity of the imperial court and the capital city" was assured until the year 1824.[112]

On his arrival at Frankfort, Metternich received the following letter from Amschel Meyer Rothschild:[113]

MOST EXCELLENT PRINCE ! MOST GRACIOUS PRINCE AND LORD !

I hope your Highness will not regard it ungraciously or consider it as a presumption if I make so bold as to ask your Highness to do me the gracious favor of taking soup with me this noon.

Such a favor would mark an epoch in my life; but I would not have ventured this bold request if my brother in Vienna had not assured me that your Highness did not entirely refuse his entreaty to grant me this gracious favor.
The Austrian gentlemen here have assured me that they will also be present in such a case. If your Highness wishes to come at another time, please command me, for any man feels himself happy to be in your Highness's company.

Metternich accepted the invitation and, accompanied by his intimate friend Countess Lieven, came to lunch with Amschel Meyer, an event which did not fail of its effect upon the diet and upon society in Frankfort The two burgomasters of Frankfort, although invited, did not come. The senate, however, was prepared to make all the concessions asked for, except to agree to the designation, "Israelite citizens." Metternich had seriously to emphasize his "definite wishes" to the obstinate Buol, instructing him to act "in strict accordance with them." But the senate remained obdurate, Buol practiced passive resistance, and the Jewish problem remained unresolved.
While making these social and diplomatic efforts on behalf of the Jews in general and of the Rothschilds in particular, Metternich instructed Gentz to see that the House of Rothschild did not suffer in the press. Because of the close association of that House with Austria, which was ruthlessly repressing all liberal movements in Germany, the more radical sections of the German public, and their papers, were venturing to pass some rather hostile judgments upon the House of Rothschild, in spite of the prevailing censorship. Gentz had repeatedly to listen to Metternich's reproach that he had not got the newspapers sufficiently in hand. For whenever an article unfavorable to the Rothschilds appeared in a German paper, Solomon pressed Metternich to use his influence to prevent such occurrences in the future. Even the Frankfort letters to the Allgemeine Zeitung, published by the firm of Cotta, contained such attacks. Gentz felt that it was his duty to intervene.

"Sir," he wrote on October 18, 1821, to Cotta, "you will have heard from other sources that there is again grave dissatisfaction here regarding the manner in which the Allgemeine Zeitung is edited. ... It seems to me all the more necessary that if you are really anxious that the A.Z. should continue to circulate in the Austrian states without restriction, you should at least mitigate such offending passages as convey the impression of hostility to Austria. . . .

"I refer to such articles as those of Frankfort origin, which have been appearing with some frequency lately, and which comment upon the financial operations here and the rate of exchange in a manner unfavorable to Austria and her credit. It is true that the general sense of these articles reveals the fact that they are directed, not against our state securities, but against the House of Rothschild. Under prevailing conditions, however, it is obvious that the moves attributed to the House of Rothschild always react upon our state credit, and are generally more damaging to it than to the Rothschilds, who in such cases are well able to help themselves."

On December 4, 1821, Gentz wrote again, saying, "The constant attacks upon the House of Rothschild invariably, and sometimes in the most outrageous manner, reflect upon the Austrian government by necessary implication, since everybody knows they are transacting important financial matters with that House, which is not only unimpeachable, but honorable and thoroughly respectable. The persistent rumors regarding new loans are invented simply and solely in order to undermine the confidence which our public securities have won and which they deserve."[114]

The Allgemeine Zeitung was thereafter banned throughout the whole dominions of the Austrian monarchy. Cotta, who although no friend of the Jews was a sound business man, was exceedingly displeased at this and requested Stegemann, the editor-in-chief, to be more careful, as Gentz—and they both knew well that meant Metternich—had complained bitterly about the paper.

Stegemann replied:[115] "In view of the letter from Herr von Gentz which you have been kind enough to communicate to me, I gladly give my formal promise not to accept . . . anything in future relating to the value of Austrian public securities, or anything whatever relating to the House of Rothschild (at least as affecting its relations with Austria). This means of course that I shall have to adopt a new, very cautious, and colorless attitude to affairs. ... In point of fact, I know nothing of any attacks against the House of Rothschild, unless the remark that Madame Rothschild has received her first invitation from the Prussian minister constitutes an attack." In a word, Cotta and Stegemann submitted, and for the time being the brothers Rothschild did not have to bother much about the very widely read Allgemeine Zeitung. The zeal Gentz had shown in this matter was not attributable entirely to Metternich's instructions. Since his return from Laibach to Vienna he had grown more and more intimate with Solomon Rothschild. He often had occasion to confer with him on behalf of his chief regarding the Neapolitan loan, and on one occasion Metternich made a very friendly remark to Gentz, regarding the attitude of the House of Rothschild in this matter.[116] It happened that on the following day Gentz met Rothschild at a dinner given by the banker Eskeles at Hietzing; and he hastened to inform him of the "remarkably flattering remarks made by the prince." This produced, as Gentz himself records in his diary, results most favorable able to himself. "This morning," he notes,[117] on June 24, 1821, "Rothschild paid me a very long visit; he told me the same remarkable story about his money and family affairs as I had recently heard from the prince. At the same time he gave me the account of my share in certain recent financial operations, from which it appeared that, entirely contrary to my expectations, nearly five thousand gulden were due to me."

Gentz's diary for the next few months is full of notes of meetings with Rothschild, and constantly mentions his "very agreeable communications,"[118] and "important financial arrangements."[119]

At the end of the year Rothschild specially demonstrated his gratitude for all the information he had received, and for the influence that had been brought to bear upon Prince Metternich and the press. "Rothschild breakfasted with me," Gentz notes in his diary on December 22, 1821, "and gave me a proof of real friendship for which I cannot feel too grateful to this excellent man at a time when all my income from the principalities has come to an end,[120] and nothing is done by those in authority to compensate me somewhat for this loss."[121] Finally, Gentz played his part in bleeding the Neapolitan treasury, and Rothschild assisted him in this matter too.

On New Year's Day Rothschild waited at Gentz's house until he came back from Metternich in order to tell him that a courier was leaving for Naples next day, and that Gentz might send an urgent reminder regarding the gratuity promised him by the court of Naples. He, Solomon, would see that the matter was put through by his brother Carl and General Roller, the intendant general of the Austrian troops. Gentz and Rothschild had become positively inseparable; the friendship certainly cost Solomon a great deal of money, but the cost was negligible in view of the advantages which it brought him.

The restoration of the Neapolitan kingdom by the Austrians placed heavy burdens upon the people. Count

Ficquelmont estimated that Naples had to pay 23 to 24 million gulden, or 12 to 13 million ducats, for the annual upkeep of the Austrian army;[122] he himself was terrified at the magnitude of the amount. "If the burdens that we impose," he reported to Vienna, "are so oppressive that they are more than the country can stand, all parties will unite in desiring our departure. Instead of being a protecting power we shall become oppressors. The end of it will be that we shall not be able to remain as long as our interests and those of the kingdom of Naples require."

The ambassador also stated emphatically, as he had often done before, that the finance minister was entirely incapable, and that there was only one man who could restore order, namely, Luigi de'Medici, the former finance minister, who had been overthrown by the revolution. All the other foreign representatives were also of this opinion, but the king feared Medici as a man whose intellectual gifts would not accord well with his own autocratic temper. Ficquelmont discussed this matter with Carl Rothschild, and Rothschild also thought that it was only by appointing this descendant of the eminent Tuscan noble family—a man of outstanding honor, energy, and administrative talent—that the material recovery of the country could be assured.

Although Medici had enemies among the royal family, such as the Duke of Calabria—to whom he had refused to give money for the duke to squander in an irresponsible manner—successful pressure was brought to bear by the Austrian government with the result that he was reappointed finance minister at Naples in the spring of 1822.

The new minister did succeed with great difficulty in getting the country out of its serious embarrassments.

It is true that not even he was able to deal with the demands of Austria, but he proved himself a pertinacious accountant, and managed to knock down considerably the maintenance expenses of the Austrian army, the returns for which had always been scaled up very generously.

He contrived to make the second Rothschild loan last longer than his incompetent predecessors had done in the case of the first loan, but in December, 1822, he was compelled to have recourse to a third loan, the extent of which was 22 million ducats nominal. Later on he raised a fourth loan of 2 1/2 million pounds sterling at the rate of 89 4/5, in order to acquire the necessary funds for paying the Austrian army for a further period, and for covering the deficit in the budget.

Through arranging for the loan to be issued in sterling instead of in ducats Nathan expected especially to interest English investors,[123] and in this he was successful. By February 26, 1824, the loan was already quoted at 96.75. The public debt of Naples, which before the revolution had stood at 28 million ducats, had risen by the year 1824 to no less than 104 million ducats nominal, yet the bonds appreciated so considerably in value that some Neapolitan public securities stood at 108 in April, 1824. It might have been expected that as the amount of the debt increased these quotations would fall, since, the income having remained comparatively stationary, the security for repayment of the debt diminished as the debt increased in amount.

The ambassador Ficquelmont fully appreciated the position when he wrote: "It was therefore another's credit and not that of Naples that caused the prices to rise, namely, the credit of the House of Rothschild. The value of its public securities is therefore not a reliable basis on which alone to found an estimate regarding a state's welfare. By so doing one might be gravely misled.

"Securities at Naples have risen in value because a wider market for them has been found. London and Paris have become the principal centers through which they are sold. It has not been possible for Naples to contribute in any way to the result, since Naples merely punctually paid the interest on its debt. ... A small portion of the funds has found its way to Austria, the balance, . . . which was not placed in Naples, has been gradually absorbed by powerful banking firms in London and Paris, which derive their profit from fluctuations in value, and have thus recouped themselves (and a great deai more) for the capital sums which they have advanced."[124]

Thus, briefly stated, the financial policy of the Rothschilds in Naples was summed up. Carl Rothschild had originally gone to Naples with the intention of remaining there only for a short time, as its occupation by Austrian troops was intended to be a temporary measure; but local conditions made it necessary that these troops should remain in the country for a much longer period, unless by withdrawing them Metternich was prepared to risk having the king and his reactionary supporters driven out of Naples.

While the Austrians remained, the presence of Carl was an urgent necessity; and his wife, who had embarked on the journey to Naples as a pleasure trip, made arrangements for a prolonged stay. Carl extended his business, and finally contrived to make himself indispensable to the Neapolitan court in financial matters. He struck roots in that beautiful city of southern Italy, and what had ar first seemed likely to be a brief business sojourn was destined to develop into permanent residence. And the House of Rothschild acquired a new center of operations in the world.

In spite of Stadion's efforts through Rothschild and military pressure to get in the money expended in Naples, the Austrian budget had got into a state of sad confusion. The rising in Piedmont had cost a great deal of money, and the military expenses had attained colossal figures. In despair Stadion reported to the emperor and Metternich[125] that the excess of expenditure over revenue was such that there was a permanent annual deficit of at least 20 million gulden, or more than one-sixth of the total budget. He urged the necessity for putting an end to this disastrous state of affairs. If it were to continue for a longer period of years, it would involve the downfall of the monarchy.

Stadion stated that another loan to cover this deficit was urgently required, and suggested recourse again to the House of Rothschild, whose wealth had increased prodigiously of recent years. Moritz von Bethmann, who was staying in Vienna in February, 1822, expressed the following opinion regarding the House of Rothschild:[126]

"I can understand that the Rothschilds prove exceedingly useful instruments to governments, and am far from wishing to cast aspersions on them or from envying them their good fortune. Solomon especially is a man of the most estimable character, and I am exceedingly fond of him. I have heard from a reliable source that Solomon Rothschild has stated that the annual balance sheet of the five brothers showed a net profit of six million gulden in 20-florin measure. This is certainly a case where the English proverb applies: 'Money makes money.'

"Observing their industry and judgment, we may expect their business to continue to flourish; indeed one hopes so, since the overthrow of this Colossus would be terrible. The harmony between the brothers contributes largely to their success. None of them ever thinks of finding fault with another. None of them adversely criticizes any of the others' business dealings, even when the results do not come up to expectations. Solomon has won people's affections here, partly through his general modesty and partly through his readiness to be obliging. Nobody leaves him without feeling comforted."

Stadion's gloomy report regarding the condition of the public finances induced the emperor to give his agreement to a loan being obtained from the House of Rothschild. Rothschild was approached in March, 1822, an amount of 28 to 30 million gulden being mentioned. The treasury official, Baron von Pillersdorff, wrote a considered report on the offer sent in by the firm.[127] Rothschild proposed that 30 million gulden should be issued at 70%, so that the loan certificates to be issued would represent a nominal capital sum of 42,957,000 gulden. As interest was allowed to be deducted, even before the money was paid, a capital amount of 42,875,000 florins would have to be issued in respect of cash received, amounting to 18,785,717 florins.

"If we compare the real underwriting figure (allowing for the deduction of interest) of 67%," Pillersdorff's report continued, "with the ruling price which averages 75%, we find there is a difference of eight points, or 10 2/3% in favor of the underwriters, which would mean a profit to them of 3,428,000 gulden. It further appears from the above statement of the case, that the interest payable on the suggested loan would amount to 7 1/2% per annum.

"The view to be taken of these conditions," the report concluded, "follows naturally from a consideration of the figures detailed above. In my opinion they are exceedingly onerous and less favorable than any previous proposals, having regard to the fact that the first loan, concluded when Austrian credit was in its infancy, was a daring experiment. They are unacceptable in view of all the reactions that would result. . . .

"Taking all these considerations into account, the proposals put forward do not seem to me such as should be accepted, even as a basis for further negotiation. It would certainly be a severe blow to the country's credit if it became known that, in the circumstances indicated above, a loan had been concluded at the price of 67%, especially when one bears in mind that the treasury would have to meet the reproach of having confined itself to a single offer."

The House of Rothschild was accordingly informed that the treasury was prepared to carry through a financing operation with them and Parish, if this could be arranged on favorable terms, but that the proposals made could not be regarded as such. Moreover, the treasury-wished to take up only a small amount. The Rothschilds, who wanted to get the business at all costs, replied in the following terms:[128]

"We hasten hereby to inform your Excellency that we have just heard from our houses in London and Paris, that several firms in those cities have informed them of their desire to invest capital in Austrian funds, and thereby to participate in a loan arranged for his Majesty's service. In view of our friendly relations with those firms, we should be exceedingly glad to meet their wishes as far as we can. So we venture to inform your Excellency, in connection with the offer (we have now made) for underwriting twelve million gulden of five per cent loan, that we are prepared in any event to offer one and a half per cent more for the amount decided upon than is: offered by any other firm."

The Rothschilds sent in a second letter on the same day, in which, together with Parish, they endeavored to get the large loan. They tried again to induce the finance minister immediately to issue the loan on a larger scale, as they stated,[129] "principally in order that the credulous and uninstructed public should have no occasion to believe that a similar operation would be repeated at an early date." The letter concluded: "In the full conviction, that none, not even the smallest circumstance of any significance escapes the profound insight and business acumen of your Excellency, we are confining ourselves briefly to indicating the above consideration and are content to leave the appreciation of it entirely to your Excellency's wisdom and judgment."

When the Austrian Treasury did not accept this offer, Solomon Rothschild felt personally aggrieved. He took his troubles to Gentz, who had just received a gratuity of three thousand ducats from the court of Naples, through Carl Rothschild's interventions. Gentz reports[130] how Solomon described, with many tears, how inconsiderately he had been treated in more than one quarter, in connection with his new loan proposals.

This failure was soon compensated for by other important transactions. Nathan had just concluded a loan of three and one-half million pounds with Prussia, and the repercussions of this transaction were felt as far as Frankfort and Vienna. Concurrently there were a large number of small loans arranged in Germany and Austria, with the higher nobility, who were short of money in both countries.

The loan, amounting to nine hundred thousand gulden, which Prince Metternich himself obtained from the House of Rothschild on September 23, is of particular interest. It was a perfectly straightforward business; the loan bore jive per cent interest, and was to be repaid by 1834; in fact the prince repaid it in full in 1827. There was nothing in the least suggestive of bribery about the transaction—Metternich was no Gentz—but it was bound to make the chancellor, who thus became Solomon's debtor, feel not entirely free in his dealings with him. At all events it had the result that Metternich was more inclined to be sympathetic to the personal wishes and requests of Solomon Rothschild and his brother.

The chancellor had known for some time that the brothers Rothschild were not content with the simple "von" that they had acquired in the year 1817, and that they had their eye on the title of baron. Upon Gentz one day sounding Metternich as to whether a request in that direction was likely to meet with success, the chancellor gave him to understand that he would raise no objection. The brothers accordingly put forward this request, mentioning their services to Austria. And it was granted; by an imperial decree, dated September 29, 1822, all the brothers and their legitimate descendants of either sex were raised to the rank of baron.

Heralds, the court officials, and Baron von Lederer, were automatically discounted. The Rothschilds obtained the seven-pointed coronet which, as a rather broad hint, they had drawn on the coat-of-arms submitted in 1817. The lion on the coat was also granted, and instead of the four arrows which the hand had grasped since they had been admitted into the ranks of the minor nobility, there were now five, symbolizing the five brothers. They were also granted supporters, a lion and a unicorn, and three splendid helmets adorned the coronet. The motto, "Concordia, integritas, industria," was intended to express the harmony between the brothers, as well as their honesty and tireless industry.

In view of the enormous value attaching to any title of nobility in those times, the promotion to the rank of baron signified for the Jewish House, which only twenty years ago had been almost entirely unknown outside its native town, an almost immeasurable increase of prestige. The private life of the brothers also changed from this time. They occupied luxurious dwellings in Frankfort, Paris, and London. Only the aged Gudula stuck faithfully to the family house in the Jewish quarter until her death in 1849 at the age of ninety-six.

Their efforts firmly to establish their social position also met with success, especially as the stories of the family's wealth had invested its members with a kind of legendary halo. They consciously encouraged this belief in their wealth and their power, for they fully realized that it increased the credit of their House. Astonishing though the achievements of the five brothers had been since their father's death, they showed no sign yet of flagging in their efforts. They were driven by the constant urge to accumulate ever-growing riches, and to increase their power and prestige.

CHAPTER V

The Rothschild Business Throughout the World

THROUGH his vigorous intervention, Metternich had restored peace after his fashion in the Apennine Peninsula. The chancellor, however, was constantly apprehensive for the future of his system and the principle of legitimacy, and dreaded the spread of liberal and democratic ideas. When the fires had been quenched at one spot they burst out at another on the broad continent of Europe. Attention was now directed to the Greek rising, and to the civil war in Spain, which had been continuing since 1820.

In this country, which had wrung a constitution from the king, the opposing forces of the Right and Left were still in conflict. During the summer of 1820 the radical members of the Cortes treated the king practically as a prisoner, and on June 22 of that year Ferdinand VII wrote to the King of France requesting him to send forces to his assistance, and also endeavored to induce the other great powers to assist him against his own subjects.

The idea of intervention did not appeal particularly either to the King of France or to his chief minister Count de Villele, although one party, that to which Chateaubriand belonged, was very much in favor of it. The matter had come to be one that concerned the whole of Europe, and Metternich had grown accustomed to intervene decisively in any important European crisis. He had found that the most effective way of doing so was through the congresses of sovereigns, such as had repeatedly been held of recent years. These congresses gave him the opportunity of using his persuasive powers to the full.

On October 20, 1822, another such congress met, this time at Verona. Metternich and Gentz accompanied the emperor to Verona as they had to Laibach, and profiting by their previous experience they took Solomon Rothschild with them. For it was obvious that if it were decided at Verona to apply measures of compulsion to Spain, the resources for this would have to be forthcoming immediately. As the House of Rothschild had proved so useful in the case of Naples, it was desired to make use of it if necessary on this occasion too. In the case of the congress at Laibach, Solomon had felt misgivings about leaving Vienna; but he made no difficulties now.

When Solomon arrived at Verona he learned from several representatives of the powers there of a rumor abroad that the House of Rothschild had offered a loan to the government which had come into power through the revolution, and which was threatening its own king, or that the Rothschilds had at any rate entered into negotiations with this government. Such conferences may actually have taken place; but it was of the utmost importance to the Rothschilds that Metternich should be reassured. He must not be left in any doubt as to the fact that their House was lending its support only to the legitimists and the conservative regime. Solomon therefore two days after his arrival at Verona hastened to write a letter to the chancellor refuting these rumors:[1]

"Most gracious Chancellor," the letter ran. "On my arrival at Verona I was amazed to learn that men of standing here believe that our House has contracted or intends to contract a loan with the Spanish government. Your Highness is far too familiar with the sentiments of myself and my brothers to give such a baseless rumor more than a moment's consideration. It is so wholly inconsistent with our general reputation that I do not think it necessary for me to go into explanations regarding the matter. I will confine myself to stating that your Highness may rest assured that we have never concluded any loan with the Spanish government, that we shall not conclude any such loan, and that we have refused such offers as have been made to us in this matter as decisively as we have, in your Highness's knowledge, refused similar offers in the past."

Solomon had spoken the truth. He had had nothing whatever to do with any arrangements with Spain; his brothers certainly, especially Nathan who lived in liberal England, often did things which they did not immediately communicate to the other brothers, and which these learned of only after the fait accompli; but on this occasion there had actually been no agreement concluded with Spain. After handing his letter to Metternich, Solomon called on Gentz. Alexander von Humboldt had just left him. Humboldt was attached to the King of Prussia's suite, and he had been discussing problems of high philosophy with the "Pen of Europe." In order to assure himself of Gentz's support during the congress, Rothschild held out to him the prospect of further profitable transactions, and Gentz noted with satisfaction in his diary that Rothschild had discussed with him "matters which although not so high were far more pleasant."[2] During the whole period of the congress Solomon and Gentz had been inseparable, and both had derived the greatest advantage from their association. Gentz introduced Solomon to the representatives of Russia, and the delegates of the tsar's dominions soon concluded a loan of £6,000,000. Apart from the business profit realized on this transaction, Solomon contrived to increase his personal prestige.

"Rothschild and his Paris brother had the Order of Vladimir conferred on them yesterday," Gentz wrote[3] to Pilat the editor of the Oesterreichischer Beobachter, which was the most widely read Viennese newspaper at that time. He would be very much pleased if this fact could be mentioned in the papers in an appropriate manner in the near future. "I do not feel that this can conveniently be done in the Beobachter; its proper place would be in an article on Verona, and as you have not published such an article yet, there would be something comic in this being the first item of news from here.

"We must, however, do everything possible to satisfy such a good and loyal person as Rothschild. You might give this matter your thought. In any case please see that it is mentioned as soon as possible in the Allgemeine Zeitung. Have the following statement printed in that paper: 'In recognition of the distinguished services rendered to the Russian Empire by the House of Rothschild in various important financial and credit operations the emperor has conferred the Order of Vladimir upon the barons Solomon and James von Rothschild.' Do not say St. Vladimir and do not refer to the class, which neither I nor the Rothschilds know."

Sometime later Gentz had occasion to send a reminder to his friend and wrote: "You have not replied to me regarding the Order of Vladimir conferred upon the Rothschilds. The baron is asking me every day whether you have forgotten about it. He is particularly anxious that the news should be featured in the Beobachter, and I do not see why this should not be done. At all events the news should be mentioned by you in the Allgemeine Zeitung before somebody else prints it in a misleading and possibly a malicious manner."

In the end the distinction was duly announced in both papers, and the news that the mighty empire of the tsars was also having financial dealings with the House of Rothschild appreciably assisted in raising its credit with the general public.

Meanwhile Solomon had inaugurated a private service of couriers between Verona and Paris and Vienna, and the Rothschilds proceeded to exploit the news about the congress, which they thus received in those capitals before anyone else.

At first it was not by any means certain whether armed intervention in Spain would be decided upon. Even Metternich was not entirely in favor of it, and as war with Spain was therefore not expected[4] French securities kept rising in value. Suddenly, on the arrival of a courier from Verona, James Rothschild sold French bonds to the nominal value of five million francs. The following day it became known that the banker Ouvrard, who was also staying at Verona, had concluded a loan with the Regency Government, which had been set up by the supporters of absolute monarchy in Spain for the duration of Ferdinand's captivity.

It was certainly natural to draw the inference that the congress was taking the side of the king, and a sharp fall in brench bonds resulted. The capital of France re-echoed with reproaches against ministers who had constantly averred that they were determined to avoid war with Spain. The slump became more and more acute, until, a few days later, the British ambassador got news from Vienna. It then became generally known that no decision had yet been taken, and Wellington was continuing, on behalf of England, to oppose the proposal for intervention. The securities now began to go up, and the good news was confirmed by Rothschild. On November 18, Villele wrote to his representative at Verona to say: "The Rothschilds' courier is causing our securities to rise again. He is spreading the news that there will be no intervention. I do not believe in these deceptive booms, which entail fresh variations in the rate of exchange and heavy losses to many persons,[5] especially when there may be a risk of war later."

The House of Rothschild was thus using the general political situation for the purpose of doing profitable business because it was able to get news early. James had been alarmed by the contradictory reports that had followed so rapidly upon one another. Solomon had confidentially informed him that important decisions were obviously pending at Verona, and that the French government would play the leading part in them. Solomon suggested that it would be exceedingly useful if James would come to Verona personally.

James quickly decided to make the journey, and on November 22 Solomon introduced his brother James to Gentz at Verona. On the following day the two brothers dined with Prince Metternich. A few days later, on November 26, Solomon planned to take advantage of his brother James's presence in Verona, and go himself to Vienna. Gentz had just given him a secret report on the congress, and several letters which he wanted taken to Vienna. But a post from Rome informed him that their brother Carl was shortly to arrive from Naples. Solomon postponed his journey for two days. The three Rothschilds had thus an opportunity thoroughly to discuss Neapolitan and Spanish affairs, and the probable result of the congress. After this Solomon and James returned home.

At the beginning of the congress, Solomon had been sending so much news from Verona to Vienna that the bulky Rothschild postal-packets attracted the notice of the postmaster at Scharding. He felt called upon to draw the authorities' attention to this exceptionally voluminous correspondence. This naturally did not particularly excite them, since numerous communications were entrusted to the Rothschild couriers by Metternich and Gentz themselves.

The decisions of the congress did finally lead to armed intervention by France in Spain. The congress passed off with great brilliance and duly impressed the world at large. The ancient arena at Verona was the scene of a magnificent banquet, which was attended by all the members.

Rossini, who was then at the height of his creative powers, charmed the members of the congress with melodies from his operas. Solomon, who had known Rossini in Vienna, introduced him to James at Verona, and this proved to be the starting-point of a friendship which was to develop into intimacy in Paris, especially during the last ten years of their lives.

Solomon dealt with Prince Metternich's personal expenditures at Verona—amounting to 16,370 lira—as indeed the House of Rothschild had furnished[6] all the cash spent in Verona, drawing it partly from France and partly from the various money-markets of the Lombard-Venetian kingdom.

The relations between Austria and that House were constantly growing closer, and her leading statesmen were scarcely able to refuse any request put forward by one of its members.

On September 30 the commercial department of the treasury received an application from Nathan, asking to be appointed Austrian consul-general in London. He pointed out not only that he had punctiliously performed the duties enumerated in his official instructions, especially in the matter of rendering assistance to Austrian seamen—doing so without asking for any compensation—but that he was the sole consular representative of a foreign power in London who had not the rank of consul-general.[7] He promised not to relax his watch on Austrian commercial interests in the future, and also most conscientiously to carry out any instructions which he should receive. The commercial department of the treasury strongly supported this application, and Metternich sent it forward to the emperor with the following memorandum:

"The said Rothschild has for a considerable period occupied the office of Austrian consul in London, to the general satisfaction of his chiefs, and in a disinterested spirit has carried out his duties often involving personal sacrifices, from which he never shrank where the prestige and the interests of your Majesty's service were involved. Your Majesty is moreover graciously acquainted with the services rendered by his House to the imperial state. The incongruity of his present rank in relation to the commercial agents of other foreign powers in London, who generally are styled consul-general, cannot fail to injure his official prestige."

Metternich also pointed out that James in Paris already had the title of consul-general, and Emperor Francis accordingly granted the application. So Nathan now held the same position in London as his brother in Paris. That city was the center now of Rothschild enterprise. The question of intervention in Spain was still the dominating issue, and as in this matter England was sharply opposed to the conservative groups in Russia, Austria, and France, it was inevitable that there should be a corresponding conflict of opinion within the House of Rothschild.

Metternich, with his legitimist policy, had Solomon completely in tow; Amschel was not so prominent, bu| owing to the Jewish problem at Frankfort, he had to follow the direction indicated by his protector Metternich, while James in Paris was so closely bound up with the leader of the ministry, Count de Villele, and anticipated such advantages from this connection that he too was compelled to fall in with the conservative group, who were all-powerful on the Continent. Carl at Naples was; also a dependent upon Austria, so that Nathan in liberal England was in an awkward position with regard to his four brothers on the Continent.

As a naturalized Englishman, and as banker of the richest state in the world, he personally would have wished to fall in with its political opinions as completely as possible. Indeed, it was necessary that he should do so, as otherwise he would speedily have lost his connection with the British government, and any possibility of doing big business in the future.

After the conclusion of the indemnity transactions in Paris, James had succeeded in getting on good terms with the Bourbon court, and especially with the leading minister Count de Villele. He had often been able to oblige influential persons in matters of finance, a fact which assisted him in his efforts to consolidate his position. Soon after his appointment as consul-general James had taken the magnificent Palais Fouche formerly occupied by Napoleon's commissioner of police, and the magnificent style in which he lived served to enhance his prestige. He was still a bachelor, a fact that somewhat limited his social activities, but also made it easier for him to make his way into exclusive circles, some of which still showed great reluctance to admit the Jewish parvenu, and only did so when personal interests made it appear desirable. Conditions, however, gradually improved in this respect as his wealth increased. James also benefited by the fact that the great Paris bankers of that period such as Laffitte and Casimir Perier were either liberal, or indeed almost revolutionary, in their views, while others such as Delessert, Mallet, and Hottinguer were too nervous to undertake risky ventures on a large scale.

In 1823 James offered to place funds at the disposal of Villele, and informed him that he was prepared to come to his assistance in alleviating the financial embarrassments of the treasury. James's first important transaction with the French Treasury consisted in undertaking the sale of 6% Royal Bonds. When at the end of January, 1823, the campaign against Spain was decided upon, James gave Villele to understand that he was prepared to deal with the big loan to which the chamber had agreed. Villele bethought himself of the precedent of Austria and Naples, and suggested that Rothschild should in a similar way raise the money necessary for intervention in Spain through negotiating a Spanish loan payable to France.

Fundamentally, however, James was as reluctant as Villele to embark on hostilities against Spain, for these might seriously interfere with his financial scheme. His attitude is revealed in some intercepted correspondence between him and a Spanish banker called Bertran de Lis, who was endeavoring in association with the Liberals to secure the fall of the Spanish Ministry, in order if possible to prevent the French from intervening. San Miguel's Spanish ministry had, in view of the French menace, obtained authority from the Cortes to change the seat of government and the royal residence. The king would gladly have dismissed the government, but the menaces of an excited populace caused him to refrain from doing so. If the fall of the ministry could be brought about in some, other way, France might perhaps be induced to regard this as indicating an improvement in the position and abstain from taking action.

Such was the state of affairs when a letter arrived from Rothschild's confidential correspondent at Madrid. "We are at this moment," wrote Bertran de Lis to the House of Rothschild in Paris,[8] "struggling to overthrow the ministry and to replace it with persons better qualified to guide the ship of state. I am convinced that we shall succeed in our endeavor, and I am therefore anxious that you should bring these facts to the attention of your government, so that they may cease taking any hostile action. I am asking you to do this in the confident expectation that a solution may be found consistent with the honor of both nations, which will assist in maintaining peace throughout Europe. I hope that you will support me in this endeavor as much as possible; but if you see that nothing can be done, and that a breach is imminent, I hope that you will send me a special messenger at my expense, so that I may regulate my actions accordingly in settling my financial affairs."

The same correspondent subsequently attempted in various ways to communicate items of important political and business news to James; but these appear to have been intercepted as they never reached their destination. The first letter to get through seems to have been one dated March 29, 1823, in which Bertran de Lis wrote:[9]

"It is our desire to avoid war, and in order to carry through the business that we have in hand, I feel I should let you know the line of action which in my view your government should adopt to this end. For one thing I feel they should cease any hostile operations until new ministers have been appointed. . . . In this way we might perhaps reach an agreement satisfactory to both nations, and one that might also bring us advantages of a general nature, and also such as we may turn to account in our business."

The writer of this letter proceeded to deal with the current situation in Spain in some detail, and concluded with the warning: "It is important also to use every precaution in carrying on this correspondence; for it would be exceedingly painful to me to be compromised in this matter in which I am convinced that the public interest is identical with my personal interest."

In spite of the precautions that were presumably taken, the correspondence fell into the hands of royalists, and was duly brought to the attention of Metternich at Vienna.

He was highly indignant that one of the Rothschilds, who always pretended to be so conservative, and denied that they had anything to do with Liberals, should suddenly be discovered in dealings of this character. Gentz was instructed to speak to Solomon about it. Solomon was at great pains to invent an explanation, and Gentz noted in his diary:

"I have just had a little discussion with Rothschild about the incredible story of his brother in Paris, who is suddenly appearing in the role of intermediary between the French ministers and a revolutionary banker at Madrid."[10]

Meanwhile the French had seriously embarked upon intervention in Spain. On April 7, 1823, the Duke of Angouleme, nephew of the king, crossed the Spanish frontier. He encountered no opposition, and pressed on far into the country toward the capital Madrid. It was Villele's task to provide the moneys required by the French army, and now that the die had been cast James Rothschild hastened to offer his services to the minister. His first action was to hand the minister a letter of credit in favor of the Duke of Angouleme addressed to a bank in Madrid that was closely connected with the firm of Rothschild.

Villele forwarded this document to the duke. "This is," he wrote in a covering letter,[11] "in the nature of a courtesy, but I was afraid of offending Rothschild, who has been and still is exceedingly useful to us in our financial difficulties, if I did not accept it. As soon as the army has entered Madrid Rothschild will send an official of the firm, or perhaps one of his brothers, to that city. I would request your Royal Highness to grant this banking firm your very special protection, as its intervention may be exceedingly useful to us in the future, both in the matter of rendering financial assistance to the army, and also in the matter of the Spanish loan, if such a loan can be usefully launched."

Angouleme did not share Villele's view that the letter of credit was to be regarded as a mere courtesy. "I consider," he replied, "that it would be exceedingly useful to avail ourselves of the facilities that Rothschild enjoys for providing ready money at Madrid." He held that this was a speedier and more economic method than sending money from France. He fully agreed that Rothschild should be treated with consideration, as recommended by Villele, who it was clear had learned much from the Austrians in Naples.

James was thus placed firmly in the saddle, and was enabled to carry out his measures under the protection of the two most powerful men in France at that time. It is true that Villele revealed a certain attitude of suspicion toward bankers in general, regarding them as voracious beasts of prey out for money.

On May 23 the duke entered Madrid without opposition, and set up a regency, which was to rule with modified absolutism until the king should have been liberated from the Cortes. This government, however, in spite of its dependence on French troops, soon threw all counsels of wisdom and moderation to the wind. In order to fill its empty treasury it attempted to arrange a loan with Ouvrard and an agent of the House of Rothschild, who had come to Madrid with the French army.

Villele warned Angouleme not to allow the regency to have a free hand in this matter. "For," he wrote,[12] "where the body is, there will the vultures be gathered together to devour it." He referred to the bankers, not excluding Rothschild, who would undoubtedly have offered the regency oppressive loans.

Meanwhile the Cortes had carried the Spanish king off to Cadiz, and Angouleme proceeded to invest that city and to liberate the king. "Cadiz is the key to the whole problem," Villele wrote to the duke.[13] "By force and negotiation the king must be got out of the hands of the rebels. Your Highness knows that his Majesty has given you carte blanche to enable you to succeed in this venture, and that we have plenty of money in reserve which is available for any of your requirements. Moreover, with the letter of credit which I have sent to you, your Highness can draw bills up to any amount on the House of Rothschild in London for making payments to those who may deliver up the king."

I n order to meet all this heavy expenditure Villele had been negotiating for some time for the flotation of a considerable French loan. The minister still found his dependence upon the House of Rothschild irksome, and gave vent to his feelings in a letter to the duke:[14] "Although I have nothing but praise for the manner in which Herr Rothschild has served us while I was in diffuculties, I should like to float a loan which would make me independent of these people."

The cold facts were destined to turn out rather differ-ently, and through this loan of 23 million francs, which was offered for public tender, Villele was to be bound more closely than ever to the House of Rothschild. In open competition with three other banking firms, James Rothschild, encouraged by his brother Nathan, offered 89.55%, the next highest price offered being 87.75%. The importance attached by the House of Rothschild to the conclusion of this agreement is most clearly evidenced by the fact that Nathan from London, Solomon from Vienna, and Amschel from Frankfort had all hurried to Paris for the negotiations.

Both parties were delighted with the arrangement. Villele was pleased since he had scarcely hoped that such conditions were possible for France, engaged in a venture like the Spanish intervention, especially in view of the fact that the country was already burdened with a foreign debt of 400 million francs.[15] He reported enthusiastically to the duke on July 11[16] that the bonds on that date already stood at 91.25, and that the loan had therefore appreciated 2 1/3%.

The four brothers did everything possible to extend the European market for this French loan. Villele congratulated himself on having got the loan underwritten at such a high figure, and explained his success as follows: "Monsieur Rothschild, whom the King of Portugal asked for a loan of 25 million francs, had the courtesy to ask King Louis XVIII for his permission before consenting. This is an example of the efforts which the financial powers were making to intervene in politics. Moreover, Rothschild of London, Rothschild of Frankfort, and Rothschild of Paris are all here, a fact which contributed not a little in giving me the confidence necessary to fix the minimum price at 89.5%."

Villele thought that he had carried through quite a clever deal, but this loan, which constantly rose in value, and reached par as early as February 12, 1824, proved to be a new and abundant source of profit to the issuing firm.

Villele now reverted to his scheme that the duke should present a skilful ultimatum demanding the liberation of the King of Spain and his family. Villele advised that he should bring money plentifully to bear in this matter,[17] and should have an unlimited supply of credit at his disposal through Monsieur Belin, the Madrid agent of the House of Rothschild, so that he could draw bills up to any amount on the House of Rothschild in London. James agreed that he might accompany the duke if he left Madrid. Belin's signature was sufficient to release amounts which it might otherwise be exceedingly difficult to procure. Without his assistance it would be impossible to use bribery for the liberation of the king.

"This man," Villele wrote to the duke, "is personally known to the majority of those whose support we need, and it will be much more attractive to them to receive the price of their infamy secretly in London than to be paid in gold which they would have to withdraw at their own risk from a city invested on all sides."

Villele had entirely forgotten his former feelings about the Rothschilds, and he had extensive recourse to the convenient services rendered by the firm at home and in Spain.

"Your Highness," he wrote to the duke,[18] "can use the House of Rothschild's money for all your financial requirements, whether necessitated by the service of the army or by the negotiations. In connection with the latter its agent's banking relations with the principal banking firms of Cadiz may be useful to you." He suppressed any misgivings at having brought Angouleme into such close contact with Rothschild. "Finance and trade," he wrote, "are the friends of peace, but they always wish to secure peace at the expense of honor; nevertheless, having the safeguard of a man of your Highness's temper and sentiment as a counterpart, we need not be anxious about allowing these gentlemen to intervene."

In Spain matters took the course that France had desired. On June 23, 1823, the duke had reached Cadiz and was prepared to launch his attack. The forts surrounding the city were speedily captured. The necessity actually to take the town by storm did not arise. In accordance with Villele's advice the duke made free with the Rothschilds' money; bills were drawn on Nathan Rothschild to the amount of nearly two million francs in favor of various members of the courts, and of the persons who held the king captive.

When the military position at Cadiz had become hopeless, and those who had accepted bribes promoted mutinies in the garrisons, the Cortes finally broke up, and released the king. It is true that he was first forced to sign a document containing all kinds of promises for a moderate form of government, in accordance with the constitution; but everybody knew perfectly well that he would not keep them. Thus the King of Spain was not in the end required to feel under an obligation to the powerful support of the House of Rothschild for his release from his own subjects of the liberal party. Neither was the duke forced to feel that he owed it to the banking firm that, after speedily overcoming all difficulties, he was enabled to return to Paris as a conquering hero.

The services which the House had rendered to the French government, however, enhanced its prestige at court and with Villele to an enormous degree. James began to surround himself with luxury, and to patronize science and the arts; he furnished his house at No. 40, rue de Laffitte magnificently. He received the Cross of the Legion of Honor.

After the intervention, the course of events in Spain was, to Metternich's delight, exactly similar to what had occurred at Naples. An absolute monarchy was reintroduced, the liberals being savagely persecuted. The constitution vanished. The Roman Inquisition functioned again, and the government went far beyond what the French government had wanted to achieve by intervention.

Ferdinand's new absolute government had money troubles no less than its predecessor; and the king appealed to the monarch of France, pointing out that his work was not yet completed, and that he lacked such a financial foundation as would be provided by a loan. Villele applied to James Rothschild, who, in conjunction with Nathan and the British bankers Baring and John Irving, offered a loan of 120,000,000 piasters[19] to be subscribed for at 60%. The bankers demanded, however, that the whole of Spain's Colonial revenue should be mortgaged, this being the only revenue that had suffered little through the civil war, and in addition they required that France should give a formal guarantee.

An agreement was not concluded at the time, since Villele replied to the bankers[20] that his first consideration must be his duty toward France. He could not agree to a guarantee by France without endangering its political and financial interests. He would, however, gladly advise the Spanish government to regularize its administration and to apply moderation in its general policy, in order to create the confidence necessary for such agreements. These were fine words, but they offered no tangible security for calculating business men, and accordingly the bankers withdrew their offer.

Metternich and Gentz had attentively watched the course of events. Rothschild's relations with Gentz had become, if possible, still more intimate, and the sincerity of Gentz's diary is attested by nothing more than by the entries of the 6th and 9th of January, 1823: "Rothschild called on me in Vienna. Everything is going magnificently and money in profusion. . . . January 9. I have been informed by Rothschild that a remittance of a thousand ducats is on its way from Russia."

Rothschild was assiduous in impressing Gentz with the riches and power of his family. On January 13, 1823, he favored him with over an hour's discourse on the position of his firm and its enormous resources, showing him some "eloquent and exceedingly interesting documents."

The firm had in fact grown so powerful that it now proceeded to conclude most important transactions, in which it had formerly allowed other firms such as Gontard and Parish to participate, entirely on its own. The brothers may have learned that the Austrian finance minister once more had occasion to think of them. England had recently demanded the repayment of some old debts owing by Vienna, and it appeared that Solomon's and Nathan's services would be required again. Metternich and Gentz were therefore anxious to be obliging at this time, especially in matters that did not cost the state anything. They did not have to rack their brains to find an opportunity of showing their good-will, for together with Borne, Solomon had been "hammering at [Gentz] about this wretched question of the Frankfort Jews."[21]

The growing power of the House of Rothschild, which had originated in Frankfort and now had dealings with most of the more important states, caused the Frankfort Jews to stiffen in their attitude. They now demanded as a right what they had formerly begged as a favor. While Solomon and Gentz were pressing Metternich to help the Jews of Frankfort, Solomon's coreligionists there were carrying on a constant campaign against Count Buol, delegate and president of the diet who was so markedly hostile to them. Their efforts finally resulted in Count Buol being recalled, and this constituted an important victory for the House of Rothschild.

Buol's successor, Baron von Munch-Bellinghausen, was instructed to settle the Jewish problem as speedily as possible, since it was Austria's intention to support such demands of the Israelite community as were just. Amschel

Meyer Rothschild was quite unrestrained in his demonstrations of joy. On the day when the new president of the diet arrived, Rothschild gave a big dinner, to which all the delegates were invited.

"I should have preferred," Munch stated in his report to Metternich,[22] "not to have made my first public appearance in this manner, but as the affair had already been arranged I thought that I ought not to be too nice; moreover I made the acquaintance of all the delegates before the session."

Matters now began to move; Miinch-Bellinghausen followed out Metternich's ideas in quite a different way from Buol, and in August, 1822, the question was settled in a manner highly satisfactory to the Jews. It is true that many restrictions were still maintained. Thus only fifteen Jewish marriages were allowed in each year;[23] no Jew was allowed to possess more than one house, and Jewish trade too was not free from all restrictions. The Jews, however, were henceforth counted as "Israelite citizens"; the ghetto was done away with, and they had full liberty of movement within the town.

They regarded these concessions as a victory, and Rothschild gave a dinner to celebrate them September 3, to which he invited both burgomasters, as well as the delegates to the diet. The former, however, again stayed away because, as Schwemer said, they did not feel in a mood for celebrations.[24] The debentures issued in 1811 under Dalberg's agreement for the liberation of the Jews were now fully redeemed. This fact also indicated that the Jews were satisfied. Thus the matters in dispute in the Jewish question, which had been pending for eight years, were finally settled by the diet acting in a judicial capacity. The principal credit for this was due to Rothschild. Both the town and the Jews sent deputations to thank Baron von Munch, who did not fail to report this fact to Metternich, as he knew well the importance Metternich attached to this question.

The reasons for supporting the Frankfort Jews were well known in Austria. Count Stadion had been negotiating with Rothschild and Parish, the underwriters of the last Austrian loan, since the spring of 1822 for a loan to cover the estimated deficit of 20 million gulden. They had stated that they were willing to underwrite 20 millions at 67, and then at 68.5%, but Count Stadion, whose recent experience in such matters had made him more cautious and critical, thought that these terms were not sufficiently favorable, or were, as he expressed it, "oppressive."[25] He therefore looked around for other offers, and for the first time in the experience of the Austrian government these were forthcoming.

Stadion wanted to borrow only 12,000,000 gulden at first; he fixed the final date for submitting tenders at April 14, 1822. The Paris banker Fould, representing a group of Paris firms at the head of which was Laffitte, offered to underwrite the 12,000,000 at 69%. Parish and Rothschild made a second offer to take over the loan at 69 1/2, while the Viennese banking firm of Geymuller offered 72 3/4. A conference of ministers was summoned for April 13, to consider the tenders.

Solomon Rothschild was particularly anxious to secure the loan, if necessary without the cooperation of Parish—with whom he had recently had several differences—as this would provide him with a further opportunity for exploiting the advantages enjoyed by his firm for the sale of securities through their branches in the most important markets in Europe. He learned through Gentz that other firms were not merely in the field but had actually offered better terms than his, and he therefore decided to write to Stadion.

When the finance minister went to attend the conference on April 13, he was handed a letter from the firm of Rothschild just before entering the conference room. This letter bore the signature of that firm alone. The firm stated that they were prepared in any case to offer 1/2% more than might be offered by anyone else for the loan which was to be issued.

The conference first decided that 20 million gulden should be issued at once instead of the smaller amount that Stadion desired. It was then considered whether or not any attention should be paid to Rothschild's late offer. The conference was agreed that Rothschild's letter was manifestly irregular. Applicants had been required to submit tenders under seal by April 12. Rothschild had done so jointly with Parish, but their offer had been less favorable than that of Geymuller. The second letter, although dated April 12, had not been given to Stadion until the following day. The minutes of the conference pointed out that "the irregularity of this procedure consists in having failed to observe the final date imposed upon all applicants for submitting their tenders—a fact which Rothschild is obviously trying to conceal by antedating his offer—and also in the lack of precision in the offer itself."

Metternich and Count Zichy expressed the opinion that Rothschild's offer should not be accepted, but that it should not be rejected either, and proposed that the whole matter should be negotiated afresh. With regard to the French banker Laffitte, whom he suspected of liberal sympathies, Prince Metternich stated that he feared the banker might be actuated by other than purely business motives. He added that he felt similar misgivings regard - ing Geymuller's offer, since it was possible that he was acting in concert with Laffitte.

While Metternich used his influence in favor of the House of Rothschild, Stadion took the opposite line, adhering to his view that Rothschild's retrospective tender should be ignored, and that the offer of the firm of Geymuller should be accepted as the best offer sent in by the time fixed.

Stadion was of the opinion that the financial interests of the state required that competitive tenders having been asked for, it was essential that the conditions laid down should be strictly observed, and that Rothschild's retrospective offer should therefore not be considered. "This is the first time," he emphasized, "that the treasury has had the gratifying experience of finding several competitors tendering for a loan. They will come to us again, and perhaps with even more favorable results in the future if we prove to them that belated offers are not considered. If in the present instance we act otherwise, it may be assumed that henceforth we shall have no possibility of securing genuine competition, and we may therefore pay dearly in time to come, for any immediate advantage." Finally, with reference to the objection made to Laffitte on personal grounds, Count Stadion observed that it would be quite impossible in any case to prevent him from being an unrevealed participator in a loan, and that even if Rothschild's offer were accepted this contingency would still have to be reckoned with.

As there was no way of bridging these differences of opinion the conference broke up without result. It was therefore necessary for the emperor to give the final decision, with the result that Metternich's views prevailed. The emperor issued the following decisions in council :[26]

"On the question whether 12 or 20 millions should be issued, the general political situation should be regarded as the determining factor, and Metternich should accordingly be consulted. A new date should be fixed for submitting tenders indicating that belated offers will not be considered."

Another year was to pass before the new big Austrian loan materialized. In April, 1823, the deficit up to the end of the financial year 1824 was estimated at no less than 35,000,000 gulden. It was now decided to issue a loan of 30,000,000. Four firms, including the House of Rothschild, jointly provided this sum in cash, receiving 36,000,000 five per cent debentures payable in coin, at 82 gulden per cent.[27]

While Austria was suffering from these difficulties, her aggressive foreign policy—especially the expedition to Naples, which was viewed very critically in England—had given rise to the belief that the finances of Austria must be in a most flourishing condition if it had so much money to spend on such objects. The Opposition in the British Parliament had for some time been reproaching the ministry for failing to demand payment of debts which had been incurred by Austria even before the revolutionary war.

Before the system of the English subsidies had come into effect, Austria had been granted two loans by England, to the value of £6,220,000 for financing its campaigns, and in the excitement of the Napoleonic wars, this fact had fallen into the background. With the addition of compound interest the debt had, by the time of the Congress of Verona in 1822, risen to an amount exceeding £23,500,000. Austria had already been approached at Aix-la-Chapelle regarding the repayment of the loan, but Metternich had refused to pay, and all the negotiations since had proved fruitless.[28] For Stadion definitely stated that if England insisted upon its demands it would mean the collapse of Austria's finances, which had been so laboriously resuscitated.[29]

When Metternich adopted a policy at Verona which was opposed to that of England, Wellington again reminded the chancellor that his government was pressing for the payment of this debt. He was not asking for the whole gigantic sum mentioned above, but was prepared to waive all interest charges, compound and simple, and would even be satisfied with a capital payment of £4,000,000. This amount, however, Austria must pay in any event Even this was a very considerable sum, representing about 40,000,000 gulden in convention coinage, and it constituted another dreadful surprise for Stadion.

Metternich realized that it was his policy which had induced this claim to be brought forward again, and he endeavored to reach an agreement in personal conversation with the British commissioner Sir Robert Gordon, who had been dispatched for this purpose. Various solutions were considered and rejected. Finally Metternich offered a lump sum of 30,000,000 gulden five per cent debentures at an issue price which involved the reduction of the total claim to about two million pounds. He then had recourse to Solomon Rothschild, asking him to try to influence the British government through his brother Nathan. Solomon immediately wrote a confidential letter to Nathan on the matter.

"The British minister," he wrote,[30] "has as yet made no reply to this proposal . . . It is probable that England will not at once unconditionally accept the offer of the Austrian government, but will attempt in one way or another to obtain better terms. Whatever the reply may be, however, I do not believe that the Austrian government will vary their original offer ... If it were to act otherwise, and all at once to put in circulation new public securities amounting to so many millions, the Austrian government would be dealing a severe blow to its credit, which is being raised by a businesslike and intelligent administration to a point commensurate with the country's greatness.

"You are a business man yourself, and will therefore be best able to appreciate these circumstances, so that it would be redundant for me to explain myself further. What I have written has been communicated to me in confidence by his Excellency Prince von Metternich, and it is merely intended to inform you of the general position. In any case you may, although only confidentially (for you have no official instructions) discuss the matter with the chancellor of the exchequer, and endeavor to convince the English of the fairness of the offer which is being made. As I am aware of your devotion to the government here, I feel confident that you will be grateful to me for giving you an opportunity of proving yourself useful and well disposed to them in such an important matter, and that you will show all the wisdom and caution necessary to assist it in attaining its ends. I hope that you will be able to inform me of the success of your endeavors by the next post ..."

Nathan thereupon got in touch with the bankers Baring and Reid-Irving, and also with the British government, and succeeded in persuading the government to agree to a payment of £2,500,000, whereas the negotiators, after at first asking for more, finally obtained from the Austrian government 30,000,000 florin 5% cash debentures at an issue price somewhat exceeding 82 2/3%. Stadion agreed to the offer made by the three firms mentioned above,[31] and on October 31, 1823, Solomon was able to send the following report to Metternich:[32]

MOST GRACIOUS CHANCELLOR!

It is with particular pleasure that I take this opportunity of informing your Highness of the pleasant news, that after considerable effort I have at last succeeded, in collaboration with my colleagues in London, in concluding the transaction with the English government on the basis of the amount of 30 million gulden 5% Metalliques Bonds. I have thus faithfully carried out the promise made to you on my departure, and am most happy to have been able to terminate a matter outstanding for so long, entirely to the satisfaction of the wishes of the imperial government.

I have been expressly requested by my colleague to endeavor to secure that the government of his Majesty the Emperor shall grant a commission of 2-3% to the underwriters in view of the fact that the transaction is such an advantageous one to the treasury. Mindful of the just and loyal principles of the government here, I may feel justified in assuming that if I submitted such a request it would not fail to receive consideration. But the reflection that my services and my zeal in this matter have resulted in such definite advantage to the state, and effected such large savings, is so exceedingly pleasant that I gladly renounce the possibility of deriving any further emoluments. I have made a similar statement recently to his Excellency, Count von Stadion, and therefore flatter myself that I have given occasion for his Majesty to feel satisfied with me, and have earned his gracious consideration.

Your Highness will no doubt deign to appreciate with your customary gracious condescension the efforts that I am making in the interests of the imperial state, and I confidently flatter myself that you will graciously consider a request with which, lest I should seem immodest, I do not venture to trouble your Excellency yet. I am waiting to communicate it to you verbally. I await with extreme impatience the moment when I shall have the happiness of seeing your Highness again and in the best of health, and when I shall be able personally to renew the assurances of my most profound regard. . . .

As a matter of hard fact the whole transaction constituted a bull speculation in Austrian public securities by the three firms concerned. Their expectations were fulfilled directly after the negotiations had been concluded, for as early as January, 1824, the Metalliques showed a marked appreciation in value.

When the conclusion of the whole affair was reported to Emperor Francis, with a suggestion that the Austrian mediator Kubeck should be commended, Count Zichy wished to avail himself of the opportunity for obtaining some imperial recognition for the House of Rothschild. He minuted on the memorandum requesting the emperor's confirmation that, although the firms carrying through the settlement of this loan, which had so materially improved the credit of the Austrian state on the London Stock Exchange, had indisputably had their own interests in view, they, and especially the House of Rothschild, nevertheless deserved recognition for the able way in which they had handled the business. Such a demand for Austrian securities had been produced that the last loan was already quoted at a premium of over 5%, while by making their credit available the firms had succeeded in the difficult matter of satisfying the English government.[33] Zichy accordingly proposed for the emperor's consideration that the following sentence should be added: "And we take cognizance of the efforts made by the London banking firms which have so materially raised Austria's public credit."

Baron von Lederer, however, added that in his view the services rendered in arranging the loan in England consisted merely in an intelligent appreciation of the circumstances ; and that on this service the banks had already realized no inconsiderable profit as shown by the prices of the securities published in the English papers.

Emperor Francis drew his pen heavily through Zichy's "frill," and took "cognizance with satisfaction" of the fact that the matter had been settled.[34] The whole transaction proved to be one of the most profitable pieces of business in which the House of Rothschild had ever engaged. The bonds continually increased in value, their average price in 1824 being 93, and in 1825, 94. It is obvious that the brothers Rothschild succeeded in very profitably realizing on the 30 million gulden debentures which they had subscribed at 82 2/3. It is not possible to estimate the actual profit, but according to the statement of Neumann it already amounted to £1,824,600 at the beginning of April.[35] Solomon Rothschild's "pleasant feelings" and the magnanimous gesture with which he refused a commission or "emoluments" are thus readily intelligible.

It is not surprising that, since Vienna offered opportunities of doing such excellent business, Solomon should have grown more and more attached to that city. In spite of the restrictions imposed upon foreign Jews, his relatives also were attracted by the idea of settling there. One of these was a cousin of Solomon Rothschild, called Anton Schnapper, who was about to marry the daughter of William von Wertheimstein, Rothschild's Vienna manager, a Jew who had received the imperial "toleration" as a private wholesale merchant.

Through Solomon's powerful influence Anton Schnapper contrived to obtain an audience from the emperor, and to submit his request for toleration, and permission to carry on business. Although the emperor gave his consent, much time elapsed, as was the case with all applications, before formal sanction could be given, and the impatient young man decided again to make application to the emperor, but in writing.

"Your Majesty," the application ran,[36] "The undersigned desires henceforward to be included among the millions of fortunate subjects who enjoy the merciful and just rule of your Majesty. I was born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and I am the son of honorable parents, my mother's name having been Rothschild. I have worked for several years as an assistant in the business of this well-known firm, and acquired such knowledge as goes to make a competent and honest business man.

"I now desire to settle in this city as a wholesale merchant, and to unite myself in the bonds of honorable matrimony with the virtuous daughter of the licensed wholesale merchant of this city, William von Wertheimstein. My request for 'toleration' and for authority to act as a wholesale tradesman has already been considered by all the departments concerned, found to be in order, and has been submitted to your Majesty for approval. May your Majesty be pleased most graciously to accede to this humble request, and speedily to grant it, and thus establish a family which in return for this priceless favor will never weary of beseeching the Almighty in their daily prayers to grant prosperity to your Majesty and your Majesty's family."

Schnapper sent this in with the observation that his first application was still lying in his Majesty's office. "You have on several occasions," he wrote to Solomon,[37] "kindly promised me your support in this matter, and in view of the bonds of blood and friendship that unite us, I hope you will have the kindness to concern yourself with it now."

Solomon kept his word, and requested Metternich[38] very kindly to emphasize the importance of this petition quite briefly to Martin, his Majesty's principal private secretary, as his Majesty's signature was still required.

Metternich's position was such that a word from him put the matter through at once.

Stadion continued to employ the House of Rothschild in important financial operations. In February, 1824, the firm undertook to produce old 200 gulden bonds to the value of ten millions for a commission of 2 1/2%,[39] if he were granted new 100 gulden 5% bonds in return for each 200 gulden bond. Solomon indeed wanted to increase the sum to twenty million, subject to the condition that during this period the old debt should not be reduced, and that the strictest secrecy should be observed during the whole scheme. The offer came to Hofrat von Lederer for his opinion, and he at once minuted that he doubted whether the House of Rothschild would find it so easy to carry through the business to the tune of twenty millions.

He was to prove right; for in February, 1825, the House of Rothschild asked to be allowed to reduce the amount to seven (from ten) millions. In the meantime the older bonds had increased considerably in value, and the result was a loss to the firm. The House of Rothschild naturally did not do all its business at a profit; but if it ever failed to do so, or actually suffered a loss, the brothers generally succeeded in their efforts to reduce it to a minimum, and above all, to keep it secret. The firm's transactions, even outside Austria, were constantly increasing in scope, and its undertakings were beginning to extend beyond Europe to other continents.

Brazil had, in 1821, also imposed a Cortes constitution upon its sovereign the King of Portugal, with the result that separation from the mother-country was decreed and the king's son Don Pedro was proclaimed constitutional emperor. This occurred with the support of England, but against the will of the conservative eastern powers, and especially of Metternich.

While the four brothers on the Continent were under Metternich's sway—James alone allowing himself occasional secret ventures with the liberals in Spain—Nathan had to do his best to follow the general political tendencies of liberal England. When, therefore, in 1824 Brazil was unable to fulfil its obligations to another London firm, Nathan intervened to the great satisfaction of British statesmen, taking over Brazil's liabilities, and in 1829 he concluded a loan of £800,000 with the new imperial state. This enabled Brazil to put her finances in order, while Nathan did not suffer financially.

However, such loans, being suggestive of liberal sentiments, would naturally arouse resentment amongst the conservative powers, and they also gave rise to considerable difficulties amongst the five brothers. Fundamentally the brothers were in complete agreement regarding their aims, and they had no intention in any circumstances of adopting any definite political line. Their adaptability made it impossible to do anything of the kind. But those Rothschilds who were living within the sphere of Metternich's power, and especially the Viennese Rothschild, were forced at any rate to pretend that they stood exclusively for the conservative tendencies represented by Metternich's system. It was often exceedingly difficult for them to explain away or put a good complexion upon Nathan's actions, a fact which frequently led to embarrassing situations.

At this time occurred an event of great importance to the House of Rothschild. On May 13 Solomon Rothschild came to see Gentz in a state of great excitement, and told him he had just received news that Count Stadion had suddenly had a stroke at his home. A man of the most scrupulous personal honor, and the most indefatigable industry, he was profoundly ambitious, and so permeated with the spirit of devotion to duty and with a sense of the importance of his work, that he took all the vicissitudes of his difficult office deeply to heart; he therefore used up his reserves of energy more quickly than other men. The excitement and the strain of the events of the last few years had prematurely worn him out. He died two days after the stroke, and was succeeded in office by Count Nadasdy.

This was a serious loss to the Rothschilds, for they owed it to Stadion more than to anyone else that they had come to Vienna. It is true that during the last years of his life he had grown much more skeptical and critical in his attitude toward the brothers; but they were so intimately connected with Austrian finances that a new minister, had he wished it, would have had the greatest difficulty in eliminating them. Even Metternich, who secretly cherished feelings of suspicion and aristocratic pride toward the Jewish parvenus, never thought of such a thing.

Moreover, Gentz and the Rothschilds themselves took care that no serious misunderstanding should arise. As Gentz reports, Rothschild not only repeatedly saw Metternich at his office during this period, he also often had meals with the prince; and Solomon's big dinners with thirty or more guests were attended by ministers and ambassadors and many members of the aristocracy. Through his numerous invitations, Solomon extended his connection, and got ideas for his operations.

The center of gravity of the House of Rothschild's business was at that time in France. The former leader of the royalists and head of the government in that country had not forgotten the financial assistance rendered by the House of Rothschild at the time of the Spanish expedition. As it was his ambition to set France on her feet financially, it occurred to him that he might avail himself of the assistance of the House of Rothschild in this also. At that time France had to pay no less than 197 million francs interest on its public indebtedness. Villele meant to reduce this intolerable burden by converting the 5% loan, which already stood at par on February 17, 1824, to a loan at a lower rate of interest, namely 3%. In this way he anticipated saving about thirty-four millions annually in interest. Villele thought out his scheme and then made a detailed proposal to James Rothschild in Paris.[40]

The minister showed that in spite of the expense of the Spanish war, he could make his budget balance without a further loan or additional taxation. "In these circumstances," he wrote, "it appears to me to be possible to take advantage of the conditions that have caused public securities in England and throughout Europe to appreciate in value, for the purpose of carrying through the conversion of our 5% bonds into 4 or 3% bonds."

Villele asked James to cooperate in this plan, which was not to affect French credit. He meant in this way to convert no less than 150 million bearing 5% interest, and to issue to the underwriters a corresponding amount of 3% bonds at 75. The minister hoped that the 3% bonds would also soon rise in value; and he offered to allow the underwriters to keep the saving in interest during the first year after the conversion of the bonds bearing 150 million in annual interest had been effected.

James immediately informed his brother Nathan in London of the French finance minister's proposal for this gigantic transaction. All the brothers, and especially James, tacitly recognized Nathan as having the best financial brain. His connection with the British government also made him the most influential of all the brothers. The finance minister not only had sent his proposal to James in writing, but also had repeatedly discussed it with him personally, and immediately after such discussions, on the 2nd, 3rd and 4th of March, 1824, James sent a private courier to his brother Nathan in London. On March 6, Nathan, after consulting with the banker Baring, sent James the following reply:[41]

"MY DEAR BROTHER: ... the brothers Baring, as well as I myself, will be pleased to be of use to the French government in their plans for reducing the interest payments; and as the scheme seems to have been well thought out, there should not be much cause to fear for the result. At the same time, it is absolutely essential that the finance minister should be in complete agreement with us, and that no difficulties should arise in carrying out his intentions.

"It is quite clear that the present price of the bonds is maintained by speculators who have been exceedingly lucky for some time, and will no doubt continue to develop their success by further speculating on a rise. Such persons, however, have not the power to assist the finance minister in a scheme embracing such far-reaching possibilities, unless it be supported by such eminent capitalists as Messrs. Baring and Rothschild. I am sending you the draft of a scheme which I should like to have submitted to the minister, and the success of which would undoubtedly be of enormous importance to the country and to the government."

In this drafted scheme Nathan explained that the finance minister would have first of all to secure the chamber's consent to the operation, the government being allowed a completely free hand to carry through in the most advantageous way possible, as was done in similar cases by the British Parliament. In essentials, Nathan followed Villele's proposal that he should jointly with Baring underwrite 150 million 3% bonds. He asked only that, in the event of the operation being less successful than was anticipated, the minister should be authorized by the chamber to issue treasury bills up to 100 million francs, so that in such a case Baring and Rothschild would be able to get money by cashing these bills, and would not be forced to sell the bonds.

"If the results work out satisfactorily," wrote Nathan, "the firms of Baring and Rothschild, who will apply all their energy and risk their property in carrying out the French minister's scheme, must expect to receive as their reward the profit which this operation will yield during the first years. The minister must persuade the bank to discount at 3%, and also to lend money on the bonds.

"His Majesty will thus be in a position when the chamber reassembles, to inform his subjects and the whole world of the flourishing condition of French finances, and that, too, directly after a war which has restored the Spanish Bourbons to their throne and to the hearts of their people. . . ."

If the whole operation were to go through successfully, and if 150 million of annual interest charges were really to be cut down from 5% to 3%, the saving effected by the French government would run into many millions, and the House of Rothschild was to receive the benefit of the first annual saving thus made.

Villele and the two firms soon arrived at an agreement Nathan had applied his experience in British transactions of a similar nature, and the whole matter had now to be submitted to the public.

When the chamber reassembled, the King of France referred to the contemplated operation for reducing the rate of interest payable on the public debt. The proposal came as a surprise to the public. The bonds were held by many thousands of small people, and the news made a great sensation because innumerable investors felt themselves hit, and most of the bondholders understood only that they would in future receive three francs interest instead of five.

Meanwhile the bonds had been driven up to a still higher figure, reaching 104 and 106. Each man felt himself threatened in the possession of this valuable paper, and a storm artificially raised by Villele's enemies broke out. This was increased by making enormous play of the government's statement that the former emigres should be compensated out of these savings. Vincent, the Austrian ambassador in Paris, reported that these operations would furnish the banking powers with fresh fields of gain, and that their avarice would lead them to suggest similar plans to all other governments.

The scheme met with harsh criticism in all quarters, the most devastating being contained in a report from Paris to Metternich, which concluded with the words: "The rentiers are wild with indignation, but Villele will attempt nevertheless to carry the thing through, for he is a minister quand meme." [42]

The king was so upset that he did not dare to show himself in the streets of Paris, fearing demonstrations by the small bondholders. Nevertheless, at the expense of his popularity he consistently supported the plans and intentions of his prime minister.

There were exceedingly severe critics of the role which the House of Rothschild played on this occasion. Ouvrard attacked them with special severity in his memoirs.[43] As, however, he belonged to the party which was hostile to the Rothschilds, his statements can be accepted only with reservations. There was no immediate prospect of the House of Rothschild making either profit or loss, for the proposals were carried in the lower house by a very small majority, while the members of the upper house, most of whom had strong personal interest as bondholders, rejected the proposal on July 3, at the instigation of Chateaubriand. Thus, the scheme failed.

Gentz does not seem to have been speaking so well of his friend Solomon at this time, or possibly he wanted to impress Metternich with the fact that he could assert his independence of the House of Rothschild. In any case he wrote to the chancellor on June 11, 1824: "I am secretly pleased that Villele's finance operation has not gone through. It will do no harm if that gentleman's arrogance is somewhat reduced. Besides, the scheme itself was exceedingly unjust and cruel; and France will certainly be impressed by the fact that the hundred thousand families who would have been hard hit by it owe the fortunate event entirely to the aristocratic opposition. Also there can be no harm in the coalition of big bankers having suffered a rebuff which will somewhat damp their ardor for getting new business. Everything must have a limit, and the all-powerful firms were beginning to go beyond theirs. They obviously had a fully prepared scheme for carrying through similar reductions in interest in all the principal states. It will now be as much as they can do to get out of the French scheme with a whole skin . . . and if I were Solomon Rothschild I would retire with all my millions after losing such a battle." [44]

If this remark was meant seriously, Gentz was to prove very much mistaken. It was not the habit of the Rothschilds to throw up the sponge at the first reverse. Moreover, one must be cautious in drawing conclusions from a perusal of the letters that passed between the brothers and Austrian politicians, as the letters suggest that they were inspired by unqualified devotion to the state of Austria, which would not have been consistent with their position with regard to other governments.

Carl Rothschild at Naples in particular soon realized that it would not be at all advisable for him to be regarded there merely as the agent of a foreign power. The occupation by the Austrian troops could not last forever, and it was all the more necessary for him to cultivate relations with the local authorities since he was strongly inclined to settle permanently in Naples, and to found a new branch, the fifth, of his House there.

As the king and the members of the royal family at Naples were always in need of money, Carl had several opportunities of obliging them. His constant business dealings with the finance minister, Medici, resulted in their getting on very good terms in spite of the payments to Austria. While on the one hand the Rothschilds assured Austria of their anxiety to see the state paid by Naples, Carl protested to Medici that he would do everything he possibly could to lessen the burden that Naples had to bear. The results soon became apparent; Medici began to examine and criticize the accounts sent in by Austria for the maintenance of the troops. Ficquelmont now lamented[45] the fact that the sums to be paid by Naples had not been fixed once and for all, and demanded in 1822. He suggested that in that case Medici would not have had time to examine Austria's disbursements so closely.

"The real reason," he stated in a report to Vienna, "that he is induced to increase his demands, and to make difficulties, lies in the fact that he obviously knows of the savings that we are effecting; as Rothschild is transmitting them to Vienna, we may practically assume that Medici is bound to know of them, for Rothschild's staff is in too close touch with Medici's for this to be avoided.

"It would have been better to leave this business to the quartermaster's department of the army, as was done in the case of the first occupation of Naples; in that case nobody would have known the amounts that we transmit to Vienna, and we would also have saved the charges which we pay to the House of Rothschild. Our departments send in exaggerated accounts, and I should not like to have the task of defending them. It is exceedingly annoying that the figures made up by the accounts department should be submitted to a foreign government without revision. This is the most certain way of compromising us."

It was a bold admission to state that the expeditionary force was being used to get more money out of Naples than the expenses actually incurred; but Count Ficquelmont must be given considerable credit for the fact that he opposed these exaggerated demands, and pointed out that the annual claim of 13 million ducats, sent in by Quartermaster-General Roller, was gaining for the Austrian the enmity of the whole country.[48]

The king also was forced gradually to realize that he would not much longer be able to dissociate himself from the movement that pressed for the recall of the Austrian troops, for Medici daily reminded him of what terrible burdens the occupation imposed upon the kingdom, and how his sovereignty was limited thereby. But the king feared the outbreak of another revolution; and as he did not trust his own soldiers, he attempted to recruit Swiss regiments. These negotiations came to nothing because of the expense of raising the troops.

The king then proceeded to recruit in Ireland. The brothers Rothschild had very skilfully introduced this idea to him. Great disturbances had broken out in that country as a result of the wretched conditions under which the poor peasantry, oppressed by their landlords, were living. Nathan had come into contact with an Irishman, the Irish London banker Callaghan, who thought that the British government would also be in favor of such recruiting, as it would draw off dissatisfied and poverty-stricken elements of the population. Nathan saw the opportunity of killing three birds with one stone: he would be rendering a service to the English government by diverting a troublesome element; to the Ring of Naples by providing the neutral troops that he so much wanted; and, in addition, he would do good business for himself.

It was Nathan who, having prepared the ground in England, advised his brother Carl to make a proposal on these lines to the King of Naples.[47] He enclosed the Irishman's letter, which stated that the difficulties that might previously have been put in the way of such a scheme had disappeared, now a new government had come into power. Callaghan stated emphatically that the overpopulation of Ireland, where it was scarcely possible to keep body and soul together, was at the root of all the trouble, and that it was positively desirable that some of the population should emigrate.

Carl Rothschild handed the letter to the minister Medici, telling him of Nathan's proposal. Medici hastened to inform the king of both these facts, the king's one wish being to have at last some sense of security.

Shortly afterwards King Ferdinand fell ill, and died on January 4, 1825. He was succeeded by Francis I, who was personally no less frivolous and extravagant than his predecessor, and was far from possessing a strong character. Under his rule the state of the kingdom tended to get worse rather than to improve. He too had reason to feel anxious about his personal safety, and in 1825 it was decided to recruit four Swiss regiments for Naples, and the Irish project was discarded. The incident illustrates how the Rothschilds would apply their energies in the most varied spheres, if there were any prospect of rendering a service to those in power, and incidentally filling their own pockets.

Meanwhile James was actively engaged in negotiations in Paris for a new Spanish loan, which the Madrid government wanted to put through at any price. Busy though he was, he contrived to steal time to make a journey to Frankfort in early July, 1824, in order to marry his nineteen-year-old niece Betty, the daughter of Solomon. He was acting in accordance with the wish of his dead father - which had come to be regarded in the family as an unwritten law—that the sons should refrain as far as possible from introducing other families into their circle by marriage, and should in no circumstances marry a Christian.

Even on this journey James took with him private letters and dispatches reporting on the situation in France, from the Austrian ambassador to Prince Metternich, who was staying at his country place, Johannesberg. Forgoing his honeymoon, immediately after the marriage, James had to return to Paris as his brothers Carl and Solomon were there, carrying on discussions with the Spanish negotiators.

The three brothers decided that one of them should go to Nathan in London with a Spanish plenipotentiary, and ask him to try to persuade the House of Baring to participate in the loan. The Rothschilds, however, demanded that the seventy-two millions which Spain owed to France for her intervention should be included in the loan; to this proposal the Spanish government raised objections. As the Rothschilds in any case had little confidence in Spanish conditions, and tried in vain to secure a guarantee from other powers, the negotiations on this occasion also came to nothing.

On September 16, 1824, King Louis XVIII died. His brother, the former leader of the conservatives, succeeded to the throne as Charles X. He was already sixty-seven years old, and firmly convinced of the necessity of still more definite reactionary measures, as well as being full of religious intolerance. Villele remained in office for the time being, so that as far as the Rothschilds were concerned, there was no immediate change in the political and financial situation in France.

During this period their business expanded in all directions; Nathan founded a big insurance company in England, the Alliance Insurance Company; Amschel was collaborating with Bethmann, Gontard, and Brentano in a scheme for founding a bank at Frankfort, although through the opposition of the senate it came to nothing.

As the Rothschilds' business expanded, their correspondence naturally became more voluminous, and they found it necessary strongly to reinforce the system of couriers with which they had covered Europe. This circumstance entailed a consideration of the question whether their correspondence could be more closely watched.

In this connection the suggestion made by a Milan postmaster is illuminating. "I have often noticed," he reported to Vienna,[48] "that the Rothschild clerks who travel as couriers from Naples to Paris about once or twice a month take with them all the dispatches of the French, English, and Spanish ministers, accredited in Naples, Rome, and Florence. In addition to this not inconsiderable correspondence, they also deal with the communications passing between the courts of Naples and Rome and their legations at Turin, Paris, London, Madrid, Lisbon, etc., as well as all private letters that are of any importance.

"These couriers travel via Piacenza. As we have an Austrian garrison there, under the command of the reliable Colonel Eberl, it might perhaps not be impossible to induce one or another of these clerks to hand over their dispatches for our perusal. Such an examination should yield profitable results, especially if we wait for a favorable or important moment. A room at Piacenza under the protection of Austrian soldiers would be all that we should want in order to do everything necessary without attracting attention."

Since diplomatic correspondence was involved, this proposal concerned the chancellor, and was duly brought to Metternich's notice. He felt that it would be awkward to accept the suggestion. The scheme could turn out to be a double-edged weapon, as he himself often made use of the Rothschild couriers, and matters of the greatest secrecy might come to the knowledge of a subordinate postal official. On the other hand, Metternich would have been exceedingly glad to get hold of the private correspondence between the brothers Rothschild and, as the technical term went, to submit it to "manipulation."

The result of these considerations was the issue of the following order: "The couriers of the House of Rothschild passing through Lombardy on their way from Paris to Naples, or from Naples to Paris are, when carrying dispatches bearing the seal of the I. and R. Consulates-General in those cities, to be regarded and treated as official couriers; if, however, they should be found carrying any letters which have nothing to indicate that they are of an official nature, such letters shall be subject to the usual regulations in force."[49]

Hormayr, the former director of the Vienna State Archives, who had been banished because of his association with the Archduke Johann in his venture for founding the so-called "Alpine Kingdom," was a bitter enemy of Metternich and the emperor. He was thoroughly familiar with the manner in which correspondence was tampered with, and used this knowledge for making a violent attack upon Metternich and Solomon Rothschild. He even went so far as to state[50] that Metternich had, in agreement with Solomon, waited at Fischamend, two stages from Vienna, for a post bearing important news from Constantinople, and held it up for two days.

"This was done to gain time in order to have two or three days to rig the market, and to make some hundreds of thousands for the chancellor, Zichy, and the rest of the pack of thieves, with the German fortress caretaker[50a] Rothschild, the King of the Jews and the Jew of Kings, at their head."

As far as Metternich's relations with Rothschild were concerned, these exceedingly offensive allegations were far from the facts; but it certainly was possible, through holding back news received by courier, to gain time for profitable deals on the exchange, and this was no doubt done.

The firm of Rothschild, which had now literally attained world-wide dimensions, was to enter upon a difficult period. The long years of peace which England was enjoying led that country to seek profitable investment for the enormously increased wealth which it had acquired since the successful termination of the Napoleonic wars. There was also an increasing tendency to unsound speculation, and a flood of new flotations. As the Central and South American republics freed themselves of Spanish dominion, they seemed to offer desirable opportunities for doing business in agricultural produce and mines.

At the end of 1824. there was feverish activity in the City. Companies sprang up like mushrooms, and millions of pounds in cash were subscribed. Almost all the principal London firms took part in this movement;[51] but the Barings and Rothschild, who regarded it as unnatural and artificial, held aloof. The year 1825 proved that they were right. The South American mining ventures collapsed, and numerous undertakings apparently on a solid foundation experienced the same fate, in a crisis that was becoming more and more general, and was spreading from London to the whole of Europe. Consols fell appreciably, and foreign public securities threatened to follow their example.

In these difficult circumstances, Wellington remembered the signal services Nathan had once rendered to him under the much more dangerous conditions of war. He consulted him as to how the crisis should be met, and Lord Liverpool's government followed Nathan's advice.

Nathan had intended to go to Paris to meet Metternich, who was staying there in 1825, but in view of the critical economic situation, he could not think of leaving London, and wrote the following letter to Metternich:

"It has been my daily endeavor to travel to Paris, in order to express to you the gratitude I owe for the gracious and fatherly kindness which your Highness has shown to the Rothschild family for so many years. The date of my journey was actually fixed, but an entirely unexpected event unfortunately frustrated my intentions. The British funds, which had reached a very high level, have fallen rapidly, because of incorrect inferences drawn by the English from the meeting of sovereigns. I am accordingly forced to remain here to prevent if possible any further fall, the government being unwilling that I should be absent at this time.

"I hope your Highness will not misinterpret my absence, and will appreciate the obvious urgency of the matter which detains me . . . since, if a further fall in the funds is not speedily checked, the movement will spread abroad, and even affect the I. and R. Austrian funds. Nevertheless I cherish the hope that financial circles here will soon regain their confidence, and am looking forward to making the journey then, and waiting personally upon your Highness. Meanwhile I beg that your Highness will graciously accept my written expressions of thanks in the spirit in which they are offered, as proceeding direct from my heart, for I pray constantly to the Almighty that our beloved sovereign emperor may long be spared, and that your Highness may flourish."[52]

Thanks to Nathan's skill, the developments in England did not result in excessively serious losses to the House of Rothschild, in spite of the crisis through which that country passed, but the firm was severely affected indirectly by the commercial crisis in Paris. In spite of the change in the general situation, the French minister Villele had adhered to his conversion scheme, and although the Rothschilds were much less enthusiastic about it than they had been a year ago, James was so closely bound up with the French minister that when Villele took the scheme up again in May, 1825, he could not stand entirely aloof.

He certainly did not conceal his misgivings. While Metternich was in Paris, James openly said to him that it was wrong of Villele to resume the operation at that time.[53] James was more explicit in the following statement to the Austrian ambassador, Baron von Vincent: "There are times when such an operation may be opportune. Last year the finance minister was assured of the success of his scheme; he was supported by powerful firms, and a large volume of English money was available for investment in France, but now it is flowing into other channels. The return of the capital sums that find their way to America is only partial, and much slower. Most of the banking operations in Europe are not carried through on a cash basis, but this is not the case in America. The . . . operations of Mr. Huchinson in England are moreover exactly contrary to those of M. de Villele. When one also considers the constant complaints in the press which bring the measures proposed by the ministry into bad odor, one cannot but fear that it will find itself deprived of the necessary resources."[54]

Villele, however, was not to be restrained. He succeeded this time in carrying his proposals in the upper chamber as well, and he proceeded to put his long-cherished plans into operation. The Rothschilds could not exclude themselves from the scheme, but they went into it very cautiously. The Paris market was reacting to the fall in prices in England, and as success was largely dependent upon a boom in French securities, the prospects were far from propitious.

James remarked to Vincent on July 7, that it was a long time since he had seen the Paris market so dull. He shared the antagonism of a certain party toward M. de Villele, and he said it was certainly not his fault that the House of Rothschild was regarded as seriously compromised in having supported the government.[55] This was a dig at Nathan, because James was a little jealous of Nathan's outstanding reputation.

The difficulties of the whole undertaking were increased through the public opposition of the authorities at the Bank of France. This was shown in the fact that they suddenly demanded the repayment of considerable sums advanced by the bank to the treasury. James was, however, not altogether confident that he was right in taking up an attitude opposed to the operation. The matter might succeed in the end, and in that case James would have suffered a humiliating reverse. He accordingly thought it advisable to say[56] to Vincent as early as June 8, that in spite of the bank's hostility to Villele and to the House of Rothschild, matters could still be arranged, and Villele's plan would yet succeed.

Somewhat later, after the chambers had accepted the draft bills, James for a time saw everything in glowing colors, and wrote a letter to Metternich expressing his changed views :[57] "You may now be assured that Villele has won his case. The bonds will be a great success, and he will defeat all his opponents because he is right."

On June 18, Solomon, who was also staying in Paris, made the following statement: "I am now able to say that notwithstanding all the vigorous attacks to which M. de Villele has been subjected hitherto, and is still being subjected, in my view, his financial scheme will go through; and the count, who enjoys his Majesty's confidence to an exceptional degree, will be strengthened in his position; while the enemies of peace and of the ministry will be deprived for a long time yet of the pleasure of seeing it fall."[58]

Metternich condemned this remarkable change of opinion with the remark: "In Paris Rothschild said to me that Villele was wrong. It is often so with the world's judgment."[59]

James's first view had really been the right one. The general financial situation throughout the world did not in fact admit of such an operation's being carried through at that time. The government succeeded only in converting 30 millions to 3% bonds, and these quickly fell from 75 to 62 and 63.

Four of the Rothschild brothers—Nathan alone was absent—were assembled in Paris in August to take counsel regarding the steps to be taken to limit the loss resulting from the decline in the 3% bonds. They admitted[60] that they had not reckoned with the possibility of such an unexpectedly sudden fall. The four brothers finally went to consult the family oracle Nathan, in London, with a view to taking energetic measures to save the situation. Villele's conversion scheme, however, could not be improved in any essential now. Even the 5% bonds were quoted some points under par at the end of the year. All they could hope to do was to limit their losses, and in this they succeeded to a certain extent; but the whole affair was an unfortunate piece of business.

In other, more distant fields also, the Rothschilds had not been over-lucky in their investments during that year. After several fruitless attempts at reconquering Haiti, the second largest island of the Antilles, it had to be surrendered by France, on the payment of an indemnity of 150,000,000 francs by the new republican government. This government borrowed the necessary money, the loans being taken up by a French syndicate, including Rothschild and Laffitte. The Republic of Haiti was never able to meet its obligations; and even though the French government eventually indemnified the two firms for their losses, the transaction had to be put down as unprofitable.

Whether the brothers Rothschild were fortunate or unfortunate in their dealings, their names were on everybody's lips; legends gathered around their activities and their wealth, and they were accredited with the most fabulous schemes by the general public. Thus the story gained currency in Austria that Rothschild had one day demanded the immediate repayment in convention coinage, of no less than 40 million gulden which he had lent the state. On being told that it was impossible to repay this sum, Rothschild was alleged to have proposed that he should either be handed over the whole customs revenue throughout the imperial dominion for a certain period, or be granted the monopoly of the purchase of fleece in the Austrian dominions, whereby he would have been able to dictate the price of textiles. Although these rumors were obviously untrue, they indicated the estimation of the power of the House held by the public, whether it was well or ill disposed.

The Rothschilds were becoming the central figures in the jokes and caricatures of comic papers. In 1825 a caricature making fun of their versatility was circulated in Frankfort and South Germany. The drawing showed a Rothschild on horseback, with samples of all his businesses; wine-casks, seeds, buttons, etchings, state securities, umbrellas, pens, magic lanterns, etc., on his way from the north to the south of Europe. The easily interpreted legend ran: "Blueshield, commercial traveler, does business in all branches of trade."[61]

The brothers did in fact engage in every conceivable kind of venture, and they were approached with all sorts of schemes. Persons in high places especially had recourse to them for loans. Among them was Marshal de Marmont, Duke of Ragusa, formerly governor in Illyria under Napoleon I. He had joined the Bourbons after Napoleon's fall, and got on good terms with Metternich. As a reward for his change of allegiance and various political services, he was granted an annuity of fifty thousand francs by the Austrian government, in alleged compensation for a donation allotted to him by Napoleon I. The marshal had again got into serious financial difficulties, and the French government, which did not wish him to be publicly compromised, advised him to mortgage his Austrian annuity to Rothschild if the banker would put his affairs in order.

The duke did apply to Solomon Rothschild, but Solomon wanted first to make sure that the Austrian government would actually pay Marmont the annuity until he died. He therefore wrote to Metternich: "I would not have entered into any negotiations in this matter without having previously asked your Highness's consent, had I not done so at the suggestion of Count de Villele. ... I am therefore venturing to ask your Highness in this most humble private letter, whether the assumption of these negotiations or their continuance is in accordance with your Highness's wishes. Will your Highness please to be assured that on receipt of the slightest hint of the contrary being the case, all negotiations will immediately be broken off, and in such a way that neither Count de Villele nor the Duke of Ragusa will discover the true reason of the change."[62]

Marmont also wrote to Metternich in order to get his support.[63] The chancellor replied cautiously.[64] He thought that the treasury would no doubt simply pay the annuity to Rothschild; but the finance minister would have to be asked for a special guarantee to that effect. Everything would be simple, "as long as the respective positions of the persons concerned remained the same."

This was rather a dangerous reply, and Solomon wanted to have various, and, as Marmont called them, "ridiculous" guarantees.[65] Rothschild, however, firmly adhered to the position that the Austrian government must give her full expressed consent to the arrangement, if he entered into it.

"I am fully aware," Marmont wrote, "that this requirement is not flattering to me, and that the only motive for making it is to obtain guarantees against the possibility of my mauvaise foi." But for fear of endangering the arrangement, he had to agree.

In November, 1825, the contract was submitted, constituting a speculation on the part of Rothschild that the marshal, who was fifty years old, would live a long time. Metternich, however, would not agree that Emperor Francis should give his express consent, as contemplated under the contract, because it was impossible to know in the case of a former marshal of Napoleon whether his political opinions would not undergo changes such as might cause Austria to cease her payments. If, however, these payments were mortgaged to Rothschild for the full term of the marshal's life, it would not be possible to discontinue them. The contract was therefore not concluded, and in order not to rebuff Villele, James lent the marshal a small sum on the security of the next instalment of his pension.

On April 30, 1827, Solomon wrote the following letter to Metternich[66]: "Your Highness will perceive from the enclosed statement that Marshal de Marmont's affairs are in a state of the greatest confusion, and he is hard pressed by his creditors. He is bound to go bankrupt sooner or later, and in such a case our Paris branch would be a creditor to the extent of fifteen thousand francs, advanced to the marshal on the security of the personal annuity payable to him by the imperial government. There is only one way in which my firm can be secured against possible loss, and that is by impounding the two next instalments of this annuity. I therefore venture most humbly to request your Highness to issue the necessary authorization for the I. and R. Treasury to instruct the paymaster's office to accept a veto from me, in the usual form, upon the instalment of the pension now due and upon that due next quarter in so far as this may be necessary to cover our claim."

It was asking a good deal to expect the powerful Austrian chancellor to concern himself with securing a pay ment of 15,000 francs to the House of Rothschild. But Solomon was in a position to take this liberty, since Metternich himself was again negotiating a personal loan with the firm; and in fact on June 1, 1827, the prince received a loan of half a million gulden from the Rothschilds.

The failure of the conversion operation necessarily damped the Rothschilds' ardor with regard to any other ventures, the consequences of which could not be clearly foreseen. The situation in Spain was exceedingly critical, and the lack of money was being acutely felt. In ignorance of the way in which the conversion scheme was working out, the Rothschild representative at Madrid had been somewhat rash in making promises to the Spaniards.

"The financial problem [in Spain]," Vincent reported to Metternich,[67] "is now in the hands of the House of Rothschild, all of whose members are just now in London. It seems to me that M. Renevier, the manager of the Madrid branch, has gone rather too far in what he has said to the Spanish government. The House of Rothschild will not enter into business negotiations with Spain without having made previous inquiries in England, and assured themselves of the probable attitude of bankers there with regard to assistance rendered to Spain, for such a loan might damage the loans made to the South American governments which are in rebellion against that country."

When James Rothschild returned from London in the middle of September, 1825, after spending five weeks there with his four brothers, he was assailed by questions from all sides as to whether Spain had any prospect of securing a loan of 25 millions. Nathan had advised against it because for political reasons he did not wish the reactionary Spanish government to be supported. Metternich on the other hand would have been pleased by the granting of a loan, and desired it to go through.

"So far as I have been able to ascertain," Vincent reported to the chancellor,[68] "the House of Rothschild is not much inclined to have anything to do with a financial venture in Spain. They have little confidence in the guarantees offered by the government, and they are afraid of damaging themselves with English firms having interests opposed to those of Spain. Although the House of Rothschild may pretend that their sympathies are purely monarchistic, the recognition of the engagements entered into by the Cortes government, and the liberation of the Spanish colonies, would provide a far wider field for enterprise and political securities, the value of which they do not fail to appreciate."

The House of Rothschild could well be discriminating. Offers of business from governing circles flowed in on them from all quarters. Carl Rothschild had met Count Louis Philippe de Bombelles in connection with some payments which he was instructed by the Austrian government to make on the Neapolitan account for the passage of Austrian troops through Tuscany. Although large sums were involved the matter was promptly settled, and the Tuscan government gave him to understand that it would take the opportunity of demonstrating its satisfaction.

Grand Duke Leopold II, who had been ruler of Tuscany since 1824, was at that time considering a scheme of great benefit to his subjects, namely, to drain the Maremme, an area of marsh land in Tuscany embracing thousands of square miles. The grand duke proposed to Carl Rothschild through Bombelles that he should undertake a part of the drainage operation on his own account, subject to a suitable arrangement with the state of Tuscany. Such was the esteem in which the House was then held for its versatility and financial resources.

Carl Rothschild did not feel that he could undertake such a far-reaching scheme. "Would it not be better," he replied to Bombelles,[69] "if the Tuscan government which has conceived such benevolent plans for their subjects, would itself supervise the carrying out of the scheme with the assistance of a loan to be taken up gradually as the work progressed? Such a method of procedure seems to me to be more advantageous than to entrust the work to foreigners who do not know the country, and who would be compelled at great expense first to find and engage workmen."

These discussions took place in August, 1825, a most unfavorable time for persuading the Rothschilds, who were uneasy at their losses, to agree to such a serious undertaking. The scheme nevertheless was carried through, and the firm took some part in financing it, although it had nothing to do with the work itself. It proved to be an inestimable boon to the country, although the work took very many years to carry out, and cost untold millions.

The relations of the House of Rothschild with Metternich had remained untroubled throughout the year 1825; and the Rothschilds actually ventured to intercede with the chancellor regarding the affairs of certain members of Napoleon's family. Toward these Metternich was in general anything but well disposed, and was always inclined to put the greatest difficulties in their way. Napoleon's mother, the aged Laetitia, who was then seventy-five years old, lived at Rome, and dearly wished to see again her eldest son Joseph, the former King of Spain, who was living in North America under the pseudonym of Count de Survilliers. Mother and son had not seen one another for ten years. Joseph had repeatedly attempted to get a passport, but the Austrian and French governments would not permit him to return to Europe. All entreaties had hitherto been in vain, and a friend of the family, Count Villeneuve, approached Solomon Rothschild, asking him to use his influence with Metternich, because the old lady was ill, and Joseph promised to return to America immediately after his visit. The world had indeed passed through great changes during the previous ten years when the son of a despised Frankfort tradesman was asked to intercede on behalf of the man who was once deemed all-powerful.[70]

Metternich, however, remained obdurate. To yield would not have been in accordance with the general principies of his policy. The House of Bonaparte was finished with, should remain finished with, and never be allowed to become dangerous to Metternich's system again. For this reason even the smallest favor was refused to the family; Rothschild was not listened to, and had to realize the limits of his influence. Although when interference with his policy was involved Metternich might remain absolutely firm, he often gave the House of Rothschild much too much rope in matters of finance; and in such instances he relied upon the finance minister and the treasury.

An accident has revealed the details of a transaction which clearly shows that Metternich and his assistants sometimes went too far in their reliance on the Rothschilds; and an examination of this incident offers an opportunity of noting the treasury's own comments on its mistakes and on the loss involved, which, it should be pointed out, was incurred under Count Stadion's successor.

Since the first Austrian occupation of Naples in 1815, the kingdom had had to pay a war indemnity. Since the end of 1818, it had been the duty of the Austrian ambassador at Naples, Prince Ludwig de Jablonovski, to receive the instalments as they were paid in each month, and, in connection with a banking syndicate controlled by the Neapolitan firm Dollfuss, to arrange for their transmission to Vienna. Everything went well at the start, but the bill for the second instalment was protested in Vienna, because the firm of Dollfuss was in difficulties a Dollfuss reported this fact to Jablonovski in January, 1819, but the ambassador had already received the orders on the Neapolitan Treasury for the following instalments up to March and drawn these sums in advance. Jablonovski was now in danger of losing this money, and was forced to accept a very unfavorable settlement offered by the firm of Dollfuss, under which they handed him public securities, for the sum they held, at 87, the price at which they had bought them, although these securities had by then fallen to 78. Jablonovski hoped that they would appreciate again, so that he would avoid any loss.

"The power," Jablonovski remarked later, "which autocratically governs quotations throughout Europe, so that the most careful calculations go astray, the autocratic power of the House of Rothschild was a factor of which I was not then aware."[71]

Jablonovski had miscalculated. The bonds continued to fall, and the prince was unable to make the payments to Vienna on the due dates, because he felt he could not sell the bonds at such a loss. He therefore mortgaged them at 60% in order to be able to send at any rate part of the money, and still hoped that they would appreciate. Later on, however, the remittances to Vienna ceased altogether. This greatly annoyed and worried Stadion, who needed the money. As an imperial ambassador, who was under Metternich's orders, was affected, Stadion complained to the chancellor, and Metternich had to try to think of a way out. Again he had recourse to the brothers Rothschild, a constant refuge in distress. It was in the summer of 1819, and James and Carl had just come to Vienna from Naples. They had informed themselves as to conditions there, reported to Prince Metternich and been commissioned by him[72] to undertake the transmission of Austria's outstanding claims in Naples.

Rothschild stated that he would be delighted to carry the matter through in collaboration with Gontard at the "most favorable possible rates," and asked for 1/2% commission and 1/2% brokerage. "You may be assured," his offer concluded,[73] "that we shall do everything in our power to carry out your commands with all the diligence and economy of which we are capable, so that we shall continue to justify the confidence which you place in us." The matter was accordingly entrusted to them.

Prince Jablonovski had not yet been told anything about the negotiations with Rothschild, and he was exceedingly upset when he was suddenly instructed to hand the business over. He expressed his astonishment, especially in view of the fact that he had meanwhile arranged a solution of the matter with the finance minister Medici by direct shipments of gold to Trieste.[74] "But," he wrote, "Herr James Rothschild was in Naples, and presumably heard of my unfortunate dealings with the firm of Dollfuss, and determined to turn them to his own advantage. Nothing else can explain how the House of Rothschild should have taken over such an unimportant business in a center with which they are not familiar, where the rate of exchange is constantly varying and unfavorable, or how they could have persuaded the I. and R. Treasury to renounce the advantages of transporting gold, and to bear the considerable loss of exchange."

In any case the matter was taken out of Jablonovski's hands, and his suggestion that further payments should be deferred until the Neapolitan bonds rose again was ignored. In January, 1820, Jablonovski received instructions to hand over all documents regarding the matter to a controller specially sent to Naples for this purpose. In July, 1820, the revolution broke out, and in the spring of 1821 the Austrian troops entered Naples. The immediate effect of these events upon the bonds was unfavorable, and they fell continuously until May, 1821. The result was that Stadion, who was always liable to sudden panics, hastily gave instructions that the bonds which had been mortgaged at 60% should be sold to Rothschild, and this was done in May, 1821, at the lowest point which they touched, namely 58 1/8.

The following year saw an extraordinary rise in Neapolitan securities, so that it may be readily imagined that the House of Rothschild made an enormous profit out of this purchase. This became particularly apparent when in August, 1827, the new finance minister Count Nadasdy, after going through these accounts, declared that Prince Jablonovski was liable to make good an amount of 584,-354.54 florins, and created a charge over his property at Rogozno for this amount.

The prince protested strongly with the result that an imperial commission was appointed to investigate the matter. This investigation led to some lamentable revelations as far as Austrian public finances were concerned. The "most obedient loyal servant Count von Taaffe," president of the treasury, had some utterly devastating statements to make in his most submissive report[75] regarding the treasury's claims on the prince. He revealed that the transaction had been most unprofitable in every way, and declared that Prince Jablonovski's statement that it would have been better for him and for the treasury to have burned the certificates of the mortgage bonds, and rid himself of them completely, was correct, harsh though it sounded. For as the bonds[76] had been mortgaged for 60, and had later been transferred to Rothschild at 58 1/8, the Austrian state had not merely failed to receive anything further, but had actually had to make up the difference. Jablonovski's proposal to hold the bonds, and wait until they improved in value before realizing them, had been a sound business speculation. Instead of this they had been handed over to the House of Rothschild, together with the interest payments for the first half of the year 1828.

On this memorandum an imperial instruction was issued, ordering the finance minister to examine the accounts again in collaboration with Prince Jablonovski, and if the results showed that any added compensation had to be paid, to take the necessary steps to collect the amount as speedily as possible. The fianance minister carried out these instructions; and the report on the matter concluded with the following words: "The assessor appointed for the investigation is of the opinion that, although there is in a general way ... an obligation on the prince to make good the amount, the claim could be effectively resisted in the courts or otherwise. For we are not at all likely to succeed in replying to an order to show cause, such as will necessarily be granted if the charge created [on the prince's property] is not canceled."

The result of the further examination was that instead of being held liable for the amount of more than half a million florins, the prince was finally required to pay only 10,694 florins 34 kronen, in order that the complete failure of the treasury might be somewhat concealed from the outside world.

The facts which had thus been brought to light also gave the chancellor food for thought, and he afterwards observed a certain amount of caution in his relations with the House of Rothschild. They availed themselves of every occasion to make the sovereign and the leading statesmen forget such untoward occurrences, and endeavored to obliterate the bad impression by giving proof of their deepest devotion. This was especially the case when Emperor Francis fell ill in the spring of 1826, recovering only after many weeks of sickness. The whole of Europe had been in suspense, for the decease of the emperor would have involved profound political changes; and the news of his recovery offered an opportunity for the brothers Rothschild to send their congratulations to Metternich. It is true that they little guessed how cleverly he had provided for the continuance of his control of affairs, even in the event of Emperor Francis's death. It will suffice to quote the letter which Amschel wrote from Frankfort:

I have by today's post received the news of the fortunate recovery of his Majesty our universally beloved emperor. Having suffered the greatest anxiety since the emperor fell sick it was one of the most joyful moments of my life when I heard the news.

Heaven has heard our prayers in preserving the greatest and most virtuous of monarchs, and thus allowing the world to continue to enjoy a good fortune, the greatness of which I can but marvel at without venturing to appraise. It is impossible to describe the radiant joy that lights up all faces—only angels could express in words our feelings of gratitude to Providence!

I cannot refrain from expressing to your Highness my congratulations on this blessed event. I would gladly make so bold as to lay my congratulations at the feet of his Majesty himself, our most benevolent emperor—so sincere and overwhelming are my feelings. May God preserve in full health this best father of mankind until the end of his days! And may it ever be my fortune in deepest reverence to call myself your Highness's most humble and most obedient servant,
AMSCHEL MEYER VON ROTHSCHILD. [77]

Now that the emperor had recovered, the fear that his death would deal a blow to Metternich's regime, and therefore also to the position which the brothers Rothschild had established in the I. and R. chancellor's office, was again remote. Solomon, who through Metternich and Gentz was constantly winning his way in Viennese court circles, was frequently invited to the chancellor's and also often entertained him in his own house.
One after another, families of the high aristocracy, requiring financial assistance, procured loans from the Frankfort banker who had settled at Vienna. In this way he placed many aristocrats under an obligation to himself, and whether they liked it or not they had to admit Solomon and his family to their exclusive salons. Thus both socially and in business Solomon climbed to dizzy heights at Vienna, and his commercial rivals began to become painfully aware of this, especially during the years of financial crisis of 1825 and 1826.
The firm Fries & Co., one of the four "monopolistic state bankers" which had come into prominence during the reign of Maria Theresa, had got into difficulties during the crisis of 1825. David Parish, a son of the well-known John Parish of Hamburg, and Rothschild's partner in numerous transactions, had entered the firm some time previously, and was now involved in its fall Parish's extravagance and reckless speculation hac caused him to be excluded from a partnership in his father's business, and he had set up on his own account. Being unable to meet his liabilities he had no other course open but to require his most powerful patrons such as Metternich and Gentz, who were at the same time his debtors, to repay their loans. He thus forfeited their favor, though he could not save his firm from ruin.

When he saw that the crash was inevitable Parish put an end to his life by jumping into the Danube; but before doing so he wrote two bitter letters expressing his resentment at the fact that the House of Rothschild had elbowed him out of many transactions. He blamed Metternich for having sacrificed him to the cupidity of a family who had succeeded better than he had in securing the chancellor's interest. He described the brothers Rothschild in a letter to Metternich as "heartless persons, only interested in their money-bags, who, standing under the special protection of Metternich, have behaved in a most ungrateful manner to him."[78]

Just before his death, Parish also wrote to Solomon Rothschild, reproaching him for having squeezed him out, although he had in 1817 introduced him to the big French and Austrian financial business. Now it has been ascertained that the Rothschilds would have succeeded in establishing this connection even without Parish, and that he invited them to join in several transactions simply because he was not sufficiently rich and powerful to carry through these great state financial operations alone.

On the other hand there is no doubt that the brothers Rothschild were entirely ruthless in competing with the firm of Fries and Parish, and that they succeeded as no one else did in consolidating their position with the public departments. In any case, Solomon neither desired nor expected that the rivalry should have such a tragic ending, and he was not a little shocked by it. He spent many hours discussing the tragedy with Metternich and Gentz, in its various aspects.

Two rivals had been disposed of, but life went on its course, and it appeared desirable to wipe out their memory, and to anticipate evil tongues by cleverly giving publicity to news regarding the fame, the business dealings, and the prestige of the House of Rothschild. The brothers had long recognized that good advertisement, which owing to the limitations of the time had to be of a literary nature, could be of the greatest value. Through their influence with the authorities, who were able to use the power of the censorship in order more or less to restrain press activities in all countries, they had little to fear from violent attacks in the press; and if any such occurred, they were almost always able to take effective countermeasures. Moreover, they had ample means at their disposal for influencing cowardly papers, and pressing the cleverest pens into their service.

First and foremost there was Gentz, the "Secretary of Europe." He had for a long time been writing propaganda articles for the Rothschilds in various papers, and exerting his influence—backed as it was by the powerful figure of Metternich looming behind him—upon the contemporary press in their favor. Gentz's growing intimacy with the House of Rothschild, which was marked by constant invitations to dinners and theatres, as well as by "highly welcome financial transactions with the excellent Rothschild," as faithfully recorded by Gentz,[79] gave a chance for carrying out a master-stroke of publicity.

In 1826 the Brockhaus publishing firm was just about to publish a new edition of its Conversational Encyclopedia, which had a very wide circulation at that time, and was regarded as an absolute gospel. The Rothschilds had not yet been featured in it, and it seemed to offer a convenient opportunity for describing the origin and progress of their House.

There was nobody better qualified to execute this, as regarded both manner and matter, than Gentz. Solomon Rothschild accordingly requested him in return for a princely fee, to undertake the task, explaining to him the points he wished to have emphasized. He was particularly anxious that the relationship with the Elector of Hesse should be described in such a way as to convey the impression that the whole of his enormous fortune had been entrusted to the management of the House of Rothschild; and that they had succeeded in saving it by risking all their possessions. Special emphasis was to be laid upon their integrity and disinterestedness, and the firm was to be described as more powerful than any contemporary firm, all the titles and dignities that the five brothers had acquired in the course of time being enumerated.

During the first week of April, 1826, Gentz wrote an essay entitled "Biographical Notes about the House of Rothschild," which was to serve as the basis of his article in the encyclopedia. The following extracts will give an idea of the way in which Gentz carried out his task. The essay was accepted at its face value by very large numbers of people, and after appearing in the Brockhaus publication was incorporated into similar foreign works, as for instance Encyclopedic des gens du monde. The article ran:

The Rothschilds, at the present time the greatest of all business firms, are among those who have achieved greatness and prosperity simply through intelligently taking advantage of opportunities which were available for thousands of others, through a spirit of enterprise seasoned by calm judgment, and through their understanding of men and affairs, and their capacity to adjust themselves to the conditions of the time. Meyer Amschel Rothschild, the father of the five brothers, who are now living, was the founder of this firm.... In a short space of time his knowledge, his tireless industry, and his straight dealing won for him the confidence of highly respected firms; he was given important orders, and his credit as well as his wealth increased. The relationship which Rothschild established with the Landgrave, afterwards Elector, of Hesse was a decisive factor in the enormous subsequent development of his business. The elector appointed him crown agent in 1801, having come to realize that he was as reliable as he was useful. When in 1806 the French occupied the elector's territories, and he himself was compelled to flee, he left the rescue of his private possessions to Rothschild, their value amounting to many million gulden. It was only by sacrificing the whole of his own property, and at considerable personal risk, that Rothschild contrived to save the property that had been entrusted to him.

The well-known fact that all Rothschild's possessions had been confiscated by the French led the exiled elector to believe that his own property had been lost too. In fact he does not appear to have thought it even worth while to make inquiries about it. When matters had settled down again Rothschild immediately proceeded to do business with the property he had saved. . . .

The brothers are most scrupulous in observing the injunction that their father laid upon them when he was dying, which was to collaborate in absolute brotherly harmony in ail business matters. Indeed they treat the memory of their father with such piety that they refer to him in all important business matters, and Nathan generally applies to doubtful cases a rule his father recommended.

When the elector returned to his states in 1813, the House of Rothschild not merely offered immediately to return to him the capital sums with which it had been entrusted, it also undertook to pay the customary rate of interest from the day when it had received them. The elector, positively astonished by such an example of honesty and fair dealing, left the whole of his capital for several more years with the firm, and refused any interest payments for the earlier period, only accepting a small interest from the time of his return. Through recommending the House of Rothschild, especially at the Congress of Vienna, the elector certainly assisted greatly in extending their connections, until now as the result of the political developments since 1813 the House has, through an uninterrupted series of great transactions, attained the position it at present holds in the commercial and financial affairs of Europe, which are partly directed by it. . . .

Students of economics and politics have no doubt frequently wondered how the House of Rothschild has been able to achieve so much in so short a time. Leaving the effects of chance out of account, its success is attributable principally to the strictest observance of certain fundamental maxims, together with wise business management, and the exploitation of favorable opportunities. The principal maxim is harmonious collaboration in all business matters, to which reference has already been made.

After their father's death every offer, whatsoever its origin might be, was made the subject of joint discussion between the brothers; any transaction of any importance at all was carried through according to a concerted plan by their joint endeavors, and all the brothers had an equal share in the result. They continued to act in close agreement, in spite of the fact that they gradually settled in places far removed from one another. This circumstance, indeed, instead of interfering with their collaboration, has proved an actual advantage; it has enabled them to obtain the fullest information as to the state of affairs in the principal markets, so that each of them can from his own center the more effectively take the preliminary steps in any business. The firm as a whole then takes it over and carries it through.

Another of the principles which the Rothschilds have adopted is to keep moving, and not allow themselves to become enmeshed by circumstances. . . .

Finally it should be noted that, apart from the reasonableness of their demands, the punctiliousness with which they carry out their duties, the simplicity and clarity of their schemes, and the intelligent way in which they are put into operation, the personal moral character of each of the five brothers has been a determining factor in the success of their undertakings. It is not difficult for those whose power enables them to attach large numbers to their interests, to secure the backing of a powerful party; but to unite the support of all parties and, in the popular phrase, to win the esteem of gentle and simple, implies the possession not merely of material resources, but also of spiritual qualities not always found in association with wealth and power. Ever ready to lend a helping hand, without distinction of person, to those who have come to them for assistance, all of the five brothers have achieved a real popularity. They have rendered the most important services in such a manner as to make them most acceptable, for they have been actuated not by considerations of policy but by natural benevolence and kindness.[80]

This eulogy of the Rothschilds was a masterpiece executed by a clever stylist; it was bound to raise the prestige of the House enormously, especially in the opinion of those who did not know how it came to be written. Then as now the great mass of the unthinking public accepted anything in print at its face value, and as the article, while containing statements that were untrue, did contain much that was the result of accurate observation, and attributed excellencies that were not fictitious, even the more critical were inclined to give credence to the description.

It was not signed by Gentz, although it is true he admitted to being the author, at any rate in conversation with his friends. Indeed he actually asked Adam Muller to express his opinion on it. "I should be glad," he wrote,[81] "if you would read the article on Rothschild in the supplement of the Conversational Encyclopedia. It is my work, and I have endeavored to give briefly a simple and I hope not infelicitous explanation of the greatness of that House. I shall greatly appreciate your opinion on this little article."

Gentz was proud of his work, and as he has noted in his diary, he read it to Rothschild's manager Wertheimstein, who naturally listened to it with "undisguised admiration."[82] Ten days later Gentz called on Rothschild and received his "actual" cash reward.[83]

Apart from the great advantage which its publication brought to the brothers Rothschild, his essay contained some shrewd observations which are of general interest. One passage in particular, although not included in the Conversational Encyclopedia, may be worth quoting. "There is a truth," Gentz remarks, "which, although not quite new, is generally not properly understood. The word luck as commonly used in the history of famous individuals or eminent families is bereft of all meaning, when we endeavor to dissociate it entirely from the personal and individual factors in each case. There are circumstances and events in life in which good or ill luck may be a determining although not an exclusive factor in human destiny. Lasting success, however, and constant failure are always, and to a much greater degree than is generally supposed, attributable to the personal deserts or the personal failings and shortcomings of those who are blessed by the one or damned by the other. Nevertheless the most outstanding personal qualities may sometimes require exceptional circumstances and world-shattering events to come to fruition. Thus have the founders of dynasties established their thrones, and thus has the House of Rothschild become great."[84]

The circumstances could not have been more aptly described, for the family Rothschild of that generation did undoubtedly bring mental forces into play in a definite direction, the results which they achieved being favored by the circumstances of the time.

CHAPTER VI

The House of Rothschild Rides the Storm

THE control of the business of the House of Rothschild, established as it was in five different centers in Europe, had become exceedingly difficult with the passage of time as a result of the enormous extension of its operations and their intimate interactions with the events of general European politics. It is true that Nathan quietly exerted an influence that tended to harmonize the often conflicting aims of the various branches; but on account of the primitive nature of the communication at that time, and the inadequate postal arrangements, it was impossible, in spite of all the efforts he made, for him to supervise everything.

The result was that each brother had a fairly wide scope within his own center, it being left entirely to his own judgment within certain limits to do what he considered best in the interests of the firm as a whole. Between Vienna, Frankfort, Paris, and London, these places being linked up on the main European routes, communication was easier. It was just the least gifted of the brothers, Carl, who was practically isolated from the others at Naples, and therefore often had to travel personally to Paris and London in order to get into touch with his brothers.

A final solution of the problem of the Austrian troops at Naples had become urgently necessary. Since the end of the year 1822, Neapolitan statesmen had been constantly protesting that the Austrian Army of Occupation should be reduced, in view of the enormous expense of maintaining it. Memorandum after memorandum, explaining the intolerable burden and the necessity of relieving the situation, was sent in.[1] The Congress of Vienna had decided that the occupying forces should be reduced to 35,000 men; but before this decision was put into effect (August, 1824) the Austrian government had already realized savings to the extent of about 6,500,000 florins out of the sums paid by Naples.[2] This fact naturally soon leaked out and caused great dissatisfaction in the kingdom,[3] especially as a rumor was abroad that the government would shortly reduce the pay of all those in its service.

The greater part of Naples public securities was held abroad. Of the annual interest, only about two million ducats remained in the country itself, while the balance constituted a tribute that Naples had to pay to foreign capitalists. The budget suffered from the malady of a constantly growing deficit, which rose to 3,800,000 ducats in 1825. This meant that the interest on foreign debt was only slightly less than the state's annual deficit.

Count Apponyi, afterwards ambassador in Paris, had been sent to Naples by Metternich to examine the situation on the spot. "Cavaliere de' Medici," he reported,[4] "regards the presence of our troops as nothing but an intolerable burden. As finance minister he trembles at the idea that the foreign occupation may last until after 1826, and by compelling him to take refuge in another loan, still more increase the state's terrifying deficit. This caused him to say to Rothschild a few days ago: 'If the Austrian troops remain here after the limit of time fixed by the convention, I am determined to hand in my resignation.'"

Fundamentally Carl Rothschild was absolutely on the side of the finance minister. It was not in accordance with his wishes that the expenses of the occupation should lead to the whole internal economy of the state being thrown into confusion, so that the loans handled and issued by the House of Rothschild would run the risk of declining seriously in value. He began, therefore, noticeably to adopt the Neapolitan point of view, and gradually to forget to consider the interests of Austria, although he owed his position in Naples to that country.

He too favored speedy evacuation, especially as the new king, who had succeeded to the throne in January, 1825, and on whom he wanted to make a good impression, cherished the same wish. At Vienna he was actually suspected of supporting the Neapolitan finance minister in his obstinate efforts to recover part of the moneys paid out to the Austrian troops on the ground that they were excessive. The Neapolitan government was claiming the repayment of 1,013,398 ducats as excess payments made only up to November, 1821, and proposed to retain 100,000 ducats each month from the moneys payable to the Austrian war account until the adjustment should have been fully effected. Austria offered only 650,000 gulden in satisfaction, and was contemplating making deductions even from this amount. However, she was afraid of any public dispute in the matter. The quartermaster-general himself admitted in a letter to Count Nadasdy that the estimate of 650,000 florins was too low. He said that in his view it would be better to agree to the amount demanded by the Neapolitan government as a lump sum, rather than to allow the matter to be discussed in detail, as that would be too damaging to Austria.[5]

Ficquelmont also expressed his fears[6] that innumerable claims might arise, the airing of which would be unpleasant for Austria. He offered to arrange for the settlement of the matter, "without publicity and without compromising the dignity of our government," asking only that the repayments should not be made out of the resources of the I. and R. war-chest at Naples, but through the House of Rothschild. For direct repayments through the war-chest would furnish proof that savings had been effected out of the lump sums paid by Naples.

"Looking at the matter coldly and impartially," he added, "we find that we are to refund only the portion of the excess payments attributable to the period between February 1 and November 30, 1821."

But Vienna was not prepared to refund the money so quickly, and hesitated about making it available. Medici urgently needed the money, and would not wait any longer. He therefore applied to Carl Rothschild, informing him that the royal treasury required 1,500,000 ducats in excess of its normal revenue. He asked Rothschild to advance this sum, offering as partial security the claim exceeding a million ducats which had been recognized by Austria.[7]

Carl Rothschild immediately sent Medici's letter to Vienna in order to ascertain the imperial government's attitude in the matter. As, however, it was not yet inclined to give way, in spite of Ficquelmont's representations, it simply put the letter by. Nevertheless, in return for special securities in the event of Austria failing to pay, Carl Rothschild advanced 1,200,000 ducats, because he attached great value to being on good terms with Medici and the new king.

This brought him into great favor in high quarters, a fact which Carl exploited to create a position for himself in society in Naples, as his brothers had done elsewhere. During the winter of 1826 many distinguished foreigners flocked to the beautiful city of the south; amongst them were Leopold of Saxe-Coburg—afterwards King Leopold I of Belgium[8]—the Duke of Lucca, and other princes, as well as several wealthy English families. "This greatly enlivens our social gatherings," Carl said in a private letter.[9] "Amateur companies perform French plays; there are balls and soirees—in a word, in spite of everything, life is very gay. . . ."

Meanwhile, as the result of representations made by Solomon to Metternich,[10] the House of Rothschild had been informed that there was no objection to crediting to the House of Rothschild the moneys which Austria would finally refund to Naples. Their total, however, remained undefined, and as it went very much against the grain to pay these amounts at all, Metternich was somewhat annoyed that the House of Rothschild should intervene in the matter.

At the end of December, 1826, Emperor Francis and Metternich decided finally to evacuate the Two Sicilies,, although not without emphatically warning the king never to think of changing the form of government. On the occasion of the Austrians' leaving, General Frimont, the officer in command, had recommended various persons for decorations, including the finance minister Medici and Carl Rothschild. In view of the attitude adopted by both of these in the matter of the rebates, Vienna was not prepared to consider the suggestion, Metternich minuted on the proposal that Medici ought not to receive any distinction,[11] since he already possessed the Grand Cross of the Order of St. Stephen, and that Baron Rothschild should not receive one "because he is not qualified to receive the distinction suggested." This was, in effect, a reply to the new attitude which Carl Rothschild had assumed. People in Vienna were almost inclined to call him a traitor or a deserter.

The negotiations regarding the refund of the excessive payments made for the support of the army continued for some time. Austria maintained her resistance against paying in full the amount demanded, until the King of Naples finally yielded, in order not to upset the, agreement arrived at. But he wished at least to receive the interest on the excess that had been paid.

A memorandum on the matter states:[12] "The king does not doubt that the difficult circumstances in which Naples has been forced to accept her onerous obligation to the House of Rothschild will so far influence the noble heart of the emperor that he will without delay carry out at least this wish of the Court of Naples." The Austrian government was to arrange the method of payment with the House of Rothschild. This appeal, however, met with little success; Austria finally paid only 338,564 gulden, which Rothschild took over on account of his claim against Naples, and at the end of 1829 this settlement was accepted for the sake of peace.

Although, as in Carl's case, Metternich was sometimes not entirely in agreement with the attitude of the brothers Rothschild, he always came back to them again, in both public and personal matters. There was no other financier who controlled such large sums of money and such important international connections. Moreover, it had been the chancellor's experience that the strictest secrecy was observed and maintained by the Rothschilds in all transactions of a delicate nature. In that respect they were in marked contrast to most other bankers; and this was of special importance to a man in such a public position as Metternich.

Transactions constantly arose in which the financial interests of the imperial house, to which Metternich naturally always wished to prove his devotion, had to be made to harmonize with those of the state in such a way as to avoid any public criticism. The Rothschilds were particularly skilful in handling such cases, and they thereby made themselves indispensable to Austria's leading statesmen, in spite of any disagreements.

A striking example of this was furnished when Metternich had recourse to the services of the Rothschilds in connection with the financial affairs of Marie Louise, wife of Napoleon I and daughter of Emperor Francis. Although she was far superior to her husband in birth, this lady was in general character and in intellectual gifts no fit consort for the Corsican genius. She remained with him as long as fortune favored him; but when his collapse came she left him, with her son, and returned to her father without shedding a tear for her husband.

Notwithstanding Napoleon's entreaties, she never once expressed the wish to visit him at Elba, to say nothing of St. Helena, although it is true that if she had so wished, her father and, still more, Metternich would have opposed her. The chancellor wished Napoleon's memory to be completely obliterated, and he was particularly skilful in the case of Marie Louise in exploiting her weaknesses to that end. She was callous and pleasure-loving, and used to visit fashionable spas; she lived only for her own amusement and did not even trouble to answer Napoleon's letters.

In 1814, while the ex-empress was staying at Aix-les-Bains, Metternich allotted to her as courtier a man who not only played the part of courtier, but also had an important political role in Metternich's service. Adam Albert, Count von Neipperg, was a handsome man of thirty-nine; he had lost his eye through a sword-thrust in the war and wore a black eye-patch. He was a smart and elegant officer, and had the reputation of possessing unusual courage and exceptional intellectual and diplomatic gifts. It was his duty to obliterate all thoughts of Napoleon and the empire in Marie Louise's mind, and to keep her from all contact with any member of Napoleon's family or his supporters. He was to be only too successful.

The Congress of Vienna had decided that the dukedoms of Parma, Piacenza and Guastalla should belong to Marie Louise "en toute souverainete et propriete." As long as she ruled in accordance with the principles of an absolute monarchy, without constitution or representative bodies, she thereby acquired a kind of private property in these territories, by the act of the congress, this being quite in accordance with the contemporary attitude of regarding a state as a patrimony. It had, however, been laid down by the Treaty of Paris of 1817 that these possessions should not be hereditary, but should pass to another prince on Marie Louise's death. Yet no provision had been made as to how the transfer should be effected, nor as to how the duchess's private property should be determined.

Marie Louise had entered Parma in 1816, Count Neipperg sitting with her in her carriage. He had in the meantime not merely obtained complete control over the duchess's actions, as Metternich had wanted—he had also won her heart. The man in gold-braided uniform, sitting next her in her carriage, as Marie Louise entered Parma, was already her lover, and Napoleon, the great emperor and general, her husband and the father of her child, had been completely forgotten.

The affair was no secret at Parma, and it proved useless to try to hush it up; it soon became publicly known that on May 1, 1817, a daughter had been born to Marie Louise and her courtier in the palace of the ruler of Parma. This child received the name Albertine at her christening. Two years later on August 8, 1819,[13] Marie Louise gave birth to a son, who received the names William Albert, Count of Montenuovo—this being the Italian equivalent to the name Neipperg (Neuberg).

Both children were therefore illegitimate, for Marie Louise's husband, from whom she never obtained a divorce, did not die until May 5, 1821, in his distant island prison at St. Helena, while the marriage between Neipperg and Marie Louise, who had been living constantly together for some years, was celebrated in secret in September, 1821.

As the Duke of Reichstadt was still alive, Neipperg feared that on the death of their parents, his children might be left unprovided for. He therefore begged Marie Louise, while there was still time, to extract from her small dominions some money that could be declared to be her private property so the children could be given portions out of it. Marie Louise too realized that something must be done for their future, since on her death her lands would pass to another prince. She knew that there was an intention to construct a dukedom out of some Bohemian estates for the son by her marriage with Napoleon, but nobody at Vienna knew anything about the Montenuovos.

Up to 1826 the annual income from the territories ruled by Marie Louise had never been completely absorbed in administration, and it had been possible to allot large sums to the building of castles and bridges, and to improvements in the ducal gardens, etc. The Castle of Piacenza had been built, and the palaces at Parma and Colorno had been magnificently refurnished; bridges had been constructed over the Taro and the Trebbia; a theater had also been built; and a survey had been made of the whole country. Neipperg argued that these outlays had been a drain on Marie Louise's personal income, since it could not be disputed that any balance left over in administering the state belonged to the ruler.[14] The expenditure in question amounted to 10,435,000 francs,[15] and he said that she should ask that at any rate a part of this sum should be refunded in cash and applied to forming a private estate for the duchess.

Neipperg fully realized how far his understanding with Metternich went, and that the chancellor would not be able to refuse his request. The general decided with Marie Louise that the matter should at first be dealt with without mentioning the Montenuovo children, but only the Duke of Reichstadt when necessary. The general then wrote to Metternich to say[16] that after all the sacrifices which Marie Louise had made for the peace and welfare of Europe, and in view of the enormous benefits which she had conferred on her subjects, the question of her personal and private property ought to be cleared up. It was obvious that the castles, etc., which had been built out of savings were her own private property, and in order to secure the furniture, pictures, library, horses, and jewels, all of which she wished to leave to her son, negotiations should be immediately entered into with her successors, so that there should not be any dispute in the event of her death.

Neipperg proposed that either all the powers should conclude a supplementary convention, or a loan should be issued whereby what was due to the duchess could be made immediately available. Neipperg pointed out in a memorandum[17] written in support of his contention that "nobody can protest that, according to the law of the land, the whole direct and indirect income of the state, of whatever kind it may be, is absolutely at the sovereign's disposal; and she may, after the expenses of the administration in all its branches have been met out of the annual budget, dispose of any sums saved or balances left over, entirely as she thinks fit."

Metternich wanted to keep the other powers out of the matter as far as possible, and advised as a "less compromising procedure" that a direct agreement should be reached[18] with the Duke of Lucca, Marie Louise's designated successor. He too was in favor of "the application of carefully designed measures in order to place her Majesty's property beyond the reach of foreign claims and, in so far as it cannot actually be taken out of the country, to secure its separation from the property of the state."

The issue of an "appropriate loan" seemed to him to furnish an easier way out. "In considering a loan," he wrote, "we have, it is true, to keep in mind the fact that her Majesty is herself the beneficiary of the dukedoms; but this does not constitute a reason for denying her power to contract loans on the country's security by virtue of her recognized sovereign rights." The justification for such a loan was to be found in the fact that Marie Louise "has made notable and extraordinary sacrifices in carrying through important works for the benefit of her subjects and the country; and in order to a certain extent to indemnify herself for these sacrifices without imposing new burdens upon her beloved subjects or exacting the taxes due with excessive severity, she has decided to have recourse to a loan."

Metternich stated emphatically that the questions of the Duke of Reichstadt's inheritance, of a civil list for Marie Louise, or of the distinction between private property and the public treasury should not be brought before the public. The only result of this would be to draw undue attention to the matter and to compromise oneself. Neither did he consider it necessary to go into any question of accounts with the public, excepting such as had reference to the amount and conditions of the loan.

After lengthy correspondence, Neipperg reported in a personal discussion of the matter with Metternich at Vienna that[19] "her Majesty the archduchess has decided to propose to her council that she shall apply one-sixth of the state property [patrimonium] which is valued at thirty millions to the formation of an allodial property, which would be hers to dispose of as she pleased, and to make a gift to her subjects of the rest of the sum that she had used in works for the benefit of the public weal, the cost of which amounted to 10,439,000 francs. Marie Louise wishes to leave it to the council to decide whether the public debt of Parma shall be increased from its present amount of four millions to nine millions, or whether steps shall be taken to sell some of the state lands."

Metternich felt it difficult to come to a decision. The problems involved were of a difficult and exceedingly delicate nature, such as were hardly suitable for official discussion. He therefore decided again to ask Solomon Rothschild for his advice. When the question became acute Metternich was staying on his Johannisberg estate on the Rhine. He first informed Marie Louise that he would ask Solomon Rothschild's advice on all these matters, and that he was certain that Solomon would have the most useful ideas as to the best way of carrying out her wishes. He then wrote a long letter to Solomon,[20] carefully explaining to him that the archduchess wished to have available a capital sum of from five to six million francs, and to assure herself of the right to spend the income derivable from it in such a manner as she should deem fit. There were political objections to Neipperg's proposal that state lands should be sold; while if she increased the public debt, the archduchess was afraid of losing popularity.

"In my humble opinion," Metternich wrote, "the following scheme might be suitable. The archduchess should state publicly to her council that she could just as well have applied the state revenues—used of her own free will in erecting buildings for public purposes, or about to be so used—for acquiring a private property, but that she does not intend to do this; that she is leaving for the benefit of the state what has already been spent, as well as what will be spent, but wishes to secure a sum of five to six million francs out of the whole amount for her free disposal.

"After making this declaration she should take up the sum as stated and deposit it in the form of bonds in her treasury. The transaction may be a fictitious one, for she does not need ready money; she could leave the securities in her treasury, or issue them in whole or in part. My idea is that only five per cent securities should be created."

Metternich wished to have Solomon's views as to how this scheme should be put into practice in detail; and on receipt of the chancellor's letter, Solomon hastened "to submit his suggestions for his Highness's wise consideration."[21]

"In my humble opinion," he replied, "the object which you have in view could best and most effectively be realized in the following way. The government of Parma should create for the total capital sum involved a general inscribed bond, made out in the name of our firm, which bond should be deposited at the government's option in the I. and R. Austrian National Bank at Vienna, or in the Bank of Milan. On the security of this general bond we should issue bearer certificates of varying amounts . . . the holders of which should be competent to change them at any time . . . for inscribed bonds registered in the Great Debt Book of the state."

Solomon submitted a three per cent rentes certificate, which the French government had privileged his House to issue. A sinking fund would furnish the necessary security, and punctual interest payments should place the business on a sound basis. Solomon certainly wished first to obtain information regarding Parma's outstanding loans, but he did not recommend sending anybody there yet.

"Perhaps," he concluded, "your Highness could obtain the documents relating to them direct from Parma. This would not arouse attention as would be the case if I did so. Finally, I assure your Plighness that I shall most zealously use all my endeavors to deserve the satisfaction of her Majesty the Archduchess, as well as the gracious commendation of his Majesty the Emperor in this matter, since, as your Highness is aware, I always deem myself richly rewarded when I have the good fortune to contribute to the fulfilment of the lofty aims of the Imperial Court of Austria."

This was Solomon's official reply, for Metternich's use in dealing with Marie Louise. He sent also a covering confidential letter, intended for the chancellor alone.[22]

"I take the liberty, in accordance with your Highness's wish, of writing a few separate lines regarding the business dealt with in the enclosed business letter.

"I am pleased to say that I am confident of arranging this matter to the full satisfaction of her Majesty the Archduchess, and of H. M. the Emperor and King, and of achieving the desired results. As the financial considerations touch political questions at many points I venture to give it as my opinion that it is quite important for the archduchess to secure the capital in such a way that after her death the claims of her legal heirs cannot be disputed. The preparation of bearer bonds issued by an eminent banking firm, the holders of which will be constantly changing, seems to me to meet any possible eventuality. For if anyone attempted to seize such certificates . . . such action would ruin the credit of Parma for all time, consequently all governments who have an interest in maintaining an inviolable credit system would use their influence to prevent such a thing being done.

"In my opinion it would be better to fix the capital sum, not at six, but at ten millions, for as your Highness has yourself indicated, the state requires some millions for public institutes and buildings. In this way the bad impression which might, as the grand duchess fears, be produced by the issue of the loan would be largely counteracted by a consideration of the fact that the proceeds were to be adapted to purposes beneficial to the community and to the country. ... If on my return to Vienna your Highness should feel convinced that my personal presence in Parma would assist in promoting the business, I should not hesitate for a moment to obey your Highness's wish—which for me is a command—and should immediately proceed thither.

"I shall count myself happy indeed, if my efforts are crowned with the success we desire, and if I carry through the business to your Highness's satisfaction, which I value above all else."

Metternich acted in accordance with Solomon's wishes, and obtained documents regarding Parma's former loans; these he forwarded to Solomon. They, however, did not sufficiently enlighten Solomon. He wrote to Metternich that he could not obtain a clear view of the situation from them, such as was absolutely necessary to enable him to draw a valid conclusion, applicable to such an important transaction as was involved. "I therefore venture to suggest that your Highness invite her Majesty the Archduchess of Parma to send to me a confidential man of business, furnished with the necessary powers, so that he can let me have any information I require, and I can negotiate the matter with him under the direction of your Highness. ... It is with particular satisfaction that I am able constantly to assure your Highness that I count it the greatest honor to devote my best services to her Majesty the Archduchess of Parma, and to justify the confidence which that gracious lady reposes in me."[23]

Solomon's wish was granted, and Colonel von Werklein, who directly controlled the duchess's public purse, set off for Vienna, taking with him a letter from Marie Louise to her father, the emperor.

"My one desire this year," she wrote,[24] "is to have the great happiness of seeing you again, and I cherish the firm hope that this may be fulfilled. This letter will be brought by Colonel Werklein, whom I am sending to Prince Metternich in Vienna, in accordance with his wishes, so that he may give Rothschild all the explanations he needs in the financial matter which you know about. The loan itself, however, which is to clarify my claims on Parma, will be formally negotiated and concluded here, with the assistance of the finance president, and a plenipotentiary of Rothschild's. I will then be much more at ease regarding the future."

The main lines of the proposal to be submitted to Marie Louise were decided in long secret conferences between Metternich, Werklein, and Solomon.

Solomon Rothschild had brought with him a detailed memorandum[25] in which he showed that the commercial crisis had affected the credit of all states, so that public enthusiasm for investments of the kind in question had been considerably damped. Moreover, Parma's public debt was too small to arouse interest in any of the principal money-markets of Europe. These facts were mentioned In explanation of the rather unfavorable conditions which he was offering. He made it a conditio sine qua non that the consent of the Duke of Lucca, the presumptive successor, should be obtained. State lands of the value of twenty-five million would realize only twelve to fifteen millions at the outside, so that a loan was preferable; but Parma would have to undertake not to incur any further debt for a period of years.

"Finally," Solomon's memorandum concluded, "as his Highness Prince von Metternich is well aware, local conditions in Parma make it of the greatest importance that the government should be told most emphatically to maintain the strictest secrecy regarding the proposed business until the time comes for carrying it into effect. We must also bear in mind that the new loan will almost double the public debt of Parma, a fact which will have a far from good effect upon the country's securities, so that the loan cannot be issued at a very high price."

There was no fear that Metternich and Werklein would attempt to modify these conditions. They were far too well satisfied that the matter was being arranged so easily, to attempt to obtain better conditions. They therefore signed the draft agreement submitted by Rothschild and Mirabaud, under which a loan of 6,000,000 livres, bearing interest at 5 per cent was to be issued at 75 per cent on the security of the three dukedoms.

Both bankers undertook the sale of the bonds, stating explicitly in the contract[26] that it had been arranged "at the invitation of the government of Parma and under the auspices of his Highness Prince Metternich." The government of Parma also undertook for fifteen years not to issue any other loans, without the consent of Rothschild and Mirabaud, to reduce the present loan by 3 per cent per annum, and to obtain the requisite consent of the Court of Lucca. Metternich and Werklein agreed because they hoped easily to secure the other's agreement. "If he [the Duke of Lucca] should refuse," Metternich wrote,[27] "we should simply carry on and ignore him; that is, act against him."

Metternich expressed his satisfaction in a letter to Neipperg: "In settling the matter in this way every factor has been carefully considered. The best thing will be for your Majesty to sell your property to the House of Rothschild under a fictitious contract, and gradually . . . invest the funds skilfully. You will thus find in about twenty years that you have acquired the whole capital sum that you want without its having cost you a halfpenny, and you will also during the whole of the period have received 9 per cent interest upon it. . . . Unless I am very much mistaken you will then possess not merely six millions in cash but seven or eight."

The chancellor wrote a short letter to Marie Louise in which he expressed his satisfaction at the conclusion of such an excellent arrangement, which offered the prospect "of achieving the desired results in the simplest possible way. If on examining the contract," he added, "your Majesty shares my feelings, all my wishes will be completely satisfied."[28]

Marie Louise, who understood nothing of financial matters, but gathered that she would obtain the millions she wanted, agreed to everything, signed the contract, and rejoiced with Neipperg that the future of her children by the second marriage was now assured. She wrote to her father saying:[29] "I have accepted and ratified the fictitious loan of 300,000 francs annuities,[30] which Prince Metternich and Werklein have concluded at Vienna with Rothschild and Mirabaud. I should be glad if, when the Duke of Lucca is being asked to give his consent, everything affecting my private property and furniture could be cleared up at the same time, so that after my decease my son and those persons whom I wish to benefit will not become involved in actions and disputes with his successor."

Marie Louise, however, wished that Rothschild would carry out the agreement, even if the duke's consent were not obtained. Metternich informed Solomon of this, assuring him that he would personally endeavor to secure the duke's consent. But Solomon was most unwilling to proceed without this security.

"I must honestly confess to your Highness," he replied,[31] "that I can see no prospect of this matter being satisfactorily settled in such a case. Her Majesty cannot flatter herself that it will be easy to double the country's indebtedness and to find a market for such a large quantity of bonds, without offering the public every kind of security." He therefore emphatically begged Metternich to use all his influence to secure the duke's consent. The chancellor concurred all the more readily in Rothschild's appeal, as he himself wished to secure this consent in view of possible further developments.[32]

Baron von Werklein accordingly went to see the Duke of Lucca with a letter from Marie Louise and Metternich. The duke unexpectedly made no difficulties. He authorized Werklein to write to Marie Louise and Metternich and say that it was a pleasure to him to be able to meet the wishes of the archduchess.[33] He also permitted Neipperg to have an inventory taken of Princess Marie Louise's personal effects. He stipulated only that the duchess should not arrange any further loan, that she should create a sinking fund and sell no property belonging to the state.

In the end all parties were satisfied, including the Austrian Treasury, which immediately recouped itself out of the loan to the extent of 400,000 francs disbursed on military expenditure and on the maintenance of Marie Louise during the years 1814 to 1816.

Metternich wrote a self-congratulatory letter to Marie Louise herself[34] in which he said: "The matter has so far worked out so entirely in accordance with my wishes that I cannot refrain from congratulating myself for having first conceived the idea of an arrangement that so extensively harmonizes your Majesty's interests with the principles of justice."

There were certain distinctions to be conferred in connection with this business. Metternich wrote to Neipperg:[35] "Werklein will have told you that Herr von Rothschild wants a little St. George for his managing clerk.[36] This indicates a certain amount of vanity, the Rothschilds, in spite of their millions and their generous loyalty, having a craving[37] for honors and distinctions. At the same time I feel that it is not in the best of taste to ask that such an order should be conferred upon a clerk, and I suggest that you reply to this request that the order of Constantine is a knightly order. It constitutes a genuine religious brotherhood, and is not simply a distinction, and as the (Jewish) religion forbids its adherents to take the statutory oath of the order, the chancellor of the order would not be able to confer the cross. Temper your refusal with appropriate expressions of your extreme regret, and the matter will be disposed of. Write to . . . Herr Solomon on these lines, but do not mention me, as nobody can take offense at a statutory provision, while a single personal remark can do untold mischief, and I myself have committed the great offense of making it impossible for all time[38] for the Rothschild family to obtain an Austrian decoration. If he thought I was implicated he would regard me as a positive cannibal."

Metternich certainly did leave Rothschild under the impression that he was prepared to use his influence in favor of securing a distinction for Leopold von Wertheimstein; but Solomon himself had been disingenuous in the matter. In putting his secretary forward he had himself in view, for if Wertheimstein were to be made a Companion, he himself was bound to be made at least a Commander. As he took Metternich's pleasant words at their face value, and had no suspicion of the correspondence quoted above, he wrote the following letter to Werklein at Parma:[39]

"I have just taken the opportunity of asking our most esteemed prince to lend his powerful support to my request, and the gracious reply which I have received from his Highness justifies me in anticipating that if you will only be so good as to make a suggestion in that quarter, his Highness will not be averse from . . . graciously acceding to it.

"I leave it to you to choose the most propitious moment for putting forward the proposal, having full confidence in your feelings of friendship for me, which I know how to value. I feel a correspondingly lively desire to find a suitable occasion for reciprocating them, and you will afford me the best possible proof of your friendship if you will give me an opportunity of being of use to you on the earliest possible occasion."

Leopold von Wertheimstein set off for Parma with full powers to conclude the business. He brought with him a secret letter from Metternich to Neipperg. "To my great satisfaction the matter has gone through," the letter ran,[40] "and something must be done for the bearer. He is Rothschild's right-hand man, and a splendid young fellow of first-rate intelligence. He hopes to get the minor cross; you know my views on that matter. Give him a nice present of a more useful kind."

The deeds were sealed, signed and delivered.[41] The two contracting firms underwrote 284,000 lire 5 per cent perpetual annuities representing a nominal capital of 5,680,000 lire at 75 per cent, i.e., 4,260,000 lire altogether were to be paid in monthly instalments of 355,000 lire. Rothschild and Mirabaud were if possible to sell the securities within six months, and they received as their commission 2 per cent of the nominal capital of the whole public debt of Parma, which amounted to 12,008,000 lire, so that they got 240,160 lire. Marie Louise informed her father[42] that they had now concluded the contract with Rothschild and Mirabaud which Prince Metternich had prepared at Vienna, and that she was exceedingly relieved.

No sooner had the transaction been completed than Solomon Rothschild began to wonder how Marie Louise proposed to invest the sums of which she would become possessed. He meant to get this business for himself to the exclusion of his partner Mirabaud; and he proposed to Metternich that the duchess should purchase shares in the Austrian National Bank through the firm of Rothschild "at a fixed average price to be agreed," and deposit these shares in Vienna. Metternich supported Solomon's plan because he hoped that the money would thus certainly remain in Vienna, and would not, as the emperor feared, be dissipated by the duchess. He therefore used his influence with Marie Louise and Neipperg in support of Solomon's proposal, without considering that Solomon was hoping thus to derive further profit from the transaction.

While Wertheimstein was on his way to Parma, "Metternich had accordingly written to the duchess in the following terms:[43] "Rothschild has some ideas regarding a transaction which is as easy as it should be advantageous for your Majesty, and which he would like to negotiate discreetly with someone who can be trusted. Monsieur Mirabaud will be in Parma, and Rothschild's authorized agent will not be able to discuss this matter in his presence. I know what Rothschild has in mind, and I guarantee that your Majesty cannot do better than to act in accordance with his suggestions."

Metternich wrote in the same sense to Neipperg and asked him to send Werklein to Vienna. Werklein brought with him a letter from Marie Louise to Metternich in which she said: "You have always given me such good advice that my interests cannot be in better hands, and I am entirely relieved with regard to my future."[44]

He also received a letter from Neipperg[45] stating:

"Herr von Wertheimstein has displayed as much zeal as he has understanding, and her Majesty has recommended that a ring with monogram of the value of 3,000 francs be given him."

Marie Louise also asked Metternich to let her know what would be a suitable present for Solomon, as the statutes of the Order of St. George made it quite impossible to admit him.

Metternich and Rothschild discussed the proposed investment of the money with Werklein at Vienna, and Werklein brought a detailed memorandum to Marie Louise[46] in which Rothschild showed that it would be to her advantage to sell the Parma bonds, and to invest the money thus made available in other suitable public securities. He pointed out that the Parma bonds did not constitute as good a security as those of larger states, since it was always the smaller states that were first endangered through political movements of any importance. He suggested that shares in the national bank would constitute an exceedingly good and safe investment.

Solomon Rothschild offered to carry through the business on the basis of the average purchase price of the shares during the years 1825 and 1826, this price to remain unaffected by any future changes, provided that he was granted a share in the dividends. Marie Louise accepted his offer, subject to the one condition that one-third of the share certificates should be sent to her at Parma, the others being deposited in the treasury at Vienna.[47]

Marie Louise maintained a constant business relationship with the House of Rothschild, even after the death of her second husband Neipperg. Everything connected both with the loan and with the budget of Parma went off sc well that in 1828 fully three million francs[48] were made available for Rothschild to apply in the purchase of 1,054 national bank shares. Marie Louise also entrusted Solomon with the settlement of the moneys due from her Bohemian estates, i.e., those of the Duke of Reichstadt; and Moritz Goldschmidt, a second secretary and confidential agent of Solomon, had to make several journeys to Parma.

When Marie Louise was staying in Vienna in July, 1828, Solomon had the great pleasure of being received in audience by her. At the end of 1829 Solomon sold Marie Louise's share, and the money received was divided into three parts. The amount of 484,824 gulden realized by 360 shares was put to a separate account "M," as a present to the children, William Albert and Albertine Montenuovo.[49] Two other accounts were opened for Marie Louise and for the Duke of Reichstadt. The money was first of all left with the Rothschilds to be invested in other securities at a suitable opportunity. The House of Rothschild had thus become the trustees of the property of the Montenuovo family, in which were merged the amounts standing in the accounts of the Duke of Reichstadt (who died early) and of Marie Louise on their respective deaths.

In view of the important position which the Princes Montenuovo came to occupy, owing to their relationship with the Imperial House of Austria, Rothschild's connection with the family was of great importance.

Gentz viewed with satisfaction the successes of his friend Solomon, for when his protege later prospered, he was not left out in the cold. At such times Rothschild was easier in the matter of presents, and Gentz scarcely ever allowed the occasion of one of Rothschild's visits to pass without obtaining a loan he had no intention of repaying. In return Gentz used his influence with Metternich in Rothschild's favor.

On the occasion of one of these visits the conversation turned upon Goethe, who had requested the Austrian government to forbid the printing of one of his works in that country. Gentz asked whether the House of Rothschild had come into touch with the poet, who was also of Frankfort origin. They had in fact scarcely come into touch with each other at all, there having been only occasional and casual meetings between them. This was due primarily to the fact that Goethe did not stay at Frankfort at all during the period between 1796 and 1814, when the House of Rothschild was first coming to the front, and that in later years his visits to the town were always quite short; he was indeed not much attached to his native town, as is indicated by the fact that in 1817 he renounced Frankfort citizenship.

Nevertheless he, like the rest of the world, heard of the remarkable success of the family which had originated in the Jewish quarter of Frankfort. Born of patrician parents, Goethe had as a child, as he tells us in "Dichtung und Wahrheit," only rarely peered at the ghetto, as at a strange world.

From his earliest days he had been brought up in an atmosphere of hostility toward the Jews, and later when his intelligence matured he had scarcely developed any more friendly attitude toward them. These sentiments were often revealed in his conversation, and the efforts of the Jews to secure their emancipation would evoke harsh comments. The growing prominence of the Rothschilds, when he had reached an advanced age, often led to Goethe expressing his attitude on Jewish questions. The introduction at Frankfort on September 23, 1823, of a new law, permitting marriage between Christians and Jews, was the occasion of a passionate outburst in conversation with the Chancellor von Muller.

"This scandalous law," the poet exclaimed, "will undermine all family sense of morality, intimately associated with religion as it is. When this goes through, how can a Jewess be prevented from becoming principal Lady of the Bedchamber? Foreigners are bound to think that bribery has been at work to make such a law possible. I suspect the all-powerful Rothschilds are behind it."[50]

In 1823, therefore, Goethe was already referring to the Rothschilds as all-powerful, recognizing the fact that it was through their money and influence that the Jews had been enabled, with the support of foreign powers, to get their way against the senate and citizens of Frankfort. The poet also inferred quite rightly that the widely current myth that the Rothschilds had made all their money very easily, and practically at one stroke, was a pure fabrication.

On October 20, 1828, he was talking to Eckermann about the period required for cultural or any other great achievements and said: "Yes, my dear fellows, it all amounts to this; in order to do something you must be something. We think Dante great, but he had a civilization of centuries behind him; the House of Rothschild is rich, but it has required more than one generation to attain such wealth. Such things all lie deeper than one thinks."[51]

In any case this remark shows that Goethe found food for thought in the phenomenon of the rise of this family of fellow Frankforters. With the Bethmanns Goethe was more intimate, and he was interested in watching the rivalry between the two leading Frankfort banking firms; however, as he had little understanding for financial matters, he was amused rather than concerned about their rivalry, and enjoyed retailing good Frankfort jokes about Rothschild and Bethmann, and stories of the way in which they spoiled each other's game.[52]

It was only toward the end of his life that Goethe actually met any members of the Rothschild family. In his diaries we have only the short entry that on May 2, 1827, two young Rothschilds with their tutor John Darby called on Goethe. They were Nathan's two sons, Lionel and Anthony, who were twenty-three and twenty-one years old at the time. On August 7, 1831, Goethe noted: "Afterwards Frau von Rothschild, a young bright person." This may have been Betty, the wife of James Rothschild of Paris, or more probably, perhaps, the wife of Solomon's son Anselm, who had married his cousin Charlotte, Nathan's twenty-four-year-old daughter.

The members of the Frankfort line are not mentioned by Goethe at all. The only other reference we find is to the effect that, a few days before his death, on March 14, 1832, Goethe was contemplating an oil painting, propped up on his easel, of the old bridge at Prague which was to go to "Baron Rothschild at Vienna."[53]

In view of these scanty references it is not unreasonable to assume that any personal intercourse during the latter years was of an exceedingly superficial nature, and that the colossus of intellect and the colossus of money, both originating from the same native city had had only the most casual intercourse, their knowledge of one another being derived practically from reading and hearsay.[54]

The Rothschild visitors referred to in the diaries were no doubt typical of the innumerable persons who called out of curiosity. Goethe had to receive many such, especially during the last years of his life. It had become a special honor to have seen the famous aged poet face to face, and this visit no doubt constituted a small step on the long road of social advancement.

James in Paris had had the best success, relatively, in making his way socially, since society in that city, having been convulsed by the changes of revolution and imperialism, did not hang together with the same consistency as in England and Austria. With few exceptions the most distinguished representatives of all parties and classes were to be found at James's house. At that time Metternich's son Victor,[55] who had already contracted a fatal disease of the lungs, was an attache at the Austrian embassy in Paris. In accordance with his father's wish he had got into touch with James; and he told the chancellor of a visite d'amitie which he had paid to Rothschild.

"I paid a friendly visit," he wrote, "to Baron James yesterday morning. His office was positively like a magic lantern, for people of the most various appearance and every kind of expression were constantly coming in and out. On that particular day the coming and going was specially noticeable, as securities quoted on the Bourse were fluctuating violently. The great banker himself, who generally maintained an attitude of such dignified calm, betrayed a certain nervousness. Our conversation was frequently interrupted by Bourse agents reporting quotations to their chief. The Duke of Dalberg was there, too, indulging in outbursts of liberalism."

Prince Victor Metternich described other strange callers who would take James aside, and all of whom wanted much the same thing—money and more money. This description of the office of the Paris money king showed how the House was constantly extending its sphere of influence. In the course of time, however, an opposition party grew up both in Paris and in London which attempted to check the firm's growing power.

Nathan Rothschild had not acquired the Austrian title of Baron, as he would have had to complete certain formalities as a naturalized British subject. He also feared that it might be damaging to his recently acquired British citizenship if he made use of a foreign prefix. But he did not conceal from the Austrian ambassador Prince Esterhazy that the title would have been welcome.[56] The ambassador asked Peel and Lord Aberdeen whether Nathan could be granted permission to use it, and they stated that they were aware of no objection, either legal or customary, to this being done. Nathan, however, decided to go no further in the matter, as he feared that his new fellow countrymen might regard him as a tool of the reactionary Metternich, and in general as a supporter of the system represented by the government of Austria.

Strong opposition against the Rothschilds made itself felt when their friend Herries was suggested for the office of chancellor of the exchequer, on the reconstruction of the ministry consequent upon the death of Canning in 1827. The appointment of a Tory who would be so entirely amenable to the king aroused a storm of indignation amongst the Whigs. The appointment of Herries had actually been approved by the king, and he had been summoned to Windsor. Thereupon Lord Lansdowne and his party suddenly offered the strongest opposition and endeavored to persuade Herries to refuse office on the ground of ill health.

Herries refused to accede to their wishes, with the result that his opponents mobilized the press against him in order, if possible, to delay the appointment. The Times and the Morning Chronicle expressed the view that the appointment of Herries was out of the question, as he was closely associated with a big financier who controlled the European money-market. Other papers[57] took up the cry that this fact made it quite impossible to appoint Herries chancellor of the exchequer.

The conservative papers took up the issue, and for a week the whole British press was full of the relationship between Nathan and Herries. The First Lord of the Treasury actually felt called upon to intervene in the discussion with a public denial.

In the end, Herries was appointed, but he held office only for a few months. When the ministry, of which he was a member, was succeeded in January by a new government under Wellington, Herries had to resign the office of chancellor of the exchequer and content himself with the post of master of the mint. Nathan expressed his regret in a letter to Carl[58] written half in German and half in Yiddish, which was intercepted by the Austrian Police.

"Consols," he said, "have gone up because of our ministers. Our friend Herries is broges [slang for 'annoyed'] because he has been given a poor job—he is broges but I cannot help him. He must be patient and perhaps he will get another job. Praise be to God that we have good news as Russia will wait, through Wellington everybody is for peace [scholem] which does not surprise me, for our king in his speeches is nothing but scholem al leichem [peace be unto you]."

In France, too, a new ministry had come to the helm in January, 1828. The harsh reactionary and clerical regime of Charles X had aroused such opposition in the country that in an election affecting 428 seats, only 125 supporters of the government were returned. Charles X was therefore forced to dismiss Villele, and to send for Martignac to form a moderate ministry; but he cherished secret plans of revenge.

Although the state of things in France afforded the Rothschilds some ground for satisfaction, the general situation in Europe was anything but pleasant. The Greek problem was still unsolved, and the battle of Navarino, in which the Turko-Egyptian fleet was destroyed, produced a tense situation. This sought relief in open hostilities between Russia and Turkey. The Porte went so far as to declare that the tsar was the arch-enemy of the Turks.

In these circumstances Emperor Alexander's successor Nicholas began to think of war. Whereas Metternich still congratulated himself on having converted Alexander into an Ultra from being a Jacobin,[59] and on having attached him permanently to his system, Nicholas inclined to a Russo-Nationalist policy. But for this, and especially for war against Turkey, he needed money. The Russian government therefore inquired of the House of Rothschild in Paris, toward the end of March, 1828, whether it would place its services at the disposal of the Russian government for floating a large loan.

The bank fully appreciated the political nature of the question of financial assistance at such a time and for such a purpose. While on the one hand it was offered an opportunity of doing big business, it might on the other lose powerful patrons. The Rothschilds had struck their roots in Western and Central Europe. They had no considerable interests or connections in Russia, and their minds were oppressed by the ill treatment to which Jews were subjected in that country. It would, moreover, have been exceedingly dangerous to come to Russia's assistance without the chancellor's knowledge, at a time when Russian policy was starting out on a line hostile to Metternich.

James therefore decided to communicate the inquiry he had received to Metternich through his brother Solomon, asking the chancellor to express his opinion. Metternich naturally advised refusal, although his advice was clothed in soft words. Through a third person, probably Gentz, Solomon was shown a memorandum in reply, entirely in Metternich's handwriting, although composed in the third person. "The prince says," the memorandum ran, "that he entirely shares the opinions and sentiments of Solomon Rothschild. There are two questions that have especially to be considered in this matter. One is the purpose to which Russia is going to devote the money; and on this there can be no doubt. Russia is seeking money in order to pursue her plans, and these plans threaten the political peace of the world. In this case, therefore, the money would be applied to the most evil ends conceivable in the present dangerous condition of governments and of affairs generally.

"The other question is whether, if the House of Rothschild refuses to do the business, Russia will still find means for carrying through her plans. There is no one better qualified to answer this question than Herr Solomon Meyer Rothschild, for he alone can judge whether in the present state of credit there is a possibility of other firms being able to carry through such a considerable, if acceptable, business as Russia requires, without the assistance of the Rothschild bank. If the answer to this question be in the negative, the House of Rothschild would alone have to accept the moral responsibility for all the evil which would result from its acquiescence. If the answer be in the affirmative, it remains for the House of Rothschild to decide whether, merely to prevent others from securing the profit, they wish to take upon themselves such a heavy responsibility, and incidentally whether under prevailing conditions, and in view of the risks necessarily attendant upon the carrying out of Russia's plans, the entrepreneur would be reasonably certain of realizing his profit.

"All these are questions which Herr Rothschild is alone qualified to decide. If the prince be asked what he considers sensible, he feels he must declare against the business. In any case, he advises Herr S. M. Rothschild to discuss the matter quite frankly with Wellington, and ascertain his views. Indeed, he has no objection to the duke being informed of his (the prince's) views . . ."

England was fundamentally opposed to Russia's warlike operations against Turkey, and Nathan was therefore also against granting the loan. Metternich's memorandum, moreover, did not fail of its desired effect. For the Rothschilds, who had acquired their enormous fortune by taking advantage of the cross-currents of war, were now opposed to all wars, with their inevitable effect of shattering public credit. They were also able to claim approval from their coreligionists for their refusal as constituting a protest against the ill treatment of the Jews in Russia.

The Russian loan was frustrated, and Metternich ascribed this fact principally to his dominant influence. The chancellor deemed himself superior to everybody, including the Rothschilds; he credited them with a special knowledge of technical financial matters that he himself lacked, but it never for a moment occurred to him that they might be cleverer than he. Whenever the Rothschilds did, or omitted to do, anything from motives of personal interest, which happened to coincide with Metternich's wishes, they always conveyed the impression that it was Metternich who had won the day, and that they were making a sacrifice. Although not free from vanity themselves they recognized the great man's weakness very well, and exploited it cleverly.

It is true that their refusal did not prevent the Russo-Turkish war, for other financiers were found to provide the Russian government with the necessary cash, Solomon made great play with his refusal of Russia's request, to emphasize the extent to which the intentions of the Austrian government and Metternich's wishes were regarded as commands. Gentz especially had this dinned into him daily, so that he might be sure of retailing it to Metternich. In return, Wertheimstein industriously discounted Gentz's bills, greatly "facilitating his little financial transactions." The Rothschilds made extensive use of Gentz in other ways, too. He was paid to supply the banking firm with political information, the correspondence being carried on in the form of private letters.[60] This was an exceedingly important factor during such an unsettled period. Solomon, who was constantly traveling on business, was thus able to keep abreast of events. The written method of communication was, however, maintained, even when Solomon was staying in Vienna, as he sent the information on to his brothers.

Meanwhile the development of events in France was becoming more and more menacing. Although Charles X had at first seemed to yield, he demonstrated that he was unteachable by summoning on August 8, 1829, the ultra-royalist cabinet of Prince Polignac, whose slogan was "No more concessions."

Solomon, who was staying in Paris at the time, expected that the news of the change of ministry in France would exercise a marked influence on the Vienna bourse. He therefore sent a special courier with this news and appropriate financial instructions, to Wertheimstein at Vienna. The letter was somewhat delayed, and when it arrived, Wertheimstein feared that he might not be the only person to have received the news, in which case he would be selling during a slump, and might sustain a loss.

"I had difficulty," he replied to Solomon, in the Hebraic language,[61] "in carrying out your instructions received by the post of the day before yesterday to sell 500 Metalliques and all our shares on the bourse. This was much increased by the fact that the postmaster of Sieghardskirchen, who brought us your letter himself, told us that another post had arrived at the same time as yours, which most probably also brought news of the change in the French ministry." The above letter was intercepted by the police, and a copy was laid before Metternich. It shows the manner in which the Rothschilds exploited political events, regarding which they always endeavored, through their own news and courier service, to have the earliest possible information.

The Russians had meanwhile been carrying on war against Turkey with varying success, and in August, 1829, they had advanced through the Balkans as far as Adrianople. Although their position was not by any means free from danger, their display of energy led the sultan to sign a treaty of peace at Adrianople on September 14, 1829, which, although it did not put Russia in possession of Constantinople, certainly secured her predominance in the East, improved her boundaries against Turkey, and offered great political and economic advantages.

The Danube Principalities served as a pledge for Russia. The Russians controlled the mouth of the river, and the straits were open to them. Turkey was to pay 11,500,000 Dutch ducats as war indemnity; in order to carry out this obligation, she applied to the principal European bankers, including Nathan Rothschild, for a loan.

Russia's successes gave little ground for satisfaction in England or Vienna. They had necessarily been achieved at the expense of England's influence; moreover, since the beginning of the war Russia had ignored all the protests made by England. Polignac was also disappointed, as he had hoped that European Turkey would be partitioned, and France would be indemnified by territorial acquisitions on the Rhine. Nathan sent a report on the situation to his brother Solomon in a letter written in Hebrew, of which Solomon made a personal, and therefore very poor, translation for Metternich's information.

"I am now going to tell you, my dear Solomon," the letter ran,[62] "all about how everything is here so far. There are some here who want to quarrel, and that with Lieven [63] . . . and want us to send angry notes, because Polignac is angry, too. Now I have spoken about the Turkish loan, and they said to me: 'Austria will do it, but it can't be done without us in England. Rothschild, speak to Wellington.'

"I must tell you Wellington and Peel would like to quarrel with Russia, but in the end we should have to go to war. I am not for demonstrations, and we must see to maintaining peace. What's the good of quarreling? The Russians have gone too far, and the world will be angry with us and will say: 'Why didn't you do it twelve months ago?' If England now says 'Yes, we are angry and want to go to war,' Austria and France will say: 'We will remain out.' They will leave us in the lurch, and we shall be involved alone.

"I went to Wellington and congratulated him on peace. He said: 'Peace is not yet. It is not yet ratified.' I spoke with him about Turkish loan as to whether he would give a guarantee. He replied, 'No, I cannot do so at the moment; you must get Austria to see to that.' Another minister said to me: 'I am afraid we shall make an enemy of Russia if we guarantee a loan.' The matter needs consideration. Perhaps the Turks will give the Island of Candia as guarantee.

"Wellington also said to me that many people had been to him who wanted a guarantee. There is dissatisfaction with the Russian Peace in every respect. The cabinet has now decided for the present to remain quite calm and not to write a word to Russia, to keep quiet and to let come what may. I shall certainly not leave you without news as soon as I hear anything further."

Political considerations alone prevented the Rothschilds from participating in a Russian loan before the war, or in a Turkish loan after the war, for they had not been severely hit by such few failures as they had suffered, and their wealth had increased enormously during the last few years. So that the "banking firm of the five brothers of Europe," as the House of Rothschild was called in several papers, had several million of cash available, for which it was seeking profitable employment. As a result of their happy knack in floating loans that almost immediately afterward were most favorably quoted, all countries wanted to have recourse to the Rothschilds for their loans, and a positively jealous rivalry developed to secure their favor.

While needy states were seeking opportunities for obtaining money on credit, the brothers Rothschild were looking for safe and profitable investments for their accumulated capital. The state of Prussia again entered into negotiations with the banking firm. The 5% interest payable on the £5,000,000 loan of 1818 was a heavy burden on the state budget. All states at that time were endeavoring to convert their public debt, and the Prussian finance minister, Motz, wished to reduce the interest payable on the state debt of 36,000,000 thalers from 5% to 4%.

The finance minister entrusted the preliminary negotiations to Christian Rother, an important treasury official and president of the Public Debt Administration, who had arranged the loan of 1818 with the Rothschilds. Rother asked[64] that he should not be hampered by detailed instructions, but that full confidence should be placed in him, as that was the only way in which he could be sure of success. From the start, Rother thought of no one but the Rothschilds. He went to Helgoland in July, 1829, where he met a confidential agent of Nathan's, and had a non-committal discussion with him about the business. He then went to Frankfort and negotiated with the house there. But he was offered conditions he could not accept.

"Gratuitous interference by business men here," Rother reported to his sovereign,[65] "has caused the Frankfort house to suspect the possibility of making large profits. In the course of our conversation conditions emerged, all of which I had to reject as being damaging to the interests of your Royal Majesty. I stated definitely that I would have to transact the business in question through the shipping interests, unless Solomon von Rothschild at Vienna would carry on the further negotiations, as I could not undertake a journey to London."

Rother thereupon decided to negotiate with Solomon, who, as he believed, had unlimited confidence in him. He met him at Troppau on December 24. They agreed-subject to Nathan's concurrence—"after two days' discussion, which was sometimes heated,"[66] on a draft agreement which Rother declared to be "extraordinarily advantageous," adding that "the state could not have secured such conditions through other channels or with other firms."

Rother wrote: "I have succeeded in obtaining what we wanted throughout—and in some matters far beyond my expectations—through the good nature of Solomon von Rothschild, who is really an estimable person."

Under the agreement the state of Prussia was to issue a new loan of £3,860,400 in 4 per cent Prussian bonds, at 98 1/2, through the House of Rothschild, the proceeds of which were to be devoted to redeeming a like amount of five per cent bonds of the 1818 loan within about two years. On signing the agreement Rother had to promise Solomon to indicate to his Royal Majesty that Solomon had not "done this business for financial gain, but regarded the whole affair as a matter of honor."

Benecke von Groeditzberg reported some details of the Troppau discussion to Berlin.[67] "Solomon Rothschild told me at the time," he wrote, "that in concluding this business—a highly profitable one for the State of Prussia, in my opinion—he had had the honor of his House particularly in view. He attached the greatest value to demonstrating to the royal government of Prussia that the consolidation of its public credit and the fulfilment of the assurances which his House had given in this matter were of more importance in his eyes than any considerations of private profit.

"While I do not wish to suggest that the least value should be attached to the unimportant part which I have played in this transaction, I consider it to be my duty in all humility to inform your Excellency of the sentiments expressed by Herr von Rothschild, which I believe to be sincere. We owe it entirely to him and to the efforts of Herr Rother that this business has been put through to the credit and profit of Prussia's finances."

Rother similarly reported[68] to the king that this extraordinarily favorable agreement had far exceeded anything that he had expected.

Nathan in London and his brother at Frankfort were less well satisfied. At first they turned the agreement down absolutely; but they had misgivings about disavowing their brother in Vienna, and Nathan contented himself with sending Solomon's son Anselm, who was then twenty-seven years old, to Berlin, to delay the signature of the agreement, and to secure improvements and alleviations. He was to agree only if better conditions were unobtainable.

Rother offered a stout resistance, and in the end, after some mutual concessions of minor importance, the matter was settled. The £3,809,400 in 5% debentures still outstanding with respect to the 1818 loan were to be fully exchanged for 4% bonds for the same amount, by October 1, 1832, in five half-yearly transactions. Rother himself was very high in praise of his own work. "This contract," he reported to his sovereign, "is purely advantageous to the state, and constitutes the first example of a financial operation by a great state for the reduction of interest on a large scale in which the nominal amount of the debt has not been increased, the interest payable on a debt of about 27,000,000 thalers being reduced from 5 to 4%. The commission of 1 1/2% is quite negligible and scarcely covers the cost of such a transaction."

The king expressed his satisfaction with Rother, and wrote saying,[69] "I gladly assure you also that the conditions have led me to the conviction that Baron Solomon von Rothschild concluded the agreement with you in the interests of the state of Prussia, as a matter affecting the honor of his house, wherefore I particularly instruct you to convey to him my satisfaction."

It was all an affair of "disinterestedness and honor," and Rother was zealous in emphasizing this aspect to his royal master. It was a matter of satisfaction to him, too, that the business had gone through so well, and in praising Solomon, he was indirectly praising himself for getting such good terms out of an astute business man. Yet in normal circumstances Solomon might have been able to make the transaction a highly profitable one. All that he needed was a continuance of fair weather on the bourse and the absence of any violent external influences, while the operation affecting the millions of pounds' worth of Prussian securities was carried through. Such conditions apparently obtained at the time, for the Russo-Turkish war was over, the general situation in Europe was tranquil, and there then seemed to be no risk in carrying through operations on the bourse.

Further loans immediately followed on that of Prussia. The Austrian government also wished gradually to proceed to the conversion of her 5% state debt to 4%, and the ministerial conference decided on the issue of a loan of from twenty to thirty million gulden 4% state debentures through the four native banking firms, in which Solomon Rothschild had come to be included, after the ruin of the Fries Bank.[70]

Count Kolowrat, who had been appointed head of the commission of the privy council to control the financial administration, had recommended this issue on the ground that[71] the interest rates obtaining in Germany, France, England, and Holland were lower than 4% and a reduction in those countries either had been or was about to be undertaken. It did not seem that there was any prospect of political complications for some time.

The loan was decided upon, and on April 3, the emperor expressed his special satisfaction with the conduct of the four banks on this occasion.

Rothschild certainly endeavored to get rid of the bonds as speedily as possible, and invested all the ready cash in the three accounts of Marie Louise of Parma in the new 4% Metalliques bonds, at the issue price (subject to a commission for his trouble), on the ground that they were a particularly safe investment.

Metternich had—to use Solomon's words—"in constant and zealous endeavor to be of service to her Majesty the Archduchess," made it clear to him that he must devote himself as much as possible to the interests of the Montenuovo family. . . .

"I have repeatedly endeavored to demonstrate," Rothschild replied,[72] "that I am filled with the same zeal. To show this to her Majesty again, and also to please your Highness, I will now undertake to forego the commission which her Majesty has allowed me in the past on the investments that I have effected in Austrian securities, as far as the capital of the Montenuovo family under my control is concerned; and I hereby declare that when the time comes, that family shall enter into the new bonds at their issue price, without my having derived any benefit from them."

Rothschild did in fact waive the commission on Account M. and reduced the commission on the two other accounts by one-half. He did this the more readily as he had already made a large profit out of the Parma business ; but his sacrifice of the relatively trivial commission made a good impression. It was just such an occasion as Solomon would use for playing up to his reputation for "disinterestedness and honor." In any case Solomon was unable at once to find purchasers for the large volume of security issued in connection with the Austrian loan.

In addition to the Prussian and Austrian loans just described, they undertook an operation on a far larger scale, fraught with far more serious consequences, namely the underwriting of 80,000,000 francs of French rentes, needed by the French government to pay for the Algiers campaign on which it had just embarked. Several rival firms had stated that they were prepared to deal with it. Aguado offered[73] to underwrite it at 97-55%, a consortium headed by Mallet Freres offered 98%, the Syndicat des Receveurs-Generaux offered 100%, and the Rothschilds—102.72 1/2%. "The rivals perceived," wrote Capefigue, "that in future nobody would be able to stand against the Rothschilds."

Even these gigantic transactions left them unsatisfied. They suggested to Marie Louise that the public debt of Parma should be converted, and they also wanted to maneuver the House of Bethmann in Frankfort out of a connection it had recently established with Austria.

tion was proposing to convert all its 5% securities to 4%. He promised on his journeys to ascertain foreign sentiment regarding this proposal, and to let Vienna know the result of his investigations. In June, 1830, he made his first report to Nadasdy;[74] it was sent from Frankfort and contained a proposal which in its essentials was directed against the House of Bethmann. His idea was that the 5% Bethmann bonds, which were still in circulation, should be redeemed at Frankfort by cash payments at par, through the Frankfort branch of the House.

"Your Excellency," he wrote, "is not unaware of my deep devotion to the Austrian state, which is shared by all my brothers and partners. I trust that you are convinced that we always have the best interests of the treasury in view, and that it must be our principal concern to fulfil your Excellency's wishes to the best of our ability."

The taking over of the Bethmann bonds was to serve "to secure and hasten the conversion operation as far as possible, and create enthusiasm abroad for the transaction." Not until he had delivered the 5% debentures did Solomon wish that his firm should receive 4% debentures at the rate of 105 florins for each hundred, or treasury notes, or money, or whatever else the authorities considered most convenient.

"Since my brothers and I," Solomon continued, "have no keener desire than constantly to furnish proofs to the Austrian state of our most disinterested service, unaffected by any private interests, we flatter ourselves that your Excellency will receive our most dutiful offer with your customary kindness." He hoped thereby to make the conversion more popular abroad.

"Your Excellency," he continued, "may be convinced it is neither pride nor self-interest that induces me to take this matter up. As I have already had the honor to prove to your Excellency, I always speak openly and sincerely; and I can absolutely assure you that if my suggestion be adopted the conversion will go through speedily and successfully. If therefore your Excellency is agreed that direct cash payments shall be made through my Frankfort house—which, I flatter myself, possesses the confidence of the public—we shall arrange for such payments to be made, not to Herr Bethmann here, but by us direct to the holders of the bonds."

The Austrian treasury thereupon asked the firm of Bethmann to submit a preliminary memorandum on the question of conversion. This was done, and the authorities forthwith sent this memorandum, which naturally differed in many respects from the Rothschilds' offers, to Amschel at Frankfort. He made some very sharp comments on Bethmann's document, ascribing its feebleness to that bank's lack of resources and knowledge.

"If that firm," he wrote,[75] "is really serious about the conversion, and means to throw itself heart and soul into the business, it is inconceivable that it should have neither the confidence nor the means to acquire the small quantity of six hundred 4% Metalliques bonds in advance. Smaller firms, without such a well-known name or such a position as the firm in question, would certainly have offered to do so."

The Rothschild memorandum described the reasons put forward by Bethmann as evasions, because that firm was not strong enough, and did not sufficiently possess the confidence of the public to carry out so great an operation. Amschel Meyer asked Solomon, who was about to make a journey to Paris, to come and see him at Frankfort in order to discuss the matter. The memorandum of the Frankfort Rothschild, written in grotesque German, ran:

"The same [Solomon] assured me on his honor that he was not actuated by the least resentment at the conversion having been entrusted to the House of Bethmann. He also asseverated that his house was devoted life and soul to the Austrian government, and that both his honor and his private interests were involved in carrying through the conversion. He had negotiated the French and the Prussian loan, 'all these things hanging upon one another and being interdependent,' and he did not propose to act against his own interest. His house held fifteen to sixteen million gulden of Austrian public securities, which he could produce on demand, whereas the House of Bethmann had neither the resources nor the knowledge of markets nor the influence that were necessary. Not one of its partners had the requisite energy to take control of such a business."

The memorandum went on to state: "It is possible and indeed probable that one or more banking firms and their supporters believe, if they directly or indirectly got fabricated articles into the papers, and spread unfounded rumors on several bourses, they could put the House of Rothschild in an unfavorable light to the Austrian government, and at the same time extend their own sphere of influence. We had expected such irresponsible newspaper articles as those that recently appeared in some French papers, attributing the fall in rentes to the action of the House of Rothschild, on the ground that we wanted to get rid of all our rentes at any price because we had taken over a Turkish loan of eighty million francs. They will not be the last, as they are not the first, of their kind."

The memorandum set forth that important firms dealing with governments would always have such fanciful stories attached to them. Truth and justice were, however, bound to prevail, and such lies would meet their own reward. By coming to the rescue with the greater part of its cash resources, the House of Rothschild had quite recently, in May, prevented a terrible crisis on the Frankfort bourse, which would have had serious consequences in other money-markets. Even now the political situation was far from satisfactory. In France nobody knew what was going to happen, while in England the king was ill and a change of ministry expected. The memorandum concluded on its original note, asking that the Rothschilds might convert the Bethmann debentures.

The finance minister Count Nadasdy[76] was, however, unshakable. He was not willing to offend the House of Bethmann by allowing the conversion to be carried through by a different firm from that which had originally negotiated the loan. The brothers Rothschild were then holding enormous quantities of state securities; in addition to their large Austrian investments they held millions of the newly issued French rentes as well as the bonds of the conversion loan of Prussia. The Rothschilds were therefore overstocked with bonds at a time when the general state of Europe might change from one of apparent calm to one of acute crisis.

While James did not feel that the political situation in France was wholly satisfactory, he did not realize how critical it really was. He gave balls, which were attended by princes such as the Duke of Chartres and the Duke of Brunswick. He supported French theatrical undertakings to give performances abroad, as in Vienna for instance. He was associating with princes and ministers and financiers. But the opinions that he heard were so various and so conflicting that he did not feel he could predict the future with any confidence.

James's own particular domain, the sensitive bourse, was already showing signs of the coming storm. On June 1 there was a severe slump, and several politicians implored Rothschild to use his power to prevent a collapse.[77] The Duke of Decazes wrote to him: "If you do not succeed in preventing the fall in values, everyone will believe that a coup d'etat will occur such as you so rightly fear, for you may be sure that in such a case no creditor would be paid his debts."[78]

gnac, as he had so often done before, and was again reassured by him. Anything of the kind was again out of the question; the bourse and the public were nervous, that was all.

Solomon, the chief of the Vienna house, had in the meantime also come from Frankfort to Paris. He had promised Metternich he would send an accurate report as to the state of affairs in France, and faithfully fulfilled his promise in spite of all difficulties.

His first report, dated June 19, 1830, reads as follows:[79]

MOST EMINENT PRINCE :

I hope that your Highness is enjoying perfect and constant well-being on your beautiful estate ... I am taking the liberty of reporting to you my arrival here the day before yesterday. I am venturing already to avail myself of the permission accorded me by your Highness to inform you occasionally of political events here through other than the ordinary channels. So far as I have had the opportunity during my short stay here of ascertaining from conversations with well-informed persons of all parties and opinions, it seems that the spirit of opposition, which has grown so very much more embittered in the last month, is directed not against the sacred person of the king and the dynasty of the Bourbons, but only against the leaders of the present cabinet, Messieurs de Polignac and Peyronnet.

Solomon still hoped that peace might be maintained, but he viewed with dismay Polignac's intention of changing the electoral and press laws, to which he adhered in spite of the strongest representations. The whole tenor of Solomon's report revealed his uneasiness.

Shortly afterwards Solomon reported that the result of the new elections had been markedly unfavorable to the government. The generally prevailing spirit of opposition had infected everybody, with the result that elements hostile to the ministry had been returned to the chamber. In fact the elections had resulted in only 125 supporters of the ministry being returned for 428 seats.

"The list is odious and contemptible," Count Apponyi reported to Vienna. The ministry was dismayed and shocked by the result. The idea of changing the electoral law was again being mooted.

"Such a step," Solomon wrote to Metternich, "might lead to the most unforeseen results. Meanwhile the king is firmly determined not to weaken his royal prerogative at any point, for he knows only too well from his own experience how quickly one concession leads to another, and how gravely the royal authority is endangered thereby."

The general situation was exceedingly unpleasant, although Solomon and James, especially James, still hoped that the storm would pass over. But at the end of June rumors were thickening to the effect that the king and Polignac meditated a coup d'etat to rid themselves of the inconvenient liberal chamber before it met and to limit still further the rights of the people. Those who accepted these rumors, or whose actual knowledge confirmed them, secretly sold large holdings of bonds in the London market; and the House of Rothschild, being interested in maintaining their value, was forced to buy them.

James Rothschild, believing that as state banker[80] he must necessarily be in the confidence of the government, was convinced that before any such fatal decisions were made he would surely be consulted, or that at any rate he would be given a hint before any vital step was taken. He heard nothing, however; and the rumors of serious steps contemplated by the government increased. On Sunday, July 24, James accordingly decided to go to Monsieur Peyronnet, minister of the interior, and ask him what it all meant.[81] The minister expressed his astonishment that such an intelligent and well-informed man as James should attach any significance to such gossip, and pointed to his office desk, covered with letters summoning the newly elected delegates to the first session of the chamber.

In a reassured frame of mind, Rothschild went to dine at the country house of Madame de Thuret, where the whole diplomatic corps had been invited. People asked him anxiously about the situation. He told them about his call on the minister, and the letters summoning the delegates which he had seen, and his statements reassured the diplomats who were present.

Meanwhile the ministers were secretly framing the famous ordinances in which the king, on Polignac's advice, dissolved the hostile chamber before it had ever met, ordered new elections on a different electoral basis, and severely limited the freedom of the press.

Early on July 26, 1830, the ordinances were published, to the general astonishment. The secret had been most scrupulously kept. The whole capital was swept by indignation. Everyone said that this meant the end of all liberty, and the relapse of France into the darkest medievalism. The press was particularly vocal, and protested most vehemently, in spite of any ordinance.

The excitement in Paris was prodigious. High barricades were erected in the principal streets; the populace collected in groups, marching through the streets shouting menaces at the king; shops with weapons and military stores were plundered, and strong opposition was offered to the royal troops, who were completely unprepared, and were present only in small numbers under the command of Marshal Marmont, who was himself taken by surprise. Stones were thrown at the windows of Polignac's private house, and his carriage was almost smashed to pieces. By July 28 the rising was in full swing. The streets reechoed with shouts of "Down with the Bourbons!" "Down with the ministers!" The garrison consisted of only twelve thousand men, and large sections had gone over to the rebels. The remainder were far from being sufficient to hold down the indignant city.

By July 29 the revolt had extended to the whole of Paris. The royal troops were slowly forced back on Saint-Cloud, where the king anxiously awaited the development of events. He was now prepared to revoke the ordinances; but it was too late. Not only his position, but that of the whole of his House, had collapsed. The Louvre and the Tuileries, defended by Swiss troops, were stormed by the populace.

The revolution was victorious all along the line; on July 31 Charles X and his guilty ministers fled. Their dominion was at an end. If the monarchy was to be maintained, only one thing could make this possible: the old line of the Bourbons must be eliminated. Recourse would have to be had to the king's rival, Louis Philippe of Orleans, son of the notorious Philippe Egalite, of the days of the great revolution. This prince played his part very cleverly; he contrived to make the people feel that they were conferring the crown upon him. His liberal views, and his simple, unadorned appearance as he courageously showed himself to the angry mob, did not fail of its effect. The old royal house was finished, the Orleans followed it, and Louis Philippe became head of the state.

James and Solomon were both in Paris during this period, and were reduced to a state of the greatest anxiety as the revolution proceeded. They were not only afraid for their wealth. As foreigners who had been so closely associated with the hated king and his ministers, they went in fear of their lives. Holding, as they still did, such a large amount of paper from the state loan they had just taken over, they had watched with the greatest dismay the catastrophic fall in rentes, amounting to 20 to 30% during the first days of the revolution.

But this fear was for a moment kept in the background by their immediate bodily danger, although their nervousness in this respect proved to be unfounded. The revolution of July was a bourgeois revolution. The people, it is true, sacked a few royal chateaux, but the life and property of private persons were spared.

Nathan Rothschild appears to have been the first man in London—apparently by means of a carrier pigeon sent by his brother—to receive news of the great event. Even if this particular is unfounded, it is clear that he received news of events at Paris before the British government. Talleyrand once stated in a letter to Madame Adelaide, the sister and adviser of King Louis Philippe:[82] "The English ministry is always informed of everything by Rothschild ten to twelve hours before Lord Stuart's dispatches[83] arrive. This is necessarily so because the vessels used by the Rothschild couriers belong to that House; they take no passengers and sail in all weathers."

On July 30, by which time peace had been restored in the capital after the "unexampled tumult and indescribable disturbances" of the previous three days, Solomon Rothschild remembered his promise to report to Metternich.

"We have been completely out of touch with the ministry for several days," he wrote,[84] "as we do not even know where the ministers are. We are also told that the king has left his residence today for the Vendee; the tricolor flag is flying on all public buildings, and the diplomatic corps here has ceased to function." Solomon's view was that the issue of events must be quietly awaited. He feared a civil war, and according to rumor the Duke of Orleans had accepted the crown. "Such is the state," he continued, "to which the self-confidence of three or four ministers has reduced France in three or four days."

Rothschild described how a new administration was being set up in the capital with the support of from thirty to forty thousand men, drawn from the dregs of the population, who had been "let loose against the king's troops." It could certainly not be denied that the people had behaved well, for apart from the king's property, no public or private property had been touched, even while the excitement was at its height. "It is satisfactory," Solomon admitted, "to see the uniforms of the regular citizen guard appearing at every corner; they are forty thousand strong, and often protected the city from pillage in 1814 and 1815."

The confirmation of the rumor that the Duke of Orleans had accepted the crown was a great relief to the brothers Rothschild. In spite of their connection with Charles X and his ministers, they had rendered financial services to the Duke of Orleans too, and had thus come into touch with his house. They felt that they had been in a sense betrayed by Charles X, as he had never informed them of the ordinances; and now that the duke's star was in the ascendant, they saw a profitable opportunity of changing their allegiance. They accordingly began to sympathize with the victorious revolution, and a letter from Solomon to a friend[85] clearly shows that they were preparing to play up to the new powers. In that letter Solomon spoke of the general indignation aroused by the ordinances.

"There was no armed force," he said, "that could have controlled a people beside themselves with rage, who felt that they were being led to the slaughter by their king's command. The nation would have let itself be cut in pieces before submitting again to the domination of the Bourbon family."

Solomon referred to the fears aroused by such a terrible explosion, but said that everything had fallen out in the most amazingly satisfactory manner. Private property had not been in danger for one moment; and in fact the people had refused money they had been offered. The troops and the people had fraternized everywhere; and all were forsaking the cause of Charles X and turning to Louis Philippe, who claimed to have been always devoted to liberty and to constitutional ideas. He was being received with the greatest enthusiasm wherever he appeared.

The Rothschilds' change of front was thus clearly stated; the revolution had triumphed, and the old powers were finished with, and the new man in whom they trusted seemed to be firmly in the saddle. They immediately adjusted their policy accordingly, and James offered his financial services to the new powers in the state, in spite of the losses incurred through the fall in the funds and the continuing uncertainty.

The news of the entirely unexpected revolution and the success it had gained in such a short time profoundly affected the whole of Europe. All governments saw with dismay how France—"Pandora's box," as Leopold of Coburg called her—was again spreading terror and unrest over Europe. There was a slump on all the bourses, while the hope of liberty ran high among the peoples; the consequences for Metternich's "peace of the world" seemed unpredictable.

It had been the worst possible blow for the chancellor and his system. At the time of the outbreak of the disturbances he was staying with Gentz at his country place Konigswart in Bohemia, and he received the first news of these events through the Frankfort ambassador Baron von Munch-Bellinghausen, who had received the news from Rothschild. It is remarkable evidence of the efficiency of the Rothschild news service even during times of such disturbance, that both the British government and the powerful chancellor, who controlled the vast diplomatic machine of the Austrian Empire, should have received the first news of these important events from the House of Rothschild.

Munch-Bellinghausen's report, dated Frankfort, July 31,[86] was based on a letter from Solomon and James in Paris, which Meyer Amschel had received at Frankfort on the 30th, and upon a short report brought by a messenger. "Rothschild has just received through a courier who left Paris on the 28th," the report ran, "a short letter from his brothers, telling him not to worry about them, as they were well and hoped that things would improve within a few days. They could not write him any news, and the courier would tell them everything verbally. The courier's statement is to the effect that Paris is in a state of great commotion." There followed a description of the serious disturbances at the beginning of the revolution.

Metternich and Gentz were at first unwilling to believe the news. The chancellor had just expressed his great satisfaction at the issue of the ordinances. He was now quite terrified. He kept hoping that the news would not be substantiated.

"I confess to you," Gentz wrote to Pilat immediately after the first news was received,[87] "that I believe all this to be only partially true. The mysterious letter from a panic-stricken Rothschild and the stories of a courier are doubtful sources. But it is certain that things are not well."

Nevertheless the Rothschild courier was right; and liberals throughout Europe took courage from what had happened in Paris, and felt that freedom was in the air. The news of the revolution resulted in a catastrophic slump on the Frankfort bourse, and masses of securities were thrown on the market. While Meyer Amschel, being the first to receive the news, had made some provision for this, he had not been able to do much in the short time available, and the collapse of all public securities reduced him to a state of panic. He applied his efforts, to keep the disaster within bounds.

When disturbances consequently broke out in several German cities, and it was feared that they might occur in Frankfort too, the senate called up the special constabulary, so as to be ready for possible attacks. Amschel, who as a result of the last settlement enjoyed the rights of citizenship, took up his duties as a special constable when his turn came. He had more reason than anyone else in Frankfort to fear for his possessions, and he heard with terror that outside the city walls the peasants were plundering country houses and driving landed proprietors from their estates.

He anxiously awaited his brother Solomon, who had just informed him that he would arrive from Paris early in September. He wanted to enlighten the head branch of the firm as to the present political situation in Paris, and to discuss the measures to be taken to meet the terrible losses which the House had incurred. In these hours of danger affecting the very existence of the House, the unity and harmonious collaboration of the brothers was particularly vital.

On his arrival at Frankfort, Solomon was able somewhat to reassure Amschel, at any rate as to the momentary position in Paris. After the abdication of the king, the funds had somewhat improved during the last few days, as compared with the lowest point which they had touched, and the proclamation of the Duke of Orleans had had a very good effect.

Solomon described that event as a particularly fortunate one for the House of Rothschild. Their difficulties consisted in their large holdings of securities. They would not be able at the moment to get rid of the enormous stock of French rentes except at very heavy loss. The conversion loan with the Prussian government, arranged during a boom period, would also prove to be a ruinous business. Austrian securities were still the best, but these too had suffered somewhat. The solution was: Get out of all engagements! Have loan agreements rescinded wherever possible; and especially the new Prussian loan.

Amschel promised to put out feelers in that direction, and especially to try to secure Rother's support. After the most pressing matters had been agreed upon, Solomon immediately returned to Paris, where his presence was urgently required. The news of the July revolution had already begun to produce disturbances in all the states of Europe, and there was the danger of fresh complications in the form of military intervention by the absolutist conservative powers, whose peace was threatened.

There was still a possibility that the danger to the House of Rothschild arising out of the July revolution might be averted. But if a European war were to break out, securities would continue to fall in value and the very existence of the House would be imperiled. The brothers' slogan therefore was: Avert war at any price.

It was in their favor that the new king feared a campaign against his usurped powers, and was anxious at all costs to avoid external complications. He was at pains to show the powers that if he had not stepped into the breach, France must have fared far worse, and that possibly it would even have come to the establishment of a republic.

In order to put this view to Metternich more particularly, the king made use of James Rothschild. In the middle of August, as a member of the Societe des Antiquites, James was one of a deputation to congratulate Louis Philippe on ascending the throne. As the deputation was leaving, the king signaled to James to remain behind, and made the following remarks to him:

"Having seen the happiness that I enjoyed in the bosom of my family, such as accorded with my peaceful and entirely unambitious disposition, you know me too well to be deceived for a moment as to the state of mind in which I am approaching my present task. ... In giving up such a pleasant and carefree existence in order to mount to a throne set with dangers and difficulties, I have made an enormous sacrifice for my country. . . . France was heading straight for a republic. She would have ruined herself and perhaps the whole of Europe with her. . . . The monarchist principle has triumphed over anarchy. . . . My most ardent desires are centered upon the peace of Europe, and I hope that the states will resume their former friendly relations with France, and come to have confidence in France's new government."[88]

James saw to it that this was accurately conveyed to Metternich at Vienna, and that the call to peace was properly emphasized.

Meanwhile there were occurrences in Paris that threatened further risings in various states of Europe. Countless emigrants from the period of the Neapolitan and Spanish revolutions thought that the moment had come for resuming their revolutionary activities. The Rothschilds knew some of these people and heard of their plans, and they did everything possible to induce the new authorities in Paris to refrain from supporting their efforts. What, for instance, would be the fate of Neapolitan bonds, which had already slumped heavily, if General Pepe, who was staying in Paris, were, as Solomon put it,[89] "again to arouse the spirit of the Carbonari"?

A rising was expected hourly in Spain. The Rothschilds immediately informed the newly constituted French government of everything that they heard of these activities, and through a common friend they also put Metternich in possession of such information.

"Count de Mole,"[90] Solomon wrote to Vienna,[91] "is well aware of all these activities, and has been enlightened as to the importance of suppressing them in the general interests of peace and of the tranquillity of France. He fully shares our convictions in this matter, and is applying all the means at his disposal to frustrate these unscrupulous schemes. I hope, my dear friend, that you will observe the strictest confidence in the use you make of this communication. It was made to me under the seal of the strictest secrecy ... it would be exceedingly unpleasant for me if there were the slightest suspicion that I had breathed a word about it. For this reason I am not signing this letter."

Owing to their excellent connections, the Rothschilds were thus receiving the most important and confidential information in spite of the complete change in affairs. The new king, Louis Philippe, and the bourgeois ministers who now received the seals of office had the greatest interest themselves in seeing that peace was maintained, that law and order was restored, and that private property was not interfered with. The aims of the Rothschilds were identical and they were to learn Louis Philippe's intentions from the best possible source, namely, the king himself.

On September 7, 1830, James was received by Louis Philippe in private audience, and discussed the general situation with him. "My brother," Solomon reported thereon to Vienna,[92] "yesterday had the opportunity of a leisured discussion with the King of France. The king said with regard to Austria, which was strengthening her forces in the Italian provinces, that she should not go too far with her military preparations, as this alone would automatically lead to war in the end. My brother represented to the king that he was not dealing firmly enough with the activities of the Spanish and Neapolitan exiles in the heart of the capital itself, and that such laxity might produce the most pernicious results. The king replied that he was using every means in his power to frustrate the agitators' schemes, but that his mandate as a constitutional monarch involved limitations which he could not legally exceed.

"The king assured me that he was opposing revolutionaries in all countries as far as his position as a constitutional monarch allowed him to do, but he stated that he was compelled to show a certain regard for liberal aspirations.

"'I should be exceedingly glad,' he said to James, 'if you could possibly be the means of communicating my views to his Highness Prince von Metternich, and request him in his wisdom to make urgent representations to the court of Naples, so that it may be moved to make a few concessions in the general interests of the country, and in accordance with the progress of contemporary ideas.'"

Solomon skilfully incorporated in this letter, which he intended Metternich to read, a few flattering remarks about the chancellor, attributed to Louis Philippe. The letter concluded with the following words: "Such, my dear friend, are the essential points mentioned in my brother's conversation with the king. With the exception of certain highly placed persons, observe the strictest secrecy in regard to it, and accept again the assurance of my most friendly sentiments."

The fears that the revolutionary movement might spread prove to be well founded. The July revolution produced repercussions throughout Europe. Apart from minor disturbances in Germany, Italy and Spain, there were serious risings leading to important results. The peoples of the kingdom of the United Netherlands, which had been welded together in 1815 without any consideration of the diverse populations of Belgium and Holland living within its boundaries, had long been restive. On August 25, 1830, revolution broke out in Brussels, as the result of which a change in the form of government, separation from the dynasty of Orange, and indeed the severance of Belgium from Holland were demanded and soon afterwards achieved. This produced a severe crisis in the commercial world, and increased the fears of a general European war, for news was received from both Vienna and St. Petersburg that the authorities were not merely determined to suppress these revolutionary uprisings individually, but also proposing to use military force against the new regime in France, as the breeding-place of all these dangerous movements.

Meanwhile Solomon had returned from Paris on a most important mission. His brothers had urged him to bring all his influence to bear upon Metternich—to restrain his warlike zeal from embarking on such an adventure, which—quite otherwise than in the case of Naples—would be fraught with the gravest consequences, such as nobody could foresee, for Europe in general and for the House of Rothschild in particular. Solomon was to do what he could in the way of direct written and verbal communications with the chancellor, and also to bring pressure to bear upon Gentz daily, while enlisting the influence of third persons whom he had placed under financial obligations. His brothers in London and Paris unceasingly urged him in their letters not to flag in his efforts.

James wrote on November 24, 1830: [93]

MY DEAR BROTHER:

An Austrian courier will be passing through Frankfort, so I am taking this opportunity of writing to you. I hope that as Uncle [Metternich] will be back in Vienna, you will know more about what is happening. You know that Count Sebastiani, minister for foreign affairs, has given me permission to call on him every morning. I am on the most friendly terms with him, a fact which is not likely to be displeasing to Uncle, as it enables me often to let you have advance news. He said to me, "My dear Rothschild, the one question is, are the foreign powers seeking an excuse to declare war on the king? It will be a murderous one if they are, and God knows when and how it will end. We will leave nothing undone to preserve peace. We will do everything possible; and the king sent a man to Brussels yesterday to beg that the Nassau dynasty should not be excluded, and to say that if it behaved foolishly it was at its own risk, as France would not interfere."

Talleyrand has been written to in London to try and settle the question between Holland and Luxembourg. Sebastiani told me that the king had had a very long conversation with Apponyi and had no other wish than to preserve peace. Therefore, my dear Solomon, do try to find out the position, for even though we are not carrying out any transaction in rentes, we have a holding of 900,000 rentes (i.e., 18 million francs nominal). If peace is preserved they will be worth 75%, while in case of war they will drop to 45. We should not be certain of dropping 25 to 36%, and I should say that we better go straight and secure ourselves.

You have no idea what the position is here with regard to actual rentes. People are selling every day in England, and today I sold 25,000 francs again in London; but I see no real sellers, and in spite of all the military preparations, the rentiers are not getting nervous, because it is not consistent with sanity that the powers should now undermine industry, trade, and public credit through a war.

Meanwhile, my dear Solomon, the whole world is arming, and this fact alarms me. They are already telling us here that they are going to station a defense force of 300,000 men on the frontiers. Now experience unfortunately teaches us that military preparations very easily lead to war, and if anybody wants war we shall have it. Believe me, I feel sure that it depends now on the prince alone, and he can use the opportunity to influence France as he wishes. If Uncle wants peace and convinces our government that he does, we shall have peace; and he will certainly have a firmer control over affairs here than he had in Polignac's time. For neither the ministry nor the chambers are, as has been supposed, ultra-liberal; indeed their views have been modified so much that they are much more inclined to royalism than in Polignac's time. You can see a proof of this in their way of dealing with the Spanish revolutionaries ; there are no more clubs or popular gatherings. Each day we have new laws for maintaining peace; there are no posters or tub-thumpers; the revolutionary papers are being suppressed.

Sebastiani also said to me: "The one person for whom I have unbounded admiration in all the ministries is Prince Metternich, and he will find me a straight man to deal with. I want to maintain the existing agreements, but if he means to declare war on us we must conclude an agreement with England, but believe that I am making every effort to maintain peace. ... As far as I can see the issue of peace or war depends entirely upon your prince."

Stuart[94] believes that peace will be maintained; that peace and war are being discussed a great deal, but that peace will prevail. I beg you, if there is any news, send somebody to Strassburg, or send a special courier here, because it makes a great difference. We have been cautious enough to consolidate our position by realizing a large holding of rentes at a loss, and I am convinced that if peace is maintained, rentes will improve in three months by at least ten percent, since there is a shortage of actual rentes on the market, and the bear speculators require millions to cover. And it would be a very good thing to recover part of their ill-gotten gains from these wretched people, and this is just the moment for doing so. You yourself will see, my dear brother, how exceedingly important it is that I should have the earliest possible news of what we are to expect. People are for war here today because of an article in the Journal des Debats. Everybody here is very pleased with Apponyi. I assure you one nearly loses one's head here, because common sense is in favor of peace, but warlike ideas are getting the upper hand. I am hoping to have full news from you at an early date, and am your very affectionate brother [no signature].

This effusion was followed three days later by a second letter:

MY DEAR BROTHERS :[95]

The news that the Belgians have dethroned the Orange dynasty has shocked everybody deeply. Rentes fell to 60.25, but closed at 61.19, and the five per cents at 91.15 while ducats were 65.40. As the Bourse was closing it was stated that Laffitte[96] would make a speech on Monday demanding 500,000 men; not that France should intervene in Belgian affairs, but only for her own security. I spent a long time with Laffitte and Sebastiani. I have never known them so moderate. They said to me, "We sent somebody to Brussels and they did not listen to us. Are we to set Europe ablaze in order to put Monsieur Merode on the Belgian throne? The powers are arming and we must do the same; we have bought 100,000 muskets in Hamburg; we have also bought munitions at Frankfort, as we must take precautions, and the interests of the powers are identical with ours." They said that they definitely believed that there would be no war; but the Belgian affair complicates everything very much.

Good news is supposed to have been received from Russia. I shall probably send you a courier on Monday night or on Tuesday with the speech, if it is important and likely to be helpful. The moderates, such as Perier and all the rest are wild, and are screaming against Russia, saying that the publication of Emperor Nicholas's letter was an insult to the nation. You have no idea of the war spirit among these people; but it is clear that none of those in real authority wants war.

Do tell the prince these things, my dear Solomon. The massing of troops exasperates them, hence these great preparations. Be assured, however, that it depends entirely on the prince, whether we have peace or war. If we have war I see the whole of France putting up barricades, and I assure you I tremble for Germany. The people are like a lion; and it is not well to rouse such a strong and powerful nation.,

This all amounted to the fact that Sebastiani wished to warn Austria through Rothschild not to prompt Russia to make war or to arm herself. While such developments might prove embarrassing to the new government in France, they might also produce results disastrous to all absolute governments.[97]

On receipt of these letters Solomon went to see the prince and Gentz, and gave them copies. He tried to read the mind of the chancellor, and if possible to influence him. Metternich repeated his well-worn phrases, and realizing that his reply would be conveyed to the French government through James, just as that government's views had been conveyed to him by Solomon, he uttered an emphatic warning that Louis Philippe should render no assistance to revolutionaries, in any country, if he was concerned for the continuance of his rule and the maintenance of peace.

Solomon thereupon replied to James:[98]

MY DEAR BROTHER:

I have received your valued communication of November, and conveyed its contents to the prince. One may now infer that the French government must be principally concerned to secure its own position, and will therefore have no use for mere adventurers like Mole and Broglie.[99]

On behalf of the prince, Solomon conveyed an assurance that he also desired peace, but that he would strike a blow in Italy, not against a power but against the revolution which had to be fought everywhere in the interests of peace and order. If France permitted this, it would not be troubled, and peace would be maintained; but if not, there would be war, in which case Austria would certainly not stand alone, for it would be in the interests of all governments to support the state which desired nothing but peace and order.

"I have also informed the prince of your inquiry," Solomon continued. "If General Sebastiani wishes to say anything to him as man to man it is perfectly open to him to do so, either through you or through any particular person in whom he has confidence."

Metternich thus appointed the Rothschilds over the head of his Paris ambassador as the channel of communication between him and the French cabinet. This implied extensive confidence in them, and was a priceless advantage to the Rothschilds, for it meant that during those dangerous times they would receive news of the most important decisions before anyone else. However, they continued to be in a state of great anxiety as to whether peace would be maintained. Their losses already amounted to millions; in accordance with their own estimate, perhaps deliberately somewhat exaggerated, they had irrevocably lost about 17 million gulden at one blow through the July revolution.[100] A war might cause further losses, and perhaps occasion the collapse of their House. Even the tame extracts from the Rothschild Paris letter made for Prince Metternich's benefit still sounded exceedingly menacing.

"We have received your valued letter of the tenth of this month," one of these letters ran,[101] "and regret to learn that your securities are falling as badly as ours. Yesterday things got a great deal worse. War is on everybody's lips; there are those who want war for its own sake, and those who want it to take the public's mind off the proceedings against the ministers.[102] Sebastiani remarked today that it would be better for the public to have something else to think of now than these proceedings, and that after the action things would be much better.

"Others, such as our friend Stuart, are of a different opinion, and think that after the action things will be much worse, and that we shall have nothing but war to think about then, and that the present ministers are not strong enough to adopt an unpopular line. Rentes remain at 58.50, and from today all the gardes natioriaux must wear uniforms, so that you will see nothing but soldiers. On the Bourse were several soldiers in uniform. This does not look like peace.

"Last night Laffitte said that war was less likely now than ever, and that everything possible will be done to avoid it. He hopes that Prince Metternich will seriously think of means for settling matters before all the powers have their armies equipped, and everything is ready for war. For as soon as the young French are ready, and anything happens to set them off, the devil himself won't stop them. . . . Frankness and mutual forbearance are more than ever necessary.

"I read out to General Sebastiani what you told me about Uncle. He said that he was pleased with everything I had heard from the good gentleman; I assure you that he actually used the word 'good.' He went on to say, 'I am doing everything possible for peace . . . and I do not see what we should go to war about. I have given orders in Italy to be accommodating to Austria in all matters. If, however, which God forbid, anything should happen there, I do ask for God's sake not to let troops march into any other country, for that might produce war.'

"You see, my dear brother, that the issue of war and peace really does hang on a thread today; God grant that everything may remain peaceful in Italy, for if God does not maintain peace, He alone can say what will become of Europe."

James might have added "and of us" after "Europe." It is exceedingly probable that the original letter did contain some such phrase, for the passage quoted was only a carefully selected extract made for the benefit of the chancellor.

And indeed, when, in the last days of November, a rising broke out in Poland against Russian rule, the danger of hostilities against France, which stood before the world as the originator of all these revolutionary troubles, became particularly acute. The future destinies of the House of Rothschild largely depended upon whether the decision should be for peace or for war. They redoubled their efforts to win the statesmen and persons in power for the cause of peace. The three brothers in Paris, London, and Vienna rivaled one another in their feverish efforts to influence their countries' policies.

Amschel Meyer at Frankfort had meanwhile been allotted the task of relieving the House of Rothschild from as many of its financial agreements and obligations as he possibly could. Carl stayed with him in order to help in this labor of Sisyphus, involved in dealing with the enormous ramifications of businesses that were mostly in a bad way. The great question continued to be, war or peace?

(14) The passage in the memoirs of General Baron de Marbot (Paris, 1891), Vol. I, pp. 309-311, from which the possible presence of Rothschild at Cassel might be inferred, will not bear serious examination, for it was not Marshal Augereau, but Mortier, who occupied Cassel, and the domiciliary search of the Rothschild house, as well as the cross-examination of the members of the family, occurred much later, at Frankfort, and not, in 1806, at Cassel. In publishing these "Memoirs," which appeared more than eighty years later, the writer was obviously influenced by the old and widely current legend regarding the rescue of the electoral property by the Rothschild family, the modest facts regarding which Berghoeffer was the first to bring to light. CHAPTER III

(1) In 1834, on the occasion of a dinner to a friend, Nathan spoke about his career in England. This is described in the Memoirs of Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Bart., edited by his son Charles Buxton, Esq. (London, 1848), pp. 333 and foll. It has been often quoted and reprinted, but we should bear in mind that an account given by Nathan during a good dinner should not be taken too literally, and that it also had the object of increasing the; prestige of the House of Rothschild. Critically regarded, the account is worthy of consideration. (2) See Demachy and Les Rothschild, p. 168. (3) Mollien to Napoleon, Mar. 26, 1811. of the Montenuoro children have been obtained from a letter of Empress Marie Louise to Metternich, dated Mar. 17, 1829 (State Archives, Vienna) in which, to use her own expression, she "confesses" these dates to the prince. Hitherto she had pretended, even to her own father, Emperor Francis, that the Montenuovo children had not been born until after Napoleon's death, and after her marriage with Neipperg. In Gotha (1914), however, William Montenuovo's birthday is wrongly given as August 9, 1821. (14) Neipperg to Metternich, Parma, Dec. 16, 1825, State Archives, Vienna. The keeper of the Goethe and Schiller archives at Weimar informed me that there were no letters or other documents that mentioned any connections between Goethe and the House of Rothschild. Tewele's Goethe und die Juden, as well as Bab's essay under the same title, mention only the passages which I have quoted. Dr. Max Maurenbrecher's Goethe und die Juden (Munich, 1921) introduces further material bearing on the poet's general attitude toward the Jews, but fails to furnish any other dates relative to the problem of Goethe and the Rothschild family. The Rothschild Dynasty

The Committee of 300

Dr. John Coleman

Dr. John Coleman, author of The Committee of 300, tells how Mayer Amschel, the founder of the"Red Shield"dynasty acquired his first fortune. It is a far cry from the myths and legends that still surround the man who began as a rag and bone merchant and pawnbroker, working out of a small house on Judenstrasse, Frankfurt on the Main, Germany, where he lived with his wife and family.

The events attributed to history are often caused by a "hidden hand" pulling the strings of kings, princes and potentates from behind the scenes. The phenomena is explained and the legends that have grown up around the Rothschilds are demolished by this book that also reveals the Rothschild's intriguing that brought down men like Napoleon and Tsar Alexander II of Russia. Legends has it that Mayer Amschel Rothschild's "genius and financial skills" were inherited by his sons, but the truth is quite a different story, as Dr. Coleman makes very clear in this well documented account that goes far beyond the best known legends cloaking the true character of the family.

Exactly how Mayer Amschel Rothschild "stuck it lucky" and the steps he took that brought the family from obscurity to "virtual rulers of all Europe," makes fascinating reading.

This outstanding book is not only about the past, it is also about the present and the future. It will help to explain many of the events that perplex the ordinary people like the war in Iraq and the war threats against Iran.

FOREWORD

The Rothschild family generally taken to mean the father and his five sons is truly a story of opportunity seized; a determined will to carry out its gains and its entry into a world of the aristocracy that did not want them. Some might consider it effrontery to talk about the huge fortune that fell into the hands and the control of Mayer Amschel Rothschild as an "opportunity," while others regard it as nothing less than misappropriation of funds entrusted to his care, hardly an "opportunity" in the generally accepted meaning of the word.

Nevertheless, for Mayer Amschel it was a godsend that lifted him out of a life of pawn-broking and selling second-hand goods, to the highest echelons of power, a remarkable achievement when one considers the history of the period, in which Jews were constrained by many civil laws designed to act as a permanent barrier between them and the people of the principalities and nations in which they lived. Class distinction was another huge barrier, which would have been daunting for even a non-Jew who was not a part of the ruling aristocracy.

Mobility of classes was unheard of and separation was harsh and strictly enforced, especially in Frankfurt on the Main, Germany, where the Rothschild dynasty began its remarkable history. Mayer Amschel Rothschild had little if any formal education; his family did not have a motto, but what he did have was tenacity of purpose and a strong belief in his religion. His was a bourgeois home, an "alien" home in the alien ghetto of Frankfurt.

Through guile, and what some unkind critics called "innate cunning," Mayer Amschel Rothschild reached right into the heady world of aristocratic families who shunned him, and who indeed, despised him. But for the "good fortune" (or "misfortune" — depending on which side one is on) of meeting the Landgrave of Hesse, Mayer Amschel Rothschild would have remained an obscure pawnbroker and peddler of rags and bones for the rest of his life. It was not necessary for him to identify himself as a Jew, of which descent he was proud, nor did Mayer Amschel ever attempt to hide his origin. On the contrary, he was proud of it, even in the face of relentless opposition to the Jews of Frankfurt, which extended to all the nations of Europe.

England, the most "civilized" of European nations as history will have us believe, was particularly fierce in its opposition to Jews. Even its leading figures, educated men, were not averse to referring to Jews in the most unflattering of terms. For instance, Lord Gladstone often referred to Disraeli, the "valet" of the Rothschilds, as "that loathsome Jew" according to Gladstone's biographer, Edward Freeman. Bishop Wilberforce called Disraeli "an Eastern Jew" in an unflattering manner. Bismarck called him "the Hebrew conjurer" and Carlyle labeled him as "the absurd Jew boy."

I mention these things as examples to show what tremendous odds were faced by Jews, even the educated among them who aspired to power in the business and financial world of the 18th and 19th centuries. Some historians and writers charge that the Rothschilds fabricated their history and their achievements to ascend to power. Their compelling presence has made a vast difference to history and it can be rightly proclaimed that no major event in the political and economic life of the nations of Europe did not somehow or somewhere involve the Rothschilds, even though deeply hidden and however indirect it may have been.

In the minds of many, the Rothschilds will always be associated with immense wealth, but it is the power, brought by that wealth, which is not as well recognized as it ought to be. For the Rothschilds did not seek a vast fortune just to be able to live a life of ease. They sought wealth for what it would bring in the way of control of the leading power brokers of all nations, through whom they exercised control of nations, which extends even to this day. The Rothschilds did not live in a vacuum; rather they affected millions of lives. Lionel Rothschild liked to think of himself as unique, and perhaps this is true. It is true that like his brothers, he was uniquely rich, but how rich was never made public. One thing is not true; the Rothschilds did not make a fortune out of inflation of the currency of the nations among whom they lived. There are no real benchmarks to guide us into the true character of the members of the Rothschild family and what drove them to an obsession with money and insatiable appetites for power.

For the most part we are left to guess at what went on in the minds of this powerful family who were determined to become the hidden rulers of Europe and Great Britain, and indeed, the world. It was not that they were aided by good looks or a pleasing manner of speech like the natural attributes of the Irish race. On the contrary, they were by all accounts distinctly ugly in appearance and coarse in manner. Meyer Amschel spoke in guttural Frankfurt Yiddish, a mixture of Polish and German with expressions drawn from the Hebrew language.

The education he gave his children did not extend beyond the rudimentary synagogue school they attended. Intellectualism was in any case prohibited to the Jews of Frankfurt who were not allowed to share in the Age of Enlightenment that swept Europe.

Mayer Amschel remained true to the instructions of the Talmud and honored all of its traditions, instructing his children to do likewise. He in no way altered his life style once fame and fortune was his. The clothes he and his sons wore were often worn until threadbare.

There are very unkind references to this fact in many of the papers and documents in the British Museum, some of them highly derogatory. It is alleged in one account by Cherep-Spiridovich that Mayer Amschel never changed his underwear and wore the same garments "until they fell off him." Writers like John Reeves, Demachy and Spiridovich conclude, in the words of the latter, that to the "political phases of this sinister and fatal family could be attributed at least one half of the all the bloodshed and calamities that have befallen the nations since 1770."

Others, like the Editor of the Chicago Tribune who knew something was going on, but could not put names to it, wrote on July 22, 1922:

> Our statesmen are children compared with theirs. A foremost place in world affairs is offered us time and again. It is thrown into our laps, and through plain stupidity, we reject it.

The question is: "Did we reject it, or did some hidden force prevent us from seizing the initiative?" Nietzsche, the German philosopher in his work The Dawn of Day wrote:

> One of the spectacles which the next century will invite us to witness is the decision regarding the fate of the Jews. It is quite obvious now that they have cast their die and crossed the Rubicon; the only thing that remains for them is to either become the masters of Europe or to lose Europe, as they once lost Egypt, where they were confronted by similar alternatives. . . Europe may some day fall into their hands like ripe fruit, if they do not clutch it too eagerly.

Those who have researched Nietzsche say he was referring to the Rothschilds, but I could find no evidence to back up this claim, although it would seem to fit the pattern of that famous family.

Many of their secrets remained totally hidden and may never be revealed. The frustration with such secrecy is revealed in the words of the French statesman, Lamartine:

> We wish to break every kind of yoke, yet there is one that is unseen, yet weighs on us. Whence comes it? Where is it? No one knows, or at least, no one tells. The association is secret even for us, the veterans of secret societies.

The French Minister for Foreign Affairs, G. Hanotoux wrote in 1878 of this hidden hand as a "mysterious force ruling politics and muddling the cards of diplomacy."

Many of these mysteries were fully cleared up by Disraeli in his novel Coningsby, which was but a thinly veiled account of the doings of the Rothschilds. Disraeli had to disguise many of the facts as fiction, lest the wrath of men should explode upon the revelations it contained. "Sidonia" was undoubtedly Lionel Rothschild and Coningsby, but a fictionalized account of his deeds:

> When he was nineteen, Sidonia who had then resided with his uncle at Naples, made a long visit to another of his father's relatives at Frankfurt. Between Paris and Naples, Sidonia passed two years. It was impossible to penetrate him. His frankness was strictly limited to the surface. He observed everything, though over-cautious, but avoided serious discussion. He was a man without affection.

Karl Rothschild lived in Naples, and Mayer Amschel lived in Frankfurt, so it does not take much to conclude, that "Sidonia" was Lionel Rothschild, and thus concluding, we obtain from Coningsby, one of the best and most accurate detailed accounts of the Rothschilds and their rise to power possibly ever written.

The Rothschild Dynasty Note of Explanation

Please note that sources and references are mentioned in the text. I felt that this would make reference easy and obviate having to search through a separate list of notes, with a loss of continuity.

In this I have followed the method and style of several authors of the Victorian era who found it the best way to continue with the narrative without the necessity of having to stop and consult and find the particular source. I hope that you too, will find this method easy to follow rather, than the traditional method.

One other important point: I want it to be understood that this work should not and cannot be construed as "anti-Jewish" or "anti-Semitic." It is neither. Rather it is a factual account of a family that happened to be Jews, and who themselves, made no secret of it. To write otherwise, would be like attempting to write an account of the Zulu King Chaka, with out saying that Chaka was a black African king.

HOW A RAG AND BONE MERCHANT BECAME ONE OF THE RICHEST MEN IN THE WORLD

There is probably no name in international banking as well known as the Rothschild name, and yet so little of the true history of this family is known. There are many legends, myths and fanciful tales, but not much of the true character of this family, that changed the course of history who bought and sold statesman, kings, dukes and bishops, as if they were mere commodities, to be cast aside like worn out shoes and old clothes when they had served their purposes. The family is said to have caused revolutions, wars and upheavals that altered the face of Europe, the Far East and the United States, forever. The purpose of this book is to explore the Rothschild history and to come to grips with what their plan was for the world. The Rothschilds are Jews, a fact they never sought to conceal or downplay.

Throughout history, from India to Babylon to Palestine in ancient times, money matters have always been principally the trade of the Jews. In the money markets of Frankfurt, London, New York and Hong Kong, the Jewish financier predominated. By 1917 they were strung out across the world. On the stock exchanges of London, Paris and New York, Jewish brokers are the back bone of the business. The movement of precious metals, diamonds and currency throughout the world has always been under Jewish control. We recite these facts as facts in themselves and not to in any way infer anything derogatory. The Jews themselves admit to this. When preparations were being made by Britain to wage war against Germany in 1910, the international Jewish financiers were stationed in key locations, -- and at the head of international financing around the world stood the Rothschilds and their associated banking houses. In France it was Rothschild, Fould, Camondo, Pereira and Bischoffheim; in Germany, Rothschild, Warschauer, Mendelssohn, Bleichroder; in England, Sassoon, Stern, Rothschild and Montague; ~ in the Far East it was Sassoon; in Russia it was Gunzburg; in the United States it was J.P. Morgan, Kuhn Loeb and Co., Seligman and Co., Speyer and Co., Warburg and Lazard Freres.

Above all, dwarfing and overshadowing them was the House of Rothschild. Critics of the Rothschilds say that Morgan and Kuhn Loeb were merely fronts for the Rothschilds, and that all of the famous banking houses were affiliated with the Rothschild banks.

These banking houses weathered many storms due to their cautious approach to speculation and their close brotherhood and kinship to the Rothschilds and each other. The founder of the House of Rothschild was Mayer Anselm Bauer (Rothschild), the son of Anselm Moses Bauer, a merchant of Frankfurt. The father sold new and used goods and old coins, and did pawn broking under the sign of a red shield, from which the name Rothschild, German language for red shield, evolved. Rothschild became their adopted and official family name. The business was located on Judenstrasse, quite literally "Jew Street" in a ghetto in Frankfurt, numbering about 550 families.

Mayer Amschel (Rothschild) was born in 1743. The family had been in Frankfurt for generations, indeed there is a record in the British Museum that they dated back to the beginning of the 16th century. By the 18th century they were quite a large group.

I identified twenty antecedents of Mayer Amschel, the eldest of three sons whose parents were in the business of dealing in money, both buying and selling, in which he assisted from the age of ten. The small business was really a type of foreign money-exchange since at that time Germany consisted of 350 principalities, each with its own currency. Apparently they were forbidden to follow the professions open to all non-Jews in Frankfurt. There is no doubt that Jews were subject to all sorts of restrictions, some of which were rather unjust. The family home was a mock-Gothic wooden hut where Mayer Amschel lived with his mother and father and three brothers until 1775, when a massive epidemic of smallpox swept Europe, taking the lives of both of Mayer's parents. Mayer's relatives enrolled him in rabbinical school at Furth. But he did not have the patience or the liking for the long years of study needed to qualify, and after three years at Furth, at the age of thirteen, Mayer Amschel struck out on his own.

One can only admire the courage it must have taken for one so young to take such a step. Proceeding to Hanover, the young man was given a small, insignificant "charity" job at the House of Oppenheimer's bank, where within six months of his arrival he was made an apprentice. It did not take him long to conclude that to succeed at banking, one needed the protection of one of the leading princes. After six years he left Hanover and went back to Frankfurt where he married Gudule Schnapper in 1770.

Mayer and Gudule (Gutta) occupied the first floor above a shop from where Mayer bought and sold new and used goods, as his father had done before him. Many items, such as pictures and furniture, were displayed on the sidewalk. This was the home, the starting place of the "barons of banking," who were to control the world's finances and great leaders, statesmen and kings. Gudule bore Mayer five sons. Discussions with his five sons were always around a "dirty wooden table," a description given by Spiridovich in Unrevealed in History, where the family gathered for meals and talks.

The distribution of the financial world among the sons was one of the favorite topics of discussion. Their father talked about the four grandsons of Charlemagne, how the Emperors of the Romans had ruled the world and his vision for his sons. His five daughters were never included in such talks. Charles the Great (Charlemagne) (771-814) was a typical German, over six feet tall and a superb athlete who spoke Greek and Latin. He was King of the Franks and became the Emperor of Rome from 800-814 BC. Yet in spite of his veneration of Charlemagne, Mayer Amschel swore a violent hatred for all things of "Roma," which in later years he described as "the great foe of Bolshevism," according to Sir Alfred Mond in World Battle of the Jews. Samuel Gompers, writing in The Chicago Tribune of May 1, 1922 said of Bolshevism, in reference to Mayer Amschel:

> Nothing would constitute a more needless and base betrayal of civilization than the recognition of the Bolshevik tyranny. The policy of the German and Anglo-American bankers is the most dangerous element in the whole chain of Bolshevik efforts. The Bolsheviks funds amounted to millions of dollars.

The hatred displayed by Mayer might have sprung from the fact, that since 1762, Frankfurt on the Main had been the city of the election and coronations of the Holy Roman Emperors, something Mayer Amschel detested because he knew that the Catholic Church was an implacable enemy of the Bolsheviks. Some historians say that his hatred was directed to Russia, because it was the largest Christian nation in Europe and that under several of its rulers, Jews had endured many hardships and persecution.

Around the table, Mayer would warn his sons to keep their wealth in the family and never marry outside of it. He explained the Hebrew law of "neshek" meaning literally, "a bite," the word for interest and "how it was to be applied outside of, and not to, the Hebrews." Secrecy was to be paramount; no one outside of the family was ever to know how much money they had. According to author John Reeves who in his book, The Rothschilds: Financial Rulers of Nations, quotes MacGregor, author of The Kahbalaha Unmasked:

> The five sons started in business in five European capitals, but were acting in concert with each other. The business of the Rothschilds since 1812 has been so immense, and the bonds linking the different members of the family together interwoven, that to unravel them appears to be well nigh hopeless. The success achieved by the founder was due to the disturbed state of the world. Mayer Amschel was a child of fortune equally with Napoleon.

Mayer Amschel had five sons and five daughters:

Anselem Mayer, born 1773 married Eva Hannau

Salomon Mayer, born 1774 married Caroline Stern

Karl, born 1788 married Adelaide Herz

Jacob (James), born 1792 married niece Betty, daughter of his brother Salomon, Anselem his oldest son, received the signal honor of becoming a member of the Royal Prussian Privy Council of Commerce, Bavarian Consul and Court banker.

It may not seem like anything of great moment today, where there is no class distinction, but the rigid cast system in operation at the time made it impossible for a "commoner" to hold such positions, always reserved for the titled classes, and Jews were expressly excluded from such high office. Salomon Mayer was somehow able to force his way into the inner and most intimate circle of Prince Mettemich, the virtual ruler of Austria.

The five daughters got no shares in the business nor did they have any say in the running of it, in fact, being totally excluded. Mostly, they married under "arranged marriages." According to author John Reeves:

> The movements of the Rothschilds are carefully watched and are as important to the public as those of any Ministers. One enthusiastic enquirer was informed that it was impossible to name all the members of the family as a pedigree did not exist. (The Rothschild Financial Rulers)

At his deathbed, Mayer Amschel read from the Talmud and then compelled his children to swear a solemn oath that they would always stick together and never undertake to do anything separately, this according to Major General Count Cherep-Spiridovich, The Unrevealed in History and papers in the British Museum in London.

MAYER AMSCHEL AND FIVE SONS MEET SINGULAR GOOD FORTUNE

While at the Oppenheimer Bank, Amschel had the singular good fortune to meet Lieutenant General Baron von Estorff, an aristocrat closest to the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassell, an extremely important family with an ancestry dating back hundreds of years.

In The Rothschild Money Trust by Armstrong, it is stated that the Landgrave was William IX: "He became a money lender and agent for William IX, Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel." The much decorated historian, soldier and writer, Count Cherep-Spiridovich describes it merely as "Amschel became the manager for the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel."

It is said that Mayer did some service for von Estorff at the expense of Oppenheim bank, the exact details of which are not known to this day.

According to my research in the British Museum, the approach was first made through the financial adviser to Wilhelm, one Karl Budurus: "Rothschild, similar in their ambitions, formidably tenacious, patient and secret, had a meeting of the minds and decided to enter into an arrangement of mutual assistances."

The details of the scheme they worked out have never been revealed. However, the Jewish Encyclopedia of 1905 and 1909 Vo. X, page 499 throws some light on it:

> In a latter connection he (Amschel) became an agent for William IX, Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, who, on his father's death inherited the largest private fortune in Europe (estimated at $40,000,000) derived mainly from the hire of troops to the British Government for putting down the revolution in the United States.. .

After the battle in June 1806 the Landgrave fled to Denmark, leaving 600,000 pounds (about $3,000,000) with Mayer Rothschild for safekeeping. According to legend, this money was hidden away in wine casks, and escaped the search of Napoleon's soldiers when they entered Frankfurt, was restored intact to the electorate. The facts are less romantic and more business-like.

The papers I examined show that the "Elector," as he became known was none too scrupulous himself as to the origin of money that flowed into his coffers. Hessian mercenaries were his stock-in-trade, hired to those who had the most money to pay for them.

The Hessians had developed their contract with the ruler, which made it clear that the Prince would receive a large down payment at the start of military operations for which they had been hired. Then, there was to be a supplementary payment to the soldiers, some extras for wounded and three times the amount if killed in battle. This was to go to the mercenaries or their dependants and not to the Prince. Moreover, the agreement-for-hire did not expire when peace was declared, but only one full year after the peace and only when the mercenaries had returned home.

The British Government was the biggest customer, "renting" about 15,000-17,000 Hessians each year. Although there is no direct proof that Amschel and Budurus were the authors of the following scheme, it seems very likely that they were. Instead of the lump sum and payments being sent to Kassel, the home of the Prince, the money was retained in England where it was invested. The interest thereon (negotiated by Amschel) was paid to the Landgrave in drafts. That portion of the money actually transferred to Kassel was then used to provide high interest loans to other needy princes. This resulted in a tremendous movement of funds in and out of Kassel with substantial income for the Landgrave, who had taken up with the Von Turn and Taxis family who held the postal monopoly for all of Europe. The mercenaries, who had done the most to earn the money, got nothing, but the bare promised amounts, as they were not privy to the "private" side-agreement done behind their backs.

The Princes of Von Thurn and Taxis (members of the Committee of 300) were happy to have a share in the booty in exchange for acting as intelligence agents for the Landgrave, and later for the Rothschilds. They did this by opening important mail as directed, reading the contents and advising the Landgrave what they had seen, and on his orders, either expediting or delaying delivery of the letters to the benefit of the Landgrave and Mayer Amschel — and to the detriment of their debtors.

These facts are indeed far from the romantic notions of how Amschel got his start, and more fully disclosed than anything that has appeared in print before. Critics say that the facts are far from those suggested in the Encyclopedia. Cherep-Spiridovich says bluntly, that the money was not returned to the Landgrave and was in fact stolen by Amschel. In The Rothschild Money Trust, author Armstrong states:

> The facts are entirely 'less romantic.' Mayer Amschel Rothschild embezzled the money. This money was tainted from its origin. It was paid by the British Government to the Landgrave for the service of his > soldiers; used to suppress the American Revolution, and the soldiers were morally entitled to it. It was first embezzled by William of Hesse and then by Mayer Amschel. This twice-stolen money is the foundation of the huge Rothschild fortune. It has ever since been true to its origin. There is not an honestly acquired dollar in the hundreds of billions now possessed by the Rothschild family. Instead of putting the money in wine casks, Mayer Amschel Rothschild sent the entire sum to his son Nathan in London, and where he established the London branch of the family.

This was most probably the money used by Nathan to open N.M. Rothschild and Sons, the family banking house. Armstrong continued:

> For his extra-curricular services, Amschel was appointed as Imperial Agent of the Crown, a title that allowed him to travel freely without hindrances. His 'partnership' with the Princes of Von Thurn and Taxis brought valuable 'intelligence' information giving an edge on all moneylenders in competition with him. Nathan Rothschild invested it in 800,000,000 of gold (meaning worth that much and not by weight) from the East India Company, knowing that it would be needed for Wellington's peninsula campaign.

He made no less than four profits:

> 1. On the sale of Wellington's paper which he bought for 50 cents on the dollar and collected at par.
> 2. On the sale of gold to Wellington.

3. On its re-purchase.

4. On forwarding it to Portugal.

This was the beginning of the great fortune. How a still relatively obscure bank clerk was able to cross the gulf of social barriers that separated their classes is a classic in its own right. According to documents in the British Museum:

> . . . The prince was very greedy and stingy, and did not care much concerning the means through which his fortune, left to him by his father, Wilhelm VIII (the brother of the King of Sweden) was increased. Frederic, hearing from von Estorff about the ability and unscrupulousness of Amschel, became interested in procuring a 'man of straw' (a front man) for his doubtful procurements.

Amschel concealed his relationship with Frederic II behind a modest facade, but there is no doubt that he used his influence with the old Landgrave to gain millions as well as political advancement. He became the agent for the Landgrave of Hesse and the first government loan he arranged was in 1802, when the Danish government borrowed ten million thalers. Although it was not known at the time, the money came from the vast fortune of the Landgrave family.

To curry favor, Amschel said he would give his share of the profits to Frederic II, but never did so. From this deal, the destiny of the Rothschilds was set to become one of the most astonishing success stories in the history of financing and loans.

Frederick II was succeeded by this son, Wilhelm IX, who became Elector Wilhelm I in 1785. At this time Amschel had been something of a "Minister of Finance" to the deceased Frederick II and knew every one of the family secrets.

The two hit it of at once. Both were born in 1743. Amschel kept his true wealth from Elector Wilhelm I, always wearing the same clothes and pretending to be poor. From the time he became the manager of the fortune of Elector Wilhelm I, Amschel's fortune increased as his employer's decreased. In 1794 there occurred an event that caused Elector Wilhelm I to flee. It happened when the French General Hoche captured Coblenz. Fearing that his corrupt practices would be revealed (actually the schemes of Amschel the "front man") by the occupation, Elector Wilhelm I fled, having signed over control to Amschel.

This is the true account of how the Rothschilds got their money. It was not by pawn brokering, smart speculation or any other of the widely accepted fairy tales that sound so romantic. The genius of the sons can be traced to the fortune of the Landgrave of Hesse and not to the fanciful "genius" of the five brothers! It was a case of "theft by conversion," plain and simple. Mayer died at Frankfurt on December 12, 1812, leaving his legacy to five sons and a lesser amount for his five daughters.

THE ROTHSCHILDS GAIN ENTRY INTO EUROPE'S HIGH SOCIETY

The manner in which Mayer left the bulk of his money to his five sons and much less to his daughters, was the hallmark of how he and his forbears regarded women as the weak link in the chain. Females were to be used for arranged marriages inside the family, for business. In other words, marriages were to be arranged with an eye to business advantages.

There was no thought of "equality" of male and female in Mayer's mind. The modern-day, Socialist-led drive for equal rights for women was something that arrived more than one hundred years later, and was largely confined to equal rights for non-Jewish women. Amschel parceled out the nations of Europe like loaves of bread, allocating his sons Germany, Austria, Britain, Italy and France as "their territories."

Later he sent one of his family relatives, a man by the name of Schoeneberg to the United States under the assumed name August Belmont. He became the hidden hand that secretly pushed through legislation to enable the Federal Reserve to become law.

The interests of the Rothschild sons became international finance and banking and they established branch offices in the major capitals of Europe, Paris, Naples, Vienna and London, each under close supervision of one of the five sons, while "Belmont" became heavily engaged in banking and Democrat Party politics in America. In a relatively short period of time the Rothschilds were able to bring all of Europe into their orbit and under their influence. They bought officials and made friends with the monarchs and princes of Europe, all the while ensuring that no outsiders came into the family. When one of the daughters began a "love relationship," it was ruthlessly crushed. She was told that the brothers regarded marriage as a business affair and that they would arrange marriages for partnerships.

It took only a generation of planning, intriguing and manipulation of public opinion to make the Rothschilds the greatest force and influence, not in only the affairs of Europe, but also in the Far East and later the United States. Intermarriages welded the family into a cohesive, solid front. By 1815, Austria led the way by granting the five brothers hereditary titles, "baron" with land ownership to go with it. Their meteoric rise to fame, fortune and power was astonishing to behold. They never made any decision or moves without close consultation with their "communication agent" and "inside information source," the Von Thurn and Taxis.

If positions of political power could not be realized, they were bought. Mayer Amschel in charge of Frankfurt, for instance, bought a seat on the Prussian Privy Council of Commerce. This was a position that in the past was open only to royalty, and his success shook the Prussian aristocracy, causing much alarm and consternation.

Following the restoration of the Bourbons (in which the Rothschilds played no small part), the youngest of the brothers, James (Jacob) was given a charter to establish a branch of the Rothschild bank in Paris.

Quick to realize the importance of railroads, James financed many of the new lines and made a huge fortune. He lent the Bourbons, always profligate spenders, millions of francs. Nathan was the genius of the five brothers. Third in line he was the one the others turned to for guidance. When the brothers decided to establish themselves in England, they sent Nathan to settle in Manchester, a grimy northern industrial town, rather than in London. The reason was that the Rothschilds had important commercial plans for the cloth trade there, which they intended to exploit to the full before moving their operation to London. Most of the fabric needed to make uniforms for the British Army and Navy originally came from Germany. Thanks to the "postal intelligence" provided by the Von Thurn and Taxis mail monopoly, the Rothschilds learned that war with Napoleon was imminent. Nathan was quickly dispatched to Germany to buy up all stocks of such cloth.

When the Manchester manufactures were given contracts by the British Government to make uniforms for the army and navy, they sent their agents to Germany to secure the necessary fabric stocks, as they had always done, only to learn that all production had already been sold to Nathan Rothschild, from whom they were now obliged to buy.

When the news reached Manchester, there followed violent uproar. At one stage Nathan feared for his safety. After five years in Manchester, in 1805 Nathan moved to London. Actually, "fled" would be a better description as indeed he was forced to do when public wrath against his dealings began to mount.

One of the principle reasons for Nathan's great success was that he realized that fast communication was the key to beating out competitors. He employed the fastest riders, ships and even carrier pigeons to communicate. He avidly sought "inside information," which he kept from his competitors and from governments. He had his secret agents in all of the capital cities of Europe.

This loyal group never hesitated to ride through the night, winter and summer. They kept the best breed of carrier pigeons and sailed on the fastest packet boats, sometimes buying all passages between France and England to block competitors.

Nathan's greatest principle of expertise was of buying government bonds that were defaulted, or about to be defaulted, at huge discounts. After a suitable time, great pressure was exerted on the governments concerned to redeem the bonds at face value, netting Nathan incredible profits. In this way he became the financial agent for more than half the governments of Europe. Some very notable people in the past declared that "civilization came to an end in 1790," among them H.G. Wells, the famous British establishment writer who said in the New York American, (July 27, 1924) that the mental and moral progress of the human race ended with the 18th century.

Wells was well thought of by the Rothschilds, who liked his idea of the League of Nations, what Wells called "a world state," which he said was inevitable. The Erlangers donated $3,000 to this purpose, as did N.M. Rothschild.

George Bernard Shaw, the Irish playwright, told Hillaire Belloc: "Something enormous happened in 1790." This was reported in the New York Times:

> There is reason to believe that they were referring to the great revolutionary movements that began between the middle and the end of the 18th century when in 1779 Amschel Rothschild became the master of the richest man on Earth, the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel.

THE WALLS OFJERICO [FRANKFURT] COME TUMBLING DOWN

Earlier I referred to the fact that only five hundred Jewish families were allowed to live in Frankfurt Germany. The manner in which Mayer Amschel handled the problem was to become his trademark. On the birth of Napoleon's son, Grand Duke Dalberg of Frankfurt wanted to go to Paris and pay his respects, but none of the banks would lend him the money to make the trip.

Old Amschel however, saw the possibilities of putting Dalberg in his debt, and lent him eighty thousand gulden at five percent. No pressure was put on the Grand Duke to repay the loan as long as the interest was paid, but at the same time, there was no favor asked by the Rothschilds that the Grand Duke could or did refuse.

Amschel and his family were engaged in extensive smuggling operations in defiance of the French boycott of England out of which the Rothschilds made a great deal of money. Suspicion fell on Amschel, and a raid was set for May 1809.

Dalberg, who never missed a chance to borrow money from Amschel at lenient rates, tipped him off about the pending raid through his executive Commissioner of Police, von Eitzlein. Frantic activity placed contraband and incriminating documents with reliable friends, so that when Inspector Savagner and his men arrived they found old Mayer Amschel in bed, and a search failed to turn up anything incriminating. Although Napoleon's Trade Boycott inspectors had come up empty-handed, Amschel was nevertheless still fined 20,000 francs, a mere pittance, but he escaped going to prison, which would have happened had the contraband been discovered by the inspectors.

When the fuss had died down, Amschel tackled the problem of restrictions on the number of Jewish families allowed to reside in Frankfurt. He approached Dalberg, who still owed him the principle sum of the loan.

By law, each Jewish family had to pay an annual fee of 22,000 gulden to remain in the city. Amschel and one of his partners, a certain Gumprecht, persuaded the Grand Duke to accept one lump sum that would give the Jews citizenship rights in Frankfurt, the very thing so strongly opposed by the Christian majority. More than that, Amschel demanded not only equal citizenship, but in addition, the Jews would be allowed to establish their own ruling bodies and councils.

The greedy Dalberg demanded that the lump sum proposed by Amschel be twenty times the total annual fee. Amschel and his friends met the demand with 294,000 gulden in cash and the balance in bearer debentures.

In a letter to the Grand Duke confirming the arrangement and terms, Amschel showed that when humble obsequious behavior was necessary he was a master of the art:

> If I could be the messenger of the good news, as soon as it has been signed by His Royal Highness our most excellent Lord and Great Duke, in favor, and that I can inform my nation of their great joy, you will graciously inform me of it through the post, confess I abuse your goodness and grace, but I do not doubt that your Highness and your honored family have to await great heavenly rewards and will receive much happiness and blessing because in truth our whole > Jewry, if they have the happiness to obtain equal rights will gladly pay with great pleasures all dues the citizens have to pay.

Note how Amschel boldly asserted that the Jews of Frankfurt were a separate nation. The agreement was some time in getting passed, but when it did, Amschel immediately announced the establishment of the Governing Body of the Israelite Religions Community with von Eitzlein (a Jew) the first president, perhaps rewarded for tipping Amschel to the planned raid for contraband in May 1809. The Senate and the Christians were furious and immediately attacked the agreement as giving special privileges to the Jews.

Rumors flew thick and fast that Dalberg had received a substantial payment, which he had not made public. Feeling against Dalberg and the Jews reached fever pitch. Accusations of bribery for exchange for equal rights filled the air. With the fall of Napoleon, Dalberg was deposed and replaced by Baron von Hugel of the Hessians.

Amschel was not afraid of Austria or Prussia, he had their governments in the palm of his hand, but he feared that when the Congress of Vienna decided the status of Frankfurt in 1814, the Dalberg agreement would not be honored. He sent Jacob Baruch and a certain Gompers as his representatives, but the Vienna police had them under surveillance as revolutionaries and ordered them to be expelled.

However, Prince Metternich, who had been created by Nathan Rothschild, just as Adam Weishaupt, Napoleon, Disraeli and Bismarck were all mere puppet-creations (or "valets") of the Rothschilds, cancelled the order. Bribery and corruption were quite openly practiced.

Humbold was offered three beautiful emerald rings worth a fortune, plus four thousand ducats, which he refused. Metternich's secretary, Frederick von Gentz however accepted the bribes offered, and was forever thereafter a most valuable conduit to the powerful Austrian nobility and political leaders for the Rothschilds.

When news of Napoleon having landed on French soil from his exile in St. Helena reached the Congress, the "Jewish question," had to be shelved. The Congress of Vienna was the first world conference to be dominated by the international bankers, and the Rothschilds contributed very heavily to the control the banker's exercised over the decisions that were taken.

THE ROTHSCHILDS PLUNDER THE FIVE GREAT POWERS

Count Buol-Schauenstein, Austria's representative, was outraged by the Dalberg-Rothschild deal with Frankfurt's Jews:

> Trade is still the only means of livelihood the Jews adopt. This nation, which never amalgamates with any other, but always hangs together to pursue its own ends will soon overshadow Christian firms; and with their terribly rapid increase in population they will soon spread over the whole city, so that a Jewish trading city will gradually arise beside our venerable cathedral.

I spent considerable time researching documents in the British Museum, which in any way referred to the family in order to qualify to write about the rise of the Rothschild dynasty, much of what came from that source. Baron James became a great personality. Kings and ministers were obliged to reckon with him and he justified this by financing a loan of 520 million francs to the Government of the Restoration, which needed the money after the great wars of the Revolution and of the Empire. In his Juifs de l'Epoque Toussenei wrote:

> One can take the fatal year 1815 as the era of new power; though prior to this date the coalition of > bankers who bought great upset the campaign of Moscow and Waterloo — these are to remembered for the interference of Jews in our (French) national affairs. . . In 1815 France was condemned to pay 1,500 million francs in war indemnity became the prey of international financiers of Frankfurt, London and Vienna who became as one to exploit her calamity. James Rothschild paid for each government bond of 100 francs only 50 francs and received five francs as interest, which made ten percent on the money, loaned and the following year the principle began to return twofold. James became the lender of Kings. This added to his speculation on the Exchange where he was able to influence the rise and fall of stocks swelled the baron's earnings into millions.

> Between 1815 and 1830, the Rothschilds were simply plundering the five great powers; England, Russia, France, Austria and Prussia. Thus Prussia contracted a 5% loan of 5,000,000 pounds sterling, but received for its government bonds only 3,500,000 or 70%, making the actual interest rate over 7%. But the chief point of it was that the bonds had to be redeemed in a few years at 100%. The Rothschilds made a profit of 1,500,000 pounds sterling, plus the interest. In 1823 James took up the whole of the French loan.

According to Professor Werner Sombart in his work The Jews and Modern Capitalism: The period of 1820 onwards became the age of the Rothschilds, so that by the middle of the century it was common dictum, there is only one power in Europe, and that is the Rothschilds. As previously explained, the work of fiction, Coningsby, by Disraeli was a thinly disguised account of the life of Nathan Rothschild II, and extremely revealing:

> His father [Nathan Rothschild] had established a brother in most of the principal capitals. Here he was lord and master of the money markets of the world, and, of course, virtually lord and master of everything else. He literally held the revenues of Southern Italy in pawn [through Karl Rothschild in Naples] and monarchs and ministers of all countries courted his advice and were guided by his suggestions. Between Paris and Naples, Sidonia [Lionel] passed two years. Sidonia has no heart; he is a man without affections.

This was the work dictated to Disraeli by Nathan Rothschild and put out as fiction, but there is no history of the Rothschilds more accurate than this. Who was Disraeli?

In La Vielle France N-216, Bismarck said that Disraeli was a mere tool of the Rothschilds and that it was Disraeli and the Rothschilds who formulated the plan to dismember the United States through a massive Civil War. Disraeli was only one of their creations whom they brought from obscurity to fame. His grandfather, Benjamin D'Israeli, arrived in England in 1748. His son, Isaac D'Israeli was born in 1766 and soon became a Bolshevik. One of his works was called Against Commerce.

Of his father Disraeli said: He lived with learned men. The learned men were Nathan Rothschild and his circle. Incidentally, "El-Israeli" (D'israeli?) is an Arabic name of Turkish origin used in the Middle East to denote people of Jewish descent. It is likely that his father's family came from Turkey to Italy and most likely, settled in Ancona or Cento. Isaac's field was writing and like many a researcher before him, he frequented the British Museum. He was also an importer of straw hats, marble and alum, but Isaac longed to write.

In 1788 his father sent him to study in France, Italy and Germany. He returned to England in 1789 and wrote The Curiosities of Literature, which was published by the Socialist, John Murray. A literary success, it ran to thirteen editions. Benjamin probably inherited his writing skills from his father. Born in 1804 into a family of moderate means, Benjamin was circumcised on the eighth day according to the Jewish custom, and grew up in the Jewish faith. Although proud of it, we are led to believe that he knew at an early age that as far as public office, his "Jewishness" would be a drawback because in England at that time, Jews were barred by religion from becoming members of any political party.

But on the orders of Nathan Rothschild, at the age of thirteen Benjamin was baptized on July 31, 1817 as a Christian so that he might penetrate English society and the political establishment, which at the time was closed to Jews by the Test Acts. His orders from Nathan Rothschild were to break down every barrier against the Jews.

At one time he told Lord Melbourne, the Home Secretary: "I am going to be the Prime Minister of England," which Melbourne thought fanciful and impossible. Of course Melbourne did not know at that time about Disraeli's "Rothschild" connection. But first, the necessary financing had to come from somewhere. At twenty-two he began "speculating" on the Stock Market, a highly unlikely occupation for a man who was always without any money.

A certain Thomas Jones — more than likely an assumed name - came up with two thousand pounds to start with, increasing to nine thousand pounds — a huge sum of money at the time to invest in a penniless writer of no experience! It does not take much imagination to come to the conclusion that "Thomas Jones" was Nathan Rothschild.

As was the case with the biographers of Napoleon I, Bismarck, Mettemich, Marshal Soult (who betrayed Napoleon at Waterloo), Karl Marx, Bombelles, Lassalle, Hertz, Kerensky and Trotsky praise for Disraeli, a former non-entity, was lavish. J.G. Lockhart, Sir Walter Scott's son-in-law, was beside himself when in 1825 he wrote:

> I may frankly say that I never met a young man with greater promise. He is a scholar, a hard student, a deep thinker, a great energy, equal perseverance, an indefatigable application, and a complete man of business. His knowledge of human nature and the practical tendency of all of his ideas, have often surprised me in a young man who has hardly passed his twentieth year.

Another bedazzled friend wrote:

> He had no rank, no important friends, no wealth, but he was an able scholar who dazzled the establishment with his audacity of conception, brilliant triumphs. He had that supreme confidence in himself, which amounts to virtual genius. He never showed discouragement. Of course! Backed by Nathan Rothschild he had the world at his feet. If only history could be rewritten!

> The English aristocracy was not destroyed by the "French" Revolution and they remained implacably opposed to the Jews until Disraeli on behalf of the Rothschilds, defeated them. Disraeli was the Trojan Horse, slipped into the very heart of English society and its political establishment.
> (Count Cherep-Spiridovich and British Museum papers)

In December 1922, the British Guardian published an article by Dr. John Clarke, which is worth quoting:

> And how this potent firm [the Rothschilds] governs the Government of France and England alike may be gathered from two recent incidents. The French Secretary of the Legation, M. Thierry at the Embassy > of London some months ago married a Jewess of the Rothschild clan. And now the hidden mentors of Bonar Law's [the British Prime Minister who promised to follow the policies of Disraeli] new 'Conservative' Government induced him to send as Ambassador to Paris a non-diplomatic 'Liberal,' the Marquise of Crewe, whose wife is the daughter of Hannah Rothschild, Countess of Roseberry. Here we have the actual basis of the Franco-British Entente — 'R.F.' meaning Rothschild Freres, the Rothschild brothers, covers the British Empire, the French Republic and most of the other republics and kingdoms between Moscow, Angora and Washington.

Who opened the way for such astonishing changes in the English political scene? It was Disraeli, who "controlled" Prime Minister Bonar Law. In the Life of Disraeli by Buckle, the author gives no hint of who made Disraeli: "No career in English history is more marvelous than that of Disraeli, and none has hitherto been enshrouded in greater mystery."

Actually, there was no "mystery" at all. But for Nathan and his son Lionel Rothschild, Disraeli would have never existed outside of his small, narrow family circle. From 1832 to 1837 Disraeli was in deep trouble over unpaid debts. In April of 1835, he was forced to spend a great deal of his time indoors to "prevent being nabbed by the creditors," as he wrote in a letter to Lady Henrietta Sykes, his mistress.

In August 1835, Disraeli went to Bradenham, there to escape his creditors. One of them was a certain Austen who was threatening to have him arrested and sent to a debtor's prison. At Bradenham, he tried to write his novel Henrietta Temple. At this period, his debts were overshadowing his writing. In July, another of his creditors, a Thomas Mash who had been pressing for payment, now grew strident and Disraeli walked in fear (when he did venture outside) of imminent arrest.

Perpetually in deep financial trouble, deeply in debt at the age of twenty and unsuccessful in getting a seat in the House of Commons, which he had tried from 1832 to 1837 to accomplish, the Rothschilds, who had been watching him since the age of ten, made him their "valet."

In writing to his sister Sarah in 1849, Benjamin admitted as much. The year was the worst financial period in his life. He was being harried by his creditors and had to appear before an Assize Court when as he said in his letter to Sarah "Mayer Rothschild unintentionally let the cat out of the bag."

Disraeli did not "raise England to the highest position" as claimed by Buckle. Instead, what he did was to prepare England for a series of disastrous wars. He frightened generations of Englishmen with his lies about a "great Russia" being a danger and a threat for Great Britain. Prime Minister Gladstone accused Disraeli of lying. Was he sincere about the alleged Russian "danger?"

Lord Gladstone said there were only two things he was "in earnest about, his wife and his race." Gladstone evidently didn't know that Benjamin was "in earnest" about the Rothschilds of whom he seldom talked, perhaps because of the fact that nobody, no matter what their rank, could cross the Rothschilds with impunity. Benjamin Disraeli was the man of the hour for the Rothschilds; Lionel, Mayer, Anthony and their families, including the Montefiores. In a letter to his sister Sarah, he wrote, that after his honeymoon, there had been a party at the home of Mrs. Montefiore and there was "not a Christian name there."

No doubt Benjamin performed yeoman service for his mentors, providing them with "intelligence" from his high office. It is known that it was one such "spy job" that allowed the Rothschilds to float the lucrative Suez Canal loan.

Described as a "coup" engineered by Disraeli, the facts are not quite that simple. Through his secret "intelligence" service, Disraeli learned that the Khedive of Egypt, Ishmail Pasha wanted to sell his shares in Compagnie Universelle de Suez.

Thanks to the "intelligence" provided by the Von Thurn and Taxis control of mail, on November 15, 1875, Disraeli was advised that the Khedive was negotiating with two French banks for the sale of the stock. Disraeli immediately rushed to Baron Lionel de Rothschild who agreed to float a loan for the British Government for this purpose. The secret plan was hatched by Lionel and Disraeli and was presented to the British Cabinet for acceptance on November 24th. The skill of Lionel in moving so fast was not mentioned, and so, in the eyes of the public, it remained a "Disraeli coup."

This account taken from the collected works of Major-General Count Cherep-Spiridovich goes a long way to dispelling the myths and legends that sprang up around the life and times of Nathan Rothschild, his extended blood relatives and their families, who lived in London, and the legendary DTsraeli.

BENJAMIN DISRAELI:

MASTERSPY FOR THE ROTHSCHILDS

It was a two-way street; with the Rothschilds always ready to bail Benjamin out of financial trouble, particularly in 1835, 1849, 1857 and 1862 when his debts amounted to what today would have been about $300,000 without means of payment. With his enemy, the Duke of Portland hounding him, he was "loaned the money" by a front man for Baron de Rothschild, one Philip Rose, who just happened to be staying at the same resort and spa hotel in Torquay at the same time as the Baron Rothschild. We are led to believe, that Rose persuaded Rothschild to loan the money Disraeli needed. Situated on the East Coast of England, Torquay was a fashionable resort town, boasting fine hotels and spas, often patronized by royalty and its hangers on. In a letter to his sister in December of that year, Benjamin wrote: He likes to give to his friends, not to lend, as he never takes interest from me. ..

I propose to look at the history of some of the world's best-known figures and to attempt to discover what role the Rothschilds played in their lives. I shall also examine revolutions and wars for the same reason. This is a daunting task, but it is one that is long overdue.

There have been so many lies in establishment history that our senses reel and I wonder how the truth can ever be made known to the ordinary people of this world, who have had to bear the brunt of those upheavals and have never known why they had to make such terrible sacrifices. Of course they have the propaganda explanations which satisfy most, but to the thinker, it has never been enough just talk about "patriotism," "love of country," "making the world safe for democracy" and fighting a "war to end all wars." I cannot go too far back in history, so let us begin with some of the most explosive upheavals to hit the world beginning with the 18th century and the personalities involved and then continue through to the 20th century. Limitations of space restrict to the more salient features of these events.

Although there is no hard evidence that the Rothschilds were involved in the cataclysmic "French" Revolution, historians tend to believe that they were behind it, acting through some of their agents. Their well-known hatred of Christianity and their desire to rid France of the Christian monarchy that it represented was the driving force behind the revolution. Opposition to Christianity was the factor believed to have motivated the Rothschilds to take indirect action to confront it at every opportunity.

One thing has emerged clearly from the past; every war fought since then has been for the advancement of International Socialism, of which the Rothschilds were avid supporters.

It is stated in papers in the British Museum that the Rothschilds were deeply involved in all revolts and wars since 1770. Indirectly, there is evidence that a branch of the Rothschilds was involved in financing the French Revolution through the bank of Moses Mocatta, uncle of Sir Moses Montefiore, whose brother, Abraham Montefiore, was married to Jeanette, the daughter of Mayer Amschel.

Mayer Amschel's son, Nathan, married the sister-in-law of Sir Moses Montefiore in 1806. Another daughter of Abraham Montefiore, Louisa, married Sir Anthony Rothschild in 1840.

History records the Jewish banking houses of Daniel Itzig, David Friedlander, Herz Geribeer and Benjamin and Abraham Goldsmidt, were the principal financiers of the "French" Revolution. It is interesting to note of the fifty-eight marriages contracted by the descendants of Mayer Amschel; twenty-nine and a half were between first cousins.

From 1848 onward, the pace quickened. Marx established that all wars must be for the advancement of International Socialism and Lenin and Trotsky enshrined it in the Communist doctrine. The First World War was fought to establish Bolshevism in Russia; to establish a "home for the Jews in Palestine," to destroy the Catholic Church and dismember Europe.

The first attempt at One World Government was launched in the disguise of the League of Nations. The Second World War was fought to destroy Japan and Germany, to establish the USSR as a Communist world power and extend the reach of Bolshevism over three quarters of the world. In the aftermath the United States was gulled into joining the next attempt at One World Government, the United Nations.

The Second World War changed the make-up of the United States, which was forced by its large contingent of International Socialists in positions of power to wean itself from its Constitution and its Republican form of government, and take on the role of the world's new Roman Empire. In short, the United States was turned from its Christian Republican form of government into an imperial power to conquer the world for and on behalf of International Socialism.

Behind these powerful changes stood the power, the money and the guiding hand of the Rothschilds. I shall attempt to make way through the major events that triggered these and other wars.

At the time the revolution burst upon France, the nobility and clergy were liberal toward French citizens. They had freedom to work and freedom of the press according to the book by Louis Diste, Freemasonry and Terror, which he says is proved in the archives prior to August 10, 1789 -- everything that the French people wanted in the way of liberty, freedom from excess taxes and freedom of religion had all been granted. If there is one thing I learned from history it is that there is an evil power that hates and fights to the death all forms of liberty, freedom and justice for the ordinary men of the world.

Each time such a system of government was established — these evil, secret rulers came along and overturned those benevolent governments by means of extreme violence and extreme cruelty. An example is Russia, where Tsar Alexander II had agreed to a new constitution.

His minister, Stolypin, had set the machinery in motion to grant lands to peasants and to nationalize banks; Nicholas had forbidden wars by his threat to "fire on the first who fires" and the Tsars were known as the most cultured, learned and gracious people in the world. Stolypin was cruelly murdered by Bolshevik revolutionaries to prevent the freedoms and reforms promised by the Tsar from being put into practice.

On August 4, 1789, eighty three unknown men, shouting "we are the 300," (thereby inadvertently exposing the hidden hand of their controllers) seized the City Hall in Paris.

The City Hall in France is typically the center of the civil administration. Robespierre and Danton did not immediately join the blood lust that followed. Stephane Lausanne, editor of La Matin of Paris said in an article on January 6, 1923:

> We French believe, that we know all about the forces of our planet. But we know nothing of the men whose names the masses could not even rightly spell. These men, more powerful than Caesar or even Napoleon, rule the fate of the Globe. These men rule the Chiefs of States, control and subdue the governing > personages, manipulate the exchanges, and initiate or suppress revolutions.

Of course he was writing about the 7 Rothschilds and the Committee of 300. What he did not know was that the Rothschilds created and controlled Napoleon as their instrument, and that they disposed of him once the Corsican genius woke up to this fact and went into a state of rebellion, the first manifestation of which came when he divorced his wife, the Creole, Josephina. Philip Francis, writing in the New York American under the title The Poison in America's Cup stated:

> Nominally we govern ourselves; actually we are governed by an oligarchy of the American branch of The International Banker's Federation, Plunderbund. The British Government is the camouflage behind which the money kings of the world have hitherto hid their economic warfare upon the masses of the people.

There is no direct proof that the Rothschilds were implicated in bringing on the French Revolution to happen, but there is ample evidence that Mirabeau was a member of the Les Amis Reunis as was his partner, Talleyrand. Mirabeau and Talleyrand discovered Napoleon, an obscure army officer. It is believed that many of the details of the French Revolution were discussed at the palace of the Landgrave of Hesse at Wilhelmsbad where it is known the leading Freemasons often gathered, which is the connection with Mayer Amschel, who headed "the deadly secret conclave beyond the masons and unknown to them" where the "French" Revolution was plotted.

There was also the connection with Adam Weishaupt, founder of the Illuminati through Wilhelmsbad. The Rothschild Money Trust, page 17 states:

> It is also admitted, as they allege, that the Illuminati played a major role in bringing on the bloody days of 1789, that it was founded and reputedly financed by Jews and that the great House of Rothschild was then just rising to financial heights. There is evidence that it was in fact financed by the 'great House of Rothschild' and that the French Revolution was in fact brought about by Jews. It was the final act that freed the Jews from their political and civil disabilities in France.

Unfortunately for history, The Rothschild Money Trust does not provide sources that could support the claim that the French Revolution was financed by the Rothschilds.

In 1782 after "acquiring" the huge fortune of the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, Amschel sent for Weishaupt who at the time was living the life of a beggar. Weishaupt was a man of low degree then struggling to find money to pay for an illegal abortion that had been performed on his sister-in-law. After his interview with Amschel, Weishaupt appeared in Paris with millions of francs at his disposal. He "imported" at least 30,000 criminals of the worst type and set them up in dens in Paris. He did the same thing in Germany. When all preparations were completed and the stage was set in 1789, all hell broke loose in Paris. According to author Pouget St. Andre, a chronicler of the revolution that burst upon France, Danton was a Jew as was Robespierre whose real name was Ruban. Pouget St. Andre, author of Les Auteurs de la Revolution Francaise, posed the question which to this day has never been answered:

> Why did the Convention shed so much blood? They say that the bloodshed was caused by the hatred of the people against the privileged class. How could the small percentage of executed aristocrats be explained by only 5% of all condemned? Why were the reforms bought for 4 billion francs and 50,000 heads when Louis XVI was already offering them free?"

Ernest Renan in his work, La Monarchic Constitutionally en France, wrote: The murder of King Louis XVI was an act of the most hideous materialism, the most shameful profession of ingratitude and baseness, of most roturiere villainy and forgetfulness of the past. Nothing, but bloodlust was served by those who put the king to death.

INSIDE ACCOUNTS OF THE HORRORS OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION

All those who had done the work of the secret societies and their henchmen trying to seize France were later executed, some horribly, and with the utmost cruelty, including Danton and Robespierre, one imagines, to silence them lest they were ever tempted to reveal whom the persons behind the revolution were. Murder, then as now, was the favorite weapon employed against those who sought to thwart the will of the "300."

Lord Acton, writing in his Essay on the French Revolution made this observation:

> The appalling thing is not the tumult but the design. Through all the fire and smoke we perceive the evidence of a calculating organization. The managers remain studiously concealed and masked, but there is no doubt about their presence from the first.

We shall come to the Russian-Japanese conflict in 1904, and who set it up, financed it and what their reasons were, but for now, in passing, we shall quote what the Editor of the New York Evening Post said on December 9, 1924:

> Somewhere behind the fog-bank of propaganda, sinister unseen hands are seeking to destroy the > peaceful relations between Russia and Japan. Japan does not want war. Certainly America does not want war. Why then, this perennial clamor that Japan is an enemy to be watched, distrusted, armed against, and finally fought?

Of all of the historical figures in the past three centuries, none is better known than Napoleon. Yet not much is ever said about how he rose from obscurity to fame.

Like most of those "adopted" by the Rothschilds, Napoleon was dirt poor when Talleyrand introduced him to the Rothschilds. He did not have the money to pay the laundry shop bill, and had only one shirt. His uniform had been supplied by Josephine Beauharnais, whom he later married after Count Paul de Barras had cast her off as his mistress.

In 1786 Napoleon was a sub-lieutenant, a poor very junior officer without any money, going from door-to-door seeking employment to supplement his pay. It was a time when the people of Europe had grown tired of "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity." Amschel was disappointed that Weishaupt had made little progress against the Church, particularly, the Catholic Church, and was seeking "new talent." The fire and ardor of the Corsican impressed Amschel enough to set him up with sufficient money to live decently. H. Fischer, in an article seen in the British Museum wrote: "In 1790 Napoleon succeeded by means, even then judged to be unscrupulous in securing his election as second in command of a whole battalion. "

How did he do it? Charles MacFarlane, in his work The Life of Napoleon (it used to be in the British Museum where I read it) threw some light on this "astonishing climb to power:"

> Augustine Robespierre, the younger brother of the terrible Dictator, had become acquainted with > Bonaparte at the taking of Toulon in 1798. The fact is indisputable that he contracted an intimacy, having all the appearances of warm friendship with Augustine, who was to be fully as pitiless as his elder brother.

According to the autobiography of Wolf Tone (Barry 1893) Robespierre was an Illuminist.

A nominal Christian, Napoleon soon sensed the hatred for Christianity that burned in the breast of Amschel, and so he resorted to simulation to please his new money supplier. He turned against the Catholic Church. The humiliation of the Pope was a very pleasing prospect to Amschel, and money began to flow into Napoleon's pockets in ever-increasing amounts.

Thus is his "stunning rise to power," his "astonishing successes" explained! As we say in modern parlance, the writers and biographers of Napoleon failed to follow the money trail.

The failure of Weishaupt to destroy the Catholic Church, the purpose for which he was "constructed" by Amschel was galling, but when Napoleon was brought to his attention, the whole work was shifted to him. The way it was to be accomplished was planned in the Mason lodges in Paris frequented by Talleyrand and in Frankfurt by Amschel.

It was Talleyrand who told Napoleon: War is the only way you can destroy the Church. This was acknowledged by H.G. Wells who called the Corsican genius "a wrecker, (of the revolution) hard, competent, capable, possessing initiative," but he failed to mention his financial backer, without whose masses of money, these traits of character would not have availed him much.

Like Kerensky, Trotsky, Disraeli, Lloyd George and Bismarck, Amschel took over Napoleon when he was of no importance, and made of him, the most important man in Europe. Although H.G. Wells complained that he did not continue the revolution, this was not the point. When Amschel had Napoleon appointed the First Consul for life by a large margin of votes, the stage was set to ring up the curtain on Europe.

As long as he carried out the mission set for him by Amschel, the destruction of the Christian Monarchies and of the Catholic Church, Napoleon bore a charmed life, going from one success to another. A good book I found in the British Museum was by Sidney Dark in which he wrote, How Great Was Napoleon:

> Napoleon, born without any advantage of wealth or high descent, made himself master of the world before he was 35 and finished his career of unparalleled romantic impossibility when he was 46.

This completely overlooks the powers behind Napoleon, Amschel and his millions and the planners inside the Mason lodges of Paris and Frankfurt. On March 9, 1796, Napoleon married Josephina de Beauharnais, a Creole woman with insatiable sexual appetites who had once paid for his uniform. The marriage was arranged by the Rothschilds through Count Paul de Barras who also appointed Napoleon Commander in Chief of the Army in Italy.

Josephina was the mistress of de Barras, but tiring of her, he sought to end the relationship, and to avoid her oath to take revenge on him, Count de Barras arranged for her to marry Napoleon, hardly the "romantic" spin put on the occasion by practically every writer on the life and times of Napoleon.

Josephine helped de Barras by giving him confidential details imparted to her by her husband, which of course went straight to the Rothschilds. Napoleon's coronation in 1804 was treated with indifference by Amschel, but he became alarmed when the Pope was invited. The Rothschilds were dismayed and angry when Napoleon divorced Josephine and married the Arch-Duchess Maria Louisa in 1810. The Rothschild's recognized that henceforth there would be less and less chance to destroy kingdoms and smash the Catholic Church.

From 1810 the die was cast against Napoleon and James Rothschild was seconded to the task of ruining their former hero. The full story of the gradual disillusionment of Napoleon, his awakening to the knowledge that he was not fighting for France, but rather for an alien power to further its grip on the nation as a necessary follow-on to the revolution, the role of the Illuminati and the Masons in his career, made him more and more angry. The awakening was slow to come, and painful, but once his mind was opened to the truth, Napoleon began to rebel against his controllers. In his work, History of Napoleon, G. Bussey says that Napoleon changed, lost his fierce desire for war and declared; Thank God I am at peace with the world.

The Rothschilds now had no further use for their former tool. They financed and set up a front called A League Against Napoleon. The mentors whom Napoleon had begun to neglect were now turned against him. Karl Rothschild hastened to despoil relations between the Pope and Napoleon, and without the knowledge of Napoleon, ordered the arrest of the Holy Father carried out by General Radet. The Pope reacted with an Excommunication Bill against the Emperor.

Napoleon had been trying to win over the Pope. He felt the ground quaking beneath his feet as events, one after another, went against him. An attempt to assassinate him by Illuminati agent Stapps was foiled by the vigilance of General Rapp.

The Russian campaign was plagued by supply problems and lack of food. Napoleon did not understand that it was deliberate sabotage of his army. He was forced to order a retreat from Moscow, during which thousands of soldiers dying from wounds and the cold were mercilessly shot to death by Rothschild's agents coming up in the rear.

The loss of Christian lives was horrendous. With the failure to win over the Pope, Napoleon became seriously concerned as his confidence ebbed away. He noted this:

> The Pope could have been won over as additional means of binding together the federated parts of the Empire. I should have had my religious as well as my legislative sessions. My councils would have constituted the representatives of Christianity, and the successor of St. Peter would have been the President.

Too late, as Karl Rothschild had already seen to it that such a plan would not succeed. No historian can tell why Napoleon attacked Russia in 1812. Theories abound but none of substance. Alexander I said of the attack: "Napoleon waged war on me in the most odious fashion and has deceived me in the most treacherous manner." For his part, Napoleon told General Gourgaud:

> / did not want to make war on Russia. Bassano and Champagny [Ministers of Foreign Affairs] persuaded me that the note of Russia was meant as a declaration of war. I really thought that Russia wanted war. What were the real motives of the campaign in Russia? I do not know, possibly the Emperor himself did not know more than I did.

The Rothschilds ruined Napoleon at the Battle of Waterloo. He was betrayed by Marshal Soult, a man he had befriended, but who was in the pay of the Rothschilds. Napoleon made Soult the Duke of Dalmatia with a salary of millions of francs and appointed him Marshal of the Army. At Waterloo, Soult failed to take and hold Gemappe, an important village to anchor the flank of Napoleon's army.

Worse yet, Marshal Grouchy who was supposed to provide reinforcements arrived 24 hours too late, even though he heard the guns and knew that the battle had been joined. Of Soult, Napoleon complained bitterly:

> Soult, my second in command at Waterloo, did not aid me as much as he might have done. . . His staff, in spite of my orders, was not organized. Soult was very easily discouraged. . . Soult was worth nothing. Why during the battle did he not keep order at Gemappe?

Worse yet, on the morning of the battle, an enemy inside the Corsican's personal staff put a substance in his breakfast that caused him to suffer a terrible migraine. Such is the power of the Rothschilds and the falsification of history; but for the treachery and treason committed against him, Napoleon would have soundly defeated Blucher and Wellington. Soult served his masters well; they gave him some of the highest offices in France. That he was the father of Bismarck has often been suggested, but never proved. At one time Bismarck's mother was Soult's mistress, as confirmed by Bismarck: Not my talents or capacities made me great, but the fact that my mother was the mistress of Soult, [one of the 300] who all helped me.

Bismarck was "made" by the Rothschilds through the Menkens. His father, William, had married a Louise Menken, whom Count Cherep-Spiridovich said was a Jewess. Marshall Soult, who betrayed Napoleon at Waterloo, was a member of the Committee of 300, who occupied the top posts in France until his death.

Soult was often in attendance of William Bismarck country residence and was widely believed to be the father of younger Bismarck. It was this "hold" over Bismarck mother that kept young Bismarck under the control of James Rothschild. In 1833, Bismarck was up against tough times and in danger of losing his property. Through Disraeli, James Rothschild befriended the young Bismarck and sought to create his as a "conservative" future leader of Europe. Oscar Arnim, a member of the Reichstag married Bismarck's sister, Malian.

Following the marriage Bismarck was totally under the direction of Lionel Rothschild. That Bismarck knew it was clear from a statement made by Walter Rathenau in 1871:

> To those who insisted upon treating Bismarck as a great political genius, a man of fate, marked, like Napoleon with the seal of a tragic predestination, Bismarck would repeat, that he did not believe in great providential men; that according to his belief, political celebrities owed their reputations, if not to chance, at least to circumstances which they themselves could not have foreseen.

BISMARCK DISCLOSES "THE HIGH FINANCIAL POWERS OF EUROPE"

Bismarck certainly knew that the American Civil War was fomented by what he called "the High Financial Powers of Europe." This is confirmed in the remarkable account published by Conrad Siem in La Vielle France, N 216, in March 1921. According to Siem, Bismarck talked with him in 1876 about the Civil War:

> The division of the United States into two federations was decided long before the Civil War by the High Financial Powers of Europe. Those bankers were afraid of the United States, if they remained in one block and as one nation would attain economical and financial independence, which would upset their domination over the World. The voice of the Rothschilds predominated. They saw tremendous booty if they substituted two feeble democracies indebted to them, to the vigorous Republic, confident and self-providing.
> Lincoln never suspected these underground machinations. He was Anti-Slaverist, and he was elected as such. But his character prevented him from being the man of one party. When he had affairs in his hands, he perceived that these sinister financiers of Europe, the Rothschilds, wanted him to be the executor of their designs. They made the rupture between the North and the South imminent! The Masters of Finance in Europe made this rupture definitive in order to exploit it to the utmost...

Lincoln's personality surprised them. They thought to easily dupe the candidate woodcutter. His candidature did not trouble them. But Lincoln read their plots and soon understood that the South was not the worst foe, but the financiers. He did not confide his apprehensions; he watched the gestures of the Hidden Hand. He did not wish to expose publicly which would disconcert the ignorant masses.

He decided to eliminate the International Bankers by establishing a system of loans, allowing the states to borrow directly from the people without intermediary.

He did not study finance, but his robust good sense revealed to him, that the source of any wealth, resides in the work and the economy of the nation. He opposed emissions through the International Financiers. He obtained from Congress the right to borrow from the people by selling to it the bonds of States.

The local banks were only too glad to help such a system and the government and the People escaped the plots of the foreign financiers. They understood at once that the United States would escape their grip. The death of Lincoln was resolved. Nothing is easier than to find a fanatic to strike. The death of Lincoln was a disaster for Christendom.

> There was no man in the United States big enough to wear his boots. The international financiers went anew to grab the riches of the world. Fear that with their banks, their craftiness and their torturous tricks — they will entirely control the exuberant riches of America and use it to systematically corrupt modern civilization. I fear that they will not hesitate to plunge the whole of Christendom into wars and chaos, in order that the earth shall become their inheritance.

(I wish to reiterate that the preparation for this work I encompassed ten months of intensive research on this particular subject work at the British Museum. The books from which sources are quoted, such as Talks With Napoleon at St. Helena and Propaganda in the Next War and the works of John Reeves -- and many others mentioned may no longer be available).

Russia provoked a peculiar hatred in the Rothschilds who set their face against the Romanov family. The daughter of Tiesenhaus, a prominent German historian wrote that she shared her father's distrust of the Tsar:

> . . . But after meeting him, in common with many others, she was impressed with Alexander's frankness, energy and nobility of character. This impression deepened into a loyal and devoted friendship. {Emperor Alexander -- Mrs. de Choiseul-Guffress)

According to Count Cherep-Spiridovich, Nathan Rothschild tried to instigate a revolution in Russia, but was unsuccessful, and Lionel confessed to Disraeli that it was prepared in Germany:

> The chief agents of the James Rothschild III were mobilized against Tsar Nicholas I to provoke a war in > the Crimea, but they were unable to win, so they poisoned Nicholas I in 1855."

> (British Museum Papers, Hidden Hand, page 119)

In these momentous events, Disraeli played a big role, either as a "confessor" or advisor to the Rothschilds. How the Rothschilds gained control of Marie Louise is told by Mrs. Edith E. Cuthell in her book, An Imperial Victim:

> In December 1827 Marie Louise, the widow of Napoleon 1 raised a loan often ten million francs from Rothschild. On February 22, 1829, she lost her husband Count Neipperg, which remained a mystery to all historians. Prince Metternich who had been a mere "clerk " of Salomon Rothschild of Vienna, told Bombelles, another Rothschild protege that he wished a man who could guide the weak character of Marie Louise. Bombelles became the confidant of Marie Louise and then married her.

The Rothschilds now had complete control of Napoleon's widow through Bombelles who had captured her heart while she was still Countess Niepperg.

According to the author Edmond Rostand, Bombelles was extremely handsome. Writing of Bombelles, Mrs. E.E. Cuthwell describes him thus:

> He has even more ambition. With his soft voice he whispered into the ears of women. Bombelles wished to marry a Mlle Cavanaugh, who had money. He gained his object. His wife died, bequeathing him her heart in a leaden case. He buried it. A year later he had a desperate passion for another rich heiress, who declined it. (An Imperial Victim, page 321)

> After the death of Marie, Louise Bombelles was appointed Comptroller to the Emperor of Austria. Rumors that she died of poison floated about Parma and spread further. " (Page 373)

Count Cherep-Spiridovich narrates what followed:

> Bombelles, supported by Salomon and his clerk, Metternich, was appointed the 'educator' of the future Emperor of Austria, Franz Joseph. Bombelles was the responsible author of the most awful disloyalty, baseness and cruelty of Austria, which began to amaze the whole world since 1848, when Franz Joseph was only eighteen years old became the Emperor de jure, and Bombelles was the 'power behind the throne' receiving and executing the orders of Rothschild. Their first act was to betray their word to Nicholas I who put as a condition 'sine qua non' mercy for Hungarian General Sheezeny and others. Franz Joseph strangled them, as soon as the Russian troops left Austria. (Hidden Hand, page 123)

The Rothschilds were not only moneylenders, but also speculators. The greatest area of interest to them was the construction of the railroads of Europe and Russia, which they latched onto and held onto. In one account of this endeavor contained in British Museum papers, James Rothschild compelled France to accept financing for its North Railroad:

> The Government took upon itself the obligation to spend 100 million francs in order to build the roadbed. James consented to spend 60 millions in providing rail cars etc. He received during 40 years 17 millions yearly by way of income, i.e. 620 millions in interest plus the principal of 60 millions. In this undertaking the Rothschilds used 60 millions of their depositors' money for which they paid them 4% interest, or 2,400,000 yearly, thus getting 14,600,000 francs per annum for their signature. The Journal des Debats in order to deceive the nation stated in July 1843, that Rothschild is begging for the privilege to ruin himself The French press acted the role of agent provocateur as early as fifty years before the scandal of Panama. The Rothschilds coveted this rich prey, the railroads, at any cost. At one time the Government passed through a period of honesty and had the temerity to stem their aggression.

In 1838, M. Martin, from the North [railroad company] suggested to Parliament a net of railroads to be built by the State. If M. Martin's plan, based on two pillars of monopoly banking and transportation had been approved by Parliament, the financial fealty would have been killed at its inception. But the Rothschilds, through the press controlled by them, found the way to acquire the railroads. In 1840, the West and South lines were conceded to the Rothschilds and the Foulds.

(The Foulds were international bankers strategically placed in France to act out Rothschild orders). By 1845, all the great lines belonged to these two companies. One of the most incisive reporters on the Rothschilds was John Reeves who wrote the book The Rothschilds - The Financial Rulers of Nations. The following comments taken from the book show just how incisive and penetrating of the curtain of mystery surrounding the Rothschilds was Reeves, whose observations of Nathan Rothschild are perhaps without equal:

The amount of fortune he left always remained a secret. The Business was to be conducted by the four > sons in cooperation with their uncles abroad. To each of his daughters he left $500,000, which was to be forfeited if they married without the consent of their mother and brothers.

> There were no legacies to his employees and no charitable bequests. . . the first occasion on which Nathan assisted the English Government was in 1819, when he undertook the loan of $60 million. From 1818 to 1832, Nathan issued eight loans for the sum of $105,400,000. With Spain, or the South American states that had formerly acknowledged the Spanish flag, he would never have anything to do. The explanation of some historians is that it was because of the Spanish Inquisition. One cause of his success was the torturous policy with which he misled those who watched him.
>
> In 1831 Nathan Mayer took control of the quicksilver mines of Idria in Austria, and simultaneously similar mines in Almadena, in Spain. Thus all the mercury, indispensable as medicine, was in his hands, and he doubled and trebled its price. It had terrific consequences upon the sick and the suffering of all nations price.. .
> Another accurate reporter of the Rothschilds was M. Martin whose book, Stories of Banks and Bankers gave some interesting facts. Nathan never paid his employees a cent more than was necessary for their subsistence or at least not a farthing more than they would compel him to pay.

Writing about Lionel Rothschild, Reeves made the following comments in his book, pages 205-207:

> Lionel concentrated his thoughts exclusively on the consolidation of his immense fortune. Great prudence marked his enterprises. In the negotiations of foreign loans Lionel was particularly active, as this business at once lucrative and comparatively free from risk, was one, which he preferred before all others. During his lifetime his firm was interested in the issue of no less than eighteen Government loans, amounting in aggregate to seven hundred million dollars. To enter into the details of these transactions would be to give the financial history of Europe.

To understand how the Rothschilds prospered, especially in their special area of expertise in lending money to governments of Europe and indeed, the world, I examined the work of John Reeves, whose book we have referred to frequently, and will continue to refer to throughout the remainder of this work as well as the sources in the papers in the British Museum.

A MUCH OVERLOOKED ASPECT OF NEGRO SLAVERY IN AMERICA

Before turning to the aspect of successful money- lending, in America as engaged in by the Rothschilds, I shall touch upon the question of slavery that has arisen in recent years. Some say that the descendants of the Negroes should be compensated for the hardship afflicted upon their forbears.

It is an important issue given the fact, that the Rothschilds used slavery as an excuse to foment the American Civil War. The idea was said to have come from Benjamin Disraeli, Lionel and James, who sat down to dinner after the wedding of Lionel's daughter for which all the Rothschilds had assembled in London. According to Count Cherep-Spiridovich:

> . . . The Rothschilds started the American Civil War. Though disputes has existed since 1812 between the South and the North, the war might never had happened, but for the hidden hand of the Rothschilds.

By manipulating and inflaming passions the dispute became a cause for war even though the South was beginning to realize, that slavery was not an economic plus.

Slavery should never have been allowed in the United States, but alas, it was. There are different kinds of slavery. In Europe, the poor lived in the slavery of abject poverty and degradation. In England and Ireland it was much the same story. The poor lived in terrible conditions. Their sons were conscripted to serve in the armed forces and millions of them lost their lives.

The British generals, especially Lord Douglas Haig were notorious for the lack of concern for the heavy casualties they suffered. In Ireland, millions died of starvation. While slavery should be universally condemned, nevertheless, it was tolerated in America, but comparatively, the poor classes of Europe, Ireland and England suffered as great hardship as the slaves in America.

On an occasion it was doubted whether the slaves in America would want to change their condition with the slaves of Ireland and England. But the hidden hand of the Quakers and "abolitionists" kept up a drumbeat of slander against the South until the demons, who had contrived the whole issue of slavery to boil over, got their way.

Negro slaves in America were not generally subjected to such appalling conditions of horror. Thus when we examine the sometimes exaggerated descriptions of slavery in America as written, preached and expounded by the abolitionists and the Quakers, we have to admit, if we are unbiased, that comparatively speaking American Negro slaves were far better treated than the poor in Europe and Great Britain:

> At the beginning of the 19th century, Great Britain, owing to false principles of government to the ignorant and blind cultivation of trade and industries, had the appearance of a State driven to the utmost opposite and contradictory extremes.
> Priding itself on the possession of the freest constitution in Europe, England yet concealed the greatest tyranny; possessing unbounded riches, it yet allowed the poor peasantry of Ireland to die of hunger, whilst the privation and distress prevalent > among the laboring classes was as great and indescribable as to threaten to end in riot and rebellion. The hardships endured by the poorer classes were aggravated by the disgraceful condition of our political system. Morality was at a discount; bribery and intrigue were the order of the day. The thoughts of all were turned to complete forgetfulness of the sufferings of others. Corruption was so widespread, that the independence of the Crown and that of the constituencies was threatened. (Sir William Molesworth)

> In 1797 the English banks found themselves deeply embarrassed, mainly in consequence of the demands of the Government, which borrowed millions every year for the war and for support by subsidies of half of the Continental Powers. (John Reeves, The Rothschilds, page 162)

It would seem that even the Rothschilds could not believe their good fortune. The character, "Sidonia," created by Disraeli in his novel Coningsby and which was in fact based on Nathan Rothschild said: Can anything be more absurd than that a nation should apply to an individual to maintain its credit, and with its credit, its existence as an empire? (Page 248)

This very accurately described the Rothschild bankers and their hold over the British Government through extensive loans. No wonder that President Garfield once said: Whoever controls the money controls that nation. The Rothschild's progeny carried on that tradition. For instance, Lionel Rothschild financed the British Government's Suez Canal undertaking. It is more than likely that without Lionel's financial backing the Suez Canal may not have been dug.

It was Lionel Rothschild who put up the $20 million that the British Government paid for the land purchased from the Khedive. But as with all their ventures, Lionel demanded and got a high return, 500,000 pounds for a couple of endorsements that took no more than a few hours of his time.

At a much earlier time, Mayer Amschel felt it would benefit the Rothschilds if he sent his son Nathan to England, where he took up residence in Manchester. According to Sir Thomas Buxton, the reason why Amschel chose to send Nathan to live in Manchester has already been partly explained herein.

> Many English manufacturers sent in 1789 a man to Frankfurt to offer their goods. The Rothschild trick consisted of keeping him a long time, and later giving him the hugest order for Germany.
> In the meantime, Nathan was sent to Manchester, where he bought all of the available cotton and dyestuffs. When the representative returned to Manchester with orders, the manufacturers had to apply to Nathan for these materials and he made them pay treble the price and even refused to sell the stuff, thus making them pay his father enormous 'damages.' Then he took the cotton and the dyes to some manufacturers and they manufactured the stuff for him at the lowest price. This base trick ruined many people in Manchester.
> This plundering made Manchester very indignant. Nathan was frightened and fled to London, where the London Stock Exchange was a larger field for his exploitation. In later years none of the members of the Exchange could boast like Nathan of having multiplied his capital 2,500 times during the course of five years. (John Reeves, The Rothschilds, page 167)

Another reason why Nathan suddenly went to London is given in the documents referred to in the British Museum:

> The reason also was that Wilhelm IX of Hesse-Cassel (1785-1821) was persuaded by Amschel to transfer his affairs in London, from the bank of van Notten into the hands of Nathan. Of course, 'accidentally' a whole gang of those Frankfurt Illuminati went with Nathan to London to try and do the same thing there, but the British were too clever to be deceived.
> When France invaded Germany, Wilhelm IX [since called the Elector] gave $3,000,000 to Amschel, which he sent to Nathan in London to prevent it from falling into the hands of Napoleon. Just at that moment the Company of India had $4,000,000 in gold. Nathan bought it and increased its price. He cornered gold in London. This arrangement has endured and even today, N.M. Rothschild fixes the price of gold on a daily basis every morning, and the Rothschild "fixing " is accepted as the "official" gold price throughout the world.
> He [Nathan] knew the Duke of Wellington needed it. Nathan also bought the Duke's bills at a large discount. The Government asked Nathan for a loan of his gold and he transferred it to Portugal. Nathan loaned his gold and it was returned, but he compelled the repayment of the Duke's bills at their full value. Thus he made 50%. Then he again loaned his gold at 15% and received it back and transported it to Portugal with a huge commission.
> The Duke needed this gold to pay the outfitters of his Army who were all Portuguese, Spanish and Dutch

> Jews. Thus not a single pound of gold was received by Wellington, only orders to Nathan's agents in Portugal, who were paid by Rothschild in Frankfurt. This operation netted Nathan 100%. Thus the Rothschilds made colossal profits with the money of the Landgrave, but took all the profits for themselves. (Maria O'Grady and John Reeves)

As I said earlier, the descendants of Mayer Amschel became the most powerful men in the world. The one example, perhaps more than any that marks the truth of this observation is the account of how James Rothschild defeated Nicolas I of Russia. It turned on the Russian revolutionary, Hertzen:

> The notorious author, Alexander Hertzen, one of the pioneers (fomenters) of the Russian Revolutionary movement was compelled to leave the country. (Actually he was forced to flee Russia just hours ahead of the police). He arrived in London, where he started a Russian paper called The Bell. Hertzen, however, was a rich man, who before going into exile had converted his property into Government bonds. The Russian Government knew the numbers of Hertzen's bonds, and when they were presented for payment upon the exile's arrival in London, Nicholas I, hoping thereby to crush his enemy, ordered the Government bank of St. Petersburg to refuse payment.
> The Bank naturally obeyed. But fortunately for Hertzen he found a champion in the elder Rothschild. The latter informed the Czar that as Hertzen's bonds were as good as any other Russian bonds, he was reluctantly compelled to conclude the insolvency of the Russian Government. Should the bonds not be > paid immediately, he would declare the Czar bankrupt in all the European money markets. Nicholas was beaten. He put his pride in his pocket and paid the bonds. Hertzen himself relates the story in The Bell under the title, King Rothschild and Emperor Nicholas I."

From these accounts it can be seen just how much the legend of Amschel Rothschild having made his money as a pawnbroker wears thin in the face of reality, and yet the myth endures that pawn broking was in the beginning the source of Rothschild's wealth. It can now be stated as a fact that there is very little substance, if any, to that claim.

In discussing Lionel under the fictitious name of "Sidonia," Disraeli gave many clues to his master's true character: "It was impossible to penetrate him. His frankness was strictly limited to the surface. He observed everything, though overcautious, but avoided serious discussion. He was a man without affection." According to John Reeves:

> . . . The Rothschild brothers, fully cognizant of his superior intellectual capacity, willingly acknowledged Nathan Mayer as the most fit to direct all of their important transactions. (The Rothschilds, page 64)

One of the most interesting of the many interesting facts I discovered in the British Museum in London is the history of the founders of what was to become one of the greatest propaganda machines the world has ever known. I refer to the Tavistock Institute for Human Relations, which became the premiere brainwashing think tank of the ruling elite of Britain. The Tavistock Institute grew into a huge organization, which today dominates the United States and Great Britain. This vast organization had its beginning in 1914 at Wellington House, London at the outbreak of the First World War.

In charge of organizing a propaganda machine that would persuade a reluctant British people to look upon that war with Germany as necessary for the survival of the British way of life, was no easy task since at the time, the majority of the people had any desire for war with Germany, and there was staunch opposition to it. Placed in charge of the propaganda enterprise were Lord Northcliffe and Lord Rothmere. Actually, both men were directly related to the Rothschilds through marriage.

One of the three daughters of Nathan Rothschild II was Charlotte, born in 1807 who married her cousin Anselm Salomon, son of Salomon, the second child of Amschel and Caroline Stern of the Frankfurt Sterns. The Sterns were directly related to the Harmsworths of England, one of who became "Lord Northcliffe" and the other who became "Lord Rothmere."

For full details about the Tavistock Institute read: The Tavistock Institute of Human Relations: Shaping the Moral, Spiritual, Cultural, Political and Economic Recline of the United States of America. (2006)

Jacob (James) Rothschild was undoubtedly the most important man in France, having virtually created many French politicians and leaders who owed their position to him. He had come a long way from the thirteen-year old boy that had hardly attended school, accompanying instead, his father Mayer Amschel in the many trips he took across Germany.

There he was exposed to the restrictions imposed upon Jews who traveled across the borders of the principalities, being forced to pay a Liebzoll, head tax, each time. James always desired to leave Frankfurt and follow his brother Nathan to London, but instead, Amschel sent him to Paris. He left Frankfurt for that city in March of 1811. His arrival in Paris did not go unnoticed by Finance Minister Mollien who reported it to Napoleon: A Frankfurt man who is now in Paris and who calls himself Rotschild (sic) is occupied mainly in smuggling guineas from the English coast to Dunkirk.

The arrival of James must have been an event of importance for Napoleon, who could not have known what great a part James Rothschild was to play in his downfall, and of course the Rothschilds were engaged in more than smuggling, although that activity was a widespread and very lucrative business for them. When the British blockaded France, Mayer Amschel saw it as a golden chance to make a fortune, and he did, in gold.

> At twenty-two years old, James was a rather unattractive young man who was almost servile in mannerisms. Some of his contemporaries were not so kind. Castellane, who along with Mirabeau and Clement-Tonnerrre were the high nobility of Paris, found James frightfully ugly, even though he is the Adonis of the Rothschilds'. (Baron James, Anka Muhlstein, page 61)

Others were even harsher:

> A monstrous visage, the flattest, squattest, most frightful kind of batrachian's face with bloodshot eyes, swollen lids, and a slobbery mouth slit like a piggy bank, a sort of a satrap of gold, that's Rothschild.
> (Goncourts, Journal Paris 1854 Vol. Ill, 7)

James set his course in Paris in 1814 when he asked the Commercial Court to accept registration of his banking house. Before that, he acted merely as the representative of the Frankfurt "head office." This did not alter the solid connection between himself, London and Frankfurt; rather it formalized it and gave him greater status in Paris. He now branched out into tax collecting for the French Treasury and engaged in widespread money lending.

When the fortunes of the king changed, and through the Restoration, (the 100 Days of Napoleon) it did not matter who was at the head of affairs, all were beholden to James Rothschild. He seemed able to change sides without losing one scrap of face or influence.

The end of Napoleon at Waterloo, engineered by his brother Nathan from London, brought in its aftermath a very profitable relation with King Louis whose return to power the Rothschilds made possible by loaning the necessary capital. The undermining of Napoleon and his government was the work of the Rothschilds who now enjoyed the bounty brought with the Restoration.

Napoleon's barely concealed dislike for the Jews contributed to his downfall. The Rothschilds had lived in fear of Napoleon after he refused to attack Christian kings and Christian nations. With peace once more in the air, banker's loans became the biggest and best opportunity to make money, and the Rothschilds exploited it to the full.

NATHAN ROTHSCHILD SETTLES FRENCH DEBTS

The French Government had to settle its wartime indemnities and for this, they needed to borrow money. By lending Louis XVIII the money it took to make a triumphant, but dignified return, Nathan Rothschild ensured a "place in the sun" for James. The sum of money was reputed to be 5 million francs.

True to the teachings of old Mayer Amschel, Nathan did nothing for nothing. His game plan for the loan was to oblige the king to open the doors for James to get into the high circles of society, at the head of which stood the Duc de Richelieu, Premiere of Paris.

At first, Richelieu resisted but he had not an inkling of how persistent Nathan could be. Much pressure was exerted upon him by the Marquis d'Osmond, the French Ambassador at London, and by the Austrian Ambassador Count Esterhazy, both of whom were heavily indebted to Nathan. Finally, although extremely irritated by such unseemly pressure, de Richelieu consented to receive James. It did not stop there.

Next, James got the chief of police Decazes in his pocket through providing him with "special information," which came to him from the von Thurn and Taxis family of Germany who held the mail contract. They simply opened mail of interest to the Rothschilds and then relayed the contents to James in Paris, Nathan in London or Mayer in Frankfurt. It is worth noting, that the von Turn and Taxis family is part of the Committee of 300. There was a double benefit in giving the information thus gained to Decazes instead of de Richelieu to whom it ought to have gone. In return, Decazes kept James informed of any pending anti-Jewish moves or political intrigues directed against his bank.

With his circle of important people growing wider, James decided that he needed a home more suited to his status, one where he might entertain in the lavish style that was expected of him. He found such a home in a mansion formerly possessed by Queen Hortense on the Rue La Fitte, which had previously belonged to a Paris banker named Laborde, who fell victim to the guillotine in 1794. Hortense, the daughter of Empress Josephine had become Queen of Holland after being married to Napoleon's brother, Louis.

It cost James a fortune to have the house remodeled and refurbished; some said the bills came to more than three million francs. When completed in 1834, it became the talk of the town. Heinrich Heine, the German-Jewish Communist philosopher, the Duc d'Orleans and Prince Leopold of Coburg were frequent guests at the glittering soirees given by James.

When Prince Metternich and his entourage, including the brilliant Prussian Friedrich von Gentz, who had the confidence of the great man, came to Paris, James gave a party that rivaled anything seen in Paris since the return of the king. Even the mighty Duke of Wellington dared not refuse an invitation from James when he visited Paris.

James patronized von Gentz and played on his weakness for women, lots of women, providing von Gentz with the money it took through "easy terms" as we say today. Von Gentz got all the women he could handle, plus many other luxuries he had not hitherto been able to afford. Thus did James come to "own" von Gentz.

> James' palace became a magnet for all types of politicians, and particularly, those who were open

> Communists and Socialists. One such person was Ludwig Borne, a strong supporter of the notion that all the kings of Europe should be dethroned and replaced by James, with the exception of Louis Philippe who would be crowned in Paris, so that coronation ceremony would be conducted, not by the Pope, but by James Rothschild. (Notre Dame de la Bourse, January 22, 1832)

> As previously mentioned, an individual who was patronized by James Rothschild was Heinrich Heine, the German poet who had deserted his homeland and settled in Paris, whether to be near Rothschild, or for political reasons, is not certain. Heine was an avowed Communist and was more than likely on the German police list of subversives and this may have been one reason why he took up residence in Paris. Rothschild helped Heine in innumerable ways, not the least being financial. Heine perceived James a revolutionary and praised him for being 'one of the first to perceive the worth of the Crimieux . . .' Herr von Rothschild alone discovered Emile Pereire, the Pontifex Maximus of railways. (Olivia Maria O'Grady)

Not exactly true as I found when I looked at the profit angle that brought James to invest in the new fad. Pereira was a young Sephardim Jew employed by James to do the day-today supervision of the construction work. Through it all, James and Nathan did not stray far from the tricks of the trade taught them by Mayer Amschel, that being never to lose sight of the goal that money was everything.

A particular deal, one of many that James and Nathan were offered, was that of official agents for making payments to Austrian troops stationed at Colmar in Alsace. The Rothschilds were awarded the contract by undercutting all competitors. The business was risky because it involved transport of coinage through bandit-infested areas, necessitating expensive insurance. Instead of transporting physical coinage, James arranged for Rothschild credits to be placed with local banks against which the soldiers were paid. Having eliminated the risk, James and Nathan were able to pocket substantial commissions. This became the basis of new business, the transfer of funds all around the Continent and to London now being done in this way, and the Rothschilds had the monopoly.

In order to give readers just a glimpse of the immense power wielded by James I relate the following affair, which became one of his causes celebre and showed how far his powerful arm could reach. A certain priest, a Father Thomas and his servant disappeared in Damascus in April 1840. Murder was suspected and the suspects, who just happened to be Jewish, were arrested, whereupon they confessed to the murder.

> World Jewry immediately protested vehemently that the arrested Jews were innocent, and that their confessions had been made under torture. James and Salomon immediately brought their combined pressures to bear upon the monarch and Salomon induced Prince Mettemich of Austria to take action.
> The Austrian Consul von Laurin protested to Mohammed Ali, reporting directly to James and Salomon actions taken. The French Consul at Damascus, however, being on the scene, took an altogether different view of the murder and the defendants the political scene being acute; Louis Philippe dared not risk unwarranted support of the Jews against the Christians. James' letter to Salomon is of considerable importance. It clearly reveals the behind-the-scenes methods employed by the Rothschilds in pressuring governments and molding public opinion: My efforts have unfortunately, not yet produced the desired results. The government is acting very slowly in this matter; in spite of the praiseworthy action of the Austrian Consul, because the matter is too remote so that the public interest has not been sufficiently aroused about it. All that I have so far succeeded in doing is, as stated in the Monitor today, to arrange that the Vice Consul at Alexandria should be instructed to investigate the conduct of the Consul at Damascus.

This is only a temporizing measure since the vice consul is under the Consul, so that he has no authority to call the latter to account for his actions. In such circumstances the only means left is the all-powerful method here of calling in the newspapers to our assistance and we have accordingly today had a detailed account based upon the reports of the Austrian Consul sent in to the Debates and other papers, and have also arranged that this account shall appear in similar detail in the Algemene Zeifung of Augsburg.

We would certainly have published Herr von Laurin 's letters to me on this matter, had we not felt that this could only have been done after previously obtaining the permission of his Highness Prince von Metternich.

For this reason, my dear brother, convinced as I am that you will gladly do your utmost in this just cause, I would beg you to request of the Prince in his kindness to authorize the publication of these letters. The gracious sentiments of human feeling, which the Prince has expressed with regard to this sad episode, > cause us to confidently entertain the hope that this request will not be refused.

> When you have received the desired permission, I beg you, my dear Salomon, not to immediately publish the letter in the Osterreicher Beobachter alone, but to also be so good as to send them immediately with a short covering letter to the Augsburger Zeitung, so that they may reach the public through that medium also. (The Untold History, Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

Some of the important statesmen the Rothschild had under their control began to worry about their power and influence.

One of these was Prince Metternich who was under the firm control of Salomon Rothschild and regarded by him as no more than a "valet" for the Rothschild family. After bartering away a good deal of Austria's sovereignty, Metternich began to have serious doubts:

> By reason of natural causes which I cannot regard as good or moral, the House of Rothschild is a much more important influence in French affairs than the foreign office of any country, except perhaps, England. The great motive force is their money. People who hope for philanthropy and who have to suppress all criticisms under the weight of gold, need a great deal of it. The fact of corruption is dealt with quite openly, that practical element, in the fullest sense of the word, in the modem representative system.

Too late did Metternich realize that by selling Austria he was playing right into the hands of the international revolutionaries, and when the revolutionary fires began to burn, despite his exalted rank, Prince Metternich had to flee Vienna on money borrowed from Salomon Rothschild.

It is doubted by historians, that Metternich ever had any conception of the revolutionary forces he had inadvertently helped to unleash. According to documents in the British Museum, world revolution began to go into high gear in 1848, beginning in Sicily in January of that year.

> The great cities of Europe seemed to be stirred by waves of excitement. Disorder spread to Naples. In Paris the red flag was unfurled over the barricades. Socialist revolutionaries led the workmen and students into bloody revolt in February 22, 1848, and Guizot resigned. (Olivia Maria O'Grady)

It is stated that James Rothschild overrated King Louis Phillip, thinking him to be sympathetic to revolutionary ideas. According to Professor William Langer, Coolidge Professor of History at Harvard University . . . Republicans and other radicals had accepted Louis Philippe as a revolutionary monarch only to discover their mistake too late.

This is surprising, as James Rothschild was known to be a very astute judge of character and one who could read political scenes like a road map. It cannot be said with certainty, but Marshal Soult, a close friend of Nathan Rothschild, who formed a ministry with the Duke of Brioglie, Thiers and Guizot, the latter two men being of a notably conservative side of politics, may have had something to do with it.

In 1830 demands by workers stirred up by Marx and his Socialist International began in Italy and Poland, which were not met by their governments. Radical agitation and violence continued in France during 1831:

In November 1831, a large scale insurrection of workers at Lyons was put down with difficulty. There followed a rapid spread of secret societies. Under the regime of press freedom the king was unsparingly attacked and in the radical newspapers mercilessly caricatured, notably by Honorare Daumire. In 1834 there were great revolts in Paris and Lyons, which were suppressed with great severity. In 1845, the radical Fieschi attempted to assassinate Louis Philippe, but the attempt did not succeed. Thereafter, in 1836, the king established a government run by his personal friend Colonel Louis Mole with the Right Center leadership Guizot; but he joined forces with the Left Center Party and overthrew Mole. (The Untold History, John Reeves)

To continue with The Untold History:

Revolutionary activities prior to 1848 had sent men like Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Louis Napoleon Bonaparte into exile from the Continent. England had been their haven. In 1848 they had returned to the Continent to participate in the Revolutions. On February 24, 1848, the Charter and constitution and parliamentary rule seemed to come to an abrupt halt.

In all of Paris I did not see one member of the militia, one soldier, one gendarme, or one member of the police. Meanwhile sheer terror gripped all upper classes. I don't believe that any time during the Revolution (1789-94) it was quite so great. (Victor Hugo, Choses vues, page 268)

James stayed on for a few days and was observed by Feydeau, one of the members of the National Guard:

> Around noon, I saw two gentlemen, arm in arm, calmly appear out of the Rue de la Paix and move toward the Tuileries. I recognized one of them a Baron de Rothschild. I quickly went up to him. 'Messeur le Baron,' I said 'you would seem not to have chosen a very good day for a walk. I think it would be better if you returned home rather than expose yourself to bullets whizzing in all directions.'
> But the Baron assured him that he was safe and was needed at the Ministry of Finance. Louis Napoleon was to become, first, the President of France and then Emperor; Marx and Engels joined in founding the Communist League, and then, with the failure of the revolutions, they returned to England, while others, among them Joseph Wedermeyer emigrated to the United States... (Olivia Maria O'Grady)

After the Battle of Sedan and the capture of Napoleon III by the Prussians (September 1870), Paris, mistaking itself for being the heart, brains and other organs of the French nation, and the rest of France as backward, primitive, one might say almost barbaric appendage, underwent a series of revolutions (in the name of France) culminating in the Paris Commune of 1871, which served only to leave the nation prostrate before the enemy and expose it to his contempt. Quoting from Professor Langer:

> Between 1840-1847 Guizot became the commanding figure. Guizot became premiere in 1847 and remained in power until 1848 when he resigned. Street disorders led to the revolution of February.

Continuing the account of events in 1848, from papers and documents in the British Museum and from L'Alliance France-Allemande et Les Forces Titanique, The

Rothschilds by John Reeves and the accounts of Olivia Maria O'Grady:

> In Paris the red flag was unfurled over the barricades. Marxist revolutionaries led the workmen and students into a bloody revolt on February 22, 1848 and Guizot resigned. The troops attacked the revolutionaries on the barricades; stirring the population into a frenzy of excitement. On the 24, the National Guard and line regiments went over to the rebels. The seventy four year old Louis Philippe fled the country.
> Marx and Engels made ready to take personal charge of the revolution . . . Marx was entrusted with full revolutionary powers . . . Lamartine and Arago asked the Jewish banker, Michael Goudchaux to accept the revolutionary portfolio for finance. The banker accepted. Caussidere, the barricade prefect, asked James Rothschild for a loan for the purposes of paying his revolutionary aides. James happily complied. (Pages 218-219)

After describing how Marx and Engels took charge of the various revolutionary factions and organizing revolt in Germany, O'Grady wrote:

> In the beginning of April, Marx and Engels left Paris for Germany where the flames of revolution had preceded them. The Holy Alliance had collapsed in the smoke and flame of Vienna and Prince Mettemich had fled the city on money borrowed from Solomon Rothschild. (Page 219)

> James Rothschild gave Leder-Rollin seven hundred and fifty thousand francs in support of the 1848 revolution. It was said that he was compelled to do so under Rollin 's threat to burn the Palais Rothschild in the Rue Lafitte. In the three days of street fighting in June of 1848, Louis Eugene Cavalgnac emerged victorious; He immediately assumed dictatorial powers and was nominated president of the council of ministers by the National Assembly. By free use of large sums of money Rothschild ingratiated himself with the new power in France, and was as much at home with Cavalgnac as he had been with Louis Philippe. It was soon said that he was as good a Republican as he had been monarchist.

The French Workers Party claimed him as one of their own. The Editor of the radical Tocsin des Travailleurs wrote:

> You are a wonder sir! In spite of his legal majority Louis Philippe has fallen, Guizot has disappeared, the constitutional monarchy and parliamentary methods have gone by the board; you, however, are unmoved. Where are Aragon and Lamaratine? They are finished but you have survived. The banking princes are going into liquidation and their offices are closed.
> The great captains of industry and the railway companies' totter . . . you alone among those ruins remain unaffected. Although your House felt the first shock of violence in Paris, although the effects of the Revolution pursue you from Naples to Vienna to Berlin, you remain unmoved in the face of a movement that has affected the whole of Europe. Wealth fades away, glory is humbled, and dominion is broken, but the Jew, the Monarch of our time held his throne.

The Paris Commune was the first Communist government in Europe. Of the Rothschilds, O'Grady writes:

> Their fabulous command of unlimited supplies of money broke down all barriers for the Rothschilds. The dazzle of great wealth increased their social prestige everywhere. The powerful, the great kings, princes and premieres sought their favor.
>
> They built palaces and entertained the 'right people' with a royal magnificence that shamed the state affairs of monarchs. The world was their feet, and the cause of Jewry in Europe was in the ascendancy. Just how fabulous was their fortune is going be demonstrated as we proceed.

FRANCE SURVIVES COMMUNIST ONSLAUGHTS

Leaving that momentous event behind, I researched papers about France in later years to see if the thread continued and found that it very much did. Following the success of the Paris Commune, the Communists tried again in 1871 after the Provisional Peace of Versailles was signed with Bismarck. In September 1870, the collapse of Napoleon III at Sedan was a blow that the French Empire did not survive.

On September 4, the mob again tried to take over Paris as they had done previously when James Rothschild had partly financed the revolution, but on September 19, the German armies that had defeated the French at Sedan rushed through to Paris and invested the city.

The Communists were not able to sustain their offensive and Paris was left with food enough for only eight days. On January 28, 1871, Paris capitulated to the German army. French troops disarmed, forts taken over. Bismarck allowed for elections and demanded an indemnity of five billion francs be paid to Germany. In March through May of 1871, the Marxist Communists National Guard, whom Bismarck had failed to disarm, seized 417 cannons and murdered Generals Lecomte and Thomas.

The International played a leading role in the National Guard through Loeb, Cohen, Lazare, Levi and of course, Karl Marx. The regular troops were forced to retreat and leave Paris in the hands of the Marxist Socialist International. Backed by the German army, French troops attacked the barricades in Paris and broke the hold of the Communists. But in the meantime, before the assault of the French and German regular troops broke the power of the mob led by the rebellious National Guard, the Communists exacted fearful reprisals. Sixty-seven innocent hostages were butchered at Fort Vincennes.

The Archbishop of Darboy was shot down like a dog, as were a number of his priests. Prominent citizens were also summarily shot. This happened even as the troops of the Third Republic were entering the city.

On May 20, 1871, the Communists drenched all those sections of Paris under their siege with gasoline, setting fire to all public buildings and most private property, including homes. The Tuileries, the Ministry of Finance, the Palais Royal, the Ministry of Justice, the City Hall and the police headquarters were all set on fire and burned to the ground.

> By a miracle, the sumptuous House of Rothschild and its priceless possessions remained untouched. As always before, the House of Rothschild emerged from the hazards of the war of 1870-1871 and the Paris Commune, financially unshaken and still the undisputed masters of Europe. Again the Rothschilds showed they were capable of switching their allegiance from the monarchy and bestowing it with equal devotion to the Third Republic. Alfonse Rothschild, of course, withdrew to Versailles, and took a room in the Hotel des Reservoirs where he lived throughout the fighting, looting and the terrors of the revolution.

The quoted portions are from the work of Olivia Maria O'Grady, the works of Professor Langer and from The Untold Mystery by John Reeves.

What is worthy of note is that while the most radical of the mob remained to murder their unfortunate victims, their leaders slipped out of the city and made their way to England, Switzerland and Latin America. The Paris Commune having run its course, collapsed in a frenzy of blood lust. There appears to be little doubt that the vast sum of money it took to run the Commune (it only lasted for two months) must have come from the Rothschilds.

> The leaders of the Commune spent 42 million francs, an enormous sum of money for that day. Even with the most prolific squandering it is hard to see how it could have spent as much as one third of that amount. This means that some 25 million francs disappeared in some direction, probably Switzerland, and possibly in the baggage of the head of the Bank of France, or rather its Assistant Governor, the Marquis de Poleis, who accompanied Beslay to Switzerland, when the latter was given a safe conduct pass to leave the country after the suppression of the Commune. (The Untold History, John Reeves)

The general feeling at the time was that Beslay, who had been appointed to the Bank of France by the Paris Commune (in other words, indirectly by the Rothschilds) had rescued the money for them and that the Rothschilds arranged the safe-conduct passes.

In any event, the Paris Commune brought shame and disgrace to the people of France and sent the Socialist movement into a state of decline. It is interesting to note that the Preliminary Peace Treaty of Versailles had been negotiated in part by Alfonso Rothschild, the son of James Rothschild. Alfonso concluded the financial negotiations with Bismarck and agreed to payment of the five billion francs demanded for reparations.

Eduard Rothschild was the son of Alfonso Rothschild, the eldest son of James Rothschild, who died on May 26, 1905, but the line of succession's hold on French affairs continued. Later, we shall see the part played by Eduard Rothschild and Lord Rothschild in the so-called "Balfour Declaration" that led to the establishment of a Zionist State in Palestine, in which, incidentally, Disraeli played a leading role for his masters, the Rothschilds. There are always people behind the scenes, as any thinking student of world history will know. What role did Disraeli play in the "homeland" for the Jews? In his work Tancred, Disraeli talked about "those days of political justice when Jerusalem belonged to the Jews." Of Jerusalem, he wrote:

> I saw before me apparently a gorgeous city" and all through his novels, Alroy, Contari and Fleming, he wrote about his love of Jerusalem stressing that it was a Jewish possession. At Hughendon, his country residence, Disraeli told the visiting Stanley of his "plans for restoring Palestine to the Jews and for the re-colonization by Jews.

What role did Karl Marx play in the 1871 Paris uprising of the Communists? According to records in the British Museum confirmed by two other sources:

> Marx was exultant, and though his fame spread everywhere as the monster who let loose the murderous cut-throats of Paris, he strutted like a peacock before members of the International in London. He launched into a eulogy of the 'immortal heroes of the barricades.'
> When the Paris Commune took the management of the revolution into its own hands, when plain workingmen for the first time dared to infringe upon the government of privilege of their cultural superiors, the old world writhed in convulsions of rage at the sight of the red flag, the symbol of the > republic of labor, floating over the Hotel De Ville. (The Paris City Hall)

One of the things we learned from the Paris Commune is that it disenchanted the majority of the French people, but the leaders who slipped away to England and Switzerland with the help of the Freemasons and Illuminati, regarded it as a landmark in the rise of International Socialism in Germany, Spain, Russia and Italy. Karl Marx in London became the clearinghouse for International Marxism, but right next to him stood Engels and the Rothschilds.

In the Untold History, we are told that the Rothschilds were the agents for the Frankfurt Masons, of which the Landgrave of Hesse was the Master, whose finances the Rothschilds controlled. At this juncture a few notations about Bismarck would be appropriate since he played a major role in shaping the destiny of not only Germany, but the whole of Europe.

According to author John Reeves in his work, The Rothschilds, Bismarck was regarded as a mere valet of the Rothschilds and was half-Jewish.

Documents in the British Museum suggest that Bismarck's natural father was Marshal Soult, the real "Waterloo" of Napoleon I: "Does it not prove that Marshal Soult was his real father and not the quiet Prussian small landowner, the official father of Bismarck?"

> After Napoleon had been put down by the Rothschilds, they needed a new leader and they created such a one in Otto Bismarck. His father, William, married Louise Menken [the Menkens were Jews] — a bourgeoisie of unknown origin. He took her into his country place, which the French troops of Napoleon soon invaded, and in a nearby chateau, Marshal Soult established his headquarters.

> Louis had been in imminent peril of violation, the champagne of Soult, his Asiatic persuasive powers appealed to the heart of Louis more than the beer and heavy wits of her German husband. Soult has since shown an extreme attention to Mrs. Bismarck — Menken and her son, the future 'Man of Blood and Iron.' Soult occupied the highest posts in France and until his death betrayed every Christian ruler. The six years Bismarck passed in Palma Institute in Berlin had left him but regrettable memories. (Cherep-Spiridovich, page 108 -- The Hidden Hand attributed to J. Hoche)

Actually, Louise Bismarck-Menken was not of unknown origin. I traced her antecedents to Haim Solomon who is credited with giving all of his fortune to General George Washington to start the American Revolution. The Jewish Tribune of New York of January 9, 1925, also confirmed that Louise Menken was the descendant of Haim Solomon.

Certain researchers and historians hotly dispute that the money Solomon gave to Washington was his own, but that it came from the Rothschilds, Solomon being their mere conduit. They point to the fact that in spite of giving all his money to Washington, Haim continued to live in luxury. The story of how Bismarck was co-opted by the Rothschilds can be pieced together from Lord Beaconsfield Letters, December 1812 and from Coningsby:

> Lionel Rothschild often took Disraeli to Paris where he was introduced to James Rothschild III. They were visited by Count Arnim, the Prussian Minister. Through Lionel, Disraeli became his friend. Soult was a Cabinet Minister of France and spoke much, perhaps, of his son, or the son of his mistress, ex Menken-Bismarck. Thus it was that the Rothschilds > decided to capture young Bismarck, who was in great need, and was, at least, a half a Jew, who already in 1839 was compelled to struggle against disaster which threatened his property. But the Rothschilds, Soult and Amim were already watching him and all sought to use him. Even in 1839 at Aachen, Bismarck had shown himself rebellious, as had Disraeli in his poem 'Blessings to the regicide dagger.'

> But James required that Bismarck and Disraeli display 'arch Conservatism,' which then was winning in order to slip into high society and to acquire power. Therefore, Disraeli and Bismarck dropped the hymns to 'regicide daggers' and became ultra-conservative. Both were ordered to become 'very mundane.' Amim, the Prussian Minister and member of the Reichstag married Bismarck's beloved sister Malvina in 1844 and, according to Disraeli, Bismarck fell entirely under the influence of the Rothschilds andArnim and his sister.

Indirectly we learn the statement made by Walter Rathenau that 300 men rule the world (see The Conspirators' Hierarchy: The Committee of 300). Forty years before, Bismarck indicated his agreement with Rathenau's statement:

> This was repeated by Disraeli when he said that 'the world is ruled by very different personages from what is imagined by those who are not behind the scenes.' Forty years before Rathenau's statement, Bismarck indicated his agreement with both Rathenau and Disraeli.
> (Extracted from Coningsby and Cherep-Spiridovich and British Museum papers)

Considered a reactionary, in 1847 Bismarck tried to placate Conservatives by his simulated violence against the Liberals, following the example of Disraeli and thus won the favor of the Prussian King. With a great deal of effort and juggling, Bismarck's controllers managed to get him to marry Johanna Puttkamer in 1847.

Puttkamer was a remarkable woman whose abilities to calm his terrible temper (probably inherited from Soult) because his registered father was a quiet man never given to violent outbursts thus saving his career, which would otherwise have come to an abrupt end. When in 1849 the list of new Cabinet members was proposed to Frederick William IV, he drew a thick line though Bismarck's name and wrote: Red-hot reactionary. Likes the smell of blood.

In 1849 Bismarck had himself elected to the Second Prussian Chamber with the help of Arnim and Rothschild, and in 1851 he attended the Diet of Frankfurt am Main as a Deputy. Count Arnim was also behind Bismarck and he did his part by recommending him to Otto von Manteuffel, the Minister of Prussia. Of von Manteuffel, Professor Langer discusses the background to his importance, historically:

> On May 16, 1850, a number of petty states and Austria met at Frankfurt and reconstituted the old diet of the Germanic Confederation. If Prussia insisted on this union, war with Austria appeared inevitable. When a dispute arose from an appeal . . . both powers mobilized and war seemed imminent.
> Tsar Nichols of Russia, irritated by the pseudo liberalism of the Prussian ruler sided with Austria, and Frederick William, who had been averse to war from the very outset, decided to beat a hasty retreat. He sent his new Minister, Otto von Manteuffel to negotiate. . . (Professor Langer, page 726-727)

> When Bismarck was old, his eyes never lost their amazing power. He had by nature contempt for anything weak, sentimental and among his objects of disdain he included several Christian virtues. (Professor F.M. Bowicke, Bismarck and the German Empire, page 5)

In La Revue des Deux Mondes published in 1880 vol. 26, page 203 by Valbert, we read the following:

> The Jews were the only people who could exploit Bismarck in such a way, where the entire liberal reforms in Germany after Sadowa (where the Prussians were defeated by the Austrians in 1866) introduced by Bismarck, served to benefit the Jews. ..

As we have shown, the Rothschilds were particularly interested in the politics of all nations where they had established themselves. For instance, at the Congress of Vienna, the Rothschilds sought to predominate. We learn from Maria Olivia O'Grady:

> . . . The Jews sent representatives to the Congress of Vienna where they sought to influence the official delegates through bribes and presents. The elder Rothschild, it will be recalled, was fearful of the special Jewish privilege he had bought from Karl von Dalberg, prince primate of the Confederation of the Rhine, might be lost unless incorporated in the new constitutions that the Congress was expected to draft.
> Jacob Baruch (father of Ludwig Boerne) G.G. Uffenheim and J.J. Gumprecht, Rothschild's special emissaries, would have been run out of town by the Viennese police, had not Metternich intervened.

> The Jewish representatives, of course, had no official position in the Congress. The most important Jewish influence on the members of Congress came from the Jewesses who opened their salons in lavish entertainment of the leading statesmen and rulers who were attending the sessions of Congress.
> The most prominent of these Jewesses were Baroness Fanny von Arenstein, Madame von Eskeles, Rachel Levin von Varahagen, Madam Leopold Herz, and the Duchess Mendelssohn von Schlegel. The best that the Jews were able to accomplish at the Congress of Vienna was a number of drafts proposals that invariably offered full rights of citizenship to those Jews who 'assume performance of all the duties of citizens.' This clause did not meet with all the peculiar demands and requirements of the Jewish 'nation,' which actually desired all rights of citizenship without the usual obligations. (The Congress of Vienna, pages 345, 346)

Author Anka Muhlstein in Baron James, The Rise of the French Rothschilds, puts a different interpretation on the events of the Congress of Vienna and their effect on Frankfurt:

> Hardly had the French armies withdrawn when the German authorities addressed themselves to the urgent problem of putting the Jews back in their place. In Frankfurt the rights legally acquired and dearly paid for were now abolished. Once again the Jews found themselves treated like unwelcome aliens.
> Realizing that their honor, their liberty, and occasionally their lives were threatened, the Jews turned to the Great Powers meeting regularly at the > Congress in Vienna. But however valid, their arguments were in vain. This left Germany's Jews no choice but to resort, as in the past, to clandestine means and thus find, or buy protection.

> Salomon took charge of the Jewish campaign and suddenly the wallet of Gentz, Metternich's advisor grew fat. This resulted in a suspension of the Austrian edicts of expulsion along with statements from Metternich and Hardenberg, the Austrian Chancellor's counterpart in Prussia. (Baron James, The Rise of the French Rothschilds, Anka Muhlstein, page 68)

According to Muhlstein, Jews were attacked in Frankfurt and severely persecuted. Salomon Rothschild chose to move to Vienna, but Amschel remained in Frankfurt and after reminding the government how much they would need Rothschild loans, the violence against the Jews began to subside.

SALOMON ROTHSCHILD SHOWS HIS FINANCIAL CLOUT

In Vienna, Salomon was not allowed to buy a house, so he rented an entire luxurious hotel for himself and then refused the King of Wurtemberg the apartment he had occupied for many years.

Salomon was granted diplomatic immunity and had the title "Baron" bestowed upon him. Metternich then appointed James and Nathan as Consuls, an "unthinkable honor for a Jew" as Salomon noted:

> James did not renew his appeal. Metternich's evident power and protection relieved his anxiety. Thanks to the Chancellor, in fact, the Rothschilds would acquire diplomatic immunity.
> Having granted them a useful and flattering title, he would now do considerably more. Nathan and James, at the price of numerous skillfully negotiated loans conceived the idea of having themselves appointed Consuls to represent Austria in London and Paris. A Jew entering the diplomatic corps! It was unthinkable. However, despite the enormity of the proposal, Metternich agreed.

> Only the evil-minded would suspect some connection between the advantageous personal loans made by the Rothschilds to the Chancellor. All court functions lead to new business especially when it has to do with Austria. If James should be appointed in Paris, he could, God willing, take charge of everything related to the liquidation of the debt owed by France to Austria, since the Consul would be allowed to treat with the King in person. {Souvenirs Augustus de Fremilly, page 232, 1908)

> In trying to establish a pattern of powerful Jews attempting to use their influence at international conventions, The Conference of Aix la Chapelle in 1818 was also confronted with uninvited Jewish representatives. Lewis Way, an English clergyman, acted as the Jewish mouthpiece, and introduced a petition to the Conference advocating Jewish emancipation in Europe. Jewish influence in the 1856 Congress of Paris and the 1858 Congress of Paris is evident in the work of both meetings. It does not appear that that Jewry was permitted official representation at either of these two conferences. (Olivia Maria O' Grady)

That did not sit well with the Rothschilds who then demanded more and more from those they held in their power. After receiving titles of barons and consuls, they now desired more visible signs of their power to be displayed.

Their "love of distinctions" was immoderate to say the least. Von Gentz was instructed to let the public know that medals and ribbons were being granted to them, and to advertise the fact: "Salomon von Rothschild and his brother in Paris have received the order of Saint Vladimir in recognition of loans negotiated for Russia."

Von Gentz wrote to a number of leading German journals. It would be as well that you publish the news. Make it Vladimir rather than Saint Vladimir. In a letter to Count von Neipberg, in 1830, Metternich privately criticized the Rothschild's vanity: The Rothschilds would like a small Saint George. What vanity. Despite their millions and their generous loyalty, the Rothschilds have an astonishing appetite for honors and distinction. (British Museum Documents)

The Christian religious nature of the decorations made it all the more extraordinary that the Rothschilds were able to secure them, and point to the power they exercised over Metternich and Bismarck, especially as it is known that Metternich began to object to the Rothschilds demands on the grounds that as non-Christians they were not entitled to receive certain decorations, but that did not stop the flood of requests for special honors. In 1867 Alphonse, the eldest son of James wrote to his cousins in London:

> The most notable outcome of Bismarck's visit (to London) has been the distribution of decorations. My father received the Great Ribbon of the Red Eagle, the highest and most distinguished decoration. No Jew in Prussia has received it. (Gold and Iron, Fritz Stern, page 1150)

Continuing with O'Grady's work, her theme of unofficial, but powerful representation at world conventions where Jews had no standing, she refers to American efforts on their behalf: American Jewry influenced the United States to present their demand for full and equal rights' to the Bucharest Peace Conference of 1913, although the United States was not officially represented at the Conference.

On October 1913, the Anglo Jewish Association addressed a joint memorial to Sir Edward Grey, urging that the new affirmative guarantees for the Jews to be secured, pointing out that Romania had repeatedly ignored and repudiated similar assurance.

> Elihu Root, the United States Secretary of State had issued strong instructions at the direction of President Theodore Roosevelt, to Ambassador White, representing the United States at the Algerian Conference of 1906, directing him to urge upon the conference the consideration of guarantees of religious and racial tolerance in Morocco.
> The work of World Jewry at the Peace Conference is nowhere better indicated than in the provisions imposed on Poland by the Versailles Treaty. A ruthless conqueror could not have been more severe. The Polish representatives signed the Minority Treaty on June 28, 1919, thereby committing Poland to divide sovereignty and a superior and privileged class of citizenry. (Olivia Maria O'Grady, pages 344-347)

It has been commented on many times in history that the average person in most countries has little or no time to spare to think beyond making a living, raising a family and holding down a job making these objectives possible, leaving little or no time to attend to politics or matters of economics or other vital issues, such as war and peace, that affected their lives and their nation.

Yet it seemed, that certain groups of people were immune from such restrictions, and always seemed to know where important issues were to be decided, and by whom, and seemed to have a world-wide network that kept them abreast of all political and economic developments. Highly organized and vocal, such groups always had the edge over the local citizenry.

According to The Hidden Hand authored by Cherep-Spiridovich and the extensive work of author Olivia Maria O'Grady, such highly effective groups were always Jewish or Jewish dominated and controlled.

Both authors cite numerous and extensive examples to prove their contention, perhaps two of the more convincing examples being the Paris Peace Conference of 1919 and the establishing of the State of Israel. Continuing with the account by Olivia Maria O'Grady:

> The dawn of 1919 found Paris literally flooded with Jews from all over the world-rich Jews, poor Jews, Orthodox Jews, Socialist Jews, financiers and revolutionaries, they poured into the French capital, -and they went to work.
> The Comite de Delegation Juives aupres de la Conference de la Paix (The Committee of Jewish Delegations at the Peace Conference) was fully organized by March 25, 1919. In addition the delegates of the World Zionist Organization and the B'nai B'rith were included in the Committee's membership, purporting to speak for ten million Jews.
> Woodrow Wilson, Georges Clemenceau and other international figures were putty in the hands of these International Jews. Although the idea of a world super state had long been a Jewish dream, Wilson's conceit in believing it as his own particular creation was pandered and puffed on all sides by the Jewish delegation and their controlled world press. 'The principles of national self-determination and homogeneity were not allowed to be carried to extremes,' writes one Jewish historian with obvious satisfaction.

> The finesse of the Jewish delegation is clearly discernible in the finished product of Versailles. The groundwork for the destruction of sovereignty throughout Christendom was well laid by the mastermind behind the Comite de Delagation Juives. Absolute sovereignty was restricted. As the basis for the Second World War 'the new and enlarged states' were compelled 'to assume an obligation to embody in a treaty with the principal Allied and Associated Powers, such provisions as might be deemed necessary for the said Powers to protect the inhabitants who differed from the majority of the population in race, language, or religion.'
> Included in the Jewish delegates to the Paris Peace Conference was Jacob Schiff, who was later to become one of the Wall Street bankers who financed the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia. The crowning Jewish triumph was the provision that brought 'domestic group rights' under the International guarantee and jurisdiction of The League of Nation -- not one of them was concerned with 'making the world safe for Democracy'. (Wilson's statement of intent, Olivia Maria O'Grady)

Wilson may have been fooled by the intent and purpose of the League of Nations, but a group of wide-awake United States Senators was not. They saw the League of Nations exactly for what it was; an attempt to destroy United States sovereignty, the United States Constitution and the Bill of Rights, and rejected it as such when the treaty was presented to the United States Senate for ratification.

Leading the opposition in the Senate were Senators Hiram Johnson and William E. Borah whose patriotism was unbounded. The treaty was rejected on November 11, 1919. British Prime Minister Lloyd George also saw the dangers of the strictures imposed on nations by the Treaty of Versailles. In 1919 he put his fears on paper during a weekend break in meetings of the Conference:

> When nations are exhausted by wars in which they have put forth all their strength and which leave them tired, bleeding and broken, it is not difficult to patch up a peace that may last until the generation which experienced the horrors of war has passed away. . . It is therefore comparatively easy to patch up a peace that may last for thirty years. What is difficult, however, is to draw up a peace which will not provoke a fresh struggle when those who have practical experience of war have passed away...
> You may strip Germany of her colonies, reduce her armaments to a mere police force and her navy to that of a fifth-rate power; all the same, in the end if she feels that she has been unjustly treated in the peace of 1919 she will fund the means of extracting retribution from her conquerors.
> The imposition, the deep impression made upon the human heart of four years of unexplained slaughter will disappear with the hearts upon which it has been marked by the terrible sword of the Great War. The maintenance of peace will then depend upon there being no cause of exasperation constantly stirring up the spirit of patriotism, of justice, of fair play. . . Although Lloyd George made a valiant effort to see that justice was done for Germany, he failed, not for the want of trying, but because of the implacable forces of Internationalism arrayed against him, characterized by the vicious and brutally ugly behavior, attitudes and demands of Georges Clemenceau of France.

> That Lloyd George was far-seeing can be gathered from his almost prophetic words written at Fontainebleau in March of 1919. Lloyd George was defeated by the revolutionary forces that had been gathering power since the 18th century. Well organized and financed, they were virtually unstoppable. In a sense Lloyd George was hampered by the presence of his controller. Sir Philip, A.G.D. Sassoon, Bart, related through marriage and blood ties to the Rothschilds. As a member of the British Privy Council, Sassoon was able to join the secret deliberations of the conferees.

Spelling out the French policy at Versailles and its aftermath, TIME Magazine of May 17, 1940 in a rare lapse of Rothschild censorship also confirmed it:

> To the vital Ministry of the Interior, Premier Reynaud appointed energetic, 54-year old Georges Mandel, until then Minister of Colonies. This was no new job for the sharp-nosed stocky little Clemencist, who as the Tiger's chef de cabinet during the last war ran the country's domestic affairs and kept up civilian morale.
> Born Jeroboam Rothschild, Mandel has often been called France's Disraeli; a super politician in a country of politicians, lately showed in the Colonial (and Post Office) Ministry that he had lost none of his drive and administrative flair that made him indispensable to Clemenceau. . .

From my studies at the British Museum it is obvious the success of the Paris Peace Conference and the Treaty of Versailles that followed was dependent upon universal acceptance of the League of Nations, the first organized attempt to set up a One World Government that would usurp the sovereignty of all nations, and give Palestine to the Zionists. This opinion is borne out by what Wilson said on his arrival in Paris in January 1919: The League of Nations is the central object of our meeting.

As is well known Wilson had been thoroughly coached and instructed by Mandel House, the servant of the Rothschilds and he knew that he had to obey orders. In researching the papers of Lloyd George at the British Museum, it became obvious to me that the British Prime Minister had put up a good fight against Wilson, but to no avail. In spite of vigorous protests from Lloyd George, Wilson insisted that the first item on the agenda had to be the proposals to establish The League of Nations.

I concentrated many months of research of The League of Nations at the British Museum and discovered that Wilson went to Paris armed with instructions indirectly received from Lord Rothschild via Mandel House as to his agenda.

Wilson had endeared himself to the Rothschilds through Mandel House, when as a professor at Princeton University; he tried to end what he called "snobbery" by banishing student clubs. He was not successful, but this very early indication of his Socialist beliefs drew the attention of House and eventually landed him the governorship of the State of New Jersey, and ultimately, the job of President of the United States. Chairman Will Hayes of the Republican Party National Committee said of Wilson:

> He wants to rebuild the world unimpeded in conformity with whatever Socialistic doctrines, whatever unlimited government-ownership notions, whatever hazy whims that may happen to possess him.

My study of Wilson's presidency shows that Hayes was on the right track, but had no way of knowing anything about the persons who were directing Wilson's agenda. There was nothing hazy at all about the clear instructions he was constantly receiving from London via Mandell House. One such set of instructions from London concerned Wilson's Fourteen Points. In fact the Fourteen Points he was to present to the Paris Peace Conference was authored by the Rothschilds and Justice Brandeis, who passed it to Wilson with orders to use as his own at the Conference, under the watchful eye of Bernard Baruch. The second set of instructions, the League of Nations instructions, was also passed off as Wilson's work. His speech at the beginning of WWI, that America was fighting the "ruling class and not the German people" was pure House rhetoric. To continue with quotes from Olivia Maria O'Grady:

> President Wilson, surrounded by the Jewish financial fraternity, pushed hither and yon by the sinister Colonel House, and counseled by the Zionist Brandeis, imagined himself the great "peace maker' of all history. He was a historian who proved that he knew nothing about history.
> In the hands of the Jews, who used him for their own particular purposes, he plunged this country [the United States] into a disastrous war, and started a chain of events that were meant to ultimately destroy America.
> Flattered and eulogized by those who bent him to their will, he fancied himself playing God, remaking the world and its people in his own image. Sworn in his high office, to protect and advance the interests of the American people, he suddenly believed he had been given a mandate to save the world.

> He called for 'peace without victory' and declared that he was plunging the United States into a 'war to end war' and to 'make the world safe for democracy.' History has been busy ever since underscoring the asininity of his double talk.
> Peace and victory came on November 11, 1918 and Wilson rushed to Paris where he lost both. (Olivia Maria O'Grady)

This is perhaps a trifle hard on Wilson who was, after all surrounded and hedged in by advisors:

> We can now properly appraise this treacherous criminal peace treaty, out of which has grown the present war (WWII).
>
> It was not Wilson who betrayed the German government by the promise of his Fourteen Points, nor Lloyd George who was false to the Arabs to induce them to enter the war; — it was Jeroboam Rothschild, Sir Philip Sassoon and Bernard Baruch. Wilson, Lloyd George and Clemenceau are culpable only to the extent that they acted in obedience to a power they dared not oppose. These three Jews, representing the money power of the Rothschild family, determined the essential provisions of the infamous peace treaty.
> They established the International Labor Board; they made provisions for the Reparations Commission and the Brussels Financial Conference; they gave Palestine to the Jews; they established without our membership the League of Nations and the World Court.

> It was our refusal to join that prevented the consummation of their grandiose elaborate machine for the government of the World. (Rothschild Money Trust, pages 67, 68)

Although the name of Colonel House is not mentioned in this account, nevertheless it was House who more than Baruch represented the Rothschild interests in the United States at the conference. Continuing from The Rothschild Money Trust:

> These three Jews are responsible for the abandonment of President Wilson's Fourteen Points and of the flagrant violations of the promises upon which Germany laid down her arms. If President Wilson's pledges had been observed we would have no World War II. Perhaps if we had joined the League of Nations there would be none, for we would be the subjects of the 'King Despot' who would rule us with an iron hand.. .
> Jeroboam Rothschild (Mandel) was a member of the Reynaud cabinet and resigned with him and fled with him when France refused to be merged into the British Empire, but decided instead to surrender. The people of France now appear to realize, according to the press, that they are now the victims of warmongers . . .
> The League of Nations scheme did not originate with President Wilson. He made no such claim. Its precise origin is unknown, but the Jews claim credit for it. It is no doubt their baby; for it has all the earmarks of their craftiness. . . The London Daily Mail said of it that it is 'the most elaborate sham which history has yet perpetrated.'

Under the pretense of writing a peace treaty with Germany this peace conference established Palestine as a home for the Jews and invested the British Government with a mandate for the government of the country. The Jews have been at war with the Arabs since and the situation has become so intolerable that the British Government sought to divide the country between the Jews and the Arabs and surrender its responsibility, which pleased neither Jew nor Arab.

The people of America do not want a super-government or to be ruled by the pope of Rome or a despot of the blood of Zion. We barely escaped it when the Republicans with the aid of twelve willful democrats defeated the League of Nations project by a very small margin; for the League of Nations was meant to be that very thing. (Olivia Maria O'Grady, pages 68, 69 and 85)

A fitting epitaph (and perhaps a dire warning to the world) was written by O'Grady:

By the end of 1938 the collapse of the League of Nations was almost complete. Of the sixty-two nations that had constituted its membership, only forty-nine remained. At the close of 1940 it had ceased to exist.

It had gone the way of its predecessors - the Holy Alliance (so greatly feared by the Rothschilds-author) the Concert of Europe, and the Permanent Court of Arbitration.

It had failed because the United States had refused to participate, and because humanity had not yet been reduced to its common denominator of mediocrity.

'Mother,' 'home,' 'the flag,' 'heaven' and 'God and Country' were still deeply rooted in the minds and hearts of the people. Another war, and perhaps yet another, would be necessary before such 'reactionary bourgeois' concepts were blasted from the breasts of human beings.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS: AN ATTEMPT TO ESTABLISH A ONE WORLD GOVERNMENT

One of the most astonishing aspects of The League of Nations was the great push to get it accepted by the United States, and the extraordinary lengths and efforts made for this purpose. Wilson demanded ratification of the treaty, as it stood, no discussion, no changes, and no modifications.

The American people, having been assessed by Rothschild agents in America as sufficiently ready to accept anything it was expected to accept secret agreements reached behind closed doors in 1915. This is what the Rothschilds were accustomed to seeing happen. It was always a case of "our will be done" or else expect plenty of trouble.

On September 22, 1919, Professor I. Shotwell, an American Fabianist, demanded that the Senate ratify the treaty without delay, and Charles McParland, General Secretary of the World Council of Churches seconded his plea!

I mention this to illustrate, just how well entrenched International Socialism was in the United States.

Zionism was the key leader, even then. Regarding the Zionist movement in America, there is an interesting account of it in History of Zionism by Walter Laqueur:

> Only in 1917 did the Zionist organization in America come into being. . . But despite the events in Eastern Europe . . . the impact of the movement was hardly noticed in American life. Europe, after all, was far away and the situation of American Jewry and its prospects gave no cause for concern. The movement was basically 'East Side' in character. It lacked money, prestige and political influence. Its leaders, on the other hand, were assimilated Jews such as Rabbi Stephen Wise. . . The breakthrough came during the early years of the war in Europe, when Brandeis became its leader. Brandeis was one of the most respected American lawyers, later a Justice of the Supreme Court. He was won over by Jacob de Haas, a British Zionist and close associate of Herzl, who had settled in America in 1901.
> Brandeis, in the words of other Zionist leaders was unrelated to any form of Jewish life, unread in its literature and unfamiliar with its traditions; he had to rediscover the Jewish people. But once his imagination had been captured by the Zionist ideal, he devoted much of his time and energy to the movement, whose president he was from 1914 until his appointment to the Supreme Court. It was the identification of Louis Brandeis with the movement, more than any other single event, which made Zionism a political force. To be a Zionist had suddenly become respectable. (Pages 160,161)

There are some very important statements in this extract from Laqueur's book.

1. Zionism was not the concern of the vast majority of American Jews.

2. The vast majority of American Jews were not much concerned with the war in Europe.

3. Brandeis was not a religious Jew in any sense of the accepted meaning of a "religious" Jew.

4. The Zionist movement before Brandeis joined it was basically a Socialist movement of East side Bolshevik non-religious Jews, the very same ones whom Trotsky recruited for his mission to overturn Christian Russia, in other words, Zionist Jews.

5. The majority of American Jews were not interested in migrating to Israel until Brandeis got their attention. Apparently they did not regard Palestine as a "homeland," at least not in the political sense of a Zionist State, because their religion taught that there could be no Jewish State until the return of the Messiah.

In fairness and wishing no harm to the Jews, and to be strictly objective, I researched thousands of pages of Brandeis history, but could find no evidence that he rediscovered his Jewish religion. I could find no evidence that Brandeis became a religious Jew. What was discovered was that De Haas had converted Brandeis to active Zionism, which is a political, and not a religious movement, in which political movement Brandeis became more of a convert than St. Paul was to Christianity. Brandeis went on to become the provisional president of the World Federation of Zionists, in itself a purely political non-religious body of non-religious Jews.

Perhaps the best-known historic event in which the Rothschilds participated at all stages was the so-called "Balfour Declaration," which is generally accepted as the beginning of the State of Israel in the land of Palestine, which the Zionists had been working to achieve for the past hundred years. But by 1914 they had not made progress toward their goal, at least none worthy of mention. Zionism was no nearer to its often-stated goal of a Jewish State in Palestine than Herzl had been in 1897. According to the Congressional Records and papers in the British Museum, plus the War Memoirs of Robert Lansing, the American ambassador to London, and the writing of Ramsey McDonald, the First World War provided a golden opportunity for the furthering of the Herzl dream of a Zionist state in Palestine. Lansing pushed for America to enter WWI in 1915 and in pressuring Wilson, House, acting for the Rothschilds, joined him. Pressures on Wilson were enormous and the United States entered the war in Europe against the wishes of 87 percent of the American people.

The impression has always been given by establishment historians that a vast majority of Jews favored the establishment of a "Homeland for the Jews" in Palestine. Through a good deal of research I found this to be much of an exercise in propaganda. Actually, in Russia and Britain, there was not inconsiderable opposition to the idea from religious Jews who believed no such homeland could be established until after the return of their Messiah.

To blunt the attitude of religious Jews, Weisman made a speech in London on May 20, 1917 in which he asserted, that he knew that the British government was prepared to support Zionist plans for Palestine.

Of course he was not officially entitled to make such a claim, but no doubt knowing that the power and prestige of Lord Rothschild would more than likely carry the day, he did so, anyway. The anti-Zionist religious Jewish opposition under the direction of Claude Montefiore of the famous Montefiore Jewish dynasty was extremely upset, especially as Weizman had referred to religious Jews as "a small minority."

According to A History of Zionism, a letter, signed by Montefiore and David Alexander, the presidents of the British Board of Deputies was sent to the London Times newspaper, which was published on May 24, 1917, under the heading Palestine and Zionism, Views of Anglo-Jewry:

> They reiterated their protest against the Zionist theory of a homeless nationality, which if generally accepted, would have the effect everywhere of stamping Jews as an anachronism; religion was the only certain criterion. The signatories also said that it would be a calamity if Jewish settlers in Palestine were to get special rights in the way of political privileges or economic preference. This was a contradiction to the principle of equal rights for all. It would compromise the Jews wherever they had secured equal rights and would involve Palestinian Jews in the bitterest feuds with their neighbors of other races. (Pages 193, 194)

The wisdom and foresight of the religious non-Zionist Jews views is mirrored in the tragic events that overtook Palestine, which remains in a turmoil to this very day. Years later their views were echoed by a religious Jewish organization, Friends of Jerusalem (Naturei Karta). In a series of 12 full-page advertisements in the New York Times, they decried the State of Israel as an illegitimate state, established in total flagrant disobedience to religious Jews and the Torah and a calamity for Orthodox Jews.

BRITISH GOVERNMENT TREACHERY BETRA YS ARABS AND LAWRENCE OF ARABIA

By a good deal of trickery involving the betrayal of Lawrence of Arabia, secret deals between the English and French (the Sykes Picot Treaty) the two governments decided to divide Arab lands between them at the end of the war. Does that sound extraordinary? Yes, it was and could only have been done with the backing of the Rothschilds. One such deception involved a letter from the Zionist leader, Sokolow, who designated another Zionist, a certain Sacher, to prepare a draft addressed to Balfour, that the reconstitution of Palestine as a Jewish state was one of its essential war aims. Having second thoughts Sokolow believed this was too ambitious:

> If we ask too much we will get nothing," a view evidently shared by Lord Rothschild. However, they were appalled when the Foreign Office issued its own draft, which employed such terms as 'asylum' and 'refuge' and 'sanctuary' for victims of Jewish persecution. This was, needless to say, rejected by the Zionists, who insisted that the declaration would have no value at all unless the principle of recognizing Palestine as a National Home for the Jewish people was affirmed. Eventually, on 18 July, Rothschild submitted a compromise formula to Balfour. It mentioned not a Jewish state, but a National home.

Unfortunately the voices of protest by religious Jewish leaders were drowned out by political Zionism, which with the backing of the Rothschilds carried the day in their favor. Ramsey McDonald summed up his feelings about such underhanded behavior:

> We encouraged the Arab revolt in Turkey by promising to create an Arab kingdom from the Arab provinces of the Ottoman Empire, including Palestine.
> At the same time we were encouraging the Jews to help us by promising them that Palestine would be placed at their disposal for settlement and government; and also at the same time we were making with France the Sykes Picot agreement partitioning the territory, which we instructed our Governor General in Egypt to promise to the Arabs. The story is one of crude duplicity and we cannot escape the reprobation which is its sequel. (Emphasis added)

What exactly did McDonald mean when he said: At the time we were encouraging the Jews to help us promising them that Palestine would be theirs. How were the Jews to help with the war? By providing men from Jewish countries to fight the Turks like the Arab did? No, it was nothing like that. The Zionists provided no manpower to help the British and the Arabs to fight the Turks. How did the Zionists help?

They persuaded the U.S. Congress to declare war on Germany against the wishes of 87% of the American people. For that, behind the backs of the Arabs and other Palestinian residents, whose antecedents had lived in Palestine for 7,000 years; the British, with U.S. complicity, promised Palestine to the Zionists although not remotely sanctioned to do so by any international law.

Only a very few voices were raised in protest over what Arnold Toynbee called "the calamity." Several writers, Olivia Maria O'Grady among them, joined in the protest against the Sykes Picot partitioning plan that led to the so-called Balfour Declaration:

> Throughout the war, England and her allies continuously proclaimed that they were fighting for world freedom. What kind of a freedom is contained in the Balfour Declaration? By what right did Britain propose to dispose of the land of another people? Upon what moral ground may one nation seek to establish a national home for alien people in the territory of another? Palestine did not belong to Britain.

Arnold Toynbee was a greatly favored British historian and public figure of note who had received universal recognition for his work, A Study of History, comprising ten volumes, constituting an exhaustive re-examination of human development in the light of the idealist philosophy of history.

Thus no one would dare call McDonald, Toynbee and Lawrence of Arabia "anti-Jewish" or "anti-Semitic" the threat of which had kept so many others of a like mind from speaking out against the duplicity of the British Government as expressed in the illicit Balfour Declaration. Toynbee expressed his feelings of anger about the betrayal of the Arabs over Palestine in A Study of History.

> While the direct responsibility for the calamity that overtook the Palestinian Arabs in A.D., 1948 was on the heads of Zionist Jews who seized lebensroum for themselves in Palestine by force of arms in that year, > a heavy load of indirect responsibility was on the heads of the people of the United Kingdom; for the Zionists would not have had in A.D. 1948 the opportunity to conquer an Arab country in which they had what amounted to no more than an inconsiderable minority in A.D. 1918 if during the intervening thirty years, the power of the United Kingdom had not been exerted continuously to make possible the entry of Jewish immigrants into Palestine, contrary to the will, in despite of the protests and without regard to the forebodings of the Arab inhabitants of the country who in A.D. 1918, were duly to become the victims of this long pursued British policy.

Lawrence of Arabia (Colonel Lawrence), who could less still be accused of anti-Jewish bias or smeared as "anti Semitic" did not remain silent over the betrayal of his commitment to the Arabs:

> If we won the war, the promises to the Arabs were dead paper. Yet the Arab inspiration was our main tool in winning the Eastern War. So I assured them that England kept her word in letter and in spirit. In this comfort they performed their fine things; but, of course, instead of being proud of what we did together, I was bitterly ashamed.

Other voices added to what Lawrence had expressed as a feeling of utter betrayal, among them, O'Grady:

> Colonel Lawrence had good reason to be ashamed. While the Arabs were fighting and dying for England, Britain's Foreign Minister, Arthur Balfour was bartering Palestine for a Jewish pledge to bring the United States into the war on England's side. In addition to this treachery, England and France, by the terms of the Sykes Picot Treaty agreed to divide the Arab lands between them at the end of the war.

I pondered for months over the statement of Toynbee, because Toynbee's background and affiliations made it highly unlikely that he would express feelings in the least bit critical of the Zionists or of his mentors, Rockefeller and Rothschild. According to documents in the War Office files (and copies in the British Museum) Toynbee was the protege of Lord Bryce, a follower of the Philosophical Radicals. Toynbee followed in the footsteps of Bryce by writing an article for the Encyclopedia Britannica, 9th Edition.

The article was entitled German Terror in France: A Historical Record and it was an unabashed exercise in anti-German propaganda, published, significantly in New York in 1917. Obviously, it was an incitement to help President Wilson with his battle to drag America into the war in Europe. Though none of the claims of German brutality could be substantiated — nevertheless, the article was widely accepted as true.

It was just the kind of justification Wilson needed from a Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford, as the reason why America needed to send her sons to die in France "to make the world safe for democracy."

We next hear of Toynbee when he was appointed as a Member of the British Delegation to the Paris Peace Conference, - hardly the prestigious position that he would jeopardize at the time of his planned future with the Royal Institute for International Affairs, the Foreign Policy arm of the Committee of 300.

As such, Toynbee must have been intimately familiar with the promises made to the Sheriff of Mecca, Hussein bin Ali and Colonel Lawrence, and the magnitude of the subsequent betrayal of the trust of these two men, who had made possible British victory over the Turks.

Toynbee had authored a major work, which called for an authoritarian One World Government, a copy of which was delivered to President Wilson by Colonel House and upon which many of Wilson's and the Royal Institute for International Affairs dictates were based. I found that Toynbee was supported with funding to the extent of a quarter of a million dollars, but there was no direct indication that he was also funded by the Rothschilds, although there might have been this connection, in view of the fact that it was House who delivered the instructions Wilson was to follow at The League of Nations conference.

Herein lies the seeds of disaster, the origin of the turmoil that continues to this day in Palestine, and fair-minded people, like the Jewish Orthodox Naturei Karta, knew the well hidden history of the Rothschild-Balfour sell-out of the Arabs contained in that document. The Naturei Karta Orthodox Jews do not agree with a "Jewish Homeland" conception. This noble Jewish Orthodox movement is opposed to a Zionist presence in Palestine.

As for the Christians of Europe and America, they have fallen into a state of indifference toward the fate of Palestine's "other" inhabitants. This does not redound to their honor and the Christian ethic of fair play embodied in the words of Christ: "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you."

Throughout the ages, philosophers, historians and scholars have posed the question: Why is it that the history of wars show, that they are always begun by the so-called "elite," the rulers of nations? One reason as enunciated by Henry Clay is when ever there is discontent among the populace, that foreign threat is used as a pretext to quell such unrest.

The second and perhaps the most important reason is that all wars are economic in origin. Since control of banking and finances are in the hands of the elite, they have been known to excite wars for economic gains. For instance, the international bankers reaped huge fortunes from the First World War. The Rothschilds gained enormous profits out of financing both sides of the American Civil War.

There is also the Bertrand Russell theory, that wars diminish populations. In the eyes of the Committee of 300, the world is filled with too many people, who are depleting the world's natural resources at an alarming rate. The solution, Russell said, is to get rid of what he referred to as "useless eaters," who should be culled at regular intervals.

Ten million dead in WWI was not enough to satisfy Russell, who promoted the idea, that plagues and pandemics should be introduced at regular intervals to wipe out "useless eaters," who had escaped the wars. The AIDS pandemic was deliberately introduced in the expectation that it would wipe out millions from the pool of "excess population."

The elite have devised ways to preserve their members from plagues as evidence by the success in warding off the Black Plague pandemic of the Middle Ages. With regard to military service of the kind faced by foot soldiers, the elite have a record of successful evasive tactics witness the record of President G.W. Bush and Vice President Richard Cheney. These are not isolated instances, but are found in abundance in the records of all nations.

UNDERHAND DOUBLE DEALING

William L. Langer, Coolidge Professor of History, Emeritus Harvard University, somewhat tersely stated the political situation in 1915 as follows:

> Campaigns in Asiatic Turkey, 1916-1917
> . . . Palestine was to be under an international administration. May 9, 1916, The Sykes-Picot Agreement between Britain and France . . . the territories mentioned in the above agreement to be French and British administered, while the rest of Arabia was to be divided into French and British spheres of influence, though organized as an Arab state or federation of states.

In a classic understatement, Professor Langer then added: "These agreements were not entirely compatible with other agreements made with Arab chieftains, agreements, which indeed, were not compatible with each other." In other words two different mandates were made, offering two sets of objectives, the one totally unknown to the Arabs.

Is there any previous history of such actions by a U.S. president ever having been approved? Was it lawful under the U.S. Constitution for Wilson to have carried out his negotiations, essentially in privacy with private persons not officially sanctioned by their government? The answer to these questions must be in the negative. The consequences for the U.S. Government and for the American people were far reaching, and humiliating. Moreover, there has never been an explanation for the American people why the Balfour Declaration was submitted to Lionel Rothschild for his acceptation, since he held no official position? For this reason alone, the Balfour Declaration was and is a spurious document. It is clear that already at that point the British Government had begun to double-deal the Arabs and their brilliant British leader, Colonel Thomas Edward Lawrence, best known as "Lawrence of Arabia." Professor Langer then goes back two years to October 31, 1914 and gives a full account of the geographical position of the Arabs, and what Britain did to try and snatch victory from the jaws of defeat in the War in the Middle East:

> Lord Kitchener (Commander of the British forces) had offered Hussein, the Grand Sheriff of Mecca a conditional guaranty of independence. Negotiations between the Sheriff and the British government were embarked upon in July 1915. On January 30, 1916, the British accepted Hussein terms, leaving the exact status of Baghdad and Basra and of the sphere of French influence in Syria, undetermined.

It is worthy of note that there is no mention here of a "Jewish homeland" in Palestine being reserved for Jews.

> On June 5, 1916, the beginning of the Arab revolts in the Hijaz and an attack on the Turkish garrison at Medina.
> On June 7, Hussein proclaimed the independence of the Hijaz and the (Turkish) garrison at Medina surrendered.

On October 29, Hussein was proclaimed king of all Arabs. He summoned the Arabs to make war on the Turks.

On December 15, the British government recognized Hussein as king of the Hijaz, and all Arabs. It was largely in order to strengthen the Arab insurrection that Sir Archibald Murray, (commander in Egypt since March 19, 1916) decided on a cautious offensive in Sinai and Palestine. During all of these revisions and military actions, there was never once any mention whatsoever of a 'Jewish Homeland' in Palestine being a part of any of the negotiations and agreement between the British government and the Arabs. One would certainly be on safe ground to assume, that had this been mentioned, the Arabs would have baulked at it there and then, and would never taken El Arish. The majority of historians agree on this vital point.

On December 21, 1916, the British took El Arish, after building a railway and pipeline across the desert. On April 17-19 1917, the British were forced back by a combined force of Turks and Germans with heavy losses. June 28, Murray was replaced by Sir Edmund Allenby.

On July 6 began the emergence of the spectacular war hero Colonel Thomas E. Lawrence, who galvanized the Arab movement and took Aqaba, thus beginning the brilliant thrusts against the Turkish garrisons and especially against the guards of the Hijaz railway, the most important link in the Turkish communications. History confirms that all this fighting along the Hijaz rail link and Aqaba was done solely by Arab forces under the command of > Lawrence. No British troops were involved in these key campaigns and there is no mention of any Jewish forces being involved. It is readily admitted by Langer and other historians that without the help of the Arabs, the British would not have been able to drive Turkey out of Arabia and Palestine. In reflection, it was the Arabs under Lawrence, who drove the Turks out of Arabia and Palestine. It is utterly illogical to believe, that the Arabs under Lawrence and under his promises did so knowing, that a 'Homeland for the Jews' was to be the reward for their fighting."

Langer then goes on to say:

> On the Palestine front the new British commander, Gen Edmund Allenby, had begun his advance in October 1917. . . On December 9, Allenby took Jerusalem. The British advance was delayed by the fact that Allenby had been obliged to send large contingents of his army to France to meet the crisis on the battlefront in France where the British Army was being defeated with heavy losses, and to halt the victorious German advances. The British Army ordered all its forces fighting in Mesopotamia and Turkey back to the German and French fronts to help to stem the advances of French and German troops in Europe.

I suspect, that there were no British troops left in Palestine other than a few garrison and supply troops, the vast majority having been sent to France on March 18, 1918. Langer statement, that British forces materially assisted by the Arabs is wrong. It was Arab forces assisted by a few British troops left behind after the main British Army was shipped in France that did the bulk of the fighting. Langer added that British forces put an end to the Turkish presence in Palestine. I suggest his account is palpably wrong.

It was the Arab Forces that ended a Turkish presence in Palestine. No French or British or Jewish troops were present at major battles in Palestine. That is an undisputed fact. Toynbee and Lawrence were horrified and expressed outrage against Langer's report that appeared in the London Times declaring it false. It is obvious that stripped of his British troops, Allenby had to rely on Arab forces to press his campaign against the Turks, knowing that the battle-seasoned Arabs would push the Turks out of Palestine during their September 8, 1918 campaign. Langer states:

> The British broke the Turkish lines near the Mediterranean and began to roll up the enemy forces. The British forces, assisted materially by the Arabs under Lawrence, were now able to push northward.

Here again Langer very much tries to minimize the key role played by the Arab forces who did most of the fighting. On page 316 of her book, historian O'Grady stated her opinion of the events in Palestine:

> With the British Army marching on the Holy Land, Jewish prospects for Palestine at the hands of the Kaiser began to fade. If Great Britain would guarantee world Jewry a foothold in Palestine, world Jewry would work for Great Britain. Negotiations were opened with the British government in February 1917, with Sir Mark Sykes acting as the principal intermediary. On November 2, 1917, Lord Balfour reduced the results of the secret bargaining and extensive communications between private persons in the U.S. in a letter addressed to Lionel Rothschild, the uncrowned King of Israel.

This letter was to become known as The Balfour Declaration and read as follows:

> Dear Lord Rothschild, I have much pleasure in conveying to you, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, the following declaration in sympathy with Jewish Zionist aspirations which has been submitted to and approved by the Cabinet.
>
> His majesty's Government views with favor, the establishment in Palestine of a national homeland for the Jewish people and will use its best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of non-Jewish communities in Palestine or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country. I shall be pleased if you would bring this Declaration to the knowledge of the Zionist Federation.
>
> The Jews labored diligently to make the Gentile public believe that Lord Balfour, seeing the 'justice' of their cause wrote the declaration after 'selling' the idea to the British government. In reporting the issuance of the letter, the Zionists said:
>
> 'The Balfour Declaration is justly so-called, not only because it fell to Sir Arthur Balfour, as Foreign Secretary, to write the historic letter, but also because he, more than any other single statesman, is responsible for the policy embodied in the Declaration'.

In fairness to the Jewish people, I searched, but could not find any reference to Lawrence of Arabia or Sheriff Hussein nor any of the leaders of the people living in Palestine having been consulted by Balfour or Sykes although a diligent search was made to see if such had perhaps been recorded and had escaped the notice of researchers, but such was not be the case. Continuing with O'Grady:

> And of course, nothing could be further from the truth. The original draft was written by the Jews themselves. Who was the Justice Brandeis who edited it? Brandeis was a far left Socialist of the American Democrat Party, a U.S. Supreme Court Justice and a member of several Zionist organizations. All through the negotiations of Arthur Balfour and Lord Rothschild, none of which ever included Sheriff Hussein or Lawrence of Arabia; Brandeis acted as a United States citizen and was never authorized by the Congress, the State Department to act as a U.S. government spokesman.

It is stated by historian O'Grady that "President Wilson approved it." That raises important issues: When Wilson became involved in the "discussions" between Brandeis, Lionel Rothschild, Lord Balfour and the American Zionist Party, was he acting in a capacity other than the President?

* If in the negative, was Wilson acting officially in his role of U.S. President?

* Had the Congress approved Wilson's acts and were they funded by the Congress?

* If in the affirmative had Wilson been authorized by a U.S. Congressional Resolution to act in any capacity whatsoever?

> President Wilson approved it, and it was then submitted to Balfour for his signature. No event in the > history of the United States is more humiliating. There is no explanation as to why the Declaration was written by Brandeis, who held no government office and then submitted to Lionel Rothschild, who held no official position in the British government. (Maria O'Grady)

The behind-the-scenes activities that went on are explained by Dr. Jacob de Haas, in his Biography of Justice Brandeis:

> A considerable number of drafts [of the Balfour Declaration] were made in London and transmitted to the United States through War Office channels for the use of the American Zionist Political Committee. The American ascendancy in the war councils led the British to ask for President Wilson's consent and approval of the terminology of the declaration before its issuance.
>
> The draft that was cabled from government to government was handed to the Brandeis regime for its approval. After a most necessary revision, President Wilson acting through Colonel House, who was in full sympathy with Zionist aims, authorized cabling to the British government the version that was published, and which all the allied governments in turn gave their approval.
> The 'Brandeis regime' refers to the Provisional Committee of the General Zionist Affairs of which Brandeis was chairman. Can you the reader, imagine that! Cabled drafts, the United States, the British War Office, all working to the benefit of the Zionists! What immense power do they wield!

Again, there is no mention of Hussein, Lawrence, the Arab leaders or the people of Palestine being consulted in any way, nor does it appear that the United States Congress knew anything about the secret negotiations between the non-American Government Brandeis committee and Lord Rothschild, Wilson and Balfour. Only the Zionists were consulted.

> Most students of Jewish intrigue suspected both the British and Jewish schemes and purpose behind the Balfour Declaration. Although the United States had been in the war for nearly seven months when the Declaration was made public, its significance as the factor that involved the United States was not unnoticed.
> There was considerable evidence available from which accurate inferences might be drawn. Government negotiations for deals of this nature however, are always secret, and it is usually very difficult to obtain conclusive evidence at the time of the transaction.
> When the event is beyond repair and lost in the mists of the past, men are apt to write their memoirs and to boast of secret exploits that one time rocked the world. So it was with Mr. Landman. He was honorary Secretary of the Second Joint Zionist Council of the United Kingdom, editor of the Zionist and Secretary and Solicitor for the Zionist Organization. Later he was legal adviser to the New Zionist Organization.

Under the title, Great Britain, the Jews and Palestine, published in the London Jewish Chronicle of February 7, 1936, Mr. Landman writes in part as follows:

During the critical days of the war, in 1916, when the defection of Russia was imminent and Jewish opinion was generally anti-Russian, and hopes that Germany if victorious, would in certain circumstances give them Palestine, several attempts were made by the Allies to bring America into the War on their side. These attempts were unsuccessful.

Mr. George Picot, of the French Embassy in London and Gout of the Quai d'Orsay Eastern Section, who was at that time in close touch with the late Sir Mark Sykes, Cabinet Secretariat, took the opportunity of convincing the representatives of the British and French governments that the best and perhaps the only way to induce the American President to come into the War was to secure the co-operation of Zionist Jewry by promising them Palestine.

By so doing, the Allies would enlist and mobilize the hitherto unsuspected powerful force of Zionist Jewry in America, and elsewhere in favor of the Allies on a quid pro quo basis. At that time, President Wilson attached the greatest possible importance to the advice of Mr. Justice Brandeis.

Sir Mark obtained permission of the War Cabinet to authorize Mr. Malcolm to approach the Zionists on that basis, neither Mark Sykes nor Mr. Malcolm knew who the Zionists leaders were, and it was Mr. L.J. Greenberg to whom Mr. Malcolm applied for information to whom he should address himself... The Zionists carried out their part and helped to bring America in, and the Balfour Declaration of November 2, 1917 was but the public conformation of the verbal agreement of 1916.

> This verbal agreement was made with the previous acquiescence and approval of not only the British, French, American and other Allied Governments, but also of the Arab leaders. . . As already explained elsewhere in detail Dr. Weitzman and Mr. Sokolow knew that Mr. James Malcolm came to them as the emissary of the British War Cabinet, which authorized him to say in their name that England would give Palestine to the Jews in return for Zionist assistance, through Justice Brandeis in inducing the United States to come to the help of the Allies. Both Sir Mark Sykes and Mr. Malcolm informed the Arab representatives in London and Paris that without the assistance of the United States the prospects of any Arab State arising after the war were problematical, and that they must therefore agree that Palestine should go to the Jews as a regard for their assistance in bringing in the United States.

After a good deal of diligent research, I could not find the names of the "Arab representatives in Paris and London" allegedly informed of the plot to go behind the promises given to Hussein bin Ali, Sheriff of Mecca and Medina and to Colonel Lawrence, nor does Mr. Landman name these mysterious "Arab representatives." That raises the question "why not?" As he mentions everyone else by name, why are the "Arab representatives" kept anonymous?

What is abundantly clear is, that neither Lawrence or Hussein bin Ali were informed of what was going on, while they were risking their lives and the lives of their men in the war against Turkey, nor could any record be found that these two men knew anything about the secret negotiations with the Zionists nor that they were asked to send their representatives in London and Paris. The Zionists were informed, but not the American people on whose backs the War was to be fought.

"PERFIDIOUS ALBION" LIVES UP TO ITS REPUTATION

> In any event, like the ordinary American people, Lawrence and Hussein bin Ali knew nothing about what Ramsey McDonald called "a triple deal" going on behind their backs. And when the time came for Wilson to drag America into the European conflict against the will of the vast majority, his enfeebled excuse was the war was a war "to make the world safe for democracy." The treason committed by Wilson lives on. Dr. Bella Dodd wrote in 1930 that so bad was the situation under Wilson, that he felt "modern history is largely a conspiracy against the truth. (The Conspiracy Against God and Man, page 9)

I discovered that but for the backing of Baron Edmond Rothschild the settlements of Russian Zionists established at Rison, Zikron and Rosh Pina would have failed and there would have been virtually no Jewish presence in Palestine. This was a key part of Rothschild strategy to make it appear that Jews were already living in Palestine — a subterfuge that worked. Rothschild also assisted with establishing two new colonies, Ekron and Medull. Altogether twenty-one Agricultural settlements existed by the end of the century, but Rothschild did not trust the abilities of the colonists and insisted in keeping direct supervision and control of the settlements. Hubert Herring in his book And So To War sums up the price the U.S. had to pay to so that the Zionists might have Palestine:

> We paid for the war. We paid with the lives of 126,000 dead, of 234,300 mutilated and wounded. We paid with the dislocated lives of hundreds of thousands whom the war wrenched from their accustomed places in a peaceful world. We paid in the imponderable damage to our national morale through the lashings of war hysteria. We paid with a period of economic confusion from which we have not yet escaped. The direct bill for the war reached the figure of fifty-five billions of dollars. The indirect bill can never be reckoned.

And what was the quid pro-quo from the Zionists side? As far as I could ascertain it amounted to absolutely nothing. An interesting aside was the failure of Herzl to obtain the blessing of Pope Pius X for Jewish immigration to Palestine: We are unable to favor this movement. We cannot prevent the Jews from going to Jerusalem, but we could never sanction it.

According to A History of Zionism, pages 129-130, the exchange took place at a meeting with the Pope in 1903, meaning that Lord Arthur Balfour knew that there was strong opposition from the Catholic Church against Zionist immigration to Palestine, long before he signed on to the declaration, but about which he informed no one. So the pattern of double-dealing was already apparent in 1903.

Catholic opposition to Israel may have contributed to the Rothschilds violent hatred of Russia with its large Christian population.

Herzl, the father of Zionism died when he was 44 years old. According to A History of Zionism, he never got on very well with the Rothschilds or with Orthodox Jewry whose leading rabbis did not like his autocratic style. Herzl always wanted to have the final say on everything.

> There was, as Herzl's critics pointed out, very little specifically Jewish in Herzl. This emerges perhaps more clearly in his vision of the Jewish state...
> Herzl envisaged a modern, technologically advanced and enlightened state, enlightened by the Jews, but not specifically a Jewish state. (A History of Zionism, pages 132-133)

It can hardly be argued that Herzl was interested in Palestine as a religious "homeland" for the Jews, particularly in light of the fact, that the bulk of the new settlers came from Russia and had no previous connection to Palestine and there was no history of Russian Jews ever having lived there, nor were they particularly religious.

Lacquer makes this abundantly plain. Lord Chamberlain came forward with an offer to provide a "homeland" for the Jews in Uganda, even though Uganda was not the British Government's land to give. Chamberlain told Herzl that he had been on a tour of Uganda and thought: Here is a land for Dr. Herzl, but of course he only wants Palestine or its neighborhood. He was right. Herzl brushed aside the idea. His fixation was with Palestine and nothing else would do. On May 30, 1903 he wrote Rothschild: I am not discouraged. I already have a very powerful man to help me. (A History of Zionism, Walter Laqueur, pages 122,123)

This was the true autocratic style of Herzl in action. Although I was not able to uncover any direct links between the Rothschilds and Sir Halford Mackinder, such as correspondence that passed between intermediaries hinting that the two did consult on a number of matters, especially in writing the blue print for the coming One World Government-

New World Order which had been assigned to Mackinder to complete. A protege of the London School of Economics which was a hotbed for Communist ideals, Mackinder nevertheless put up a good conservative front and is believed to have influenced President Wilson at the Paris Peace Conference as to what steps were to be implemented to usher in a New World Order through a League of Nations mandate. It is certain that the Rothschilds provided a great deal of input for the World Socialist dream. One month after Wilson arrived at the Paris Peace Conference, Mackinder's new book Democratic Ideals and Reality was published. The timing of the release of the book was no accident. In his book Mackinder called for a New World Order (NWO) to be established in a One World Government, ostensibly The League of Nations. If this goal could not be achieved by peaceful, voluntary means, then force was to be resorted to.

Mackinder admitted that while the New World Order would be ideally a democratic institution, it could never be expected that at times it would not be a dictatorship. The Zionists claimed that The League of Nations was their concept and this is referred to by Maria O'Grady in her book where she stated:

> President Wilson was surrounded by Jewish financial fraternity pushed hither and yon by the sinister Colonel House and counseled by the Zionist Brandeis. (Page 342)

The Zionists greatly favored the concept of a League of Nations and claimed it as their creation: The League is a Jewish idea, said Nahum Sokolow at the Carlsbad Conference. We created it after a fight of 25 years.

Ultimate World Government dominated by Socialists is the long-held goal of Socialism, and it is well known that the concept was favored by the Rothschilds. As one of their own family, Jacob Schiff worked hard to establish a League of Nations. It received a donation of 3,000 pounds from N.M. Rothschild of the London branch of the family. As we shall see there may have been an ulterior motive to this, as the League was to play a decisive role in granting a mandate for Palestine to the British Government, a decisive step along the road to granting "a Homeland" for the Jews in Palestine. With that in mind I return to Lord Balfour and his so-called "Balfour Declaration," based on double-dealing, deception and secret deals behind the backs of Colonel Lawrence and the Arabs.

Balfour made haste to explain that a "Jewish Homeland" in Palestine did not mean the imposition of a Jewish state upon the inhabitants of Palestine, but in the light of subsequent events, this emerged as the goal of the Zionists. As Balfour put it:

> . . . but the further development of the existing Jewish community, in order that they may become a center in which the Jewish people, as a whole, might take, on grounds of religion and race, interest and pride.

What Balfour left out was that nothing the British did or said could obscure the fact that Palestine was not theirs to give, nor did the British Government have the slightest right to secure a mandate for Palestine. But Balfour, backed by Lord Nathan Rothschild, pressed ahead anyway, as if the two men had an inherent right to act in the arbitrary manner which they saw fit. The right of the Arab and other population groups, including Christians that extended back for more than 7,000 years was totally disregarded by Lord Balfour. No less an authority than Walter Laqueur, one of the foremost experts on Zionism confirmed that the bulk of the Jews who were to inhabit Palestine under the Balfour Declaration came from Russia. They had no previous connection to Palestine. Laqueur also pointed out that Russian Jews were not overly happy about being uprooted from Russia and sent to Palestine:

> Russian Jewry was divided in its attitude toward Zionism and a Jewish national home (a religious homeland) and would not have in any case have been able to keep Russia in the war. The Allies on the other hand, to put it somewhat crudely, would have won the war even if no promise to the Zionists had been made.

What Laqueur was explaining, if somewhat obliquely, was the "deal" the Zionists had struck with Balfour, namely, that if the Zionists could bring the United States into the war on the side of the allies, the British would establish a Jewish Homeland in Palestine in return.

> At a private meeting soon after the passage of the Balfour Declaration, when asked whether it had been his intention to make a bid for Jewish support in the war, Balfour snapped 'certainly not' and went on to explain that he felt that he was instrumental in righting a wrong of world historical dimensions. In 1922 Balfour made a speech in which he said that the whole culture of Europe had been guilty of great crimes against the Jews, and Britain had taken the initiative in giving them the opportunity of developing in peace, the great gifts which they had, in the past been able to apply in countries of the Diaspora. (A History of Zionism, page 203)

Balfour did not explain why it was considered legal to give Palestine to the Jews when it belonged to a people who had been there for 7,000 years, especially as a big tract of land in Madagascar, as well as land in Uganda, had been offered and rejected without discussion. Nor did Balfour explain that his magnanimous gesture in favor of the Jews would be at the expense of the Arab and other non-Jewish populations of Palestine. He never explained what connections the bulk of the new settlers, coming as they did from Russia had with Palestine.

According to Dr. Jacob de Haas, Balfour's altruistic protestations must be very much doubted because the real motive behind the Declaration was to get the United States to enter the war on the side of the Allies.

Confirmation of the true motives behind the Balfour Declaration came from another well-founded source, Congressional Record, April 25, 1939, pages 6597-6604, which reflects a speech made in the U.S. Senate by Senator Nye:

> There has been published in a series of works under the title "The Next War." One of the volumes in this series is entitled "Propaganda in the Next War." This particular volume was written by one Sydney Rogerson.
> I have been unable to obtain any trace of his background; but the editor in chief of all of these works, including the one entitled "Propaganda in the Next War" is by a man whose name is recognized the world over as a authority in Great Britain. He is none other than Captain Liddell Hart, associated with the London Times, a writer and military authority in Europe.
> I understand that this particular volume "Propaganda in the Next War," published last fall and placed in circulation, instead of having the circulation enlarged, now is suffering at the hands of those who desire to retire it from circulation. A few days ago I came on the floor of the Senate with the volume itself. I am sorry that I do not have it with me > today. I am told that it is the only copy of "Propaganda in the Next War" available in the United States. It can be had, I can borrow it against if there is any occasion for me to need it in the Senate, but it is no longer easy to obtain. I wish I had the entire work and that it could be read by every member of the Senate.

The following are quotations from Propaganda in the Next War:

> From time to time the issue of which side the United States would take hung in the balance and the final result was a credit to our profaned machine. There remain the Jews. It has been estimated that of the world's population of 15,000,000 no fewer than 5,000,000 are in the United States; 25 percent of the population of New York are Jews. During the Great War we bought off this huge Jewish public by the promise of a National Home in Palestine, held by Ludendorf to be a masterstroke of propaganda, as it enabled us not only to appeal to the Jews in America, but to the Jews in Germany as well.

George Armstrong in his work The Rothschild Money Trust explains how this came about:

> There can be no doubt about the fact that prior to President Wilson's second election in 1916 he kept us out of the war. There can likewise be no doubt about the fact that he was elected on that slogan. Why did he change his mind soon after the election ? Why did he make an arrangement with the British Government to help the Allies? That has been until now, an unexplained mystery. (Page 62)

"TRIPLE CROSS" DECIDES FATE OF PALESTINE

Ramsey McDonald characterized the Balfour Declaration as "a triple cross," yet The League of Nations made its first mistake in a series of many by granting a British mandate on September 23, 1923, proving so early in the game that it was not an impartial body by any definition. Reciting the Balfour Declaration in the preamble of the Mandate Commission, it dealt with the problems of immigration and how it proposed they were to be dealt with by a number of Articles, of which Article 22 was the most compelling. Nowhere did it deal with the question of Britain giving away land that it did not own:

> Whereas the League of Nations declares: 'Where populations are not yet able to stand alone, the machinery of government should be set up for them in keeping with the accepted beliefs that the well being of and developments of such peoples forms a scared trust of civilization'.

To the inexperienced the subtlety of the way in which the Wilson guarantees were short-circuited may not be immediately apparent, but what Article 23 did was to negate Wilson's guarantees of "self determination and independence" and replace them with the imagined right of The League of Nations to interfere in the affairs of sovereign nations and states, in effect soiling its own charter. Thus it must become obvious to the fair-minded that from its very inception, the League intended to play fast and loose with the internal affairs of sovereign nations and states. This immorality and underhanded political gerrymandering was continued even more shamelessly when the League gave birth to its bastard child, the United Nations, which awarded Palestine to the Zionists in 1948 thereby doing violence to the "sacred of civilizations" embodied in Article 22 of the deceased parent League, long since forgotten.

Lawrence of Arabia and the Sheriff of Mecca were appalled by the betrayal of the British promise to Emir Hussein, who had fought the Turkish Army to a standstill, believing in the promises of Lawrence that Britain always kept her word.

At the Peace Conference, the Arabs were represented by Emir Feizal, son of Sheriff Hussein. He had commanded the Arab troops under the direction of Colonel Lawrence, and was a signatory to the McMahon-Hussein Treaty, which gave the written assurance that Britain would keep her commitment and promise to the Arabs over Palestine.

Unable to fully understand English and French and not being a man accustomed to dark intrigues and betrayals of one's word, Feizal did not comprehend what was happening, so much so that he appealed to Wilson, who sent an American Commission, the King-Crane Commission to Palestine to investigate.

What the King-Crane Commission members reported to Wilson was startling: Ninety percent of the population of Palestine opposed any Jewish immigration to Palestine. Quoting from the Commission's report:

> To subject a people so minded to unlimited immigration and a steady financial and social pressure to surrender land would be in gross violation of the principles just quoted, and of the people's rights, although it kept within the forms of > law, with the best possible intentions, it may be doubted whether the Jews could possibly seem to either Christians and Moslems proper guardians of the Holy Places, or custodians of the Holy Land as a whole.

The Zionists were determined to bury the report. Wilson, bowing to the Zionists who surrounded him, compromised his principles and a bogus "mandate system" replaced the "self determination" clause.

Under the supervision of The League of Nations, a bogus "mandate" for Palestine was awarded to the British. Wilson's belief in the "backward" nature of non-European populations convinced him that they would accept the mandate system. The King-Crane Commission report was shelved, leaving Imperialism and Zionism triumphant in the guise of mandates. The Commission's report simply disappeared from view.

It was not published in the London Times or the New York Times, nor was it put into the business of the House and Senate. To repeat, it simply vanished! But fortunately for "the sacred trust of civilization" the report was published in a minor publication called the Editor and Publisher. How and why did it "vanish?" The reader can draw his or her own conclusions, which are rather self-evident.

> When Justice Brandeis heard that the British officials administering the Mandate were not favoring Jews, he immediately set out for Palestine accompanied by his biographer, Dr. de Haas. Upon their arrival in the Holy Land they found the reports to be only too true. Dr. de Haas wrote that the British Commander in Chief and military and civil aids regarded the Balfour Declaration as a forgotten episode of the war. The American Supreme Court Justice went straight to Balfour.

An added note: I emphasize the fact, that an American Supreme Justice journeyed to Palestine to admonish a British official, a Foreign Minister no less, and demanded that the Palestine Administration be reprimanded! Who had given the American non-official, non-representative of the U.S. Government such authority? By this arrogant display of power, Brandeis intimidated all who opposed Zionist policy for Palestine.

> A few hours later the British Foreign Office was reminding the military authorities in Egypt and Palestine, not only of the verbal content of the Balfour Declaration, but that the matter was 'chose-jugee,' or very much current.
> A number of Palestinian officials sought desirable exchanges and Colonel Meinertzhagen; a pronounced Zionist was dispatched to Palestine. There had been no protests, no stirring of troubled political waters. The Brandeis direct action diplomacy had achieved results. (Dr. Jacob de Haas, biographer of Justice Brandeis)

How in the world could a person with no official government standing, no official position, go to Palestine and Britain and start making demands that the Zionist be obeyed? Perhaps I should retrace my steps and connect some of the threads.

It is a fact that when Brandeis went to see Balfour, the latter immediately contacted Lord Nathan Rothschild, whom it would appear, gave the green light for what steps Balfour told him he wanted to take. Thus, in my opinion, there was a definite connection between the progress of Zionist plans for Palestine and Lord Rothschild, leading back directly to Balfour and then to Brandeis.

* The resentment of the Arabs flared into violence in 1929;

* Jewish-Arab controversy over rights to the Wailing Wall of the Herodian Temple developed into open conflict;

* The Christian Arabs joining with the Mohammedans against the Jews.

> A British Commission reported that the disturbances were caused by rising Arab fears of a rising Jewish majority and the systematic acquisition of land by the invaders. The Commission recommended that restriction be placed on immigration and the purchase of land. In spite of the cries of the Zionists, the recommendations were accepted. The British Government published the findings in what is known as the White Book, October 20, 1930. . . In November 1938, the British Government announced that it would drop the partition proposal and attempt to promote an understanding between the Arabs and the Zionists. The Arabs took the understandable position that their country was being stolen from them, and that the negotiations were in a category of bargaining with a thief for the return of some portion of your property.
> When the Arabs and the Jews were unable to reach an agreement the British announced that it would have to find a solution of its own. In its White Paper of May 17, 1939, it rejected its former interpretations of the Balfour Declaration as contrary to British obligations to the Arabs. The statesmen of Britain undoubtedly realized the unfairness of the Balfour Declaration to the Arabs after it was too late to do much about it. The so-called MacDonald White Paper of 1939 was an apparently sincere desire to correct the wrong of 1917. The White Paper in attempting to rationalize Balfour's policy, insisted that the Jewish Homeland in Palestine had already existed. So that there would be no doubt as to Britain's future stand, the White Paper declared:

'His Majesty's Government therefore now declares unequivocally that it is not part of their policy that Palestine should become a Jewish State. They would indeed regard it as contrary to their obligations to the Arab people under the Mandate as well as to the assurances which have been given to the Arab people in the past that the Arab population of Palestine should be made the subjects of a Jewish State against their will. The wrath of the Jews knew no bounds. The new British policy on the subject meant the defeat of their carefully laid plans and they had no intentions of permitting the controversy to end with the White Paper. They unleashed a world-wide campaign of abuse against the British Government supplemented by propaganda material thoroughly distorting the facts.' Concluding at last that Great Britain as the Mandatory would never permit them to set up a Jewish States in Palestine, the Jews embarked on a campaign of violence to drive the British to either repudiate its White Paper or surrender the Mandate to the United Nations.

Hagana organized by the Zionists on the pattern of a regular army was mobilized and held ready to strike. Two terrorist groups, the Irgun Zvei Leumi and the Stern Gang were unleashed against the British Mandate authorities and the people of Palestine. The terrorists, following the traditions of their Khazar brethren of Poland and Russia, assassinated bombed and plundered. (Olivia Maria O'Grady)

ZIONISTS SEIZE PALESTINE

Without going any further we now have the history of the incursion of the Zionists into Palestine, which was the basis of three wars, countless acts of terrorism and unrest, a total absence of peace which has plagued Palestine and the Middle East and will continue to do so until the rights of all parties are recognized with justice for all. Unfortunately, the fallacy of The League of Nations was perpetuated by an equally bastard creation, the United Nations.

On July 8, 1919, President Wilson having acted out his orders from Colonel House who had received them from the Rothschilds returned home.

If Wilson expected to be received like a conquering hero, he was sadly mistaken. An indication of the fact that Wilson was under the control of foreign personalities may be deduced from the fact that he had not taken one single member of the legislature with him to Paris or even a member of his own Democrat Party.

His advisors consisted in the main of Wall Street bankers and International Socialists. One of the strangest aspects of his trip to Paris was that he and his entourage accepted gifts of jewelry worth more than one million dollars from a number of non-government well-wishers.

The political storm that broke over the president when he introduced his One World Government blueprint to the United States Senate was unlike anything ever experienced before. Most probably influenced by the domineering "attitude" toward Germany that governed the proceedings in Paris, Wilson demanded that the Senate ratify the treaty exactly as it was presented, with no material changes and no debate being permitted.

This was an astonishing development in American politics, which had never been attempted before. It was all or nothing based solely on the secret closed sessions held in Paris. (The German delegation was kept in their hotel for a week while this was going on and took no part in it). Wilson was not without support for his dictatorial attitude which came from an American member of the Fabian Society, Professor Shotwell, who more or less told the Senate to hurry up and ratify the Treaty.

Shotwell was a prominent member of the upper-level parallel secret government of the United States, the Council on Foreign Relations (CFR). Senator Robert Owen, who had been appointed Chairman of the especially created Federal Reserve Act in 1919, now chaired the commission on The League of Nations Treaty Report to the Senate.

Others who backed Wilson's treaty were Eugene Delano, Thomas J. Lamont and Jacob Schiff. Lamont had been a long-time Fabian Socialist-Communist sympathizer, and Schiff later helped to bankroll the 1904-1905 Russo-Japan War, and the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia. All were related to or affiliated with the Rothschilds.

Most notably, Schiff was a Wall Street banker, who began his career in banking with the financial backing of the Rothschilds, whose creation he was.

On March 19, 1920, the Treaty of Versailles came before the Senate for ratification, but strong objections developed at the very outset. Wilson's demands that the treaty be passed "as is" angered many Senators who offered a number of amendments and reservations, which Wilson refused to accept on the advice of Colonel House acting for the Rothschilds. On November 19, the Senate defeated the Treaty of Versailles with and without reservations, seeing in it great dangers to the sovereignty of the U.S. Constitution and as attempt at usurping of its powers. The vote was 49-35.

For once, Colonel House and the Rothschilds were on the losing side. Wilson then did an extraordinary thing; he vetoed the joint resolution of Congress declaring the war with Germany at an end! At this point, it is necessary to retrace our footsteps: In the run-up to World War I and Wilson's attempt to embroil America in it, angry voices were raised against Wilson and his administration.

In fact, 87 percent of the American people were opposed to war, but could not prevail over the International Socialists and their international bankers. The Chicago Tribune was adamant and scathingly opposed to America's entry and declared that "Brandeis ruled the White House by secret telephone." Cyrus D. Eaton stated:

> America dishonored itself by entering the World War, while in later years (1925) Captain H. Spencer, in his book, "Democracy or Shylockcracy," quoted a telegram in which Sir William Wisemen, President Wilson's British MI6 controller said: "Brandeis called Rothschild." Justice Dembitz Brandeis was undoubtedly under the control of the Rothschilds. Long after the U.S. Senate refused to ratify the Treaty of Versailles, loud voices of anti-Americanism were still being heard.
> For instance Paul Hymens an ex Minister of Belgian Foreign Affairs said: "America refused to ratify the treaty and considered void the man who went to Europe to act in her name." (The New York Evening Post, July 16, 1925)

This was nothing new in so far as the character of President Wilson was concerned. While he was moving every political force he knew to get the United States into WWI under intense pressure from the Rothschilds via Colonel House, Wilson had grossly and violently assaulted the United States Constitution by ramming a law through the U.S. Congress, drafting the Militia of the States to be sent to fight in France.

This remains, in my opinion, one of the worst violations of the U.S. Constitution in American history; because Wilson did it against the Constitution, knowing precisely what a gross wrong he was doing in disregard of his oath of office.

But, before providing details of Wilson's horrendous crime against the American people, leaving aside the crimes against the Arabs and Palestinians, I would like to give some hitherto unknown facts about the man who was Wilson's controller and alter ego Colonel Mandel House, simply because this mysterious and sinister man played such a huge background shadowy role in the history of he United States, plus the fact that he was an intimate friend of the Rothschilds.

Edward Mandel House was the son of Thomas William and Elizabeth (nee Shearn). House had immigrated to the United States in 1837 and gone to live in Texas where he became involved in the cotton industry and entered into banking for and on behalf of the Rothschilds.

House, the elder, always acted as the trusted agent for the Rothschilds. Edward was educated at Cornell and became an adviser to the Governor of Texas although holding no official position, a career that was duplicated in the Wilson administration.

The State of Texas made the younger House an honorary Colonel, a title to which he clung all through his extraordinary career. There is no indication why the State of Texas bestowed favors on Edward House.

In the first part of 1900, the Rothschilds sent House to Europe to learn the business of how bankers control politics and politicians. When he returned to America, House became the guiding light in Democrat politics and it was he who selected Woodrow Wilson as the Democrat Party nominee for the Presidency.

House was largely responsible for Wilson's success in winning the election, and then developed his policies, especially foreign policy. It is believed by some real authorities on the subject that House was the conduit for the Rothschilds orders for the establishment of the Federal Reserve Banks, although the United States Constitution prohibited a Central Bank.

Thus it may be safely stated that House presided over twenty-five fateful years that changed the face of the United States forever, and led to a lawless Federal Government that destroyed in a few years what the Founding Fathers and the generation that followed had taken almost two hundred years to build.

Wilson was the first President of the United States to assume the de facto status of an Emperor of what was to become the Empire of the United States of America, the driving force and leader of a New World Order inside an International Socialist One World Government.

THE ROTHSCHILDS ESTABLISH A CENTRAL BANK IN AMERICA

There had been profound changes in Europe under the tutelage of the Rothschild Dynasty, perhaps some of the more important being:

* The rise of Napoleon I as the chosen Rothschild agent for toppling of the Monarchs of Europe;

* The fall of the Romanov Dynasty and the destruction of Christian Russia at the hands of the Bolshevik Communists;

* The Anglo-Boer War of genocide, a most important war at the turn of the 19th century that was swept under the carpet.

I believe that these most profound changes could not and would not have occurred save and except for the guiding hand of the Rothschild Dynasty and the commitment of its vast financial resources to this end.

Before dealing with events in pre-Bolshevik Russia, I will cover the history of what gave rise to Rothschild intervention in South Africa to secure the largest gold and diamond fields in the world that resulted in the Anglo Boer War 1899-1903.

In the 1830s the farmers at the Cape (known as Boers) moved into the vast, uninhabited hinterland in what became known as The Great Trek. They were angered by British interference in their lives, particularly the freeing of slaves. They overcame great hardships traveling a thousand miles in ox wagons often over rugged mountains, and settled on the barren land of what was to become the Orange Free State and Transvaal Republics.

When huge finds of diamond and gold occurred, the barren lands were immediately coveted by the Rothschilds who sent an agent in the person of Cecil John Rhodes to tie up possession and control in their name. In 1898, Rhodes, the agent for the Rothschilds in South Africa, requested Lord Rothschild to buy out French interests in the diamond mines, setting the stage for complete control by the Rothschilds.

The British Government "annexed" an area of the Orange Free State known as Griqualand West (the location of the diamond finds) and three years later annexed the Transvaal, although in both cases they had no lawful or legitimate claim to the land whatsoever, a tactic they were to use again in Palestine in 1917. (The Balfour Declaration)

Cecil Rhodes was the chief instigator of the Boer War. The fabulous gold fields of rich veins, which extended for 200 miles from East to West, was a glittering prize the Rothschilds were determined to acquire. Friction with Britain became endemic as the Boers refused to recognize Queen Victoria's bogus claims to the Orange Free State and the Transvaal Republics.

A clear provocation was the raid by 600 armed men under Starr Jameson in an attempt to overthrow the Boer Government of President Paul Kruger.

It was a prelude to the Anglo-Boer War, which broke out in 1899, after the machinations of Rhodes to achieve the desired goals of the British Government to seize the gold and diamond fields, failed.

The Boers were descended from Dutch, Irish, Scots, English and German stock. They had emigrated to the southernmost tip of Africa known as "the Cape," where first the Dutch and then the British established a refueling, food and fresh water station for their ships plying trade between the Far East and Europe. At what became known in later years as Cape Town, a thriving independent community was established under Dutch rule.

At that time there were no black (Bantu) people in Africa south of the Zambezi River, in the vast, empty hinterland between the Cape and the Zambezi River to the North. Only a few nomadic "Hottentots" - a non-Bantu Mongolian type of people lived along the sea shore of the Cape eking out a precarious living through beachcombing and scavenging. They soon became workers in the vegetable gardens of the Dutch East India Company. But the British invaded the Cape settlement and set up their own administration under the British East India Corporation (BEIC) opium trading company in London.

From this inauspicious beginning grew a thriving, bustling community in which the Dutch were integrated. After the British invasion, the BEIC in London began to seriously interfere in the internal affairs of the Dutch community.

The Dutch, who were referred to as "Boers" (farmers) then began to organize a plan to leave the Cape and "trekked" (traveled) into the vast uninhabited plains of the north. After the long journey the Boer arrived and settled in the uninhabited land they named the Orange Free State Republic and the Transvaal Republic. I want to emphasize that the thousands of square miles of land the Boers traveled through was devoid of the Bantu races who lived north of the Zambezi. Contrary to popular history, the Boers did not take the Transvaal and Orange Free State away from the Bantu.

The discovery of the richest gold strike ever known brought Rhodes to the scene and from then onwards, Queen Victoria began to assert her unfounded claim to the new republics. War was inevitable after Victoria rejected the peace proposals of the God-fearing Paul Kruger.

Queen Victoria was determined to have war, and in 1899 the British Government sent the first contingents of troops, which by 1901 would reach the amazing strength of 400,000 men, this, to overcome a guerilla force that never numbered more than 80,000 men in the field at any time, many of them as young as fourteen years and as old as seventy five years.

The epic struggle of the Boers ought to be a model for all countries threatened by big, bullying governments. For almost three years the farmer-soldiers fought and defeated the pride of the British Army.

The Boers only agreed to end the fighting after 27,000 of their women and children died in inhuman concentration camps set up by Lord Kitchener and Alfred Milner, a servant of the Rothschilds. With their cattle slaughtered, their farms burned to the ground and their women and children dying in the thousands as a result of the vindictive Lord Milner's genocidal policies, the Boer warriors were compelled to come in from the field and lay down their arms.

Throughout the struggle, Rhodes kept his masters, the Rothschilds, fully briefed and carried out their instructions to the letter. Today, N.M. Rothschild still controls the gold trade from London. Rhodes operated in a period when the British Empire was the most powerful political, economic and military force in the world, yet the Boers were not afraid to take on the Empire in a war they knew they could not win, but which they fought with astonishing courage, determination and bravery.

The British Empire was like the Persian, Assyrian, Babylonian and Roman Empires, built upon twin pillars of stripping the assets of their "Dominions" and using virtual slave labor of the inhabitants to accomplish the task.

The "noble" families of England could be traced back to the Venetian and Genoese Black Nobility and the great banking families of those city-states. They were the masters of propaganda and have not lost their touch, which was their most successful weapon in the Boer War and the First and Second World Wars. Behind the government stood the banking families, of which the Rothschild banks were the most powerful and influential. Some historians have held to the belief that the fortune they received from South Africa "made the Rothschilds rich."

It is a belief with which I do not agree. The Rothschilds were wealthy beyond belief well before their agent, Cecil John Rhodes, a master of deceit and cunning, a man who hated Christianity — secured the gold and diamond treasures of South Africa as the monopoly of the Rothschilds. From documents and papers I studied in the British Museum in London, it was clear that shortly before the death of Mayer Amschel, his fortune exceeded the combined fortunes of the world's richest men.

The full extent of the Rothschild fortune was never made known, but what is known is that it grew at an astronomical rate. Amschel knew the power of money and like old John D. Rockefeller who aped his philosophy of secrecy Mayer knew that secrecy is paramount to success. His religious belief that the Jews were God's chosen people never wavered, and he flaunted his belief on every occasion, public and private. To give some idea of the Rothschild wealth I provide the following:

> His son Lionel was the friend and counselor of the Prince Consort and of Disraeli whose Sidonia in Coningsby is a (thinly disguised) ideal portrait of him. . .
> He brought about the enactment of the disabilities bill which permitted Jews to hold office in England. He > advanced the British government the money for the Irish famine loan (about $40,000,000) and also for the Crimean War (about $80,000,000) and for twenty-four years he acted as the agent for the Russian government.

> He had a large share in the successful funding of the United States national debt, provided the funds for the immediate purchase of the Suez Canal shares; he was also active in facilitating the payment of the French indemnity to Germany; in directing the finances of the Austrian Empire and the Egyptian loan of 8,500,000 pounds (about $40,000,000). (The Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol. 10, pages 501-502)

Jacob (James) Rothschild's fortune, which was independent of Lionel's or any of the other family members, was estimated by historians to be $200 billion at the time of his death according to author Armstrong who wrote. . . "But this was only an estimate, since no inventory of his estate was filed." It was of course in keeping with one of the principles laid down by Amschel that secrecy was to be maintained. Above all else, the Rothschilds were always involved in financing wars.

Hymym Solomon (also known as Haim) was involved in financing the American Revolution. Seligman Brothers and Speyer and Company financed the North and Messrs Erlanger the South in the Civil War. More recently, in the great development of railway finance the firm of Kuhn, Loeb and Company has taken a prominent role.

Although it does not say so in so many words, it is clear to anyone who knows anything about banking of the period, that the Rothschilds' financed the North and South through front men and front banks. There have been various estimates of the wealth of the Rothschilds, and one who knew perhaps better than others, Count Cherep-Spiridovich estimated that they made $100 billion out of WWI alone. Historian John Reeves in The Rothschilds: Financial Controllers of Nations gives a good accounting of the Rothschilds achievements:

> Little could Mayer have anticipated that his sons would in after years come to exercise such an unbounded sway that the peace of nations would depend on their nod; that the powerful control they exercised on the European money markets would enable them to pose as the arbiters of peace and war, since they could at their pleasure, furnish or withhold the pecuniary means required to carry on a campaign.
> But this, incredible as it may seem, was what their vast influence, combined with their enormous wealth and unlimited credit, enabled them to do, for no firms existed strong enough to oppose them for any length of time, or rash enough to take up a business which the Rothschilds had refused.

A short note of explanation: It happened that the Rothschilds would refuse an offering although sound, simply to punish, that particular nation, or company, for some wrong doing, imagined or real. Had any other bankers have taken up what the Rothschilds rejected, their punishment would be swift.

THE U.S. CONSTITUTION TRAMPLED BY CORRUPT LEGISLATORS IN THE PA Y OF THE ROTHSCHILDS

The question has often been posed and encountered by me: "How did the United States with its Constitution, the highest law of the land, which forbad a central bank, come in the end to have just such a central bank, totally in violation of the Constitution." To answer the question would require many thousands of pages of explanations, but in the following brief accounting, I shall try to provide a clue as to how the Federal Reserve Banks were forced down the throats of the American people.

In the first instance, the Federal Reserve Bank is not "Federal" being owned by anonymous stockholders, and not by the United States Government. In plain language it is a private bank masquerading as a federal government institution.

As such it is not accountable to the American people, in witness whereof, it has never been audited by government auditors as is required by law if it were a government bank. The great Louis T. McFadden, Chairman of the House Banking Committee, once declared from the floor of the House: . . . the Federal Reserve banking system is the greatest swindle in history, a fraud on the American people.

On Friday June 10, 1932, in a debate in the House of Representatives on the Federal Reserve Bank, the courageous McFadden said:

Mr. Chairman, we have in this country one of the most corrupt institutions the world has ever known. I refer to the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. The Federal Reserve Board, a Government board, has cheated the Government of the United States and the people of the United States out of enough money to pay the national debt. The depredations and the iniquities of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks acting together have cost this country enough money to pay the national debt several times over.

This evil institution has impoverished and ruined the people of the United States; has bankrupted itself, and has practically bankrupted our Government. It has done this through defects of the law under which it operates, through misadministration of that law by the Federal Reserve Board, and through the corrupt practices of the moneyed vultures who control it. Some people think the Federal Reserve Banks are United States Government institutions. They are not Government institutions. They are private credit monopolies, which prey upon the people of the United States for the benefit of themselves and their foreign customers; foreign and domestic speculators and swindlers; and rich and predatory moneylenders. In that dark crew of financial pirates there are those who would cut a man's throat to get a dollar out of his pocket. . .

The 12 private credit monopolies were deceitfully and disloyally foisted upon this country by bankers who came here from Europe and who repaid our hospitality by undermining our American institutions. These bankers took money out of this country to finance a war against Russia. They created a reign of terror in Russia with our money. . . They financed Trotsky's mass meetings of discontent and rebellion in New York. They paid Trotsky's passage from New York to Russia so that he might assist in the destruction of the Russian Empire. They fomented and instigated the Russian revolution and placed a large fund of American dollars at Trotsky's disposal in one of their banks in Sweden. It has been said that President Wilson was deceived by the attentions of these bankers and by the philanthropic poses they assumed. It has been said that when he discovered the manner in which he had been misled by Colonel House, he turned against that busybody, that 'holy monk' of the financial empire, and showed him the door. He had the grace to do that, and in my opinion, he deserves great credit for it.

In 1912 the National Monetary Association, under the chairmanship of the late Senator Nelson Aldrich, made a report and presented a vicious bill called the National Reserve Association bill. This bill is usually spoken of as the Aldrich bill. He was the tool, but not the accomplice, of the European-born bankers who for nearly 20 years had been scheming to set up a central bank in this country and who in 1912 had spent and were continuing to spend vast sums of money to accomplish their purpose.

. . . Under the tutelage of those sinister Wall Street figures who stood behind Colonel House, established here in our free country the worm-eaten monarchical institution of the 'king's bank' to control us from the top downward, and to shackle us from the cradle to the grave. The Federal Reserve act destroyed our old and characteristic way of doing business...

> It fastened down upon this country the very tyranny from which the framers of the Constitution sought to save us. The danger that the country was warned against came upon us and is shown in the long train of horrors attendant upon the affairs of the traitorous and dishonest Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve Banks. . . The Aldrich bill was created by bankers of European origin in New York City. It was a copy and in general a translation of the Reichsbank and other European central banks." (Notably the Bank of England)
> (From the Congressional Records of the House of Representatives, the Collected Speeches of Congressman Louis T. McFadden)

On Thursday June 15, 1933, McFadden went to do battle once more against the imposition of a central bank on America, in gross violation of the United States Constitution. Speaking in the House of Representatives, McFadden complained about foreign bankers taking over the money and credit of the American people, and he concentrated on Jacob Schiff, whom he said, was an agent of the Rothschilds:

> He also hit out at a Mr. Mayer who is a brother-in-law of Mr. George Blumenthal a member of the firm of J.P. Morgan and Co., who, I understand, represents the Rothschild interest... I want to make it perfectly plain, that in placing Mr. Mayer at the head of the Federal Reserve system you are turning it over completely to this international finance group.

How was the U.S. forced into the slavery of the Federal Reserve Bank system? The answer is really quite simple:

It was done through the money power of the Rothschilds and a group of traitors in the U.S. House and Senate willing to sell their souls in exchange for a life of opulence and ease. Such men are found in all countries, and there is no way to foreclose against their treachery. Their infamous deeds continue to reap a bitter harvest. For daring to expose the truth about how August Belmont entered the United States for the sole purpose of gaining control of politicians who would make it possible to impose Rothschild control of the money and credit of the United States, McFadden was murdered.

There were three attempts on his life; one by a shooting that did not succeed, and two attempts to poison him, the last of which killed this great and courageous American. His murderers were never found and justice has still to be done.

Thus was a great American Christian patriot silenced, an unspeakable foul deed was done and financial slavery imposed on the American people. For as long as the elected representatives of the people in the U.S. House and Senate abide by their oath of office, to preserve and protect America from the ravages of the international bankers who lead International Socialism's onslaught against the Constitution, the blessings of liberty shall be those of the American people.

But when our representatives bow to the money power of the international bankers and prostitute themselves on the alter of Rothschild money power then has the hour arrived that We, the People have lost our freedom and the rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

The Federal Reserve Act was a smashing blow against the Constitution, another nail in the coffin of a once-free American people. The Federal Reserve Act was a progression along a road that will end with the total destruction of the Constitution. One of the Rothschild servants, Lord Bryce, said that it would take fifty years to destroy the Republican form of government guaranteed to the American people by their Constitution. Lord Bryce predicted that: Security provided by for the protection of the Constitution will be gone like the morning mists.

This is the same Lord Bryce, who through false testimony published shameless lies about German atrocities in Belgium that brought the United States into the First World War.

Having acquired control of the leading banks of Europe and having become the lenders of first resort to every government on the Continent and England, the Rothschilds then acquired control of the Bank of England. In order to hide this fact it was decreed that the names of the bank's stockholders were never to be made public:

> This power brought about the establishment of the gold standard, first in the British Empire, and then in other countries as stated. They acquired the controlling interest in the Bank of England for which the late Lord Rothschild was the gold agent and governor.
> The Bank of England is one of their many fronts. They no doubt have the controlling interest in most of the other central banks of issue. In strict keeping with the secrecy which has been one of the cardinal principles of the Rothschild rulers from the very beginning, the Bank of England refuses to reveal its stockholders. . .
>
> They [the Rothschilds] sent one of their agents, Paul Warburg, as their representative to America, just prior to World War I, to change our banking systems.
> Through their ownership and control of J. P. Morgan and Co. and Kuhn, Loeb and Co., private banks, they owned and controlled the principal New York national banks and trust companies, and through them controlled the New York Federal System. . . It is essential in order to control at will the expansion and contraction of credit that there be some supreme authority with the power to increase or decrease at will the volume of money in circulation.

Prior to the regime of the Rothschilds this power resided in the kings and emperors of the world, for they were then the supreme authority. In our country (the United States) our National Constitution vested this power (solely) in the Congress of the United States. . . Under the Rothschild influence the banking systems of the world were all radically changed. The supreme authority for the issue of money, as well as to extend credit, was transferred by the various governments to the bankers of their respective countries. The Bank of England became the model for other central banks of the world. At the time of the establishment of the Federal Reserve System, our government was the only one of any consequence that even pretended to exercise its sovereign right to issue and control the volume of money in circulation. The establishment of the Federal Reserve System brought about a complete surrender to the banking fraternity of the sovereign power of the American people to regulate values through their congressional representatives, as guaranteed to them by their national Constitution.

The panic of 1907 was, like all our other panics, a manipulated one. It was brought about by the refusal of the reserve bank of New York to pay currency to their country bank depositors, which in turn made it necessary for these banks to refuse to pay their depositors in currency. It was therefore due primarily to an insufficient quantity of currency in circulation and an inadequate method of increasing the supply.

In the midst of the campaign for the reform of our banking and currency system (to prevent further manipulations that could result in panic) Paul Warburg, a German Jew, migrated from Frankfurt am Main, the original home of the Rothschilds, to America. He was at that time a member of Kuhn, Loeb and Company in New York, the American branch of the Rothschilds, upon his arrival here. The following is a Naval Secret Service report on him in December 1918:

'Warburg, Paul, New York City, German; was naturalized as an American citizen 1911, was decorated by the Kaiser; was vice-chairman of the United States Federal Reserve Board, is a wealthy and influential banker; handled large sums of money furnished by Germany for Lenin and Trotsky; subject has a brother who is leader of the espionage system of Germany.'

The Federal Reserve System is the product of the Rothschilds and its adoption was secured by the same underground, deceptive manner that they always employ to obtain their objectives. Paul Warburg evidently came to America to reform our banking and currency system and evidently he and the Rothschild interest then anticipated the world war [the First World War 1914-1918] although it did not come about until some three years later.

This is the sordid story of the greatest disaster that ever befell the American people. We then surrendered to Jeroboam Rothschild and his successors, complete domination over our welfare and happiness. Prior thereto, great influence was through his Morgan and Co., and Kuhn, Loeb and Co., banks and their subsidiary affiliates, but now his authority is made supreme and unlimited. This surrender perfected his control over the economy of all of the people of the world.

THE ROTHSCHILDS THWART THE U.S. CONSTITUTION

What is so astonishing about the audacious hijack of the United States credit and money supply by the Rothschilds is that it was accomplished in the face of stringent provisions in the United States Constitution that forbad establishing a central bank.

We are reminded by the words of Jesus Christ at his crucifixion when He said: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." This prayer of forgiveness was for and behalf of the Roman soldiers, and not for the Sanhedrin, who had demanded his execution.

Thus we say of those members of the U.S. Congress who were ignorant of what was being done, and ignorant of the gigantic swindle being perpetrated upon them, and worse still, ignorant of the Constitution they had sworn an oath to uphold: "Father, forgive them for they knew not what they did."

But for the traitors, the deceivers, the liars and the betrayers who did know what they were doing, I say that death by hanging for treason, as suggested by the framers of the Constitution, would have been far too lenient a fate for them. Some scholars of the period wondered why the Federal Reserve Act was presented when it was.

Two reasons come to mind. A pliant Socialist president in the White House, the architects of the Federal Reserve knew that war was coming. Thus it was essential to have the Central Bank up and running before hostilities commenced. Subsequent history has shown that the Federal Reserve Act was passed in time to make the coming war happen. Without the massive financing provided by the U.S. there is every reason to believe, that WWI would not have broken out.

The second reason is, of course, the more obvious one: Complete control of banking and finance of the United States. Passage of the illegal, unconstitutional, Federal Reserve Act made it possible for the Rothschilds through the treason of Wilson, to drag the United States into WWI that resulted in the death of millions of young Christian men, the flower of the European and American nations, and cost the United States billions of dollars.

The treason-mongers were never punished and America is still suffering today from the effects of that terrible war and the one that followed, and from the stranglehold which the Rothschilds have over an allegedly "free America" from which they continue to reap obscene profits.

Any real freedom for the American people ended the day that the Rothschild gained control of America's currency, credit and economy through establishment of the Federal Reserve Banks. When one considers the power of the Rothschild to have been able to establish their banking system in the heart of the American republic, we are reminded of the following verse: Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed that he has grown so great?

The story of that "meat" is what I have tried to recount in this work and perhaps it will shed some light on the mystery of how both Wilson and Roosevelt were able to impose their wills upon the American people, even though they had the shocking example of the treason committed by President Woodrow Wilson still fresh before their eyes.

There can be but one answer as to the source of that power; the Rothschild agents in America who desired and actively sought American entry into WWII. The book, Propaganda in the Next War, authored by Captain Liddell Hart, throws a good deal of light on how, for the second time, the American people were dragged into a war in Europe although the vast majority of them totally opposed, but unfortunately, the book appears to rendered unavailable. Author Armstrong said:

> Apparently it is a semi-official book of the British government. The destruction of these copies of the book was probably by the order of Secretary of War, Hoar-Belisha...
> The establishment of a Jewish homeland was not an issue in the world war or in the peace treaty with Germany. The Arabs were our allies and they fought side by side with the soldiers of the allies. It was coldblooded indefensible robbery perpetrated at the instance of 'Elders,' Lloyd George and Woodrow Wilson and Georges Clemenceau. (Rothschild Money Trust, pages 65, 79)
>
> The worst of it is that the establishment of this 'Jewish homeland' was cold-blooded treachery to the Arab Government and the people. The Arabs claim that they were induced to enter the war on the side of the Allies by the promise that what is known as the Balfour Declaration would be rescinded and the Arabians would not be molested in the peaceful ownership and possession of their country.
> This contention is not denied by the British Government, but the excuse is made that Woodrow Wilson insisted that the Jews be given this home and > that Lloyd George consented as a matter of policy and in order to get some other things in the peace treaty that he desired. Palestine is now properly called the 'twice promised land.' It is likely that Germany also promised it in consideration of the Russian deal. (Rothschild Money Trust, page 70)

One of the least noticed after effects of WWI and the subsequent peace treaty was the demonetizing of silver, which has always figured prominently in the monetary systems of the world since ancient times. Silver is a noble metal, but it is not regarded as being anywhere near as valuable as gold by the Rothschilds although it has always been a good defense against inflation.

Neither silver, gold coins nor scripts/certificates can be inflated. It was most probably with this in mind that the Rothschilds made strenuous efforts to demonetize silver and get rid of coinage in the money systems of the world. I do not propose to give a history of the Bank of England in this book other than to refer to it from time to time.

The Bank of England was and still is the model for all "fractional reserve banks," including the illicit Federal Reserve Bank of the United States. Its original charter was amended eight times up to 1844, and undoubtedly, the Rothschilds had a great deal to do with the latter amendments, especially the Peel Amendment, which made drastic changes that greatly favored the Rothschilds' banks.

The Peel Amendment was adopted in 1844 and its immediate effect was to demonetize silver, which had hitherto circulated as coinage in every country, even nation, since time immemorial as real money.

This was done because the Rothschilds wanted their war debts to be repaid in gold, a fact that became apparent when they refused to accept payment of Civil War debts in silver and demanded of the United States Government that the debts be paid in gold. No doubt the Peel Amendment foresaw such matters and was adopted specifically to lay the foundation for what was to follow. The amendment also gave the British a monopoly over gold, because they held the gold stolen from the Boers of South Africa in 1899-1902.

Incidentally, it was Peel who had steered the Jewish Disabilities Bill through the House that made it possible for a Jew to run for public office for the first time in the long history of England. But in the middle of the struggle against strong opposition, Peel fell of his horse while out riding and died from his injuries. He was an accomplished horseman, which makes the accident all the more strange. That left Disraeli the chief protagonist for the bill. Disraeli's maiden speech to the House of Commons on December 7, 1847 as party leader, had been drowned out by his opponents led by the feared Irishman, Daniel O'Connell.

Those for the Jewish Disabilities Act were Sir Moses Montefiore, related through marriage to the Rothschilds, and one of two Sheriffs of the City of London. Although a Jew, Montefiore could hold the high office, because the House of Lords had no jurisdiction or control over the City of London. Montefiore had come to the House to receive permission to listen to the debate.

The bill was presented not directly, but what it became known as, a bill to remove restrictions from all faiths, what the Rothschilds always did, calling such an approach as a "side wind."

The measure was to end the longstanding practice, which held, that Jews could not become magistrates, schoolteachers or enter Parliament; could not vote if they refused to take the Christian oath and could not practice law.

Lionel de Rothschild had refused to take the Christian oath, and although elected to the House of Lords could not take his seat because of his obdurate opposition to the Christian oath being administered.

The 'Jew bill' as it was referred to by the Tories would not go away, even after eleven years of opposition by members like Lord Derby, Lord Bentinck and Sir Robert Inglis, who when asked why Jews should be excluded from Parliament stated: "The Jews are voluntary strangers here, and have no claim to become citizens but by conforming to our moral law, which is the Gospel."

The Tories in the House of Lords were solidly against the "Jew bill" as Lord George Bentinck called it as he explained it each time the bill came up again for eleven years. One must give credit to the tenacity of the Rothschilds, when they wanted something they clung on tenaciously until they got it. As Lord Bentinck explained:

> The Jew Question I look upon as a personal matter as I would a great private estate or Divorce Bill. Disraeli will of course warmly support the Jews, first from hereditary prepossession in their favor and next because he and the Rothschilds are great allies. (From Hansard Report)

Bentinck was later found dead, apparently from a heart attack at the age of forty-six. Like the death of Peel before him, Bentinck's passing left many unanswered questions, the most pertinent of which have never been addressed.

On February 20, 1849 the Jewish Disabilities Removal Act came up again for consideration in its third reading in the House with Disraeli in charge. In the gallery sat Louise de Rothschild, observing the proceedings on behalf of Lionel Rothschild. The measure passed by a vote of 272 to 206, but died in the Lords.

In the following year, July 29, 1850, Lionel de Rothschild again tried to take his seat, but the Clerk refused to allow it and thus was generated a new round of frenzied activity characterized by scathing debate.

The measure was now being referred to in the Times as the "annual pastime" of Parliament. Having been struck down in 1849, 1851, 1853, 1856 and 1857, Disraeli in 1858 tried a new tack by changing the wording of the Oath, but the Lords again rejected it.

Disraeli hit back by appointing a committee to look into a basis of the restoration of the new Oath and appointed Lionel de Rothschild on the committee. Finally, amid ugly scenes and rearguard opposition from Lord Derby, much grumbling with a razor-thin majority voting for it, a compromise was reached: Each House would formulate its own Oath. At the sumptuous home of Lionel de Rothschild there was great rejoicing that the "eleven years of shouting and screaming in every corner of the House" was over.

On July 26, 1858, Lionel de Rothschild was sworn in on the new, non-Christian Oath, shaking hands with Disraeli as he went up to do so in a public display of the gratitude he owed his protege whom he had wisely and with great foresight, converted to Christianity at a tender age possibly in anticipation of his need for the very service he had now delivered.

THE ROTHSCHILDS BREAK OPEN THE HOUSE OF LORDS

The floodgates had been opened. Lord Rothschild took his seat, followed in quick succession by David Salomons, Sir Francis Goldsmith, Nathaniel de Rothschild, Frederick Goldsmid and Julian Goldsmid.

It is interesting that none of these men represented Disraeli's own party, the Conservative Unionist Party "Tory Party." But the chief opponent, Earl Derby, now losing support from his own party, put his objections in writing:

> Without imparting any disloyalty or disaffection to Her Majesty's Subjects of the Jewish Persuasion, the Lords consider that Denial and Rejection of that Savior, in whose Name each House of Parliament daily offers up its collective prayers for the Divine Blessing on its Councils, constitutes a moral unfitness to take part in Legislation of a professedly Christian Community. (Hansard Report)

The most visible results of The Jewish Disabilities Removal Act was that it provided the Rothschilds and other leading Jews access to the House of Lords and removal of the hated Christian Oath. With the other change, the Peel Amendment to the Bank of England, the ordinary people, as usual, had no inkling of how they were being bamboozled and how much they would lose. The miscreants worked so skillfully that while the victims were walking around with their eyes wide open, yet not comprehending what they saw, the Rothschild solidified their grip on world monetary systems.

Of course the deception is still practiced today where U.S. coinage is made to look like silver, but which coinage has no silver content whatsoever. U.S. coinage might as well be made of plastic, but that would not do, because then the multitudes might just wake up to the deception after all these years! Even the Encyclopedia Britannica sought to conceal the deception of the Peel Amendment:

> It was indispensable in attempting to obviate the defects inherent in our currency, to proceed cautiously, to respect, as far as possible, existing interests, and to avoid taking any steps that might excite the fears or suspicions of the public; but the measures . . . were so skillfully contrived as to provoke little opposition, at the same time that they effected most important and highly beneficial changes. (Encyclopedia Britannica Vol. III, page 323)

For instance: What were the "defects" it speaks about? The principle "defect" was that hitherto it had not been easy to wage war, as there was never enough money for such wars and additional money had to be raised by additional taxation. This meant that at some point, even the slumbering multitudes would become enraged and rise in rebellion against overburdening taxes.

The other "defect" was that paper money had to be backed by bullion and what was desirable was the full practice of the old Babylonian system of fraudulent fractional reserve banking meaning in plain language that banks could issue a certain amount of paper money not backed by real assets such as silver and gold. Without these changes and the flood of paper money that followed the Peel Amendment and the Federal Reserve Banks establishment in America, WWI and WWII would not have been possible to promote. There was simply no real money for such wasteful wars, nor would the people have stood for additional taxes to finance such misadventures.

In fact, there would have been no Gulf War, no invasion of Iraq in 2002, no bombing of Serbia and no war against Afghanistan, -- were it not for an abundant supply of worthless paper money, which are called U.S. dollars. Accepted as such all over the world — in reality they are pieces of paper issued by a private banking system, which cannot be exchanged for gold or silver.

Why, in the words of the Encyclopedia Britannica, was it necessary to "proceed cautiously?" If this was an honest need why should there have been caution about the move? But the encyclopedia gives the nasty game of deception away in the words, "that might excite the fears and suspicions of the public."

By its own admission we now learn that there was a need for caution because base deception of the public was being engaged in and that the deception had to be "skillfully contrived to provoke little opposition."

What an admission that wholesale deception and gross fraud were being perpetrated on the people. The perpetrators very well knew that the people would go into revolt if they found out, so the Peel Amendment had to be disguised as "highly beneficial changes."

Who were the recipients of the "highly beneficial changes?" There was only one party who benefited and that was the Rothschild Dynasty and their banks all over the world.

If this were not true, the "highly beneficial changes" would have been shouted from the rooftops of London and of every city in the world. But the "highly beneficial changes" were for the benefit of the Rothschild banking empire and not for the people of the many nations affected by it.

While Sir Robert Peel presented the amendment to the bank's charter, its author was indeed Lionel Rothschild through his "valet," Benjamin Disraeli, whom he had created and made famous as England's Prime Minister, in the manner in which the Rothschilds created and made famous Napoleon I. Lionel Rothschild's influence over the Bank of England had never waned since he frightened the bank into giving him de-facto control through this attack on its gold reserves, as explained earlier by demanding his paper be exchanged for his gold.

It should be recalled that on August 4, 1847, when Disraeli's eligibility to run for a seat in Parliament was paper-thin, because he could not claim property ownership in fear of his many creditors, and property ownership being a necessary qualification, it was Baron Mayer de Rothschild, the High Sheriff of the county in which the town of Aylesbury was situated, who certified Disraeli as a qualified candidate and then declared him duly elected, after another candidate, a John Gibbs, had been persuaded to withdraw from the election.

But the watching crowd did not take the result well. Perceiving Disraeli as an interloper, he was met with hisses and heckling. It is also worth mentioning, that while Disraeli was in such deep financial straits that could and would have badly affected his career in Parliament, it was Lionel de Rothschild who bought his debts and discharged them. The deal is mentioned in Disraeli by Weintraub, page 401:

> Through Philip Rose and Lionel de Rothschild, Montague discharged all debts. The Montague mentioned is said to have 'offered to buy up Disraeli's debts and charge a lower than usurious interest rate.' Critics suggested that the real

> 'purchaser' of Disraeli's debts was in fact, Lionel Rothschild.
> Another indisputable fact is, that in September 1848 the Rothschilds had a hand in buying Hughendon, Disraeli's country home for him through a front man, the Marquis of Titchfield. As Disraeli wrote to his wife Mary Anne, 'It is all done; you are the Lady of Hughendon'.

I mention these facts, as they seem to bear out the claim that Disraeli was "a mere valet of the Rothschilds."

A study of the methods used by the Rothschilds to put over the deception of the Peel Amendment shows that they used in precisely the same way to put over the Federal Reserve Banks swindle on the American people. In both instances, the author and finisher of the plot were one and the same -- the Rothschilds.

The catastrophe in 1840 was staged and managed by the Rothschilds to set the stage for the crucial amendment of 1844 that was to be so beneficial for the Rothschilds in that it ended the restraining influence of silver coinage and silver certificates.

The Rothschilds stage-managed the panic of 1907 which opened the way for the American version of the Peel Amendment, the deceitful and downright unconstitutional Federal Reserve Banks, which bill was steered through the Senate by their numerous agents in place, notably Senator William Aldrich. The Peel Amendment and the Federal Reserve Act are twins of the same parentage, the Rothschilds, who used their front men and servants to conceal the real authors of these infamous fiscal and monetary measures of deception.

How were the Rothschilds able to accomplish the double success that placed the yoke of slavery around the necks of the ordinary people? They did it by owning and controlling the leaders of both political parties in the British Parliament and the political leaders of both parties in the U.S. House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate. Since then, nothing has changed.

The status-quo remains entrenched. The two measures gave the Rothschilds complete control over the monetary and fiscal policies of the British Empire and the complete monetary and fiscal control over the United States, thereby multiplying not only Rothschild wealth, but Rothschild power to dictate policies to both the British and United States Governments, making them "lord and master over the money markets of the world.

Disraeli did not say that the Rothschilds achieved complete mastery of the foreign and domestic policies of the governments of the world, but this was hardly necessary to enunciate as it became self-evident at the Paris Peace Conference.

On the instructions of their Rothschild masters, President Wilson and Prime Minister George organized two committees that were called the "Financial Committee" and the "Economic Section." Rothschild agents Baruch and Thomas Lamont, a partner of J.P. Morgan and Co. were appointed to the Financial Committee.

The net end result of the deliberations and decisions of the two committees made it almost impossible for Britain and France to repay their war debts to the United States, more than likely with the intention that they should be "forgiven," which they were, in the most flagrant abuse of the U.S. Constitution. There were and are no provisions in the United States Constitution that would allow for loans and gifts to foreign powers, much less that debts should be written off. But to the Rothschilds it was just another hurdle to be overcome, and the U.S. did write off billions in debt owed by the Allies.

The intention was quite clearly that the debts owing to the Rothschilds would be repaid and that was the bottom line. Unfortunately, the Rothschild agents in the U.S. Government went along with the plan that robbed the American people of billions upon billions of dollars and enriched the Rothschilds with like amounts, this, in the most flagrant violation of the highest law of the United States, the Constitution.

In its wake, the blatant disregard of the Constitution resulted in strengthening International Socialism that caused poverty and suffering, with revolutions that led to the rise of Communism.

Who was this Disraeli, a man who had such a profound effect on the history of England? How did he aspire to his position of power?

Benjamin Disraeli (1804-1881) who was given the title of Lord Beaconsfield in his later years was the first person of Jewish descent to become a prime minister of England.

A study of documents in the British Museum, show that Disraeli owed his rise to fame and power solely to Lionel Rothschild. When he was discovered by Lionel, Disraeli was in a state of desperate poverty, but he still managed to rise to power and fame because Lionel Rothschild found him a useful servant. Bismarck, another of Rothschild's "creations" said that Disraeli was the originator of the plan to bring down the United States through civil war.

The American Civil War was the most senseless fratricide ever in the history of the world, and cost the lives of nearly 800,000 men. It was a war that should never have happened, and would not have happened had it not been for the "hidden hand" of the Rothschilds and their agent, Disraeli, upon whose soul the blood of the dead of the Civil War must forever lie.

Lionel Rothschild became Benjamin's mentor and guide. Starting from the young Disraeli's formative years, Lionel took charge and steered his protege from one success to another.

> Disraeli was to Lionel what Weishaupt was to Amschel; Gambetta to James Rothschild III, what Poincare was to Alphonso Rothschild IV and is to Eduard Rothschild V, or as was and is Kerensky (Kirbis) to E. Rothschild V...
> Disraeli was the Horse of Troy slipped into the upper classes of Great Britain, carrying inside a score of Jews as future Lords and Ministers. Now they entirely rule her. (Let Us Prevent The Second World War. (Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

According to Buckle's Life and Death of Disraeli, "no career in English history is more marvelous than that of Disraeli and none has hitherto been shrouded in greater mystery."

But to Thomas Carlyle, the great English essayist and historian, Disraeli was an "adventurer and a superb Hebrew conjuror." Carlyle wrote a notable work on the French Revolution and his lectures On Heroes, which were greatly acclaimed, made him a better judge of Disraeli than Buckle's History of Civilization in England. Professor William Langer also does a more realistic job in assessing the worth of Disraeli, but none of these historians say anything at all about his mentor and controller, Lionel Rothschild. Cherep-Spiridovich is the least charitable of all toward Disraeli:

> The politics of Disraeli consisted chiefly in his hatred of Russia . . . Taken by Lionel under his guidance, Disraeli henceforth assumed a triumphant scorn, that which would be worthy of a Mephistopheles. As he was luridly pale with flashing eyes and black hair, he adopted a dress coat of black velvet lined with white satin, white gloves, hanging fringes of black silk, white ivory stick with black tassels.

> All this was devilishly combined in order to make a stronger impression on influential old ladies. And through them, Benjamin learned in London all the secrets needed for his patron-Lionel, with whose money Disraeli stepped into the highest places.

Sarah Bradford, in her book Disraeli, states on pages 60 and 186 that Disraeli had "strong Zionist feelings, which he expressed in private." Bradford mentions several other significant things as they related to the Rothschild's patronage of Disraeli:

> They knew his wife Mary Anne before the marriage, relating how the Rothschild ladies became increasingly intimate with her. (Page 187)

> Disraeli was often entertained at the home of Anthony de Rothschild and was "considered as part of the family." (Page 386)

Disraeli, Author Weintraub relates how close Lionel was to Disraeli (page 243) and how he "considered Lionel his best friend. . . He saw him more than anyone else in London and never needed an invitation to dine. After the death of Disraeli's wife Mary Anne, he practically lived at Lionel's house. (Pages 243 and 611) Anthony de Rothschild was the best and kindest host in the world. (Page 651)

Weintraub mentions that Alfred de Rothschild was extremely generous toward Disraeli. We are left in no doubt that Disraeli and the Rothschilds enjoyed an extraordinarily close friendship reaching far beyond that which would be understood by the normal meaning of the word.

ROTHSCHILDS SURROGATE FINANCED ATTACK ON RUSSIA

Earlier herein, I indicated that I would explain in some detail the Rothschild involvement in the war between Japan and Russia in 1904-1905. At that time the government of Japan thought they were receiving a helping hand from Jacob Schiff who worked behind the scenes to foment tension between Russia and Japan, but what was actually behind the loan Schiff gave to the Japanese?

The Rothschilds needed Japan in their quest to destabilize Russia. Their hatred of the Romanov family was unbounded. The attack by the Japanese fleet on Port Arthur set the stage for the Bolshevik Revolution that was to follow in due time. As Lionel Rothschild once remarked, "there has been no friendship between the Court of St. Petersburg and my family."

The Russo-Japanese War began on February 8, 1904. The Communists were jubilant seeing in the attack a chance to strike a blow against the government. Russian newspapers like Novoye Vremyo charged that the Zionist Jews were secretly helping Japan. In this they were correct because Jacob Schiff was instrumental in floating several loans in favor of Japan.

Schiff was tied to the Rothschilds through his birth in Frankfurt on January 10, 1847. His father was known to the Rothschilds. When he reached adulthood, Jacob became a broker for the Rothschild bank in Frankfurt. During 1865 the Rothschilds sent him to New York to connect up with the firm of Frank and Gans. Under the instructions of the Rothschilds he started his own brokerage house of Budge, Schiff and Co. in 1867. The partnership lasted for about six years and was dissolved in 1873 at which time Schiff went to Europe.

After a tour of German banking firms in 1873 he returned to the United States in 1875, and was made a member of the banking firm Kuhn, Loeb and Co., a well known "front" for Rothschild banking interests in America. Schiff hated Russia and saw in a Russo-Japanese War the chance to strike a blow against the Tsars and perhaps bring about the end of their rule over Russia.

By his express order, Kuhn, Loeb and Co., floated the three large Japanese war loans in 1904 and 1905. In appreciation he was awarded the Second Order of the Sacred Treasure of Japan. After the decisive defeat of the Russian fleet at Port Arthur, the stage was set for the grave unrest in Russia that was to follow:

July 28, 1904
Murder of Viacheslav von Plehve, the able minister of the interior

August 22,1904
Jewish rioting erupted in Kiev, Rovno and Volhnia, continued to October

January 22,1905
Bloody Sunday led by Rothschild agent "Father" Giorgi Gapon

October 2-30,1905
A General Strike in which the whole country joined December 22-January 1,1905-06 Insurrection of workers in Moscow

May 2,1906
The dismissal of Count Witte, recognized by historians as the beginning of the end of the rule of the Romanov's

The murder of von Plehve was predicted in a Jewish poem circulated in February 1904, addressed to "Haman." Easily identified as the minister of the interior, it read that the "new Haman" would soon die. On the morning of July 28, 1904, a terrorist by the name of Sazonov threw a bomb at von Plehve as he stood in the square before the Warsaw depot in St. Petersburg.

Just before the Bolshevik Revolution erupted, Schiff gave Lenin $20 million to further the Bolshevik cause. It is no wonder that Pope Leo XIII wrote in his Apostolic Letter of March 19, 1902, Parvenu a la Vingt-cinquieme Anee:

> Including most nations in its immense grip it unites itself with other sects of which the real inspiration and the hidden motive powers. It first attracts and then retains its associates by the bait of worldly advantage, which it secures for them. It bends governments to its will sometimes by promises, sometimes by threats. It has found its way into every class of society, and forms an invisible and irresponsible power, an independent government, as if it were within the body corporate of the lawful state.

Well did Dr. Gerard Encausse in Mysteria in the April 1914 issue declare:

> Side by side with the international politics of each State, there exist certain obscure organizations of > international politics. . . The men that take part in these councils are not professional politicians or brilliantly-dressed ambassadors, but certain, unknown men, high financiers, who are superior to the vain ephemeral politicians who imagine that they govern the world.

Before he was turned in favor of the conspirators, Winston Churchill remarked about events in Russia:

> The leading spirits of a formidable sect, the most formidable sect in the world, and with those spirits around him, set to work with a demoniacal ability to tear to pieces every institution upon which the Russian State depended. Russia was laid low. Russia had to be laid low. She was laid low in the dust.

Churchill was referring to the diabolical fury of Lenin and Trotsky, and the terror and destruction they brought down on Christian Russia. (Speech in the House of Commons on Nov. 5, 1919)

Lenin was but another valet of the Rothschilds sent to do their bidding. Their hatred for the Romanovs' knew no bounds. The one thing that infuriated the Rothschilds was the Tsar's attempt to form a Holy Empire that would acknowledge Christ as it leader. There are several accounts: The Jewish author A. Rappaport's book, The Curse of the Romanov's, Professor William Langer's account, John Spencer Bassett in The Lost Fruits of Waterloo and documents in Lord Milner's private papers.

The Holy Alliance was considered a Christian League of Nations, Austria, Prussia, and Russia with the hope that Britain and France and all the nations of Europe would join. The nations were to swear an oath of allegiance to "The One and Only True Sovereign, to whom alone, all power by divine right belongs, namely God, our Divine Savior, Jesus Christ."

The leading light in this hoped-for alliance was Tsar Alexander I who moved mightily to make it become a reality. The Rothschilds immediately expressed their opposition to it. Professor Langer defines it thusly, which in my opinion is a prejudiced account:

> On September 26, 1815, the Holy Alliance, a document drawn up by the Tsar Alexander I, signed by the Emperor Francis I and by Frederick William III and ultimately by all European rulers, excepting the prince regent of Britain, the pope, and the sultan of Turkey. It was an innocuous declaration of Christian principles, which were to guide the rulers in their relations with their subjects and with each other.
> These vague and unexceptionable principles were probably meant by the tsar as merely a preface to some form of international organization along the lines recommended by the Abbe de St. Pierre a century earlier.
> The importance of the document lay not in its terms, but in its later confusion in the public mind with the Quadruple Alliance and more particularly, with the reactionary policy of the three eastern powers which were regarded as bound by a pact directed against the liberties of the people, camouflaged as religion.

In the first instance, it was not "camouflaged as religion." That was the interpretation put upon it by the Rothschilds who did all they could to stop Britain from signing the document.

In France, the Rothschilds were instrumental in getting the "separation of Church and State" to help to dissolve the Holy Alliance. Rappaport's book in this regard:

> The re-establishment of European peace has given to Czar Alexander I great satisfaction. Alexander directed his attention to the irreligiousness of the nations as the source of evils. He conceived the idea of reviving religious fervor in the peoples and thus re-establish a patriarchal regime, purity of family life, obedience to the law and authority. But the rulers must set an example and serve as models for their subjects.
> The sovereigns of Europe must carry out their missions as rulers of empires and kingdoms in the spirit of the founder of Christianity, which should be the link uniting the sovereigns to their peoples and among themselves. (Curse of the Romanov's, page 336)

Apparently the Holy Alliance was at variance with the plans of the Rothschilds if we take into account the writings of Count Cherep-Spiridovich, who believed that from that moment on in 1815, the Rothschilds sealed the fate of Russia and the Romanov family. Cardinal Manning stated: An association has been formed for the express purpose of rooting out all the religions of the establishments and overturning all the governments of Europe. The cardinal believed that the first victim was France in the French Revolution and Russia was its second victim. There is evidence that Disraeli did not tell the truth about Russia. It was the Rothschilds, who fomented the Bolshevik Revolution and financed it through their New York banking fronts of Jacob Schiff and J.P. Morgan, and in London by Lord Alfred Milner. It is a fact that Schiff gave Trotsky $20 million for the task of overthrowing Christian Russia.

The history of the Rothschilds shows that they did not hesitate to spend part of their huge fortune to achieve political goals. In this they achieved astonishing successes.

That the Rothschilds held and exercised amazing power over nations and governments is born out by the following:

> The Kaiser had to consult Rothschild to find out whether he could declare war. Another Rothschild carried the whole burden of the conflict which overthrew Napoleon. (The Patriot, Dr. Stuart Holden, June 11, 1925)

> The revolt in Georgia (Caucasus) was staged by the Rothschilds. (Humanite, September 1924. This was a Jewish magazine)

> The Rothschilds can start or prevent wars. Their word could make or break Empires.
> (Chicago Evening newspaper, December 3, 1923)

> Alphonso Rothschild consented to pay all the indemnity of France to Germany, if France would elect him King.
> (Journal d'un Officier d'Ordonance by Comte d'Hemson)

> At the last, decisive council of the British Cabinet on July 3, 1914, Mr. Lloyd George invited Lord Rothschild to listen to the debate. The Prime Minister played his demonical game on behalf of the Rothschilds, whose mere tool he has always been and still is. If England had honestly declared that she would stand by Russia and France there would have been no war, because the Kaiser would never have permitted it, not withstanding the 10 Jews who closely surrounded him: Bethman-Hollwig-Rothschild, Rathenau, Ballin and Dembury. (Unrevealed History, Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

> The Rothschilds have been the backbone of all political and financial happenings since 1770. Their name ought to be mentioned on each page of the history of every country. The authors, teachers, lecturers and politicians who do not speak of them, must be considered dupes, hypocrites or criminally ignorant. (Unrevealed History, Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

> Most of the Archives containing details about the Rothschilds were purposefully burned in Paris during the Commune in 1871, of which Rothschild was the chief financier. (La Libre Parole, May 27, 1905)

> In February 1817, the free masons, Bublikoff and others; all valets of the Rothschilds, went over to Russia and stopped the fast food trains that were going to Petrograd, in order to provoke the people into revolt. (Unrevealed History, Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

> On February 15, 1911, Schiff and Co., urged President Taft not to renew the Commercial Treaty of 1832 with Russia. When he declined, Schiff refused to shake his hand, saying, 'this means war.' The murders of Luschinsky and Prime Minister Stolypin and World War followed.
> (Towards Disasters; Dangers and Remedies, Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

The Rothschilds consorted with kings, princes and potentates, they amassed huge fortunes and titles, lords and barons, "Sir" and "Lady" and had innumerable honors bestowed upon them. They wished to forget their beginnings and their founder who made it all possible by misappropriating the "windfall" he was given charge of by the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel.

SOME OPINIONS ON THE ROTHSCHILDS, THEIR ROLE IN WAR, REVOLUTION AND FINANCIAL INTRIGUES

This chapter consists of opinions by various authors and authorities which cannot be conveniently included in the body of the book because they are somewhat disconnected.

Nevertheless, in my opinion they are important, because they provide a basis for the writings of those historians and researchers who have been almost solidly at one with the belief that the Rothschilds were one of the greatest forces at play in the 18th and 19th centuries, and who are in all probability, even more so, today.

The First World War brought to Eduard Rothschild more than 100 billion dollars. (Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

This mighty revolution which is at this moment preparing in Germany and of which so little is as yet known is developing entirely under the auspices of the Jews, who almost monopolize the professional chairs of Germany. (Coningsby, Disraeli, page 250, writing about events in 1844-1848)

Historians agree that he meant the Rothschilds. Practically all wars and revolutions were then financed by the Rothschilds. (Disraeli in Coningsby, pages 218-219)

The League of Nations is a Jewish idea. We created it after a fight of 25 years. (Nathan Sokolow, Zionist leaders at Carlsbad Congress, August 27, 1932)

The League of Nations is run entirely by Jews: Paul Hymans, Sir Eric Drummond, Paul Mantaux, Major Abraham, Mrs. N. Spiller, The Jew 'valet,' Albert Thomas who helped with French millions to help enthrone the Bolsheviks in Russia, is "chief of the Labor Section. He receives a fabulous salary." (Le Peril Juif La Regue d'Israel chez les Anglo Saxons, B. Grasset, Peres, France)

Again this appears to refer to the Rothschilds and I take pains to point out that in most cases "Jews" may be substituted for "Rothschilds."

The modern social revolutionary movement dates back from the middle of the 18th century. Ever since that time there; has been a flowing of a continuous stream of subversive agitation, assuming many forms, but essentially the same, ever broadening and deepening until it became a veritable flood, which has submerged Russia and which threatens to engulf our civilization. (The Revolt Against Civilization, Lothrop Stoddard)

The great revolutionary movements began between the middle and the end of the 18th century, when in 1770, Amschel Rothschild became the manager of the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel. Amschel hired all of the Miliukovs, Kerenskies and Lenins et al of the 18th century to start their subversive agitation, just as E. Rothschild hired those of the 20th century. (Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

Facts of world importance are known to too few men, and we need more facts. Humanity cannot find the light unless it has facts. (Editor of the Chicago Daily News)

What is this formidable sect of which Abbe Burruel speaks in the 18th century and Churchill in the 20th? Upon the answer may rest the power of Christianity and of civilization based upon Christianity. It was a power outside of Russia; it was a worldwide power and it was strong enough to bring down Russia, and also, the House of Hohenzollers. What was it? (Cause of World Unrest, Nesta Webster, page 35)

Lloyd George said he did not believe any statesman or ruler caused war. It may be a century before the world will know the full truth. (Senator Copeland, Congressional Record)

The House of Rothschild with a few co-religionists conspires to own the world.
(The Secret of the Rothschilds, Mrs. Mary Hobart)

The Kaiser had to consult Rothschild to find out if he could declare war. Another Rothschild carried the whole burden of the conflict which overthrew Napoleon. (The New York Times, July 22, 1924)

In the Imperial Archives in Berlin was found a letter from Rothschild to Wilhelm II, urging war.
(Truth About The Jews, Walter Hurt, page 324)

To the public, the archives of the family, (the Rothschilds) which could throw so much light upon history are a profound secret, a sealed book kept hidden.
(The Rothschilds, Financial Rulers of the World, John Reeves, page 59)

Bismarck, Beaconsfield (Disraeli), the French Republic, Gambetta etc., all are a force as nothing. A mere mirage. It is the Jew alone with his Bank who is their master and who rules all of Europe. The Jew will prefer VETO and suddenly, Bismarck will fall. . . To the Rothschilds, nothing could have occurred more propitiously than the outbreak of the American revolt and the French Revolution, as the two enabled them to lay the foundations of the immense wealth they have sine acquired.

Mrs. Nesta Webster cannot escape the conclusion that international financiers put up the money (for revolutions and wars.) More it is the Jewish financiers who supply the funds; it is Jews who have been the agents-provocateurs of revolutions of revolutions for the last two thousand years. It is the Jews who are the secret inner council of the five principal organized horrendous movements at work with which organized government has to contend. (The New York Times, March 8, 1925)

In the whole range of history, no one has aroused emotions so opposite and intense, or has claimed so much of the admiration of, the fear, and the hared of mankind. (Napoleon, Hebert Fisher)

A man, Napoleon, born without any advantage of wealth or high descent made himself master of the world before he was 35 and he finished his career of un-paralleled romantic impossibility when he was 46. (How Great Was Napoleon? Sydney Dark)

In conclusion how amazing it is, that the same leaders of the elite of the world, who have the power to excite wars for their own benefits, can also break and consign to obscurity, those formerly important national leaders who oppose their grand designs, particularly their plans to establish a New World Order operation inside a World structure of a single One World Government dictatorship. Unless a counter force can be erected to oppose these plans, the world could very well be plunged into the darkness of a brutal dictatorship by the year 2025.

THE ROTHSCHILD OCTOPUS

Written by: Vlada Sindjelic

Marxism, globalism, the new world order, liberalism...All these are euphemisms for a phenomenon embodied in the invisible empire of the Rothschild family.

Jacob Rothschild

The Rothschilds do not die, they simply depart into history, and their place is inconspicuously taken by their sons and grandsons. Word goes that the old master Jacob has left the scene, and that his place has been occupied by his son Nathan (Nathaniel Philip Rothschild, who bears the name of the founder of the English Rothschilds). The heavy burden has fallen on the frail shoulders of the young heir. But Nathan is not alone. In the running of the empire he will be aided by his uncles Evelyn and Edmund and the other members of the English branch of the family (Catherine, Emma, Leopold), but also his French cousins (David, Eduard...).

The Rothschild family has produced governors, prime ministers, ministers, supervisors who are making sure that everything goes according to the big plan.
The European Union was created by the Rothschilds (Schumann, a Khazar). The EU is an exploiter of Russia, which should be freed from the Siberian burden. With the aim of completing this job the Rothschilds have employed Soros, Berezovski, Hodorkovski, Kasparov, the Mitals...

If we wish to unveil the background and causes of these events, we must delve into the dark history of the Khazar dynasty Rothschild, identify the agents, the grey eminences, the greedy politicians, as well as the mechanisms of their actions.

Let us start with the Rothschilds, the main characters. They are the ones sitting at the head of the table.

WHO ARE TODAY'S ROTHSCHILDS?

Although ever since World War II the Rothschild departments for the creation of public opinion have been assuring people that the power of the Rothschilds today is insignificant and that they will be remembered by their vineries in France or gardens and philanthropy in Great Britain, reality projects a completely different picture. Building upon the foundations laid by their fathers and grandfathers, the present-day descendants are completing a mission that has lasted for several centuries. Today, the Rothschilds are the steam engine of a Khazar train heading for Russia and the vast expanses of Siberia. This train, which runs through the Balkans, is to be boarded with armies of the newly recruited members of NATO, which will then fight for the Rothschild empire.

THE RED SHIELD FROM FRANKFURT

In order to be better acquainted with the new sovereign and his dukes, let us look at the lineage and the chronology of this dynasty. It all began towards the end of 18th century with Amshel (or Moses Bauer) Rothschild.

The Rothschilds (Rothschild translates as “the red shield”) are descended from Frankfurt. It is no coincidence that this is the greatest financial centre in the EU. It is very indicative that Frankfurt is the seat of the Central European Bank and all the major European and American banks, which are mainly controlled by the dynasty. The Frankfurt Stock Market (one of the most important stock markets in the world) is aligned to the “Deutsche Borse” owned by the Rothschilds via their “Children’s Investment Trust” and “Atticus Capital” on the one hand, and their branches “Merrill Lynch” and “Fidelity Investments” on the other. Beside that, the coat of arms of the city of Frankfurt is a red shield! This symbol dates back to the period of the Khazar empire.

Meyer Rothschild

The coat of arms of the city of Frankfurt

The writer Dejan Lucic says of Khazars:

90% of present-day Jews are Khazars by origin. They are a Turkish-Mongol tribe, which was converted to Judaism in the middle of 8th century. When their empire fell apart in 10th century they settled down across Russia and Europe, and later on the American continent as well. They are converts and have no Semitic origins at all. The Semite Jews come from Palestine and number between 7 and 10%.

Amshel had five sons, whom he positioned all across Europe. Salomon went to Vienna, Carl to Naples, Nathan to London, James to Paris and the fifth son Amshel stayed in Frankfurt. In less than two hundred years the sons and their descendants completely subjugated the west. Thus the foundations of a “Pax Judaica” were laid. The head of the family is the Anglo-French Rothschild team led by Nathan, son of Jacob Rothschild. The English team is led by the aged Edmund and Evelyn and the young Nathan, and the French team by David and Eduard.

Meyer's sons

THE ENGLISH ROTHSCHILDS

The English branch of the Rothschilds was founded by Nathan Meyer, the third Amshel's son. During 19th and 20th centuries an alliance was established between the British crown and this family, so that the modern history of Britain is inseparably tied to the Khazar dynasty. Today, the Khazar triumvirate is made up of the abovementioned Evelyn, Edmund and Nathan.

- Edmund Rothschild (1916)

He built his career by pushing the British-Khazar interests in the post-war Japan. In cooperation with Winston Churchill he founded the BRINCO Corporation (British Newfoundland Development Corporation) in Canada. Edmund's daughter Catherine is married to Marcus Egius, the president of "Barclay's" global financial group (after the acquisition of ABN-AMRO, a Dutch banking group, these two Rothschild groups have become one). Marcus is also at the head of the BBC corporation.

- Evelyn Rothschild (1931)

After the union of the English and French Rothschild financial and banking groups, and his stepping down from the leading positions in them, he remained head of the enormous N M Rothschild & Sons, an investment bank from London.
Evelyn also has control of the press (the Economist, the Daliy Telegraph...).
He set up the Association for Studies of the History of Banking and Finances, which has a seat in Frankfurt.

He owns the international corporation De Biers, one of the leaders in the area of the exploitation, refinement and distribution of diamonds.

Evelyn Rothschild

Together with his wife Lynn Forester, he controls the "FirstMark Communications International LLC" and "FieldFresh Foods" with the Indian family Mital, which, in fact, acts as a representative of Rothschild interests and capital (the great "Bharti" group). Evelyn's main agents in the area of politics are Soros, Norman Lamont, Peter Mandelson (a Khazar), Oliver Letwin (a Khazar) and Vernon Jordan. Lamont has influence over the Conservative Party and the potential prime minister Michael Howard (a Khazar). Howard was a minister of the Treasury when Margaret Thatcher was in office. He took part in regional conferences together with Stjepan Mesic (Croatia) and Boris Tadic (Serbia). Peter Mandelson is the present commissary of Great Britain in the EU and is close to Labour Party and Tony Blaire.

On the other hand, Vernon Jordan (Lazard Bank) is very influential in the Democrat Party in the USA (he was an advisor to Bill Clinton and led the campaign for John Carrey in 2004). Evelyn's wife Lynn financed Bill Clinton's presidential election campaigns and is also a close friend of Hillary Clinton.
Evelyn is also very close to Duke of York, Prince Edward (son of Queen Elizabeth), which reveals only a part of a long-standing connection between the British royal dynasty and the Rothschild family.

-Nathan Philip Rothschild (1971)

Young Nathan is the son of Jacob Rothschild, from whom he inherited innumerable managers, agents, and an influence over the vital political, economic, media and military institutions all over the world, including even the Butrint archaeological site in Albania...

The companies and corporations "RIT Capital", "Atticus Capital", "JNR Limited", "NM Rothschild", "Vanco", "Trigranit", "British Petroleum", Rio Tinto, are only a part of the resources which are at the disposal of the new king in his crusade for the east. To achieve this he has at his service not only the western nomenclature in the EU, NATO, Great Britain, but also numerous financial and political operatives all over Europe and Asia (Soros, Berezovski, Djukanovic, the Mitals...).

THE FRENCH ROTHSCHILDS

The French dynasty of Rothschild, which was founded by James Meyer, is a flank guard of the British triumvirate. The French Rothschilds are represented by David Rene and Eduard Rothschild, sons of Guy Rothschild(1909-2007).

- David Rene Rothschild (1942)

David is head of the NM Rothschild group, which is divided between the English and the French Rothschilds. He is also head of "Rothschild & Cie Banque", an influential investment bank in West Europe.

David Rene Rothschild

- Eduard Rothschild (1957)

David's half-brother Eduard is also a member of the investment bank. In addition to this, he controls the renowned French newspaper "Liberation". He is at the head of the "Imerys" metallurgy company, which has been owned by the Rothschilds since 1880.

The Rothschilds in Serbia

In Serbia, the new king progresses in several lanes, thus trying to take over mining basins, energy production, the food industry, the media... The first lane has, for some time now, been occupied by George Soros who represents the crucial lever for the expansion of the Rothschilds towards the east and the first emissary of Nathan Rothschild in Serbia.

George Soros and his connection to the Rothschilds

Soros is a Hungarian Jew (a Khazar), born in Budapest in 1930 as György Schwartz (in 1936 his parents changed their surname to Sorosz).He was educated in London and in 1950s he went to the USA. An important role in his development was played by the famous Khazar Carl Popper, who approved Soros's projects and was his guru.

George (Schwartz) Soros, the main agent of the Rothschilds

Throughout the world, this grey eminence is represented as the "Robin Hood of the computer age", because he seemingly takes the money from the rich countries and via his foundations generously gives it to East Europe and Russia.

In this way he installs "democracy" and "civil society" in countries which suffered and were exhausted during communism, the very communism that was forced onto these countries by those very Rothschilds.
He built his career upon financial speculations all over the world, mostly thanks to his family of investment funds "Quantum Fund", whose managers, and at the same time his agents, are Italian and Swiss financiers.

The connection between Soros and the Rothschilds is achieved through a network of confidential people who sit in administrative committees of funds, trusts, companies, banks... One of those people was a certain Richard Katz (also a Khazar), a member of the "Quantum Fund" committee. At the same time he was head of "Rothschild Italia S.p.A." and a member of the committee of the commercial bank "N.M. Rothschild & Sons" in London. Another important player is Nils O. Taube, also a member of Quantum and a partner of the investment group "St .James Place Capital", which now belongs to Nathaniel Rothschild.

The connection is also realized via Societe Generale Bank and its manager Michael Cicurel, who is chairman of Edmund Rothschild's management and a member of the Rothschild & Cie Banque board. Another frequent partner of Soros's was James Goldsmith (a Khazar), related to Rothschild dynasty.

Soros's Network in Serbia

In Serbia, this grey eminence is preparing the ground for Nathaniel Rothschild and is an important creator of the political, legal, economic, cultural and media image of Serbian society. On his way to the achievement of his goals he is seeking to drive out the Serbian Orthodox church, the Serbian language, the Cyrillic alphabet, Serbian history, nationalism... He spun the network of his influence way back in 1990s through the "Open Society Fund", :Humanitarian Rights Fund", "Helsinki Committee", "Belgrade Circle", "European Movement", "Centre for Anti-War Action", "NUNS", "ANEM", "OTPOR"...

Today, all the leading NGOs are branch offices of the Rothschilds and are entrusted with not only attaining the greatest political influence possible, but also with the psychological shaping of the nation. By constantly pinning on the Serbian people accusations for genocide, criminal mentality and collective guilt, these phantom organizations aim at creating the feelings of fear and guilt in people. These feelings are supposed to materialize as indifference to a piece of land, to driving Serbs out of their land or, in other words, to colonization. This is also done in the form of liberalism which is supposed to reach metastasis in state institutions, in the family, the nation, tradition, culture, and thus ensure a clear passage for Rothschild empire.

In addition to the abovementioned organizations, very active participants in this offensive are "Yucom", the Belgrade Centre for Human Rights, the Civil Initiative, the Centre for Cultural Decontamination, Women in Black, the Youth Initiative... Advocates of this anti-Serb hysteria are Sonja Biserko, Natasa Kandic, Vuco, Borka Pavicevic (the wife of the lawyer Nikola Barovic), Miljenko Dereta, Vojin Dimitrijevic, Srdja Popovic, Mirko Djordjevic, Biljana Srbljanovic, Zoran Ostojic, and the journalists Petar Lukovic, Teofil Pancic, as well as all the other infamous vedettas of Soros's. Soros also pushes anti-Semitism, which is then ascribed to the "xenophobic Serbian society". Those in charge of this are Filip David, Jovan Byford, Laszlo Sekel... Various "incidents", threatening letters, desecrating of monuments, graffiti are all parts of this plan. We should not disregard the fact that the Open Society Fund supports (both financially and ideologically) the organizations advocating gay rights (Labris, Queeria, Gay Serbia...).

Marketing and the media and logistic support to this subversive project are ensured through "independent" media, such as B92, Studio B, TV Pink, TV Panonija, ANEM (the TV stations Devic, RTV Globus, RTV M+, RTV Kraljevo, RTV Nisava, RTV Pancevo, RTV Spektar, RTV Trstenik, the radio stations Radio 021, Bum 93, Radio Sombor, Radio Index, Radio Subotica, Radio Pirot, Radio Ozon...), the "Free Europe" radio... The cable TV network SBB and the satellite television TOTAL TV which are expanding, are also owned by Soros. The production companies VIN and PG Network contribute to the information unity. The Media Centre provides additional publicity to the so-called NGO sector

In addition to the electronic media, Soros's list includes the newspapers and magazines Danas, Vreme, Evropa, Republika, the association of independent local media "Local Press" (the newspapers Pancevac, Kikindske, Vranjske novine, Nasa rec...), the publishing houses Samizdat, Dan graf, Stubovi culture, Fabrika knjiga, Klio, Aleksandrija pres; the book distributors Bookbridge, Beopolis... He also controls the information agency Sense and the two leading information agencies in Serbia – Beta and Fonet. At the same time these agencies are branch offices of AP (Associated Press) and Reuters, which have been owned by the Rothshilds ever since 19th century. Sorosz has also infiltrated cultural and educational institutions, theatres, the National Library, the Historical Archives, SANU (Serbian Academy of Arts and Sciences)...He has gathered around himself a large group of actors, directors, playwrights, musicians, writers, scientists, analysts, former diplomats, who assist him in animating more and more followers.

Two Gorans – Markovic (whose mentor is Bernard Levi, a great friend of Bernard Coushner's) and Paskaljevic, satanize Serbs at film festivals. We should also mention the following educational organizations of Soros's: the Union University, the Alternative Academic Education Network (AAOM), the Belgrade Open School, the Centre for Women Studies (which sprung out of the feminist group "Woman and Society")... They recruit future Sorosz's mercenaries. The centre for the improvement of legal studies – Human Rights Watch (HRW) is also present. CESID and all the other polling organizations are in the same camp.

A political acquisition of the Rothschilds'

In addition to the "non-governmental" sector, Soros has laid his hands on the finances as well, controlling them via various "experts" (G17+) who are financed by the "Open Society".

Beside this, we should point out that Soros has stocks at Societe Generale bank, which takes up an important part of the financial market. The Hague Tribunal is also financed from Soros's funds.

The most active of Soros's exponents in the political life in Serbia (of course, apart from the "non-governmental" system and G17+) is the coalition gathered around LDP and Cedomir Jovanovic, which was the most expensive of Rothshild's investments in the latest parliament elections. Together with the guests of the radio show Pescanik (B92 Radio), this anti-Serb group articulates the ideas of Nathaniel Rothshild most brutally and loudly. The Spiritus agens of this virulent group is Latinka Perovic, the founder of modern liberalism in Serbia.

Latinka Perovic, Cedomir Jovanovic's guru

We should say that Soros spreads his influence through the Democratic Party as well. The best example of this is the election of Oliver Dulic, one of Sonja Liht's personnel, as president of Serbian Parliament.

Oliver Dulic

What are Rothshilds' interests in Kosmet and Vojvodina?

Important Rothshild companies in this region are Carlyle Group and the International Crisis Group which, led by Soros, has been campaigning for independent Kosovo for years. In addition to Sorosz, the group is finaced by Rupert Murdoch (Sky), Goldman Sacks, JP Morgan... Members of this group are or were Marti Ahtisari, James Lion, Morton Abramovich, Louise Arbour, Bzezinski, Wesley Clark, Mihail Hodorkovski, Thorvald Stoltenberg... The staff have changed, but not the anti-Serb policy.

Marti Ahtisari, one of Rothschils' representatives

Independent Kosovo is also in the interest of the Rothshilds, because it is the "Serbian Kuwait" with enormous reserves of lead, zinc, gold, coal...Since the occupation of Kosovo and Metohija (Kosmet) Soros has invested a lot of money and effort in getting hold of Trepca for the Rothshilds. An important link in the chain is Agron Dida, deputy minister of energy and mining in Kosovo government, who was elected to this office after being a member of KFOS (one of Soros's organizations). Independence is crucial to the interests of Rothshilds' mining and metallurgical companies, since it would provide them with a clear passage for snatching mineral wealth and energy resources which are in low supply in the world.

In the meantime the Alferon company has bought over the metallurgical plant Feronikl, which owns several open-pit mines. Alferon is owned by three businessmen from Kazakhstan (i.e. Rothshilds' tycoons, one of them being Alexander Mashkevic, also a Khazar) and is part of the ENRC (Eurasian Natural Resources Corporation) .

Head of ENRC and Alferon is Johannes Sittard, one of Rothschilds' agents, and until recently the right hand of Lakshmi Mital (also one of Rothshilds' investors). Mital invested 100 million dollars in the company's development. Apart from Alferon, the Global Steel corporation (owned by Pramod Mital) is also present in Kosovo, via its Bulgarian branch Kremikovici, which it acquired in 2005. This company bought the Lamkos plant (for zinc-coated steel) in Vucitrn. We should mention that this company also bought over the Lemind foundry in Leskovac and Zastava Smithy in Kragujevac.

At the same time, Soros has been expanding his influence through the Kosovo Fund for Open Society (KFOS) and other affiliates, by financing the media (Koha ditore), politicians (Veton Suroi)... Part of the same chain is Ekrem Luka, who has taken hold of the brewery in Pec. He coordinates the work of the other non-governmental branches through Balkan Human Rights Network.

He has also secured privileges for Alcatel, the mobile phone company in Kosovo, which he indirectly controls via Globalstar L.P.

In addition to his devoted work on the stealing of Kosovo and Metohija, Soros and the International Crisis Group are beginning to turn their attention to Vojvodina. In cooperation with the government of this province, they are trying to make Vojvodina sit at the same table with Croatia, Hungaria and Romania, all of which are Rothschild proxies. With this aim they are creating the "Danube project", backed by Germany and Austria. According to this idea, Vojvodina should be pushed into a confederation of countries in the Danube Basin as a "European region". Not long ago German ambassador Zobel(a Khazar) drew attention to this, no doubt deliberately. The project is carried out through the acquisition of agricultural combines, sugar refineries, dairies, oil refineries, banks... Agricultural estates are increasingly being purchased by Croats, who have already bought several important food companies. Agrokor has taken over Dijamant from Zrenjanin, Frikom... Nekse Group has bought Polet IGK, Strazilovo, and has stocks in Toza Markovic company for the production of construction materials (it also owns the Jelen Do plant for the manufacturing of lime and stone). Somboled has also been purchased.

On the other hand, both Austria and Germany are positioning their companies in the province. The German company Nordzucker has bought over sugar refineries all across Vojvodina. With MG Commerce it has set up the Sunoko company and in this way it has come into possession of tens of thousands of acres of land. Stada has bought Hemofarm. VAC has purchased Dnevnik from Novi Sad. The Austrian Erste Bank chose Novi Sad as it seat. OTC banking group and Metals bank have done the same. These things coincide with a more and more intensive penetration of Hungarian companies into Serbia and the region, as well as an increased influence of the Hungarian government. Both of these are supported by Nathaniel Rothschild.

We should mention that Serbs in Austria have also been granted the status of a national minority. Hence, this would be the status of Serbs in the future confederation which would represent a realization of the Alpe-Adria project – an incarnation of the Habsburg state.

Investment Funds

The second lane of Nathaniel Rothschild's progress in Serbia is occupied by investment funds from Virgin and other exotic islands, which are seemingly owned by "Russian Jews" (in fact, Khazars). The most important one is Salford, from Virgin Islands, behind which stand Boris Berezovski (a Khazar) and Rothschild capital. The fund was set up in London in 2001 and today it owns almost the entire dairy industry in Serbia (Imlek, Novi Sad Dairy, Subotica Dairy, Impaz, Zemun), the Bambi concern, Knjaz Milos...

Boris Berezovski, a Rothshild agent, in charge of overthrowing Putin

The founder of the fund is Eugene Geffy, a Khazar from Russia, who made his career in Russian Alfa bank, which is connected to Boris Berezovski and Friedman

One of the members in Salford committee is Lord Tim Bell, a former advisor to Margaret Thatcher, who is very close to Berezovski, Rupert Murdoch, Viktor Yuschenko, and was in good relations with Yeltsin. The president of this fund is Klaus Mangel, who was Boris Berezovski's partner in selling Mercedes cars in Russia.

In addition to Salford, the Ashmore investment fund is also strengthening its positions. It has recently taken over Carnex from Midland Resources. Ashmore is controlled by Rothschilds' Atticus. Namely, Ashmore is owned by Michael Benson, a former member of Amvescap, the company where the capital of Atticus is placed.

Midland Resources is a third important investment fund run by Alexander Schneider and Eduard Sifrin (both of whom are Khazars!). The Midland group owns the hotels Park and Kasina (the oldest hotel in Belgrade) and Pancevo Port.

Regal Appearance

The third lane of colonization is occupied by companies from the fields of construction, mining, metal industry, finances, banking and publishing, most of which are directly related to the young Rothschild. One of them and, at the same time, the most active company in the region is Trigranit, which has a seat in Budapest, and which has over the past few years grown into a regional giant and a leader in big investment projects.

Rothschild and Trigranit

It constructed a number of business and financial centres in Poland, Slovakia, Hungary, Slovenia, Romania, Bulgaria...In Croatia it is about to build a sports hall with 20,000 seats and office space. In Serbia Trigranit should construct the railways station "Prokop" (it has not been started yet).
The Riotinto branch (one of the largest mining companies in the world) has been granted the concession to exploit the boron ore (which can still be found only in China and Turkey) in the surroundings of Baljevac near the river Ibar. Other mining companies are present too - Glenkor, which Rothschild controls through his agent Mark Rich (a Khazar) and Phelps Dodge, where Atticus capital is placed (Atticus is Rothschild's investment fund). These two companies are placing bids for the remaining mining basins. The Magnohrom company from Kraljevo was bought through the Indian company Mital. Incidentally, the Mital family has been a representative of the Rothshild dynasty for a long time. Wilbur Ross, a Rothschild banker for many years, occupies a managerial position in Mital. In addition to Mital company, the Rothschilds and Mitals are in control of FieldFresh Foods company, which produces and exports food from India.

UniCredit Group METALS BANKA Banca Intesa

The banking and financial sectors are also dominated by the dynasty. The leading banks, such as Banca Intesa, Credit Agricole, Unicredit group, Societe General are controlled by the Rothshilds.

The lever which provides control is Antoine Bernheim (a Khazar), head of the Delta Generali group. The Greek banks Piraeus and Laiki are under the control of Marfin financial group, in which Rothshild's capital is placed. The Khazar Shandor Chanyi, one of the co-owners of Trigranit, enables Rothshild to expand his operations in the field of banking via his OTP group. OTP bought over three banks in Serbia: Kula, Nis and Zepter bank. Metals Bank from Novi Sad was bought by Rothshild's JNR Limited (Jacob and Nathaniel Rothschild) investment fund. The young Rothshild also controls the Hungarian oil company MOL, also through Chanyi.

MOL has been present in the Serbian market since 2005 and is a serious candidate for participation in the privatization of the oil industry.

We should also mention that NM Rothschild is the financial advisor to NLB Continental, a banking group from Slovenia.

Antoine Bernheim

Shandor Chanyi

The Rothschilds participated in the privatization of Mobtel as well. They have been present in the publishing industry through the Slovene "Mladinska knjiga", which is part of "Reader's digest", an American company whose part has recently been bought by the Rothschilds.

The Rothshilds in Montenegro, the Republic of Srpska, Bosnian Federation, Croatia and Macedonia

Montenegro, terra Rothschildiana

The arrival of Rothschilds' delegation soon after the referendum (which was carried out by those very Rothschilds), meant the branding of one of the oldest Serb countries with "colonized". Jacob and Nathaniel Rothshild thus obtained another colony. Today, Montenegro is completely owned by Khazar companies run by the Rothshilds. The pattern is the same. As elsewhere in the region, colonization is carried out by the Rothschilds. Next to them are "Russian" businessmen, Soros... There are ports to be appropriated, and natural resources, metallurgical plants, tourist capacities...

Rothshild congratulating on the proclamation of a "colony"

Just like in Serbia and the other coutries in the region, Soros had previously spun a network of NGOs. CEDEM, the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights, Human Rights Action and Hominem querum are only some of them. To this we can add the controlled media (ANEM), through which he carried out – successfully, it turns out – an anti-Serb campaign. In cooperation with European organizations and the Venice commission (one of whose members is Vojin Dimitrijevic as well) he actively supported the project of independence.

Peter Munk

Peter Munk (one of Nathaniel's managers, a Khazar) has taken over (through OTP) the overhaul company Arsenal in Tivat, where Trigranit is to construct a large marina. The same company is planning the construction of a business-financial centres in Podgorica, Ulcinj, Budva...

The head manager, Chanyi (OTP banking group), occupied the field of banking by purchasing Montenegrin Commercial Bank, which covers more than a half of the market in Montenegro. Its ally is Rothshilds' Societe Generale, which took over Podgorica Bank. NLV group bought the Montenegro Bank.

In addition to this, Rothschild and Chanyi's MOL is soon to become a strategic partner of the state oil company Montenegro Bonus. Milo Djukanovic, who gave the Rothshilds a blank check, was rewarded with a managerial position in Tigranit, which speaks volumes of the part he played in the process of colonization.

Monet, the mobile phone company which is part of Deutsche Telekom, is indirectly controlled by the Rothschilds!

An important role in the colonization of Montenegro was played by Oleg Deripaska, a Khazar multimillionaire from Russia. Nathaniel Rothschild himself has boasted of having excellent relations with him. As one of Rothschild branches, Deripaska's company Rusal bought KAP (The Alluminium Plant Podgorica). Through its affiliate Salamon, it took over the bauxite mine in Niksic. It should be mentioned that Rusal and Glenkor often act together. The Austrian company Strabag, in which Deripaska has a lare part, has bought over the Crnagoraput company. Tourist premises are being purchased as well as attractive pieces of seaside land, building land...

Oleg Deripaska

In order to secure his position in this colony, Rothschild has set up an organization for long-term granting of scholarships to students from Montenegro.

The Republic of Srpska

The Republic of Srpska, which is under constant pressure aiming at its complete annihilation, was penetrated by the Rothschilds via Soros's foundations, Mital Steel corporation, Salford. This

In accordance with his long-established custom, Soros founded a number of NGOs with the same goal as in Serbia (the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights, Lex International...). Soros's media are gathered around the international organization Press Now and the Soros media centre in Sarajevo. Among those media are Nezavisne novine, the Alternative Television Banja Luka, Net novinar...

In the area of industry, Salford bought over the Banja Luka dairy, the largest one in the Republic of Srpska. The company Stabag (Deripaska) was granted concession to construct a network of motorways.

The company Mittal Steel Zenica bought over the RZR Ljubija, a complex of mines with great reserves of iron ore. We should mention that the Russian state companies Juzuralzoloto and Zarubeznjev are also present. The former has become a strategic partner of the mining plant Sase in Srebrenica and the latter has bought over the oil refineries (Modrica, Petrol). Thus, any further penetration of MOL and Mittal has been prevented.

Lakshmi Mittal, the Indian Deripaska

Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina

In the Muslim-Croatian part of Bosnia, Mittal group is the leader in the area of mining and metallurgy. This group has taken hold of the steel plant in Zenica, one of the largest steel plants in the Balkans. The mining complex Ljubija in the Republic of Srpska has also become a part of Mittal.

The field of energy is reserved for MOL, which has bought over the state oil company Energopetrol. The investment fund of Boris Berezovski, Salford, has taken over the dairy industry (Mlekoprodukt - K.Dubica, Campomil – Sarajevo). It is expected that Ljubljana dairy plants will also be taken over. These plants include the dairy plant in Tuzla as well.

The sector of banking and finances is being dominated by Rothschild banks Unicredit, Intesa...

Ever since 1993 Soros has been present in the Federation through his network of NGOs. The same as in the other countries, this network is exceedingly anti-Serb oriented. Some of the more renowned members of Soros's Open Society have been Jacob Finci and Ivan Straus (Khazars). In addition to the Open Society, we can mention „Obrazovanje gradi", Media Centre Sarajevo, the Helsinki Committee, the Women of Bosnia and other NGO's. He also controls the following media – the newspaper Oslobodjenje, the Start magazine, the HTV Hajat television, the news agency ONASA...

Croatia

Unlike the other Balkan states, Croatia was occupied by the Rothschilds mainly from Hungary, which is a basis for the expansion of the Khazar dynasty.

In Croatia Soros is less present than in the other countries. The trump card from the non-governmental sector is Zarko Puhovski.

In addition to MOL which took over the oil company INA, another important Rothschild company in Croatian industry is Trigranit. A consortium Ingra-Trigranit has been founded (at the head of Ingra is Igor Openheim, a Khazar). The consortium is to build the sports arena in Zagreb, with a capacity of 20,000 seats. Trigranit also has ambitions plans regarding the Croatian seaside.

T-Mobile is present in the area of telecommunications.

Macedonia

After the break-up of Yugoslavia, this former republic has shared the fate of the other colonies in the region. In other words, the sovereignty and independence refer to the territory, whereas the economy and resources are undergoing quiet occupation and the people are being promised a "better future" in the EU. At the same time a pro-Albanian element is being promoted, with the aim of completing the project of the Greater Albania.

A central part in Macedonia is occupied by Mittal Steel Skopje, a part of Mittal corporation, which has bought over the metallurgy plant in Skopje, thus ensuring domination in the region. In the area of banking, Societe Generale has taken over Ohrid Bank.

On the other hand, Soros openly supports Albanian interests. For this purpose he uses numerous organizations – the Helsinki Committee, the Centre for Multicultural Understanding, the Association for Democratic Initiatives, all dominated by Albanians. The same goes for the media. Soros controls the "Shutel" television, the Vati and Life radio stations...

Soros also credited the Macedonian government in 1994 with 25 million dollars. During this same period he attained great influence on the then prime minister and the current president of Macedonia, Branko Crvenkovski. Branko Crvenkovski openly supported Marti Ahtisaari's plan for Kosovo.

Branko Crvenkovski, Soros's puppet

Soros is involved in the Macedonian mobile phone company MT via "Stonebridge Communications" company, in which he has stocks. Incidentally, MT is indirectly controlled by the Rothschilds through "Blackstone Group", a major financial-investment group which was founded in 1985 by their agents Peter George Peterson and Stefan Schwartzman (a Khazar). Both of them had previously made careers in Rothschild branch offices "Lehman Brothers" and "Kuhn Loeb Inc.". Blackstone group is the leading stockholder of "Deutsche Telekom" (T-Mobile), which also incorporates the Hungarian mobile phone company Matav – the owner of the Macedonian mobile phone company MT. "T-Mobile" is the second largest mobile phone company in Macedonia.

On the way to their goal the Rothschilds bring into play reforms, transitions, shock therapies, elections, referendums, secessions, revolutions, civil wars, military interventions...

Nations are offered "freedom", "democracy" and voluntary enslavement in return for their independence and resources!

The alternative is sanctions, isolation and bombing!

Former Yugoslavia was a phase in the crusade of Rothschild empire towards the east. The geopolitical combinations were not a Serbian ally yet again.

nUnUnfortunately, Serbia

Unfortunately, Serbia stood in the way of this beast with a kind face.

THE SECRET OF THE ROTHSCHILDS

Mary E. Hobart

Charles H. Kerr & Company
Chicago, 1898

thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow —Moses, Deut 15:6

This century will not close before we shall have a general reorganization of international relations THROUGHOUT THE WORLD and alliances and combinations on new lines to meet conditions which have long been changing SILENTLY and SLOWLY and have now reached the stage where the bud must burst into flower. —Memoranda of Baron Rothschild to Lord Salisbury, 1896.

PREFACE

It has been impossible within the narrow limits of this work to enter into an exhaustive discussion of all the phases, principles and complex relations of the "money question." Neither has it been possible to treat even in a limited manner of the "seven great conspiracies" which have been enacted into law by venal legislators and which have greatly intensified in number and magnitude the financial disasters which naturally arise under our present system of money, even when honestly administered. But that which has been attempted is to establish, beyond disputation, by analysis and comparative demonstration the fallacious principles upon which our money system is founded and without a knowledge of which it is impossible to understand the complex and confused conditions which now pervade all departments of our social fabric. The reader is admonished that there is no royal road which leads to the understanding of the science of government any more than there is to the understanding of geometry or astronomy.

If a practical comprehension of this subject is ever acquired it must be through the patient study and careful investigation of the relations which exist between all our varied business transactions.

The teacher who told his pupil that the best way to state a problem in compound proportion was to "guess at it" illustrates the teaching of political economy as it has been and is still taught. The economists, like the teacher, have never studied deep enough to discover that this science is not governed by the laws of "chance" but by principles which are as fixed and unchangeable as those by principles govern any branch of mathematics. The confusion and turmoil now agitating the world come because our teachers have been "guessing at it." They have been dealing in rhetoric when they should have been delving in numbers and philosophy. Rhetoric may, indeed, brighten and beautify economic discussion when once the principles have been established, but till then we must content ourselves with the soberest prose.

If the laboring people of America ever succeed in bettering their conditions it will only be after they themselves have mastered the principles of the systems through which their oppressors plunder them.

It is not true that "what a man does not know does not, hurt him." He is hurt just the same, knowledge or no knowledge. But when he does not know what hurts him he is powerless in his defense. All the sufferings and wrongs of the laboring people are endured because they do not understand the methods used by the so-called "better classes" to filch from them the rewards of their toil. The betterment of their conditions can only be accomplished through the betterment of their knowledge. With this view the author places before the public this unpretentious effort, regretting that space does not permit a more complete examination of the subject discussed. Many phases of the money, question which are of vital importance have necessarily been omitted. The work is designed to be in every sense elemental — an aid to those who have been unable through the complex discussions to gather a clear understanding of this vastly important subject. If this object shall be accomplished the author will be richly rewarded for the thought expended upon it. After carefully reading this book the reader is kindly requested to pass or mail it to some other person, with the request that he in like manner shall pass it on, in order that these truths may be more effectually disseminated among all classes.

CHAPTER I.

A PROBLEM FOR SCIENTISTS TO SOLVE.

I see in the near future a crisis arising, which unnerves me and makes me tremble for the safety of my country. As a result of the war corporations have been enthroned, and an era of corruption in high places will follow, and the money power will endeavor to prolong its reign, by working on the prejudices of the people, until all wealth is aggregated in the hands of the few, and the Republic is lost. —Abraham Lincoln, 1866.

By some machination, by some incantation, honest or otherwise, thirty thousand people have become possessed of thirty-five billions, or half the wealth of this great nation. Mr. Speaker, this is the most appalling statement that ever fell upon mortal ears. —John J. Ingalls, United States Senate, 1890.

The people of the United States are now thirty-two billion dollars in debt. —Speech of Jos. M. Walker, M.C., House of Representatives, 1882.

Organize under whatsoever form of government man may, under a Republic or a Principality, under a Kingdom or an Empire, there seems to be some secret law which continually concentrates the wealth which the many make into the hands of the idle few. Happy our generation if science sometime gives the key. —Blanqui's History of Political Economy.

These quotations furnish data from which no thoughtful student of public affairs can or will turn with indifference. Indeed, the striking character of each is sufficiently important to arrest the attention of the dullest dullard belonging to that species of the genus homo known as the American voter. The first, a prophecy from one of the wisest and purest of statesmen, predicating conditions then existing which if not arrested would overwhelm the young Republic and dethrone popular government. The second declares that the half-way station of this remarkable prophecy has already been passed. The third announces conditions which unerringly point to the final consummation of Abraham Lincoln's prophetic vision. The last asserts that this is the trend of human affairs under whatsoever form of government, man has thus far organized; that these unjust relations are the result of some secret and unknown law, which science has not yet unlocked; that happiness, the goal of all human endeavor, will be the inheritance of all men, when an intelligent solution of this problem has been attained. The importance of this last fact is sufficient to spur the student on, in an earnest effort to discover this hitherto undiscovered law.

In our search we shall rigidly deduce from known facts logical, philosophical and mathematical conclusions, for by no methods less than these can we reach a scientific solution. Statistics are the most reliable and best authenticated facts that we have from which to deduce logical conclusions.

In 1865 the Secretary of the United States Treasury, Hugh McCulloch, in his annual report, made this remarkable statement: "The people are out of debt and consequently prosperous." By a comparison of the statistics of the financial failures of that year with the two previous years — 1863-4 — and the following year —1866— with the failures of the five years previous to 1863 and of those which have followed 1866 we can readily give credence to the Secretary's report, that to an extent greater than had ever before existed the people of this country were out of debt.

By these statistics, we find that for the years of 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, the business failures were respectively 485, 502, 530, 532, while from the year 1857 to 1862 the failures ranged from 4,932 to 6,993, and from 1866 to 1896 they have ranged from 2,386 to over 15,000. Now when we remember that the financial failures taken for a series of years must be the index to a very truthful degree of the debts of the people, we must admit the fact that these years were years when the people were comparatively out of debt, and when out of debt prosperous.

At this time, let it be remembered, the American people had existed upon this continent as a nation over two hundred years, and as an independent government nearly a hundred years, yet at the close of a gigantic internecine war the Secretary of the Treasury — a high official of the United States, sworn to tell the truth — says the people are out of debt, and these statistics unquestionably prove that his statement was correct.

Twelve years from this date (1877) a United States Senator — Hon. Daniel Voorhees — who had an enviable reputation as a financier of unquestioned ability, stated on the floor of the Senate chamber that the people of the United States were from six to ten billion dollars in debt, and unless silver should be remonetized that debt could never be paid. Fifteen years later Hon. Jos. M. Walker, member of Congress from Massachusetts, stated in a speech delivered March, 1892, that the people were thirty-two billion dollars in debt.

Five years later, and reliable statisticians estimate that our debts have attained the gigantic proportions of forty billion dollars, aggregating a sum of more than five times all the metallic money of the world, an inconceivable and incomprehensible number. How incomprehensible this amount is we may partially understand when we find by computation that it would require forty persons, beginning at the age of twenty years and counting forty thousand each day, except Sundays and holidays, to live each to the age of one hundred and four years before the task of counting would be completed. How many years of unremitting toil will be required of our boys and girls to pay this monstrous debt the future alone can tell.

These statistical statements reveal a GROWTH OF DEBT which constitutes our problem. The solution of this problem is of universal significance to all the American people, regardless of politics, creed, color or condition. The prosperity of all men is affected by this gigantic debt, because the ever-increasing interest upon it enters into and augments the price of every article of consumption. It is a consuming fire, a living demon, a raging beast going up and down the highways of the nation devouring the substance of the people. It is a dark cloud of ruin overshadowing three-fourths of all the homes in the land. This problem of debt is no new problem. It is the problem of the ages. Again and again, during the history of mankind, have cities, states and kingdoms been brought face to face with this demon of evil, this devourer of men, this destruction of empires, this death of civilization. The highways of six thousand years are strewn with the wrecks of men and nations who have bowed in meek submission to its arbitrament. In its devastating march it spares neither Greek nor Jew; neither pagan nor Christian; neither Republic nor Empire. Philosophers, poets, seers and prophets have bewailed the desolation that has marked its pathway, in the language of sublime sympathy and patriotic devotion. With marvelous power and pathos, they have portrayed the effects and conditions that have followed in the trail of this unknown and undescribed highwayman, but not even the immortal genius of a Bacon, a Milton, a Newton, nor a Mill seems to have taken any comprehensive recognition of the Titanic power of evil over the fortunes and happiness of men encompassed in, and arising from conditions produced by debt.

The necessity for the analysis of causes, which produce, enlarge, and continue it, appears to have escaped their attention. But in the general uplift of humanity all secrets shall be revealed; all phenomena shall be explained; all problems shall find solutions. As every event in life has a relation to all other events, and may be traced — if we possess sufficient data — so every problem arising from human activity has a rational and logical solution.

CHAPTER II
RESTATEMENT AND SOLUTION OF PROBLEM

Given seventy million people occupying the best part of the best continent on the globe, valued at sixty-two billion dollars; on which valuation, after a period of thirty years of intense activity, in labor skilled and unskilled, exercised in the development of farms, mines and factories, in the building of cities, villages, towns, and railroads, in commerce, inventions, and speculation, said seventy million people find themselves at this date (1898) owing somebody or many somebodies over forty billion dollars.

To give a logical and philosophical cause for these disastrous conditions will be the effort of this pamphlet. The whole truth concerning this matter must be scientifically ventilated. No misleading falsehood nor seductive sophistry can alleviate the misery now so prevalent throughout the land caused by this gigantic debt. The constitution and make-up of our social organization must be analyzed, its laws of action formulated, the relations of these laws traced and the rights of individuals in their social organization clearly established.

It may be observed that this debt of forty billion is owed in dollars. Nothing but dollars, and yellow metallic dollars at that, will be received in payment or liquidation of this debt. Hence the yellow metallic dollar becomes one of the main factors in the solution of this problem. As the metallic dollar is a definite thing, which can be estimated and measured, it is therefore a mathematical quantity, and all operations with it are mathematical operations. A failure to record these operations will in no way affect the results which mathematically follow. If we can formulate these operations we can solve our problem.

What is the dollar, what is its function and from what condition of society arises the necessity for its use ?

The dollar is a specified number of grains of gold or silver, on which the government has placed its official stamp, stating that it is a dollar, and shall be received by all creditors in payment of a dollar's debt. Its function is two-fold, for it acts in the hands of the holder both as a receipt and check. A receipt for a dollar's worth of production or service, which the holder has parted with for the benefit of society or some member thereof. It is also a check entitling the holder to draw upon society for one dollar's worth of production or service, which society or some member thereof may desire to part with. The material on which this stamp is placed cannot affect its power, or function. The social necessity which calls for its use was philosophically answered by a school boy of twelve, who said we need it to buy things with, because we don't know how to make all the things we need. In more scientific language civilized man has entered a social condition, which may be designated a division of labor, which defined means that condition of society in which some men raise wheat, some corn, some cotton, some rice, some produce or manufacture sugar, some flour, some leather, some make bread, some shoes, some hats, some coats, etc., etc.

This social condition makes every member of society interdependent; each works for all and all work for each. Every man produces a surplus of some commodity, or renders some service which he must dispose of, in order to procure those commodities and services which he cannot produce or render.

Equity and the eternal law of righteousness (right action) demands that every man be protected in the disposal of his commodities, also in the purchase of other commodities, so that he receive equal for equal and equivalent for equivalent.

Nothing short of this can fulfill the will of the Father on earth as it is in Heaven. Neither will this great question ever be settled until settled upon this basis. A division of labor once endorsed and entered into by a nation of people bestows upon that people the right to make provision for the exercise of three powers, namely, the power of communication, the power to transfer goods from place to place or transportation, and the power to transfer the ownership of goods from person to person (or the power of exchange). These three powers inhere in the constitution and social make-up of society, and are the prerogatives and functions belonging to the whole people.

Every citizen has the right to an equal and inalienable ownership in these powers, and he has the right to demand of the collectivity (government) that these powers be furnished him in sufficiency to meet all the necessities of his condition at cost. Otherwise if these truly governmental functions be delegated to individuals they may be so manipulated, monopolized, cornered and controlled that wholesale robbery, exploitation and slavery will be the final result. No reasonable denial can be given to these self-evident propositions. There is no reasonable or logical basis for the assumption that any man or corporation of men should receive tribute from society or any member thereof for the use of any one of these powers above the actual cost. The men who raise wheat, and desire to trade with the men who raise cotton, have an inalienable right, by reason of their social condition (division of labor), to demand protection in the exercise of the three powers of communication, transportation and exchange, without paying more than the actual cost of these utilities, and if any man receive more than this, he is living from another man's exertion without giving an equivalent, and society has incorporated an element of inequality, which has the power, in time, to absorb all wealth into the hands of the operators of these truly governmental but usurped powers. Hence it becomes the solemn duty of society to establish, own and operate these three powers of franchise AT COST to the whole people. Successful denial of these fundamental propositions cannot be made.

We are now ready to examine in what way the United States government, which is supposed to be "of the people, for the people and by the people," has provided for these three powers, and inquire how its citizens are protected in the exercise of these inalienable and imprescriptable rights and immunities. The power of communication is secured by the establishment of postoffices, telegraphs and telephones. The first is under the supervision of the general government, and its service is rendered to all in sufficiency, at cost, being, the best-managed business in the United States. Telegraphs and telephones are supplied by private corporations, for which service the people who use them pay the cost of operation and besides a bonus of millions to capitalists whose privileges and franchises are given to them by law, and their exploitations sanctioned by the Federal courts.

The power to transfer goods from place to place is secured mostly by railroads, steamboats, and ships. These, too, are owned by private individuals and corporations, and are operated on the splendid business principle of charging all the traffic will bear and sometimes something more. This is the worst managed business in the United States, where more strikes and labor difficulties occur than along any other line. Neither, although exacting enormous tariffs, are they able to pay their debts, but yearly thousands of miles pass into the hands of receivers under the Federal courts. We are now prepare to examine the methods by which we obtain the power of exchange, or the power to transfer the ownership of goods from person to person, which when we have done will reveal a debt-refunding system which has created the debt we owe ($40,000,000,000) and the concentration of thirty-five billion dollars of wealth into the possession of thirty thousand people, or one-twentieth of 1 per cent of the population.

For a period of time so long past that history gives no hint whence the origin of the thought, men have been taught to believe that governments had no power, and could devise no methods by which individuals could be protected in the exchange of their production, except as one commodity was exchanged for another of equal value; that security and safety in transferring goods from person to person rests alone on the principle of taking some commodity as gold and silver and legalizing it as a measure of value and a medium by which all other commodities must be measured and exchanged.

The fallacy of such an idea may be seen when we analyze the action of law in its power to protect the commodity gold.

A owns a gold mine and works out 51,600 grains of gold, which coins an even $200. This gold is a commodity, and a product of labor. In itself it satisfies no essential or primary want of man. It cannot feed, warm, clothe or shelter him. Neither from it can any tool be made that can aid him in procuring these essentials. So much for gold and the labor expended in procuring it. B has a field, which he plows and cultivates and produces 12,000 pounds of wheat, which measures 200 bushels. B's labor has been useful in producing a commodity which satisfies the most essential want of man. Both wheat and gold are commodities and must be so classified. Society in its stupidity declares by its legislative action that it can by law protect the gold owner in parting with his commodity gold by a piece of paper (bonds, notes and mortgages) which holds the borrower responsible for the return to A of the gold or its equivalent, at "the same time refusing to protect B in parting with his commodity wheat for the benefit of society. C desires the wheat, but before the trade can be effected he must borrow A's commodity gold, and give him a paper security that he will return it or its equivalent. This paper has no intrinsic value, yet the law behind it makes A safe in parting with his gold. The question arises why may not a piece of paper be made, so legalized that B may be secured in parting with his wheat, that he, too, will be able to receive an equivalent in return ? By what logic is this discrimination drawn ? Law stamped upon paper protects commodity gold; why can it not protect commodity wheat ?

The second error of such a proposition may be seen in the fact that no one commodity is of sufficient magnitude to measure the value of all other commodities, and no one commodity is held in common ownership, but in a division of labor all persons in the association will need a sufficient quantity of this commodity, whatever it may be, to measure the value of and exchange all the commodities which they are capable of making and desire to exchange. Then it will be seen that the demand for money is equal to the demand for all other things. And as no commodity is equal to such an extension, commodity exchange, or the exchange of one article for another of equal value, will always prove a miserable failure. From its use a great degree of injustice will arise, because no commodity is in the hands of all persons in the nation, and some will be forced to borrow the exchange commodity (gold and silver) and submit to the terms of the loaner, which past experience has proven will be too often extortionate and usurious, or, more correctly, some individuals will be forced to pay tribute to other individuals for the privilege of making their exchanges — a principle which has been proven to be false, to justice and the structure of society. Again, as no commodity is of sufficient capacity to measure and exchange all other commodities, the necessities growing out of the division of labor will at times become so severely urgent that some men will be forced to trade with promissory notes ("credit or confidence"), which in time must be redeemed in cash or coin. If there is not a sufficient quantity of money to trade on a cash basis, there will not be sufficient to cancel debts so made; and the impossibility of redemption destroys equity and creates losses, failures, foreclosures, concentration of wealth and a debt refunding system.

In order to discover the factors or elements which have produced our debt growth of forty billion dollars it will be necessary to formulate a problem of such small dimensions as can be easily grasped and retained in the mind, but in exact conformity to the methods employed by nations using commodity exchange (gold and silver), remembering that what is true mathematically of small quantities will be true when applied to larger ones.

We will now suppose that in some far away sea is an isolated island, on which a hundred men and women have been wrecked, with no possible hope of future escape. Complaints are useless. Action is imperative. With hope and energy they assemble in convention and formulate plans for organization and the structure of a government. They are all workers and know how to do something. They therefore construct their government on the basis of a division of labor, and proceed to divide the island, giving to each an equal portion. They provide for postal and transportation service, and adopt gold as the measure of all values and a legal tender for all debts and the medium by which all commodities must be exchanged. For this action they can give no intelligent reason. On being questioned about it their only reply was we want "an honest dollar." We must have a "sound currency." On the island there proved to be but one small spot where this metal could be found, and this falls into the possession of one whom we will call A. He discovers the metal and works the mine. He succeeds in taking out 51,600 grains of gold — a cube less than two inches square — which the government coins for him into $200 free of cost and permits him to loan them to the community at ten per cent interest or increase. This is a legally constituted arrangement for securing a power of exchange, necessitated by the action of these islanders in endorsing and entering into a division of labor. Without mastering the philosophy of the effect of these legal arrangements, they have unwittingly made this man the arbiter of their fortunes. They have placed in his hands the power to forge a chain of circumstances, which will in the end give him the power to lawfully obtain possession of their productions and their homes without giving them back an equivalent. By law they have made this man the legal owner of that material (gold), which they must have or cease to live by co-operation, and return to a state of barbarism. By this ownership they have crowned him with greater power than is conferred upon kings and emperors. He is absolute monarch and dictator of every financial condition on the island. By this ownership he has the right to loan, or to refuse to loan; the right to disburse, or to hoard; and as he does the one or the other, artificial prosperity springs up, only to be withered by artificial death and depression. When he loans business flourishes; when he refuses, business languishes and dies. By these manipulations he is able to reduce prices and lower wages; to corner both gold and productions, thereby exploiting both producer and consumer. And as all roads lead to Rome so all industries yield their profits to swell his income and increase his wealth. The community is now divided into two classes — borrowers and loaner; laborers and capitalist. On the one side are the laborers with their lands equally divided, on the other side the capitalist with his two-inch cube of gold, possessing in its legal action a power to absorb wealth more rapidly than the ninety-nine laborers can create it from all their lands. The financial and material condition of these islanders may be thus diagrammed.

It will be perceived that by the two factors — land and labor — all wealth is created, and by the factor gold all wealth is measured and exchanged. Gold is not wealth nor the creator of wealth; but simply the tool by which the value of wealth is estimated and exchanged. The free and ready exchange of commodities greatly enhances the powers of production, and promotes prosperity. These advantages are ascribed to the power of gold, whereas it inheres in the easy and rapid exchange of productions, no matter by what methods this exchange is effected. We will now proceed to set in motion this financial mechanism of gold, which carries within itself the power to propagate nine-tenths of all the evil which besets the path of human endeavor. The following chart illustrates the debt-making and wealth-concentrating power of gold as it is now used in our legalized monetary system. The reader is earnestly requested to give careful attention to every detail, that he may know for himself that all which has been affirmed is susceptible of proof. A represents the banker owning a small piece of metal called gold; B, C, D, F, etc., are the laborers owning their lands from which all wealth is derived. This chart will follow the movements of these two hundred gold dollars as they circulate in society and record the various transactions which will transfer the ownership of the homes and lands of the toilers into the hands of the gold owner or capitalist. For the benefit of those who believe that whisky is the cause of all the poverty, we will assume that these islanders are all sober men, and that no intoxicant is manufactured or imported on the island.

CHART OF TRANSACTIONS.
Let A be the banker with a loaning capital of $200
B borrows Jan. 1st, 1880, $100 for 1 year at 10 per cent ... 110
C borrows Jan. 1st, 1880, $100 for 2 years at 10 per cent ... 120
D borrows Jan. 1st, 1881, $110 for 2 years at 10 per cent ... 132
E borrows Jan. 1st, 1882, $120 for 1 year at 10 per cent ... 132
Due the banker Jan. 1st, 1884 264
Jan. 1st, 1800, G loans F for three years $100 at 10 per cent ... 130
Jan. 1st, 1880, H sells J a horse for $100 on three years' time ... 130
Debts due Jan. 1st, 1884 524
Money on the island to meet it 200
Increment of unpaid debt, or, DEBT GROWTH arising in three years ... 324

Before tracing these transactions, in order to avoid confusion, we will assume that no more dollars are coined or imported on the island, and also that the income of Banker A's farm is sufficient to meet all his expenses. We will also assume that these islanders are in possession of all needed tools and implements, such as plows, harrows, axes, hues, etc., so that they can begin the development of their farms and the production of wealth. Since these productions are of various kinds, each man desires to exchange with his neighbor. It may be observed that no exchange is possible until wealth of some form has been created, but when wealth has been produced, because of natural barriers and their legal arrangements they cannot make exchanges without asking Banker A for a loan of that commodity (gold) which by their law estimates values, exchanges wealth, and which is the only commodity crowned with the power of being a legal tender for debt. Virtually this is asking his permission for the right to trade ! Stalwart laborers, from the highest profession to the lowest ditch-digger, you may create wealth by the million, but you cannot, shall not, exchange with each other until you have obtained permission of that man upon whom your laws have bestowed the right t0 own your power or medium of exchange.

By referring to the chart (page 17) the reader will observe that B is the first member of society on the island whose necessities compel him to trade. Severe floods have destroyed his wheat and he must have some for seeding. He learns that neighbor G has an abundance. To him he goes with various propositions of barter for horses, hogs and corn. G responds: None of these things do I want, friend B. I must sell for money. My taxes are even now overdue. This forces B, if he obtains the wheat, to borrow $100 of Banker A, said loan being made for one year at ten per cent. This transaction has not arisen because of B's idleness or imprudence nor from the fact that he has nothing to sell, but from his necessity and the legalized arrangements of the community in which he lives. These have forced him to give the banker $10 for the privilege of trading — a privilege which under a system of justice would be free to all. Analyzed, this is a very peculiar transaction, having many phases. B sees no impossibility in the contract. He thinks, if he thinks at all, with the entire community, that raising wheat produces the same effect in increasing the number of dollars as mining and coining gold, that if he produces a good crop he has made money. In fact, he and all the community in which he lives believe that all that is necessary is to work hard, be sober and prudent and wealth and prosperity will follow. They do not comprehend that money cannot be increased by the production of commodities, neither by circulation. C is another member of society who has lost his horse, and as spring approaches the same necessity which forced B forces him also. He has heard of B's transaction at the bank and follows his example. There is no way to escape and he borrows of A the other $100 for two years, at the same rate of interest. It is pertinent to pause here and inquire of the reader if he considers these men to blame for being in debt. Have not the arrangements made by the community for securing the power or medium of exchange forced these men, through no fault of theirs, to contract these debts ? Has not a debt system been established by law ? and if the community co-operate on the basis of a division of labor can the people as a whole ever be free from debt, if money circulates at all ? Under such a system, when all debts are paid or canceled, there will be no money in circulation and money by this system can only be put in circulation by debt. We have been thus minute in analyzing the situation surrounding these islanders because so many persons believe that a condition of debt is the fault of individuals, whereas it is plainly the fault of the arrangements which governments legalize for securing a power of exchange. This difficulty must always exist so long as any commodity is used for a medium of exchange. Closing this analysis, we will now follow these $200 as they circulate through the community, for only as we follow and record every transaction made with these dollars can we know with certainty what effect will be produced. In following the circulation of these two hundred dollars, we shall discover that their number is never increased by that circulation.

The $100 borrowed from A by B when paid to G for wheat remains $100. When G pays them out for taxes their number will still be one hundred. The same is true of the $100 borrowed by C. Wheresoever these $200 may go their original number will never increase. Plant them or trade them, sow them or reap them, scatter them or gather them, pay them out, or receive them in, deposit them in bank or stocking, their number will ever remain the same. To believe otherwise is to believe that which is false, and to act upon that belief is to lay the foundation for financial disaster, ruin and national disruption. Let it be emphasized here that the number of dollars in circulation can only be increased by taking the metal and coining them or importing them from some other country. There rests a confusion in the minds of the people concerning the terms "make money" and "coin money." Governments make or coin money; the people earn it after it is coined or made. Money must be coined before it can be earned. This thought ought to be well digested. Yet startling as it may appear, B and C have never given one moment of serious thought to the subject and are entirely oblivious of the true philosophy of the situation, believing that their ability to pay debts depends entirely upon industry and prudence, whereas this ability is found in the increase of coinage, which A controls. The reader is kindly requested to note another fact. B and C, who are the two weakest members of society, by reason of their losses, are forced to pay a tax or tribute to Banker A for the use of these $200, while all the other islanders are able to secure the power of exchange free of cost, which is in itself an unjust discrimination between classes. For when borrowed money passes out of the hands of the borrower it then becomes a free instrument of exchange. At the end of the year we will assume that B has been successful and raised a good crop of wheat which he is able to sell, and obtain (not make or coin) $110 which enables him to cancel his obligation with A. This transaction gives the appearance of the possibility of paying interest; refer to the chart (page 17). But let us see. Upon what did B's ability to secure this extra ten dollars depend on the assumed proposition that no more dollars have been coined ? Evidently they are a part of the $100 borrowed by C and if neither he nor any other had borrowed, B's wheat could only have sold for $100 and the ten dollars of interest owed to A could not have been canceled, and the impossibility of paving interest without an increase of coinage would have appeared at once. No records having been kept, the error escapes detection. An examination of these islanders' financial condition after B pays the banker $110 will disclose the fact that society has in its possession but $90. Accustomed to having $200, the withdrawal of $110 will produce a stringency so severe that some one, whom we will call D, will be forced to borrow. By chance (everything in the system is done by chance) he borrows of Banker A this same $110 and business runs fairly well again. By referring to the chart (page 17) the reader will observe that at the beginning of that year, when these islanders first created a debt, this debt was but $200, but at the beginning of the second year it had increased $20, for now C owes $110 and D' has borrowed $110. Mark this GROWTH OF DEBT. It may also be observed that the ten dollars of interest which appeared to have been paid is now refunded into another debt on D's farm.

At the close of another year we will suppose that C, whose note now falls due, has been successful in producing some thing for which he obtains $120, with which he pays Banker A (refer to chart). By what fact was C able to obtain $120 ? From the fact that D had borrowed $110 and from no other. As before, if all the members of society will count all the dollars in their possession after C has paid A, they will find the sum to be but $80. Another money famine will be produced and one whom we will call E is forced to borrow. He presents his case to Banker A, who loans him the same $120 that C had paid his debt with. Again it will be apparent to the reader that this $20 supposed to have been paid by C is refunded into another debt on E's farm, and the close of the second year finds these islanders $241 in debt. The debt growth of two years has been $41 by the transactions, which have taken place at the bank alone. Other debts made by individuals outside the bank which produce debt growth will be examined later on. By reference to the chart the reader will see that at the end of one year D borrowed for two years and at the end of two years E borrowed for one. Consequently these two notes fall due on the same day. This is merely an accidental circumstance of no importance worth looking after, so the banker would have them believe. (What other inference can be drawn when they tell the farmers to go home and attend to their farms and let the great financiers run the money affairs of the country?) By reference to the chart it will be seen that D owes the banker $132 and E owes him the same amount. There now appears a debt of $264, which is $64 greater than the number of dollars on the island. This $64 is the debt growth of three years on the four loans of B, C, D and E, and will be found to be the sum of all the interest which has accrued upon their loans — viz., $10 upon B's note, plus $20 on C's, plus $22 on D's, plus $12 on E's. Not one dollar of interest, in reality, has been paid; has, in fact, only been re-funded into other debts on other securities. The impossibility of paying interest without an equivalent increase of money now appears, and one or both of these men must fail. Both may, add certainly will, if by chance some one has left the island for a foreign tour taking with him a hundred dollars or more, or if the original $200 was composed of $100 of gold and $100 of silver and the government in the meantime had demonetized silver, thus leaving the $100 of gold as the only debt-paying power on the island.

The point which this demonstration settles here, and settles forever, is that an increase of debt has arisen from loaning money at an interest which can only be paid by coining $64, or importing $64, or by the banker spending $64, or when the sum of these three items shall equal $64. It settles another point also, that the interest accruing on the loans in a nation must be known and also the increase of money for its extinguishment, or business will be done by methods of chance where failures and foreclosures are the inevitable results. Not one penny of interest can be paid by any other means, if the banker demands his interest in money (and who ever heard of his demanding anything else?).

By no reloaning and by no recirculating of these $200 can this debt of $64 of interest be paid. And what is true of this $200 is just as true of any conceivable sum and its interest.

A failure to keep the record will in no way affect the result.

The reader is requested to fix this principle firmly in his mind for future use, as we are now establishing principles for application later on in the work.

This demonstration will force the gold-standard theorist to acknowledge that unless $64 has been coined, imported or expended by the money loaners, neither of which was assumed in the hypothesis, one or both of these men must fail and be foreclosed. It will also force them to acknowledge that these islanders are doing business by methods which will produce failures and foreclosures through the impossibilities that arise unless an exact record of all debt contracts on the island is kept and a record of all moneys coined, of all moneys imported from and exported to foreign countries, of all moneys lost and taken from circulation and of all money expended by the money loaners, in order that the differences which arise between the debt contracts and the moneys provided for their extinguishment or liquidation may be known and these differences provided for. Otherwise these men are doing business by slipshod methods where panics, failures and foreclosures, with all their attendant evils of loss and concentration of wealth, depression, stagnation and want will be the inevitable result. If these islanders had kept an exact record of all their debt contracts and the times when they fell due, and by any method added $64 to their circulation, these men D and E might have escaped. Failing to keep these records and supply money to meet the debt growth one or both must fail; or they must re-fund their debts, which only defers the evil day; for by no process of re-loaning or re-circulation of these dollars, neither by greater industry nor economy, can this debt of $64 be canceled. The banker understands this and knows his power. He demands settlement, and as this is impossible the sheriff is ordered to foreclose at once.

Here let the reader pause and ponder. Let him measure the full magnitude of the cruel injustice imbedded in these transactions. D borrowed on a farm worth $500 and by two years' hard labor in ditching, fencing, digging out stumps, setting out fruit trees, building and repairing he has added $500 more to the value of his farm. E borrowed on a farm worth $600 and by the year's work has added $400 value to his, so that now the two farms are worth $2,000, which the money loaner is permitted to take possession of, in the name of justice, law and order ! By legalized process he obtains $1,136 worth of property for which he gave no equivalent whatever. The value of these farms consists solely in the labor expended upon them by D and E and now, through no fault of theirs, but through the fault of the system which they indorsed without understanding, they are forced to surrender to the money loaners their property worth $2,000. He is now able to extort from them rent for values which their own labor has created or drive them and their wives and children out on the highways to tramp, to beg, to steal, perchance to starve and die.

It is pertinent here again to pause and ask the reader to give due reflection to this transaction. Were these men at fault for the loss of their homes and consequent poverty ? Had they doubled their labor or quadrupled their economy would it have increased the circulating medium by a single dollar ? Most assuredly not, for the number of dollars can only be increased by coinage or importation and only by an actual increase of dollars can these debts be paid.

Returning to the subject of the money loaner's power, it may now be observed that if he forecloses the land in satisfaction of these debt, society will be left in possession of $200; but the banker will by law be permitted to rent these two farms worth $2,000. Interest on money and rents on land usually coincide and our banker is able to rent these farms on the 10 per cent basis and in one year the rent will bring back to him the ownership of the original $200. This deprives the islanders of all money; and thus deprived, some member or members will be forced again to borrow it on the same terms as did A, B, C and D, and as like causes produce like effects the banker will be able in a few years more to foreclose two or three more homes, thereby giving him still greater power through rent and interest.

Thus year by year the concentration of wealth will increase and homeless men will multiply. By the power these rents and interest give to this money loaner he is able to command the services and products of labor and soon becomes a well-clothed, well-groomed and courteous gentleman. These exterior qualifications always command the respect and admiration of the multitude. His financial success enables him to travel at home and abroad, to appear in the halls of legislation where the people send their representatives; here by the seductive power of his position and the purchasing power of his money he buys their votes and obtains the grant of valuable franchises and the donation of rich lands. These swell his fortune and strengthen his dominion over men. The finality of these transactions will transfer the ownership of the entire island into the hands of this money loaner and leave the original owners serfs and slaves amid the wealth they have by their own labor created.

Returning to chart (page 17) we find that this $64 of debt impossible of payment has accrued because of a deviation from mathematical law. This deviation cannot be annulled or set aside by statute law. The decree of man can never make the sum of two and two make six; neither can an increase be laid upon our money obligations by legislation without giving the money loaner power to ultimately foreclose the homes of the people, unless said increase is systematically provided for.

The law declaring that 8 per cent or any other is the legal rate of interest is the most infamous power of robbery that ever blackened the pages of a nation's code. Under its exactions and executions the possession of homes soon becomes impossible and hope, happiness, honesty, virtue and patriotism perishes from the hearts of men. Vain will be the display of flags to resuscitate these sentiments.

Like the sinuous trail of the serpent, these dollars move through the channels of trade with such intricacy that their action is unnoticed and unrecorded and their debt-making power is unsuspected. Another factor in the financial system of these islanders may be even more potent than interest in producing debt growth and the concentration of wealth. Referring again to the chart (page 17) we will go back to the time when B borrowed the first $100 and paid them to G for wheat. G now owns these $100 and so does A, for A only loaned them to B. To whom do they then belong ? and what will become of B's security if G should take them and go to Europe ? We will assume that G does not do this and that he does not need this money for immediate use. He has an eye for business and is willing to turn banker, too, so he loans it to some needy neighbor whom we will call F, who wants it for three years, and who is willing to pay ten percent for its use. The reader will now observe that F's note falls due on the same day that E's and D's falls due, making $394 of debt due with but $200 on the island to meet it.[1] This deviation from correct or mathematical principles arises from loaning the same dollars twice over making $200 of debt due at the same time, with only $100 to meet it. Neither of these men knew how much money was on the island, nor did they know that any relation existed between the amount of business to be transacted and the amount of money needed; nor did they know that dollars could be made from any other metal than gold.

Like matters in Hafed's dream, all their transactions were regulated by chance, and so as production increased and population multiplied more and more business was transacted with debt (credit) regardless of the times when these debts fell due or the amount of money they had to meet them, and year by year their failures and foreclosures increased until the island was covered with bonds and mortgages and half the people had lost their homes and property without ever once suspecting the true cause. It is obvious that if debts are made dollars must be made to cancel them. If more dollars of debt fall due at a given time and place than there are dollars in that place it is evident that the amount of debt above the number of dollars must be either foreclosed, refunded or repudiated.

1. This mathematical deviation exists in the bank-deposit system of the United States, and is at once detected when the banks report four billion dollars on deposit and the Comptroller of the Currency reports less than two billion in circulation, showing four dollars of debt for every dollar in the country. Result: Bank failures, with robbery of the depositors.

The third element which creates debt growth and concentration of wealth, encompassed in the system of exchange, which these islanders endorsed and legalized, is found in the fact that there is not money enough to transact all the business they wish to transact on a cash basis. (Refer to chart.) For instance, H has a horse which he desires to sell and J desires to buy. J has no money and no credit at the bank; H, however, believes that J is an honest man, and he is willing to trust him. He sells the horse for $100 and takes J's note for the same, bearing ten per cent interest, due in three years. It will now be seen that there are $524 of debt due on the same day, while them are but $200 to meet it. Thus by following these $200 and recording each financial transaction and the date of its maturity, it is found that an increment or growth of $324 of debt has arisen in three years above the amount of dollars to extinguish it. This growth of debt would arise if the number of the same kind of transactions were ten thousand or ten million. This debt growth is the sum of three mathematical deviations from true principle, namely, $124 usury or interest, $100 of debt produced by loaning $100 twice over and $100 made by buying on credit. There are three ways by which this increment of debt may be extinguished or adjusted. It may be foreclosed, refunded or repudiated. As all business is run by chance, perhaps all three methods may be used. F may be foreclosed; D may extend his time or refund; J may repudiate by abusing "confidence" and running away to Canada. Or they may pool their wits and succeed in refunding it upon the community by the following method: Let us suppose that D, E, F and J begin to realize, as they are sure to do, about six months before their debts fall due, that money is very scarce, wages low and work hard to obtain, and from the present outlook they will by no means be able to meet their obligations. They will, if shrewd, begin to cast about to find ways and means of payment. They are good mechanics and the dilapidated condition of their state house suggests the idea of bonding the island for the purpose of building a new one. They call the people together and convince them of the desirability of the plan. Bonds are issued to the amount of $324. They are sent to London, sold for gold and the money brought into the island. The work begins and D, E, F and J secure jobs and earn money enough to pay off their individual indebtedness and all the people view with pride and satisfaction the achievement of these industrious men. The banker, too, with smiling suavity, declares with unquestioned authority that "This is the most prosperous country the sun ever shone upon." But let us take time to reflect. Is the debt of $324 paid, or is it transferred to the collectivity, refunded into a bonded indebtedness against every home on the island ? All understand that bonds are community or collective debts. These bonds have been drawn for twenty years at 5 per cent and at the end of this time the original $324 borrowed from London has been carried back in interest, leaving on the island only $200 with which to pay $324 of bonds.

The principal of these bonds must now be paid by the taxation of the islanders. Every individual must pay his pro rata of taxes. On the island there is but $200. Therefore, some must fail of having the amount necessary to pay taxes with. In the meantime foreign syndicates have located loan agents in every town and hamlet to loan money on farm property, and since by no means can $324 be paid with $200, therefore some among the people, naturally the weakest members of society, made so by sickness or some other unpreventable misfortune, will be obliged to borrow money to meet this taxation to pay off the foreign bonds. Taxation is levied and the bonds are paid and all throw up their caps and shout: "We have paid our debts."

The reader will not fail to see that an increment of debt of $124, the difference between $324 and $200, has not been paid. It has again been transferred, this time from the collectivity (all the people of the island) to the individual homes. Another fact of deep significance to these islanders worth the reader's closest attention is that in paying off these foreign bonds these islanders have lost their money volume of $200. The ownership of it has passed over to London. Worse than this; they are individually $124 in debt to these foreign money loaners; and still worse, if they do not at once recognize their right to make or coin money and also understand that a good dollar can be made from any material which they themselves by law decree they will be forever forced to borrow their power of exchange from foreigners, and the growth of debt arising from the usury on these loans will be foreclosed by the foreign money loaners and year by year these islanders will see the ownership of their lands and industries passing into the hands of a foreign country. As long as they maintain the gold standard they will be powerless to stay this foreign absorption. These formulated transactions reveal the methods which produce a growth of debt and the instruments — bonds and mortgages —by which it is perpetuated, being transferred back and forth first from the individual to the collectivity by bonds, then from the collectivity to the individual by taxation. If the mortgages are extinguished the people are bonded collectively; if the bonds are extinguished the people are mortgaged individually. All these processes of bonding, mortgaging, foreclosing, taxing and renting are going on simultaneously over a wide field of territory among parties unknown to each other. Their record is never kept and their true relation to each other is never comprehended, nor is the increment of debt which arises ever known or provided for, or liquidated except through the foreclosure of securities, which produces the concentration of wealth. These processes continually increase the increment of debt, which grows with their growth and fattens upon their decay until every home on the island is overshadowed with a mortgage and every county, town and city is blanketed with a bond. This increment of debt is impossible of payment unless the amount is known and intelligently provided for by one or all of the three methods which have been previously mentioned.

No amount of industry or frugality on the part of these islanders can abolish this increment of debt or the results which follow it. Even higher, higher rises this floodtide of ruin into thousands, millions, billions; ever faster, faster does it swell the fortunes of the money loaners, until the ownership of their island and its industries passes into the hands of foreign lords and dukes, who send their warships to collect their rents and interest at the point of the bayonet, as has been done in Egypt.

These islanders are now serfs and slaves amidst the wealth their own hands have created, enslaved by endorsing a system of commodity exchange, the philosophy of which they did not understand. For a nation of people doing business by these methods there is absolutely no hope and no salvation; every industry they establish and every home they create must in the end pass into the ownership of the money loaners.

By the use of $200 for three years, on the loans of which 10 per cent increase was legalized in six transactions, none of which were unreasonable or extravagant, it has been possible for a debt of $324 to arise, which is impossible of payment in accordance with the terms of the contract without an increase of money either by coinage or importation. Failing in this, we find $1,736 worth of property foreclosed and concentrated into the hands of a man who never by a single hour's toil honestly earned one penny of it.

The rapidity with which these transactions will accomplish concentration of wealth may be approximately calculated when we find by actual calculation that $200 loaned at 10 per cent and compounded every year will transfer to the money loaner over 65 billion dollars' worth of property, or more than the entire wealth of the United States, in the short period of 184 years.

This is the result when every transaction is legal and characterized with the strictest honesty and integrity; how much more rapidly will the work be consummated when these principles are manipulated by dishonest bankers, capitalists and legislators; when dollars are converted into bonds, when debts are manufactured by law, when the volume of money is expanded and contracted, when millions of it is burned and millions more demonetized, when every juggling trick of fraud and chicanery that the cupidity and greed of man can devise and operate is clearly evidenced by the conditions now existing in the United States, all of which have been produced in the last thirty years ! Can human ingenuity devise a more cruel and vicious system of tyranny and spoliation to rob and enslave the people by legally binding them to an impossibility and then compelling them to surrender their property to satisfy this impossibility ?

The truth is, the harder these people worked the deeper they sunk in debt and destitution. The more they worked the more they produced; the more they produced the more they had to exchange; the more they had to exchange the more money must be borrowed; the more money borrowed the more the interest accrued; the more interest accrued the faster grew the debt; the larger the debt the more of their earnings were consumed in paying interest, and the more want and destitution they must endure. Enslaved by the power of gold.

To avoid confusion, it has been assumed throughout this illustration that these islanders did not increase their money volume, either by coinage or importation, and that the money loaners did not expend any money during these three years. We will now introduce these factors into our problem by supposing that $50 were coined, $50 were imported and the money loaners expended $24. Then it will be seen that the sum of these will cancel $124 of debt, which will still leave $200 of debt to be foreclosed, refunded or repudiated. By this increase of money the growth of debt and the resulting concentration of wealth will be less rapid, but it will not be extinguished unless the increase of money is equal to the debt growth.

Before leaving this subject to draw conclusions it is worth noting that debts made by loaning the same dollars more than once and debts made by buying on credit may be canceled by the circulation of money when due regard is paid to the time when these debts fall due. For example, suppose B borrows $100 of A and pays a debt he owes C. C loans this to D, who pays his debt to E, who again loans to F. Here is a debt of $300 which has been created by loaning the same $100 three times. If these debts fall due upon the same day we may be reasonably sure that the dollars cannot be made to circulate rapidly enough to cancel these debts; but if the dates are not identical then it will be possible for F to purchase something of B worth $100, who then can pay A. A can buy of D, who can then pay C. He can purchase of F, who then can pay E. These debts have thus all been canceled by circulation. But if B borrows money of A for sixty days and pays his debt to C, who reloans it to B for sixty days, and so on, until it reaches F, who keeps it in his pocket for six months, it will be seen that it is not safe to count on circulation for paying debts, and that the loaning of money over and over again is a dangerous and unscientific method of doing business, which will produce any amount of financial disaster.

Interest, which has been shown to be a factor in creating debt growth, cannot be paid or canceled by the circulation of money when the entire volume is loaned into circulation. It was clearly proved by the first four operations on the chart that interest continually refunded itself, and will always do so unless the coinage, importation of money and the expenditures of the money loaners are equal to the amount of debt accruing by interest. Increase by one or all three of these methods is the only means by which interest can be paid.

We are here confronted by the practical man who says: "Oh, yes, you reformers are all right as theorists, but when it comes to practice your theories do not work. Business is now performed with bank checks and drafts and very little money is needed; in fact, money cuts a very small figure in the business world to-day. Checks perform all the work." And so he runs on until, out of breath, he is compelled to stop from sheer exhaustion. There is no use in trying to arrest him in his prattle, for he is so badly afflicted with check on the brain that an ounce of fact and philosophy never so carefully administered would prove fatal. The business world has no time to-day to follow any train of thought to its ultimate conclusion, and so we must endure this sapient prattle until these men personally confront such conditions as will compel them to think and reason.

For the benefit of those who are trying to educate themselves upon this great question we will explain the check system which the bankers are now trying to force the people to believe is so much better than a system of money.

A check or draft is an order for the payment of money drawn on a banker and payable at sight.

Before the banker ever issues a check of this character some person must first deposit a sum of money equal to the amount which the check calls for, or money obligations, such as well-secured bonds, iron-clad notes, mortgages, etc., may be sold to the banker at a discount and the proceeds placed to the credit of the seller, against which proceeds he can draw checks. These checks pass from person to person, making exchanges and paying debts. Every person is willing to take the check who believes in the solvency of the bank on which the check is drawn. But no check so issued ever did or could perform any more exchanges or cancel any more debts than the dollars which were deposited to obtain it. And if these dollars had been used instead of the check just as much business would have been performed. In the course of business transactions these checks must finally come into the possession of persons who will present them to the bank on which they were drawn to be redeemed in money, or they may, if drawn on different banks, be canceled at the clearing house. For instance H deposits $100 in bank No. 1 and receives a check. J deposits $100 in bank No. 2 and receives a check also. These checks may perform hundreds of exchanges and cancellations of debts and finally be canceled themselves at the clearing house, if it should happen that check No. 1 should fall into the possession of bank No. 2 and check No. 2 should come into the ownership of bank No. 1.

But still no more business has been done or exchanges performed than could have been performed with the money on which the check was issued. When bonds, notes, mortgages, and other debt obligations are discounted by the banker and checks issued to the sellers these checks, too, will make exchanges and cancel debts the same as checks drawn on actual cash. These checks may also cancel themselves at the clearing house, but when so canceled this does not cancel the notes, bonds and mortgages held by the banker nor prevent the banker from demanding settlement, in money, of those persons who drew and signed these evidences of debt. And as these were drawn for the want of sufficient quantity of circulating medium no increase of business was secured by them above that which would have been performed by creating dollars instead of debts. No substitute for the dollar can ever perform more work than the dollar itself. The check can transact no more business than the dollars which were deposited to secure the check, neither can they avert the payment of debts nor prevent more dollars of debt accruing than there are dollars to meet these debts nor the results of foreclosure and failure which follow.

Let the reader carefully note that it is not the dollar, nor any legitimate action of the dollar, which produces financial disturbances, but it is debt contracts (bonds, mortgages and notes} which follow the loan of the dollar that create failures, foreclosures and panics. So long as the dollar performs its legitimate function in exchanging production from person to person no evil effect follows its use. Every debt is an evidence of the insufficiency and inadequacy of the power or medium of exchange.

The remedy for the evils from which we suffer will found in making dollars instead of debts.

To see a whole nation full of people wildly, madly rushing hither and thither, from pillar to post, from Maine to Alaska, Florida to California from city to city, from state to state and from one nation to another crossing oceans, scaling mountains, facing arctic frosts and tropic fevers, searching, struggling, scheming schemes that mortal never dared to scheme before; even schemes of robbery and murder against their brother-man, all to get dollars, at the same time persistently, stubbornly, idiotically, denying themselves the right to coin them, is a sad commentary on the intelligence of the nineteenth century.

We have now logically, scientifically and mathematically demonstrated beyond the possibility of doubt or disputation the impossibilities imbedded in a system of commodity exchange where the commodity is insufficient in volume to do business on a cash basis and where it is loaned into circulation with an increase attached to the loan. It scarcely need be suggested that if the size of the island, the number of the people and the money of the bank were doubled, or if two banks were established, each with $200 capital, the growth of debt and the power of wealth concentration would be doubled also.

If all these factors were multiplied by ten no change in the relations of debt and absorption would occur. Or if the banks were ten thousand, their loaning capital $2,000,000,000 instead of $200, and the number of people seventy million, there would be no material change in the mathematical relations and results. Debt growth and the concentration of wealth are the natural and mathematical results that will always follow these methods of doing business.

The only reason we are unable to calculate the precise time when bankruptcy will occur is because we do not keep the record of every transaction which produces an unpayable debt and all the factors which extinguish or liquidate it. Money is a species of bookkeeping with a debit and credit side which must be corretly kept and balanced.

It is in season now to ask the reader specifically to designate the differences, if any, between the methods employed by these islanders for securing a medium of exchange and the methods employed and legalized by the people of the United States. It is here affirmed that they are one and the same; identical in processes; identical in results; differing only in the volume of money used, the number of people using it and the size of the territory occupied by the system.

To prove otherwise it would be necessary to know how many dollars of debt arise from interest, how many from loaning the same dollars more than once and how many are made by buying on credit and the identical dates on which all these debts fall due. It would also be necessary to know how many dollars are coined, how many are exported from the country, how many are imported into the country, how many are taken out of circulation, how many are lost and the exact amount of the expenditures of the money loaners. Failing to know all these items, our gold standard opponents are at sea in a tub, neither having chart, compass, pilot nor rudder; no, not even the guiding ray of the polar star. They see not the whirlpool just ahead that will swamp their craft and immerse them in the same waters of financial ruin in which many so many of their fellow citizens have been submerged.

By these illustrations all the factors of our financial system have been examined and traced. Summing up, we find three factors or elements which produce debt growth — viz., interest, loaning the same dollars more than once and buying on credit. There are three ways by which this debt growth might be liquidated without loss or foreclosure — viz., by coinage, by the importation of money from foreign countries, (by exporting more goods than are imported and by the expenditures of travelers) and by the expenditures of the creditor classes. If the sum total of these three does not equal the debt growth there are three ways by which it is adjusted. It may be foreclosed, repudiated or refunded. All three of these methods of adjustment are employed, dealing great injustice and wrong to all the parties concerned. If debts are foreclosed the creditor usually secures about three times the value he loaned, which is a cruel injustice to the debtor, by taking something for which no equivalent bas been given. If debts are repudiated then the creditor loses that which rightfully belongs to him and he is the injured party.

If debts are refunded the evil day when one or the other of these alternatives must occur is deferred. No record of these three items of debt increase is ever kept, nor is their sum total ever known, and no provision for the honest extinguishment of debt growth is ever made. So year by year the concentration of wealth increases by our failures and foreclosures, and year by year our debts enlarge by being refunded and the interest compounded.

There is no practical way of providing for this increase of debt under the present system unless the number of dollars is increased to the extent of the debt growth; failing in this it constantly refunds itself, and as our money becomes more difficult to obtain because the securities which must be put up in order to obtain money constantly diminish, until finally they all become covered with bonds and mortgages and money almost wholly disappears from circulation. Chaos follows. It will also be apparent that if an amount of money equal to the debt growth was obtained and thrown into circulation without debt very few, if any, failures would occur. So vast have been the exploitations of the people of the United States by and through these processes that one stands appalled not only at the magnitude of the crime but at the stupidity or treachery of the economists and statesmen in their failure to expose it. Debt upon debt; foreclosure upon foreclosure; panic upon panic; disaster upon disaster, until we, a robbed and robbing people, stand upon the very brink of national bankruptcy and disruption.

These processes been going on so long and these intricate relations here described are so little understood that those who are benefited by them have come to look upon them as honest and legitimate, and those who have been the victims have become accustomed to regard their misfortunes as the results of their own mismanagement or the allotments of an inscrutable Providence, whose decrees it were impious to question. For thirty years a greedy set of grasping cormorants and inhuman vultures, whose principal dens of devastation are located in London and Wall street, have by these processes, and others still more infamous, pillaged the people and confiscated the land until a wail of despair ascends from millions of crushed and bleeding hearts and the nation is filled with homeless, penniless multitudes who unable even to obtain employment.

That these demonstrations give true interpretation to the causes which have led to our deplorable condition of congested wealth and unpayable debt of $40,000,000,000 must be so glaringly apparent that the wayfaring man, though a gold-standard Republican, may not be fooled again.

For thirty years the American people have been admonished by one of the most impressive and suggestive object lessons ever enacted before the eyes of intelligent men without once arousing their suspicion or enlisting their serious consideration. For a quarter of a century Bradstreet and Dun have reported through the weekly and daily papers "219 failures this week, against 217 of the corresponding week of last year;" "225 failures this week against 219 of the corresponding week of last year," and so on until 425 failures were reported in a single week (July, 1893). Week in and week out, month in and month out, year in and year out, this red flag of anarchy has been flung in their faces without their comprehending its awful meaning or putting forth any adequate effort to investigate the causes which have led to these widespread disasters. When questioned their only reply is: "It always was and it always will be," or "People fail because they do not have sense enough to run a business." There is a grim truth in this last remark which is truly pathetic. Interest is in every sense unjust and unscientific and the nation that travels over a highway paved with bonds, iron-clad notes and cutthroat debt obligations travels the road of legalized robbery and financial ruin, at he end of which lies the precipice of anarchy and national dissolution. The dumb inarticulate cry of "interest" "interest," now heard throughout the length and breadth of the land is but the roar of the surging breakers just ahead toward which our beloved country — the greatest and grandest Republic ever organized — is blindly, madly rushing with ever-increasing impetuosity.

From that point of time buried so far away in the catacombs of the dead past that all memory of it has been obliterated from the archives of history, when the prehistoric nations made gold and silver their medium and power of exchange, the curse of debt impossible of payment has eaten up the substance of the people and destroyed the stability of all forms of government. At first a small cloud, no larger than a man's hand, at last a hideous, whirling cyclone, black with crime and freighted with destruction. And thus it always must be with all nations to the end of all time who use gold and silver for their power and medium of exchange.[2] Like causes will produce like effects.

Historical evidence is not wanting, both ancient and modern, to confirm these conclusions. So well did Moses, the great lawgiver of the Jewish people, comprehend the disaster of debt which lay imbedded in commodity exchange that he wisely instituted laws which, if they had been observed, would have counteracted both the concentration of wealth, and the growth of debt.

2 A friendly critic pronounces this last sentence unscientific and requests that it be stricken out. This critic may never have come to regard money as a tool or instrument by the means of which a certain kind of work is to be performed. When he does he will see that it is as unscientific, and consequently uneconomical, to manufacture money from a material more expensive than utility demands as it would be to make any other tool, or instrument from a material more expensive than is demanded by its use. If all the governments of the world should assume the ownership of a all the gold and silver and also all the mines now known to exist and give to gold and silver money exclusively the legal tender quality, there would not be a sufficient quantity to do the business of the world on a cash basis; and debts arising from doing business on credit would increase the same as the debts which arise from interest and would be unpayable only through foreclosure. Therefore we must conclude that both gold and silver are unscientific material on which to place the money stamp. Our problem rests not only with the material from which money is made, but also with methods of circulation and the liquidation of debt. All debts must be made possible of payment by an adequate circulation scientifically disbursed.

The law which absolutely forbade usury prevented the growth of that part of debt which is unpayable without an increase of money. The law repudiating all debts every seven years prevented the growth of that part of debt which arises from buying on credit and the re-loaning of the same money more than once. Then to prevent the concentration of wealth which arose through the foreclosure of debts during the six years in which there was no releasement the fiftieth years was proclaimed the year of Jubilee, when all the lands that had passed out of the hands of the debtor class were restored back to the original possessors. The power of metallic money or commodity exchange to create debt impossible of payment and the concentration of wealth which would follow was most surely known to Moses, else these counteracting laws, which on the surface have the most decided appearance of injustice, would not have been instituted in the Jewish code and the direct curses of God pronounced against the people if they disregarded them.[3] Obedience to these laws would have so preserved equality of wealth and opportunities that the prophets of a later day would not have bewailed the pitiful conditions of Judea, saying, "Our inheritance is turned to strangers, our houses to aliens." (Lament 5:2); "the young children ask bread, and no man breaketh it unto them." (Lament 4:4); "The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children" (Lament 4:10); "Our skin was black like an oven because of the terrible famine." (Lament 5:10). This wisdom of the ancients seems always to have been the inheritance of the Jews, and while they have no country and scattered among many nationalities, where often they are not permitted to own land, yet so well do they understand the power of money when loaned that seldom ever see a Jew who is either a tramp or a pauper. Acting upon this ancient knowledge, the House of Rothschilds, with a few co-religionists, conspire to own the world.

The power to accomplish their design will be readily understood by a few mathematical calculations. The National bonds drawn upon the various nations of the earth are now estimated to be 28 billion, largely, if not wholly, held in London. This is three and one half times all the metallic money of the world, which reveals the fact that the money of the world is primarily owned in London and the nations of the earth are doing business with borrowed money, owning not one dollar of their circulating medium. These bonds are drawing 4 per cent interest, which annually amounts to $1,120,000,000. This is more than three times the annual output of all the gold and silver in the world, and seven and one-half times the output of the world's gold.

The world's interest-bearing debts are now estimated to be a over 200 billion dollars, which is twenty-five times all the gold and silver money in the world and fifty times the amount of the world's gold. The annual interest at 10 per cent would be 20 billion dollars, which is a sum fifty-four times greater than the world's annual output of both gold and silver and 108 times the world's annual output of gold.

The power of this vast growth of debt to concentrate the ownership of the world into the hands of the few men who own the gold must certainly be comprehended by all who will study these calculations, and the man who cannot understand that this work will be accomplished in one-half the time when silver is demonetized is too imbecile to be allowed the privilege of voting. All this vast debt has accrued by three mathematical deviations which have been described — namely, interest, loaning the same dollars more than once and buying on credit. There is but one cure. Dollars must be made instead of bonds, notes and mortgages.

The last pages of this book will clearly demonstrate the success of the money mongers. What a marvelous contrast between the laws for the protection of the debtor classes, as established by Moses, and the Roman law[4] of the twelve tables, which sanctioned the creditor, after some preliminary formalities, to scourge a debtor to death, and if the debtor had several creditors they might cut his body in pieces, each taking a piece in proportion to the amount of his debt. If the creditors did not resort to this horrible atrocity they were authorized to reduce him to slavery and subject him to chains and stripes or sell him and his wife and children into foreign slavery. The laws of Greece prior to Solon were little less severe than those of ancient Rome, except the creditor was not permitted to kill his debtor. The cultivating tenants and small farmers weighed down by debt were first deprived of their property and finally with their families were reduced to slavery. The growth of debt went on until all the small farmers and were converted into slaves and there grew up but two classes in the state — the large land owners and the poor debtors reduced to slavery.

4 Speech of Judge Henry C. Caldwell.

Between the arrogant profligacy of the rich and the destitution and misery of the slaves the state was about to perish. In its extremity it was saved by the justice and the wisdom of Solon. He abolished imprisonment for debt; set all slaves free who had been adjudged so for debt and canceled all contracts in which the debtor had borrowed on the security of his person or his land.

Mortgage debts were repudiated by pulling down the stone pillars erected erected on the land which were at that time used to record the debt.

Coming down to recent events, our own history affords a striking example corroborative of the position here elucidated. During the war nearly $2,000,000,000 were thrown into circulation without debt. The result was, to an extent never before known, the debtor classes were able and did pay their debts and the failures of the country were reduced to a minimum, being respectively 485, 502, 530 and 532 for the four years 1863, 1864, 1865 and 1866 ! Then came the contraction policy with all its withering, blighting curse of sheriffs' sales, mortgage foreclosures and business failures — 2,386 of them in 1867 ! Since this time there has been a steady increase, until now they have reached nearly 16,000 in a single year and our growth of debt is over $2,000,000,000 a year, or over six million every twenty-four hours. This appaling phenomena can be accounted for upon no other hypothesis than that laid down here. Let him who thinks it can be, at once proceed to enlighten this distracted world that these appalling losses which send men down to poverty and crime may soon be numbered with the things of the past. From this analysis which encompasses and shows the relation of every factor in our financial system and agrees with all known facts we must conclude that business done with borrowed money on which interest accrues and by buying on credit must always result disastrously unless the coinage equals the debt growth or it is otherwise provided for.

If the reader still doubts let him carefully study the following table and note the decrease and increase of failures, with the increase and decrease of coinage. By the use of $200 for three years, on the loans of which 10 per cent increase was legalized, in six transactions, none of which were based upon unreasonable or improbable conditions, it has been proved that it was possible for a debt of $324 to accumulate which was impossible of payment in accordance with the terms of the contract without an increase of money either by coinage or importation. Failing in this we find $1,736 worth of property concentrated into the hands of a man who never by a single hour's toil honestly earned one penny of it.

In the United States we find ten or twelve thousand banks and loan associations loaning into circulation a sum of money varying from one to two billion dollars, which is the entire volume, by the same methods and similar terms. By the bank-deposit system we find this same volume of money loaned over and over again, probably not less than four times. Thousands of pawnshops and private individuals are loaning money on rates of interest varying from ten to three hundred per cent. Thousands and tens of thousands of transactions are effected by means of promissory notes and promises to pay. The increase of our money volume is not one-thousandth part of the debt growth, while, as will be seen by the table on page 44, many years show a positive decrease. We see the same results of business failures, foreclosures, panics, concentration of wealth and debt growth, as was seen on the island. By these financial methods the people of the United States, who are the most energetic, inventive and industrious on earth, have, while working to their utmost, imposed upon themselves a debt of $40,000,000,000 in the last thirty years; while not less than about the same amount has either been repudiated or foreclosed. The preceding table only partially reveals the magnitude of these crimes, for in this table neither the failures below three thousand nor the foreclosure of real estate are recorded.

Let no one who reads this blackest page of human history ever again raise his voice against these destitute, homeless multitudes, contemptuously asserting that "it is their own fault; they have brought these evils upon themselves by their own extravagance and idleness." It is infamously false. By the legalized processes here described nine-tenths of these afflicted and stricken people have been robbed of their homes, their labors and their education. What if in their ignorance and poverty they do not understand the methods employed to rob them ? An avenging eye beholds it all and the oppressor shall not pass out from under the rod until he has paid the utmost farthing. Your gains have been filched from the poor; from you these riches shall melt as snow before the summer's sun.

From these deductions there is no escape; that which ye sow ye shall reap. Your gold and silver is cankered and the rust of them shall eat your soul as with fire.[James 5:3]

My task is done. This chart, sublime in its simplicity, proclaims to a world lying in darkness the scientific solution of that so long unsolved problem of which Blanqui exclaimed: "Happy our generation if science sometime gives the key." It reveals the incantations and machinations complained of by Senator Ingalls by which one-half the wealth of this great nation has been legally stolen from the hands of those who created it and the ownership of it transferred to those who gave no equivalent for it — the idle few. Hitherto the only epitaph man has inscribed over the buried achievements of his past greatness is "Nations rise and nations fall." But henceforth this chart shall point with unerring certainty to the disease — concentration of wealth — and the cause of this is debt produced by the use of gold and silver money. Go forth; thy mission is as broad as humanity; thy power as great as truth.

The Rothschilds have been in control of the world for a very long time, their tentacles reaching into many aspects of our daily lives, as is documented in the following timeline. However, before you jump to the timeline, please read this invaluable introduction which will tell you who the Rothschilds are as oppose to who they claim to be.

The Rothschilds claim that they are Jewish, when in fact they are Khazars. They are from a country called Khazaria, which occupied the land locked between the Black Sea and the Caspian Sea which is now predominantly occupied by Georgia. The reason the Rothschilds claim to be Jewish is that the Khazars under the instruction of the King, converted to the Jewish faith in 740 A.D., but of course that did not include converting their Asiatic Mongolian genes to the genes of the Jewish people.

You will find that approximately 90% of people in the world today who call themselves Jews are actually Khazars, or as they like to be known, Ashkenazi Jews. These people knowingly lie to the world with their claims that the land of Israel is theirs by birthright, when in actual fact their real homeland is over 800 miles away in Georgia.

So, next time you hear an Israeli Prime Minister bleating about the so-called persecution of the Jews, consider this, every Prime Minister of Israel has been an Ashkenazi Jew. Therefore when all these Prime Ministers have curried favour with the West for their re-establishment of a Jewish homeland, they have knowingly and deliberately lied to you, as they were never from that region, and they well know it, because it is they who call themselves Ashkenazi Jews.

The Book of Revelation, Chapter 2, Verse 9, states the following which would appear to be about these Ashkenazi Jews:

> "I know thy works, and tribulation and poverty, (but thou art rich) and I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan."

The most wealthy bloodline in the world bar none and the leader of the Ashkenazi Jews in the world today is the Rothschild family. As you will see in the timeline, the Rothschilds have obtained this position through lies, manipulation and murder. Their bloodline also extends into the Royal Families of Europe, and the following family names: Astor; Bundy; Collins; duPont; Freeman; Kennedy; Morgan; Oppenheimer; Rockefeller; Sassoon; Schiff; Taft; and Van Duyn.

However, these are not the only bloodlines to worry about. You are probably aware of the centuries old pratice undertaken by many Ashkenazi Jews whereby they would change their name, in order for them to appear part of the dominant race of the country in which they lived, so as they could obtain influential positions in that country, which they would then exploit to serve their real masters elsewhere. There is plenty of evidence to prove the Rothschilds continue that deceptive tradition.

Furthermore the Rothschilds are known to sire many children secretly that they can put into positions of power when required. This started with the very first man who took the name Rothschild, who had a secret sixth son. Finally, remember the world is a diverse place, I could if I wanted change my name to Rothschild, or any of the names listed above, and that would not make me part of this family anymore than converting to Judaism in 740 A.D. will make these Ashkenazis Jewish.

Please, therefore, do not automatically assume someone you see with the name Rothschild or any of the names listed above are part of the Rothschild criminal network. Furthermore and most importantly, the majority of Ashkenazi Jews are innocent and not part of this network. Check the facts out for yourself first, this article is designed to inform people who the enemy is, not single out people of a particular race or people with a particular surname, who may have nothing to do with this Rothschild criminal network.

1743: Mayer Amschel Bauer, an Ashkenazi Jew, is born in Frankfurt, Germany, the son of Moses Amschel Bauer, a money lender and the proprietor of a counting house.

Moses Amschel Bauer places a red sign above the entrance door to his counting house. This sign is a red hexagram (which geometrically and numerically translates into the number 666) which under Rothschild instruction will end up on the Israeli flag some two centuries later.

1760: During this decade Mayer Amschel Bauer works for a bank owned by the Oppenheimers' in Hanover, Germany. He is highly successful and becomes a junior partner. Whilst working at the bank he becomes acquainted with General von Estorff.

Following his father's death, Bauer returns to Frankfurt to take over his father's business. Bauer recognises the significance of the red hexagram and changes his name from Bauer to Rothschild, after the red hexagram or sign signifying 666 hanging over the entrance door ("Rot," is German for, "Red," "Schild," is German for, "Sign").

Now Mayer Amschel Rothschild, he discovers that General von Estorff is now attached to the court of Prince William IX of Hesse-Hanau, one of the richest royal houses in Europe, which gained its' wealth by the hiring out of Hessian soldiers to foreign countries for vast profits (a practice that continues today in the form of exporting, "peacekeeping," troops throughout the world).

He therefore makes the General's re-acquaintance on the pretext of selling him valuable coins and trinkets at discounted prices. As he plans, Rothschild is subsequently introduced to Prince William himself who is more than pleased with discounted prices he charges for his rare coins and trinkets, and Rothschild offers him a bonus for any other business the Prince can direct his way.

Rothschild subsequently becomes close associates with Prince William, and ends up doing business with him and members of the court. He soon discovers that loaning money to governments and royalty is more profitable than loaning to individuals, as the loans are bigger and are secured by the nation's taxes.

1769: Mayer Amschel Rothschild is given permission by Prince William to hang a sign on the front of his business premises declaring that he is, "M. A. Rothschild, by appointment court factor to his serene highness, Prince William of Hanau."

1770: Mayer Amschel Rothschild draws up plans for the creation of the Illuminati and entrusts Ashkenazi Jew, Adam Weishaupt, a Crypto-Jew who was outwardly Roman Catholic, with its organization and development. The Illuminati is to be based upon the teachings of the Talmud, which is in turn, the teachings of Rabbinical Jews. It was to be called the Illuminati as this is a Luciferian term which means, keepers of the light.

Mayer Amschel Rothschild marries Gutle Schnaper.

1773: Amschel Mayer Rothschild born, the first of Mayer Amschel Rothschild's sons. He like all his brothers who follow him, will enter the family business at the age of 12.

1774: Salomon Mayer Rothschild born.

1776: Adam Weishaupt officially completes his organisation of the Illuminati on May

1 of this year. The purpose of the Illuminati is to divide the goyim (all non-Jews) through political, economic, social, and religious means. The opposing sides were to be armed and incidents were to be provided in order for them to: fight amongst themselves; destroy national governments; destroy religious institutions; and eventually destroy each other.

Weishaupt soon infiltrates the Continental Order of Freemasons with this Illuminati doctrine and establishes lodges of the Grand Orient to be their secret headquarters. This was all under the orders and finance of Mayer Amschel Rothschild and the concept has spread and is followed within Masonic Lodges worldwide to the present day.

Weishaupt also recruits 2,000 paid followers including the most intelligent men in the field of arts and letters, education, science, finance,and industry. They were instructed to follow the following methods in order to control people.

1) Use monetary and sex bribery to obtain control of men already in high places, in the various levels of all governments and other fields of endeavour. Once influential persons had fallen for the lies, deceits, and temptations of the Illuminati they were to be held in bondage by application of political and other forms of blackmail, threats of financial ruin, public exposure, and fiscal harm, even death to themselves and loved members of their families.

2) The faculties of colleges and universities were to cultivate students possessing exceptional mental ability belonging to well-bred families with international leanings, and recommend them for special training in internationalism, or rather the notion that only a one-world government can put an end to recurring wars and strife. Such training was to be provided by granting scholarships to those selected by the Illuminati.

3) All influential people trapped into coming under the control of the Illuminati, plus the students who had been specially educated and trained, were to be used as agents and placed behind the scenes of all governments as experts and specialists. This was so they would advise the top executives to adopt policies which would in the long-run serve the secret plans of the Illuminati one-world conspiracy and bring about the destruction of the governments and religions they were elected or appointed to serve.

4) To obtain absolute-control of the press, at that time the only mass-communications media which distributed information to the public, so that all news and information could be slanted in order to make the masses believe that a one-world government is the only solution to our many and varied problems.

1777: Nathan Mayer Rothschild born.

1784: Adam Weishaupt issues his order for the French Revolution to be started by by Maximilien Robespierre in book form. This book was written by one of Weishaupt's associates, Xavier Zwack, and sent by courier from Frankfurt to Paris. However en route there, the courier is struck by lightning, the book detailing this plan discovered by the police, and handed over to the Bavarian authorities.

As a consequence, the Bavarian government orders the police to raid Weishaupt's masonic lodges of the Grand Orient, and the homes of his most influential associates. Clearly, the Bavarian authorities were convinced that the book that was discovered was a very real threat by a private group of influential people, to use wars and revolutions to achieve their political ends.

1785: The Bavarian government outlaw the Illuminati and close all the Bavarian lodges of the Grand Orient.

Mayer Amschel Rothschild moves his family home to a five storey house in Frankfurt which he shares with the Schiff family.

1786: The Bavarian government publish the details of the Illuminati plot in a document entitled, "The Original Writings of The Order and Sect of The Illuminati." They then send this document to all the heads of church and state throughout Europe, but sadly their warning is ignored.

1788: Kalmann (Carl) Mayer Rothschild Born.

1789: Due to the European ignorance of the Bavarian government's warning, the Illuminati's plan for a French Revolution succeeded from this year to 1793. This revolution was a bankers' dream, it established a new constitution and passed laws that forbade the Roman Church from levying tithes (taxes) and also removed its exemption from taxation.

1790: Mayer Amschel Rothschild states,

> "Let me issue and control a nation's money and I care not who writes the laws."

1791: The Rothschilds get, "control of a nation's money," through Alexander Hamilton (their agent in George Washington's cabinet) when they set up a central bank in the USA called the First Bank of the United States. This is established with a 20 year charter.

1792: Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild born.

1796: Amschel Mayer Rothschild marries Eva Hanau.

1798: John Robison publishes a book entitled, "Proofs of a Conspiracy Against All the Religions and Governments of Europe Carried on in the Secret Meetings of Freemasons, Illuminati and Reading Societies." In this book, Professor Robison of the University of Edinburgh, one of the leading intellects of his time, who in 1783 was elected general secretary of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, gave details of the whole Rothschild Illuminati plot.

He advised how he had been a high degree mason in the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry, and had been invited by Adam Weishaupt to Europe, where he had been given a revised copy of Weishaupt's conspiracy. However, although he pretended to go along with it, Professor Robison did not agree with it and therefore published his aforementioned book. The book included details of the Bavarian government's investigation into the Illuminati and the French Revolution.

That same year on July 19th, David Pappen, President of Harvard University, lectured the graduating class on the influence illuminism was having on American politics and religion.

At the age of 21, Nathan Mayer Rothschild leaves Frankfurt for England, where with a large sum of money given to him by his father, he sets up a banking house in London.

1800: Salomon Mayer Rothschild marries Caroline Stern.

1806: Napolean states that it is his,

> "object to remove the house of Hess-Cassel from rulership and to strike it out of the list of powers."

On hearing this, Prince William IX of Hesse-Hanau, flees Germany, goes to Denmark and entrusts his fortune valued at $3,000,000 at that time to Mayer Amschel Rothschild for safekeeping.

Nathan Mayer Rothschild marries Hannah Barent Cohen the daughter of a wealthy London merchant.

1808: Nathan Mayer Rothschild has his first son born Lionel Nathan de Rothschild.

1810: Sir Francis Baring and Abraham Goldsmid die. This leaves Nathan Mayer Rothschild as the remaining major banker in England.

Salomon Mayer Rothschild goes to Vienna, Austria and sets up the bank, M. von Rothschild und Söhne.

1811: The charter for the Rothschilds Bank of the United States runs out and Congress votes against its renewal. Nathan Mayer Rothschild is not amused and he states,

> "Either the application for renewal of the charter is granted, or the United States will find itself involved in a most disastrous war."

However the United States stands firm and the Charter is not renewed, which causes Nathan Mayer Rothschild to issue another threat,

> "Teach those impudent Americans a lesson. Bring them back to colonial status."

1812: Backed by Rothschild money, and Nathan Mayer Rothschild's orders, the British declare war on the United States. The Rothschilds plan was to cause the United States to build up such a debt in fighting this war that they would have to surrender to the Rothschilds and allow the charter for the Rothschild owned First Bank of the United States to be renewed.

Mayer Amschel Rothschild dies. In his will he lays out specific laws that the House of Rothschild were to follow: all key positions in the family business were only to be held by family members; only male members of the family were allowed to participate in the family business, this included a reported sixth secret bastard son (It is important to note that Mayer Amschel Rothschild also has five daughters, so today the spread of the Rothschild Zionist dynasty without the Rothschild name is far and wide, and Jews believe the mixed offspring of a Jewish mother is solely Jewish); the family was to intermarry with it's first and second cousins to preserve the family fortune (of the 18 marriages by Mayer Amschel Rothschild's grandchildren, 16 were between first cousins - a practice known today as inbreeding); no public inventory of his estate was to be published; no legal action was to be taken with regard to the value of the inheritance; the eldest son of the eldest son was to become the head of the family (this condition could only be overturned when the majority of the family agreed otherwise).

This was straightaway the case and Nathan Mayer Rothschild was elected head of the family following his father, Mayer Amschel Rothschild's death.

Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild goes to Paris, France to set up the bank, de Rothschild Frères.

Nathaniel de Rothschild, the son in law of Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild, born.

1814: With regard to the $3,000,000 Prince William IX of Hesse-Hanau had entrusted to Mayer Amschel Rothschild for safekeeping, for an account of what happened next we turn to the Jewish Encyclopaedia, 1905 edition, Volume 10, page 494, which states,

> "According to legend this money was hidden away in wine casks, and, escaping the search of Napoleon's soldiers when they entered Frankfurt, was restored intact in the same casks in 1814, when the elector (Prince William IX of Hesse-Hanau) returned to the electorate (Germany). The facts are somewhat less romantic, and more businesslike."

This last line indicates the money was never returned by Rothschild to Prince William IX of Hesse-Hanau. The encyclopaedia goes on to state,

> "Nathan Mayer Rothschild invested this $3,000,000 in, gold from the East India Company knowing that it would be needed for Wellington's peninsula campaign."

On the stolen money Nathan made,

> "no less than four profits:
>
> i) On the sale of Wellington's paper which he bought at 50 cents on the dollar and collected at par;
> ii) on the sale of gold to Wellington;
> iii) on its repurchase; and > iv) on forwarding it to Portugal."

1815: The five Rothschild brothers work to supply gold to both Wellington's army (through Nathan in England) and Napoleon's army (through Jacob in France), and begin their policy of funding both sides in wars. The Rothschilds love wars because they are massive generators of risk free debt.

This is because they are guaranteed by the government of a country, and therefore the efforts of the population of that country, and it doesn't matter if that country loses the war because the loans are given on the guarantee that the victor will honour the debts of the vanquished.

Whilst the Rothschilds are funding both sides in this war, they use the banks they have spread out across Europe to give them the opportunity to set up an unrivalled postal service network of secret routes and fast couriers. The post these couriers carried was to be opened up by these couriers and their details given to the Rothschilds so they always were one step ahead of current events.

Furthermore, these Rothschild couriers were the only merchants allowed to pass through the English and French blockades. It was these couriers who also kept Nathan Mayer Rothschild up to date with how the war was going so he could use that intelligence to buy and sell from his position on the stock exchange in accordance with that intelligence.

One of Rothschild's couriers was a man named Rothworth. When the outcome of the Battle of Waterloo was won by the British, Rothworth took off for the Channel and was able to deliver this news to Nathan Mayer Rothschild, a full 24 hours before Wellington's own courier.

At that time British bonds were called consuls and they were traded on the floor of the stock exchange. Nathan Mayer Rothschild instructed all his workers on the floor to start selling consuls. The made all the other traders believe that the British had lost the war so they started selling frantically.

Therefore the consuls plummeted in value which was when Nathan Mayer Rothschild discreetly instructed his workers to purchase all the consuls they could lay their hands on.

When news came through that the British had actually won the war, the consuls went up to a level even higher than before the war ended leaving Nathan Mayer Rothschild with a return of approximately 20 to 1 on his investment.

This gave the Rothschild family complete control of the British economy, now the financial centre of the world following Napolean's defeat, and forced England to set up a new Bank of England, which Nathan Mayer Rothschild controlled.

Interestingly 100 years later the New York Times would run a story stating that Nathan Mayer Rothschild's grandson had attempted to secure a court order to suppress publication of a book which had this insider trading story in it. The Rothschild family claimed the story was untrue and libellous, but the court denied the Rothschilds request and ordered the family to pay all court costs.

Back to 1815, this is the year Nathan Mayer Rothschild makes his famous statement,

> "I care not what puppet is placed upon the throne of England to rule the Empire on which the sun never sets. The man who controls Britain's money supply controls the British Empire, and I control the British money supply."

He would go onto brag that in the 17 years he had been in England he had increased the £20,000 stake given to him by his father, 2500 times to £50 million.

The Rothschilds also use their control of the Bank of England to replace the method of shipping gold from country to country and instead used their five banks spread across Europe to set up a system of paper debits and credits, the banking system of today.

By the end of this century, a period of time that was known as the, "Age of the Rothschilds," it is estimated that the Rothschild family controlled half the wealth of the world.

However something that did not go well for the Rothschilds this year was the Congress of Vienna, which started in September, 1814 and concluded in June of this year. The reason for this Congress of Vienna, was for the Rothschilds to create a form of world government, to give them complete political control over much of the civilized world.

Many of the European governments were in debt to the Rothschilds, so they figured they could use that as a bargaining tool. However the Tsar Alexander I of Russia, who had not succumbed to a Rothschild central bank, would not go along with the plan, so the Rothschild world government plan failed.

Enraged by this, Nathan Mayer Rothschild swore that some day he or his descendants would destroy the Tsar Alexander I's entire family and descendants. Unfortunately he was true to his word and 102 years later Rothschild funded Bolsheviks would act upon that promise.

Interestingly, world government fanatic and Ashkenazi Jew, Henry Kissinger, did his doctoral dissertation on the Congress of Vienna.

1816: The American Congress passes a bill permitting yet another Rothschild dominated central bank, which gives the Rothschilds control of the American money supply again. This is called the Second Bank of the United States and is given a twenty year charter. The British war against the America therefore ends with the deaths of thousands of British and American soldiers, but the Rothschilds get their bank.

1818: Following the French securing massive loans in 1817 in order to help rebuild after their disastrous defeat at Waterloo, Rothschild agents bought vast amounts of French government bonds causing their value to increase.

On November 5th they dumped the lot on the open market causing their value to plummet and France to go into a financial panic. The Rothschilds then stepped in to take control of the French money supply. This was the same year the Rothschilds were able to loan £5,000,000 to the Prussian government.

1821: Kalmann (Carl) Mayer Rothschild was sent to Naples, Italy. He would end up doing a lot of business with the Vatican and Pope Gregory XVI subsequently conferred upon him the Order of St. George.

Also, whenever the Pope received Kalmann, he would give him his hand rather than the customary toe to kiss, which showed the extent of Kalmann's power over the Vatican.

1822: The emperor of Austria made the five Rothschild brothers Barons. Nathan Mayer Rothschild chose not to take up the title.

1823: The Rothschilds take over the financial operations of the Catholic Church, worldwide.

1827: Sir Walter Scott publishes his nine volume set, The life of Napolean and in volume two he states that the French Revolution was planned by the Illuminati (Adam Weishaupt) and was financed by the money changers of Europe (The Rothschilds).

1832: President Andrew Jackson (the 7th President of the United States from 1829 to 1837), runs the campaign for his second term in office under the slogan, "Jackson And No Bank!" This is in reference to his plan to take the control of the American money system to benefit the American people, not for the profiteering of the Rothschilds.

1833: President Andrew Jackson starts removing the government's deposits from the Rothschild controlled, Second Bank of the United States and instead deposits them into banks directed by democratic bankers.

This causes the Rothschilds to panic and so they do what they do best, contract the money supply causing a depression. President Jackson knows what they are up to and later states,

> "You are a den of thieves vipers, and I intend to rout you out, and by the Eternal God, I will rout you out."

1834: The Italian revolutionary leader, Guiseppe Mazzini, is selected by the Illuminati to direct their revolutionary program throughout the world and would serve in that capacity until he died in 1872.

1835: On January 30, an assassin tries to shoot President Jackson, but miraculously both of the assassin's pistols misfired. President Jackson would later claim that he knew the Rothschilds were responsible for that attempted assassination. He is not the only one, the assassin, Richard Lawrence, who was found not guilty by reason of insanity, later bragged that powerful people in Europe had hired him and promised to protect him if he were caught.

The Rothschilds acquire the rights in the Almadén quicksilver mines in Spain. This was at the time the biggest concession in the world and as quicksilver was a vital component in the refining of gold or silver this gave the Rothschilds a virtual world monopoly.

1836: Following his years of fighting against the Rothschilds and their central bank in America, President Andrew Jackson finally succeeds in throwing the Rothschilds central bank out of America, when the bank's charter is not renewed. It would not be until 1913 that the Rothschilds would be able to set up their third central bank in America, the Federal Reserve, and to ensure no mistakes are made, this time they will put one of their own bloodline, Jacob Schiff, in charge of the project.

Nathan Mayer Rothschild dies and the control of his bank, N. M. Rothschild & Sons is passed on to his younger brother, James Mayer Rothschild.

1837: The Rothschilds send one of their own, August Belmont, an Ashkenazi Jew, to America to salvage their banking interests defeated by President Andrew Jackson.

1840: The Rothschilds become the Bank of England's bullion brokers. They set up agencies in California and Australia.

1841: President John Tyler (the 10th President of the United States From 1841 to 1845) vetoed the act to renew the charter for the Bank of the United States. He goes on to receive hundreds of letters threatening him with assassination.

1844: Salomon Mayer Rothschild purchases the United Coal Mines of Vítkovice and Austro-Hungarian Blast Furnace Company that would go on to be one of the top ten global industrial concerns.

Benjamin Disraeli, an Ashkenazi Jew (who would go on to become British Prime Minister twice - the only admitted Ashkenazi Jew to do so) publishes Coningsby, in which he characterises Nathan Mayer Rothschild as,

> "the Lord and Master of the money markets of the world, and of course virtually Lord and Master of everything else. He literally held the revenues of Southern Italy in pawn, and Monarchs and Ministers of all countries courted his advice and were guided by his suggestions."

1845: The Great American Patriot, Andrew Jackson (7th President of the United States) dies.

Before his death he is asked what he regarded his as greatest achievement. He replies without hesitation,

> "I Killed The Bank,"

This is in reference to the fact he banished the Rothschilds Second Bank of the United States in 1836.

Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild (who by now had married his niece, Betty, Salomon Mayer Rothschild's daughter), now known as Baron James de Rothschild, wins the contract to build the first major railway line across the country.

This was called the Chemin De Fer Du Nord and ran initially from Paris to Valenciennes and then joined with the Austrian rail network built by his brother (and wife's father - all sounds a bit sordid doesn't it) Salomon Mayer Rothschild.

A requirement for entering parliament was to take an oath in the true faith of a Christian. Lionel De Rothschild refused to do this as he was Jewish and his seat in parliament remained empty for 11 years until new oaths were allowed. He must have been an invaluable representative for his constituency, bearing in mind he could never vote on any bill as he never entered parliament! I wonder how he managed to keep his parliamentary seat for 11 years?

1848: Karl Marx, an Ashkenazi Jew, publishes, "The Communist Manifesto." Interestingly at the same time as he is working on this, Karl Ritter of Frankfurt University was writing the antithesis which would form the basis for Freidrich Wilhelm Nietzsche's, "Nietzscheanism." This Nietzecheanism was later developed into Fascism and then into Nazism and was used to forment the first and second world wars.

Marx, Ritter, and Nietzsche were all funded and under the instruction of the Rothschilds. The idea was that those who direct the overall conspiracy could use the differences in those two so-called ideologies to enable them to divide larger and larger factions of the human race into opposing camps so that they could be armed and then brainwashed into fighting and destroying each other, and particularly, to destroy all political and religious institutions. The same plan put forward by Weishaupt in 1776.

Eva Hanau, Amschel Mayer Rothschild's wife dies.

1849: Gutle Schnaper, Mayer Amschel Rothschild's wife dies. Before her death she would nonchalantly state,

> "If my sons did not want wars, there would be none."

1850: Construction begins this decade on the manor houses of Mentmore in England and Ferrières in France, more Rothschilds Manors will follow throughout the world, all of them filled with works of art.

Jacob (James) Rothschild in France is said to be worth 600 million francs, which at the time was 150 million francs more than all the other bankers in France put together.

1852: N.M. Rothschild & Sons begins refining gold and silver for the Royal Mint and the Bank of England and other international customers.

1853: Nathaniel de Rothschild, the son in law of Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild, purchases Château Brane Mouton, the Bordeaux vineyard of Mouton, and renames it Château Mouton Rothschild.

1854: Caroline Stern, Salomon Mayer Rothschild's wife, dies.

1855: Amschel Mayer Rothschild dies.

Salomon Mayer Rothschild dies.

Kalmann (Carl) Mayer Rothschild dies.

1858: Lionel De Rothschild finally takes his seat in parliament when the requirement to take an oath in the true faith of a Christian is broadened to include other oaths. He becomes the first Jewish member of the British parliament.

1861: President Abraham Lincoln (16th President of the United States from 1860 till his assassination in 1865) approaches the big banks in New York to try to obtain loans to support the ongoing American civil war. As these large banks were heavily under the influence of the Rothschilds, they offer him a deal they know he cannot accept, 24% to 36% interest on all monies loaned.

Lincoln is very angry about this high level of interest and so he prints his own debt free money and informs the public that this is now legal tender for both public and private debts.

1862: By April $449,338,902 worth of Lincoln's debt free money has been printed and distributed. He states of this,

> "We gave the people of this republic the greatest blessing they ever had, their own paper money to pay their own debts."

That same year The Times of London publishes a story containing the following statement,

> "If that mischievous financial policy, which had its origin in the North American Republic, should become indurated down to a fixture, then that government will furnish its own money without cost. It will pay off debts and be without a debt. It will have all the money necessary to carry on its commerce.
> It will become prosperous beyond precedent in the history of civilized governments of the world. The brains and the wealth of all countries will go to North America. That government must be destroyed or it will destroy every monarchy on the globe."

1863: President Abraham Lincoln discovers the Tsar of Russia, Alexander II (1855 – 1881), was having problems with the Rothschilds as well as he was refusing their continual attempts to set up a central bank in Russia. The Tsar then gives President Lincoln some unexpected help.

The Tsar issued orders that if either England or France actively intervened in the American Civil War, and help the South, Russia would consider such action a declaration of war, and take the side of President Lincoln. To show that he wasn't messing about, he sent part of his Pacific Fleet to port in San Francisco and another part to New York.

The Rothschild banking house in Naples, Italy, C. M. de Rothschild e figli, closes following the unification of Italy. The Rothschilds use one of their own in America, John D. Rockefeller, to form an oil business called Standard Oil which eventually takes over all of its competition.

1864: Rothschild, August Belmont, who by now is the Democratic Party's National Chairman, supports General George McClellan as the Democratic nominee to run against President Abraham Lincoln in this year's election. Much to the anger of Belmont, President Lincoln wins the election.

1865: In a statement to Congress, President Abraham Lincoln states,

> "I have two great enemies, the Southern Army in front of me, and the financial institutions in the rear. Of the two, the one in my rear is my greatest foe."

Later that year, on April 14, President Lincoln is assassinated, less than two months before the end of the American Civil War.

Following a brief training period in the Rothschilds London Bank, Jacob Schiff, a Rothschild, born in their house in Frankfurt, arrives in America at the age of 18, with instructions and the finance necessary to buy into a banking house there. The purpose of this was to carry out the following tasks.

1. Gain control of America's money system through the establishment of a central bank.
2. Find desirable men, who for a price, would be willing to serve as stooges for the Illuminati and promote them into high places in the federal government, the Congress, Supreme Court, and all the federal agencies.
3. Create minority group strife throughout the nations, particularly targeting the whites and blacks.
4. Create a movement to destroy religion in the United States, with Christianity as the main target.

Nathaniel de Rothschild becomes Member of Parliament for Aylesbury in Buckinghamshire.

1870: Nathaniel de Rothschild dies.

1871: An American General named, Albert Pike, who had been enticed into the Illuminati by Guissepe Mazzini, completes his military blueprint for three world wars and various revolutions throughout the world, culminating into moving this great conspiracy into its final stage.

The first world war is to be fought for the purpose of destroying the Tsar in Russia,as promised by Nathan Mayer Rothschild in 1815. The Tsar is to be replaced with communism which is to be used to attack religions, predominantly Christianity. The differences between the British and German empires are to be used to forment this war.

The second world war is to be used to forment the controversy between facism and political zionism with the slaughter of Jews in Germany a lynchpin in bringing hatred against the German people. This is designed to destroy fascism (which the Rothschilds created) and increase the power of political zionism. This war is also designed to increase the power of communism to the level that it equalled that of united Christendom.

The third world war is to be played out by stirring up hatred of the Muslim world for the purposes of playing the Islamic world and the political zionists off against one another. Whilst this is going on, the remaining nations would be forced to fight themselves into a state of mental, physical, spiritual and economic exhaustion.

On August 15th of this year, Albert Pike writes a letter (now catalogued in the British Museum) to Guiseppe Mazzini in which he states the following,

> "We shall unleash the nihilists and the atheists and we shall provoke a great social cataclysm which in all its horror will show clearly to all nations the effect of absolute atheism; the origins of savagery and of most bloody turmoil.
> Then everywhere, the people will be forced to defend themselves against > the world minority of the world revolutionaries and will exterminate those destroyers of civilization and the multitudes disillusioned with Christianity whose spirits will be from that moment without direction and leadership and anxious for an ideal, but without knowledge where to send its adoration, will receive the true light through the universal manifestation of the pure doctrine of Lucifer brought finally out into public view.

> A manifestation which will result from a general reactionary movement which will follow the destruction of Christianity and Atheism; both conquered and exterminated at the same time."

Pike, who having been elected as Sovereign Grand Commander of the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry's Southern Jurisdiction in 1859, was the most powerful Freemason in America. He would retain that post for 32 years until his death in 1891. He also published a book on the subject in 1872 entitled, "Morals and Dogma of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry," in which he candidly states the following,

> "LUCIFER, the Light-bearer! Strange and mysterious name to give to the Spirit of Darknesss! Lucifer, the Son of the Morning! Is it he who bears the Light, and with its splendors intolerable blinds feeble, sensual or selfish Souls? Doubt it not!"

1872: Prior to Guiseppe Mazzini's death this year, he makes another revolutionary leader named Adrian Lemmy his successor. Lemmy will be subsequently succeeded by Lenin and Trotsky, then by Stalin. The revolutionary activities of all these men are financed by the Rothschilds.

1873: The loss making Rio Tinto copper mines in Spain, are purchased by a group of foreign financiers including the Rothschilds. These mines represented Europe’s largest source of copper.

1875: On January 1 of this year Jacob Schiff, now Solomon Loeb's son-in-law after marrying his daughter, Teresa, takes control of the banking house, Kuhn, Loeb & Co. He goes on to finance John D. Rockefeller's Standard Oil Company, Edward R. Harriman's Railroad Empire, and Andrew Carnegie's Steel Empire. This is all with Rothschild money.

He then identifies the other largest bankers in America at that time. They are, J.P. Morgan who controls Wall Street, and the Drexels and the Biddles of Philadelphia. All the other financiers, big and little, danced to the music of those three houses. Schiff then gets the European Rothschilds to set up European branches of these three large banks on the understanding that Schiff, and therefore Rothschild, is to be the boss of banking in New York and therefore America.

N M Rothschild & Sons undertake a share issue to raise capital for the first channel tunnel project to link France to England, with half of its capital coming from the Rothschild owned Compagnie du Chemin de Fer du Nord.

This year Lionel De Rothschild also loans Prime Minister Benjamin Disraeli the finance for the British government to purchase the shares in the Suez Canal, from Khedive Said of Egypt. This was done as the Rothschilds needed this access route to be held by a government they controlled, so they could use that government's military to protect their huge business interests in the Middle East.

1876: Otto von Bismarck states,

> "The division of the United States into two federations of equal force was decided long before the civil war by the high financial power of Europe. These bankers were afraid that the United States, if they remained in one block and as one nation, would attain economical and financial independence, which would upset their financial domination over the world.
>
> The voice of the Rothschilds predominated. They foresaw the tremendous booty if they could substitute two feeble democracies, indebted to the financiers, to the vigorous Republic, confident and self-providing.
> Therefore they started their emissaries in order to exploit the question of slavery and thus dig an abyss between the two parts of the Republic."

1879: Lionel de Rothschild dies.

1880: Rothschild agents begin formenting a series of pogroms predominantly in Russia, but also in Poland, Bulgaria and Romania. These pogroms resulted in the slaughter of thousands of innocent Jews, causing approximately 2 million to flee, mainly to New York, but also to Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston and Los Angeles.

The reason these pogroms were initiated, was to create a large Jewish base in America, who when they arrived, would be educated to register as Democrat voters. Some twenty years later, this would result in in a massive Democratic power base in the United States and be used to elect Rothschild front men such as Woodrow Wilson, to the Presidency, to carry out the bidding of the Rothschilds.

1881: President James A. Garfield (The 20th President of the United States who lasted only 100 Days) states two weeks before he is assassinated,

> “Whoever controls the volume of money in our country is absolute master of all industry and commerce…and when you realize that the entire system is very easily controlled, one way or another, by a few powerful men at the top, you will not have to be told how periods of inflation and depression originate.”

Edmond James de Rothschild has a son Maurice de Rothschild.

1883: After 6,000 feet of tunnel in the channel tunnel project being excavated, the British government halt the project citing the fact that it would be a threat to Britain’s security.

1885: Nathaniel Rothschild, son of Lionel De Rothschild, becomes the first Jewish peer and is takes the title of Lord Rothschild.

1886: The French Rothschild bank, de Rothschild Frères obtains substantial amounts of Russia's oil fields and forms the Caspian and Black Sea Petroleum Company, which quickly becomes the world's second largest oil producer.

1887: Opium trafficker in China, Edward Albert Sassoon, marries Aline Caroline de Rothschild, the grand-daughter of Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild. Aline Caroline's father, Gustave, together with his brother, Alphonse, took over the Rothschild's french arm following their father Jacob's death.

The Rothschilds finance the amalgamation of the Kimberley diamond mines in South Africa. They subsequently become the biggest shareholders of this company, De Beers, and mine precious stones in Africa and India.

1888: Noémie Halphen, future wife of Maurice de Rothschild born.

1891: The British Labour Leader makes the following statement on the subject of the Rothschilds,

> "This blood-sucking crew has been the cause of untold mischief and misery in Europe during the present century, and has piled up its prodigious wealth chiefly through fomenting wars between States which ought never to have quarrelled.
> Whenever there is trouble in Europe, wherever rumours of war circulate and men's minds are distraught with fear of change and calamity you may be sure that a hook-nosed Rothschild is at his games somewhere near the region of the disturbance."

Comments like this worry the Rothschilds and towards the end of the 1800's they purchase Reuters news agency so they can have some control of the media.

1895: Edmond James de Rothschild the youngest son of Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild visits Palestine and subsequently supplies the funds to found the first Jewish colonies there, this is to further their long term objective of creating a Rothschild owned country.

1897: The Rothschilds found the Zionist Congress to promote Zionism (a political movement with the sole aim of moving all Jews into a singularly Jewish nation state) and arrange its first meeting in Munich. However due to extreme opposition from local Jews, who are quite happy where they are, this meeting has to be moved to Basle, Switzerland and takes place on 29 August. The meeting is chaired by Ashkenazi Jew, Theodor Herzl, who would state in his diaries,

> "It is essential that the sufferings of Jews….become worse….this will assist in realization of our plans….I have an excellent idea….I shall induce anti-Semites to liquidate Jewish wealth….The anti-Semites will assist us thereby in that they will strengthen the persecution and oppression of Jews. The anti-Semites shall be our best friends."

Herzl is subsequently elected President of the Zionist Organisation which adopts the, "Rothschild Red Hexagram or Sign," as the Zionist flag which 51 years later will end up as the flag of Israel.

Edward Henry Harriman becomes a director of the Union Pacific Railroad and goes on to take control of the Southern Pacific Railroad. This is all financed by the Rothschilds.

1898: Ferdinand de Rothschild dies.

1901: The Jews from the colonies set up in Palestine by Edmond James de Rothschild, send a delegation to him which tell him,

> "If you wish to save the Yishuv (The Jewish settlement) first take your hands from it, and…for once permit the colonists to have the possibility of correcting for themselves what needs correcting."

Edmond James de Rothschild is very angry about this and states,

> "I created the Yishuv, I alone. Therefore no men, neither colonists nor organisations have the right to interfere in my plans."

The Rothschild banking house in Frankfurt, Germany, M. A. von Rothschild und Söhne, closes as there is no male Rothschild heir to take it on.

1902: Philippe de Rothschild born.

1905: A group of Rothschild backed Zionist Jews led by Georgi Apollonovich Gapon attempt to overthrow the Tsar in Russia in a Communist Coup. They fail and are forced to flee Russia only to be given refuge in Germany.

The Jewish Encyclopaedia (Vol. 2, p.497) states,

> "It is a somewhat curious sequel to the attempt to set up a Catholic competitor to the Rothschilds that at the present time the latter are the guardians of the papal treasure."

1906: The Rothschilds claim that due to growing instability in the region and increasing competition from Rockefeller (the Rockefeller family are Rothschild descendants through a female bloodline) owned Standard Oil, this is why they sell their Caspian and Black Sea Petroleum Company to Royal Dutch and Shell. This is another example of the Rothschilds trying to hide their true wealth.

1907: Rothschild, Jacob Schiff, the head of Kuhn, Loeb and Co., in a speech to the New York Chamber of Commerce, warns that,

> "Unless we have a Central Bank with adequate control of credit resources, this country is going to undergo the most severe and far reaching money panic in its history."

Suddenly America finds itself in the middle of another typical run of the mill Rothschild engineered financial crisis, which ruins as usual ruins the lives of millions of innocent people throughout America and makes billions for the Rothschilds.

1909: Jacob Schiff founds the National Advancement for the Association of the Coloured People (NAACP). This was done to incite black people into roiting, looting and other forms of disorder, in order to cause a rift between the black and white communities. Jewish historian, Howard Sachar, states the following in his book, "A History of the Jews in America,"

> "In 1914, Professor Emeritus Joel Spingarn of Columbia University > became chairman of the NAACP and recruited for its board such Jewish leaders as Jacob Schiff, Jacob Billikopf, and Rabbi Stephen Wise."

Other Ashkenazi Jew co-founders included Julius Rosenthal, Lillian Wald and Rabbi Emil G. Hirsch. It was not until 1920 that the NAACP appointed its first black president, James Weldon Johnson.

Maurice de Rothschild marries Ashkenazi Jew, Noémie Halphen.

1911: Werner Sombart, in his book, "The Jews and Modern Capitalism," stated that from 1820 on, it was the,

> "Age of the Rothschild," and concluded that there was, "Only one power in Europe, and that is Rothschild."

1912: In the December issue of, "Truth," magazine, George R. Conroy states of banker Jacob Schiff,

> "Mr Schiff is head of the great private banking house of Kuhn, Loeb, and co, which represents the Rothschilds interests on this side of the Atlantic.
>
> He has been described as financial strategist and has been for years the financial minister of the great impersonal power known as Standard Oil.
> He was hand in glove with the Harrimans, the Goulds, and the Rockefellers in all their railroad enterprises and has become the dominant power in the railroad and financial power of America."

1913: On March 4, Woodrow Wilson is elected the 28th President of the United States. Shortly after he is inaugurated, he is visited in the White House by Ashkenazi Jew, Samuel Untermyer, of law firm, Guggenheim, Untermyer, and Marshall, who tries to blackmail him for the sum of $40,000 in relation to an affair Wilson had whilst he was a professor at Princeton University, with a fellow professor's wife.

President Wilson does not have the money, so Untermyer volunteers to pay the $40,000 out of his own pocket to the woman Wilson had had the affair with, on the condition that Wilson promise to appoint to the first vacancy on the United States Supreme Court a nominee to be recommended to President Wilson by Untermyer. Wilson agrees to this.

Jacob Schiff sets up the Anti Defamation League (ADL) in the United States. This organisation is formed to slander anyone who questions or challenges the Rothschild global conspiracy as, "anti-semitic."

Strangely enough, the same year that they do this they also set up their last and current central bank in America, the Federal Reserve. Congressman Charles Lindbergh stated following the passing of the Federal Reserve Act on December 23,

> "The Act establishes the most gigantic trust on earth. When the President signs this Bill, the invisible government of the monetary power will be legalized.....The greatest crime of the ages is perpetrated by this banking and currency bill."

It is important to note that the Federal Reserve is a private company, it is neither Federal nor does it have any Reserve. It is conservatively estimated that profits exceed $150 billion per year and the Federal Reserve has never once in its history published accounts.

1914: The start of World War I. In this war, the German Rothschilds loan money to the Germans, the British Rothschilds loan money to the British, and the French Rothschilds loan money to the French.

Futhermore, the Rothschilds have control of the three European news agencies, Wolff (est. 1849) in Germany, Reuters (est. 1851) in England, and Havas (est. 1835) in France.

The Rothschilds use Wolff to manipulate the German people into a fervour for war. From around this time, the Rothschilds are rarely reported in the media, because they own the media.

1916: On June 4, Ashkenazi Jew, Louis Dembitz Brandeis is appointed to the Supreme Court of the United States by President Wilson as per his agreed blackmail payment to Samuel Untermyer some three years earlier. Justice Brandeis is also the elected leader of the Executive Committee for Zionist Affairs, a position he has held since 1914.

The middle of World War II. Germany were winning the war as they were being financed by the Rothschilds to a greater extent than France, Italy and England, because Rothschilds, did not want to support the Tsar in Russia, and of course Russia was on the same side as France, Italy and England.

Then a significant event occurred. Germany, although they were winning the war and not one foreign soldier had set foot on their soil, offered armistice to Britain with no requirement of reparations. The Rothschilds were anxious to make sure this didn't happen as they were expecting to make far more money off this war, so they played another card they had up their sleeve.

Whilst the British were considering Germany's offer, Rothschild agent Louis Brandeis sends a Zionist delegation from America to Britain to promise to bring America into the war on the side of the British, provided the British agree to give the land of Palestine to the Rothschilds.

The Rothschilds wanted Palestine for the following reason. They had great business interests in the far east and desired their own state in that area along with their own military which they could use as an aggressor to any state that threatened those interests.

The British subsequently agree to the deal for Palestine and the Zionists in London contact their counterparts in America and inform them of this fact. Suddenly all the major newspapers in America that up to that point had been pro-German turned on Germany running propaganda pieces such as: German soldiers were killing Red Cross Nurses; German soldiers were cutting off babies hands, etc, in order to manipulate the American public against the Germans.

This same year, President Woodrow Wilson, ran a re-election campaign under the slogan, "Re-Elect The Man Who Will Keep Your Sons Out Of The War."

On December 12, Germany and her allies offer peace terms to end the war.

1917: As a result of Germany's offer of peace the Rothschild war machine goes into overdrive in America, spreading propaganda which leads to President Wilson under the instructions of American Zionist leader and Supreme Court Justice, Louis Dembitz Brandeis, reneging on his promise to the electorate and taking America into the first world war on April 6.

As per the Rothschild Zionist promise to the British, to take America into the war, they decide they want something in writing from the British to prove that they will uphold their side of the bargain. The British Foreign Secretary, Arthur James Balfour therefore drafts a letter which is commonly known as the, "Balfour Declaration," which is reprinted below.

> Foreign Office
> November 2nd, 1917
>
> Dear Lord Rothschild,
>
> I have much pleasure in conveying to you, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, the following declaration of sympathy with Jewish Zionist aspirations which has been submitted to, and approved by, the Cabinet.
>
> His Majesty's Government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavours to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.
>
> I should be grateful if you would bring this declaration to the knowledge of the Zionist Federation.
>
> Yours sincerely,
> Arthur James Balfour

The Rothschilds order the execution by the Bolsheviks they control, of Tsar Nicholas II and his entire family in Russia, even though the Tsar had already abdicated on March 2. This is both to get control of the country and an act of revenge for Tsar Alexander I blocking their world government plan in 1815 at the Congress Of Vienna, and Tsar Alexander II siding with President Abraham Lincoln in 1864.

It is extremely important for them to slaughter the entire family including women and children in order to make good on the promise to do so made by Nathan Mayer Rothschild in 1815. It is designed to show the world what happens if you ever attempt to cross the Rothschilds.

U.S. Congressman Oscar Callaway informs Congress that J. P. Morgan is a Rothschild front and has taken control of the American media industry. He states,

> "In March, 1915, the J.P. Morgan interests, the steel, shipbuilding, and > powder interest, and their subsidiary organizations, got together 12 men high up in the newspaper world and employed them to select the most influential newspapers in the United States and sufficient number of them to control generally the policy of the daily press...

> ...They found it was only necessary to purchase the control of 25 of the greatest papers...An agreement was reached. The policy of the papers was bought, to be paid for by the month, an editor was furnished for each paper to properly supervise and edit information regarding the questions of preparedness, militarism, financial policies, and other things of national and international nature considered vital to the interests of the purchasers."

1919: In January, Ashkenazi Jews, Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg, are killed as they attempt to lead another Rothschild funded Communist coup, this time in Berlin, Germany.

The Versailles peace conference is held to decide reparations that the Germans need to pay to the victors following the end of the first world war. A delegation of 117 Zionists headed up by Ashkenazi Jew, Bernard Baruch, bring up the subject of the promise of Palestine for them. At this point the Germans realised why America had turned on them and under whose influence, the Rothschilds.

The Germans, naturally, felt they had been betrayed by the Zionists. This is because, at the time the Rothschilds made their deal with Britain for Palestine, in exchange for bringing America into the war, Germany was the most friendly country in the world towards the Jews, indeed the German Emancipation Edict of 1822 guaranteed Jews in Germany all civil rights enjoyed by Germans.

Also, Germany was the only country in Europe which did not place restrictions on Jews, even giving them refuge when they had to flee from Russia after their first attempted Communist coup failed there in 1905.

Nevertheless, the Rothschilds had held up their side of the bargain to spill the blood of millions of innocents and as a result, Palestine is confirmed as a Jewish homeland, and whilst its handover to the Rothschilds takes place it is to remain under the control of Britain as the Rothschilds control Britain. At that time less than one percent of the population of Palestine was Jewish. Interestingly, the host of the Versailles peace conference is its boss, Baron Edmond de Rothschild.

The Versailles peace conference is also used as an attempt by the Rothschilds to set up a world government under the pretext of ending all wars (which they create). This was called the, "League of Nations." Fortunately not enough countries accepted it and so it soon died.

On March 29th The Times of London reports on the Bolsheviks in Russia,

> "One of the curious features of the Bolshevist movement is the high percentage of non Russian elements among its leaders. Of the twenty or thirty commissaries, or leaders, who provide the central machinery of the Bolshevist movement, not less than 75% were Jews."

It is reported that the Rothschilds were angry with the Russians because they were not prepared to allow them to form a central bank within their nation. They therefore gathered groups of Jewish spies and sent them into Russia to drum up a revolution for the benefit of the common man, which was actually a takeover of Russia by a Rothschild controlled satanic elite.

These Jewish spies were, in age old deceptive Ashkenazi tradition, given Russian names, for example Trotsky was a member of the first group and his original name was Bronstein. These groups were sent to areas throughout Russia to incite riots and rebellion.

The Jewish Post International Edition, week ending January 24th 1991, confirms Vladimir Lenin was Jewish. Lenin is also on record as having stated,

> "The establishment of a central bank is 90% of communizing a nation."

These Jewish, Rothschild funded Bolsheviks would go on in the course of history to slaughter 60 million Christians and Non-Jews in Soviet controlled territory. Indeed the author Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn in his work, "Gulag Archipelago, Vol 2," affirms that Zionist Jews created and administered the organized Soviet concentration camp system in which these tens of millions of Christians and Non-Jews died.

On page 79 of this book he even names the administrators of this the greatest killing machine in the history of the world. They are Aron Solts, Yakov Rappoport, Lazar Kogan, Matvei Berman, Genrikh Yagoda, and Naftaly Frenkel. All six are Zionist Jews. In 1970 Solzhenitsyn would be awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for literature.

N. M. Rothschild & Sons' are given a permanent role to fix the world's daily gold price. This takes place in the City of London offices, daily at 1100 hours, in the same room until 2004.

1920: Winston Churchill (whose mother, Jenny (Jacobson) Jerome, was Jewish – meaning he is Jewish under Ashkenazi law as he was born of a Jewish mother) writes in an article in the Illustrated Sunday Herald, dated February 8th,

> "From the days of Illuminati leader Weishaupt, to those of Karl Marx, to those of Trotsky, this worldwide conspiracy has been steadily growing.
> And now at last this band of extraordinary personalities from the underworld of the great cities of Europe and America, have gripped the Russian people by the hair of their heads and become the undisputed masters of that enormous empire."

1921: Under the orders of Jacob Schiff the Council on Foreign Relations (CFR) is founded by Ashkenazi Jews, Bernard Baruch and Colonel Edward Mandell House. Schiff gave his orders prior to his death in 1920, as he knew an organisation in America needed to be set up to select politicians to carry on the Rothschild conspiracy,and the formation of the CFR was actually agreed in a meeting on May 30, 1919 at the Hotel Majestic in Paris, France.

The CFR membership at the start was approximately 1000 people in the United States. This membership included the heads of virtually every industrial empire in America, all the American based international bankers, and the heads of all their tax free foundations. In essence all those people who would provide the capital required for anyone who wished to run for Congress, the Senate or the Presidency.

The first job of the CFR was to gain control of the press. This task was given to John D. Rockefeller who set up a number of national news magazines such as Life, and Time. He financed Samuel Newhouse to buy up and establish a chain of newspapers all across the country, and Eugene Meyer also who would go on to buy up many publications such as the Washington Post, Newsweek, ant The Weekly Magazine.

The CFR also needed to gate control of radio, television and the motion picture industry. This task was split amongst the international bankers from, Kuhn Loeb, Goldman Sachs, the Warburgs, and the Lehmanns.

1925: This year's Jewish Encyclopaedia, states of the existence of Ashkenazi Jews (who represent approximately 90% of so-called world Jewry), with the startling admission that the so called enemy of the Jews, Esau (also known as Edom, see Genesis 36:1), now actually represents the Jewish race, when on page 42 of Volume V it is stated,

> "Edom is in modern Jewry."

So what they're basically saying is that these Ashkenazi Jews, who represent 90% of the so-called Jewish population, are actually gentiles or goyim themselves.

1926: N. M. Rothschild & Sons refinance the Underground Electric Railways Company of London Ltd which has a controlling interest in the entire London Underground transport system.

Maurice de Rothschild has a son, Edmond de Rothschild.

1929: The Rothschilds crash the United States economy by contracting the money supply.

1930: The first Rothschild world bank, the, "Bank for International Settlements (BIS)," is established in Basle, Switzerland. The same place as where 33 years earlier the first ever World Zionist Congress was held.

1933: On January 30, Adolf Hitler becomes Chancellor of Germany. He drives Jews, many of which were Communist out of Governmental positions within Germany. As a result of this, in July, the Jews hold a World Conference in Amsterdam during which they demand that Hitler re-instate every Jew back to his former position.

Hitler refuses and as a result of this, Samuel Untermyer, the Ashkenazi Jew who blackmailed President Wilson,and is now the head of the American delegation and the president of the whole conference, returns to the United States, and makes a speech on radio which was transcribed in the From the New York Times, Monday, August 7, 1933. In the speech he made the following statements,

> "...the Jews are the aristocrats of the world...Our campaign is...the economic boycott against all German goods, shipping and services...What we are proposing...is to prosecute a purely defensive economic boycott that will undermine the Hitler regime and bring the German people to their senses by destroying their export trade on which their very existence depends...

> ...Each of you, Jew and Gentile alike...must refuse to deal with any merchant or shopkeeper who sells any German-made goods or who patronizes German ships or shipping."

As two thirds of Germany's food supply had to be imported, and could only be imported with the proceeds of what they exported, if Germany could not export, two thirds of Germany's population would starve, as there would be not enough food for more than one third of the population.

As a result of this boycott, Jews throughout America, would protest outside and damage any stores in which they found any products with, "Made in Germany," printed on them, causing stores to have to dump these products or risk bankruptcy.

Once the effects of this boycott began to be felt in Germany, the Germans, who had demonstrated no violence towards the Jews up to this point, simply began boycotting Jewish stores in the same way the Jews had done to stores selling German products in America.

Rothschild financed IBM, supply machines to the Nazis which produce punch cards to help organize and manage the initial identification and social expulsion of Jews, the confiscation of their property and their extermination.

On November 16, President Roosevelt recognizes the Zionist regime of Stalin in Russia without consultation with Congress even as 8,000 Ukrainians march in protest in New York.

Also this year, President Roosevelt, born of a Jewish mother, therefore satisfying Ashkenazi rules of being Jewish, orders the all-seeing eye to be placed upon all new dollar bills along with the motto, "Novus Ordo Seclorum." This is latin for, "A New Order of the Ages."

1934: Swiss banking secrecy laws are reformed and it becomes an offence resulting in imprisonment for any bank employee to violate bank secrecy. This is all in preparation for the Rothschild engineered Second World War in which as usual they will fund both sides.

Edmond de Rothschild dies.

1936: With regard to the increase in anti-semitism in Germany, Samuel Landman (at the time, secretary to the World Zionist Organisation), in his 1936 book, Great Britain, The Jews, and Palestine states the following of the United States entry into World War 1,

> "The fact that it was Jewish help that brought USA into the War on the side of the Allies has rankled ever since in German – especially Nazi – minds, and has contributed in no small measure to the prominence which anti-Semitism occupies in the Nazi programme."

1938: On 7th November, a Jew, Herschel Grynszpan, assassinated Ernst vom Rath, a minor official at the German Embassy in Paris. As a result of this German hostility towards Jews in Germany started to turn violent.

The Rothschilds Austrian banking house in Vienna, S. M. von Rothschild und Söhne, closes following the Nazi occupation of Austria.

1939: I.G. Farben the leading producer of chemicals in the world and largest German producer of steel dramatically increases its production. This increased production is almost exclusively used to arm Germany for the Second World War. This company was controlled by the Rothschilds and would go on to use Jews and other disaffected peoples as slave labour in the concentration camps. I.G. Farben also created the lethal Zyklon B gas that was used to exterminate the Jews.

On 1 September, the Second world war starts when Germany invades Poland. This was because the German leadership were a Christian leadership, who understood that Soviet Russia was led by Rothschild funded Communists, and they feared that as the Soviet Union grew in strength, these Jewish Communists would invade and wipe all the Christians off the map.

1940: Hansjurgen Koehler in his book, "Inside The Gestapo," states the following, of Maria Anna Schicklgruber, Adolf Hitler's grandmother,

> "A little servant girl…….came to Vienna and became a domestic servant…….at the Rothschild mansion…….and Hitler's unknown grandfather must be probably looked for in this magnificent house."

This is backed up by Walter Langer in his book, "The Mind Of Hitler," in which he states,

> "Adolf's father, Alois Hitler, was the illegitimate son of Maria Anna Schicklgruber…….Maria Anna Schicklgruber was living in Vienna at the time she conceived. At that time she was employed as a servant in the home of Baron Rothschild. As soon as the family discovered her pregnancy she was sent back home…….where Alois was born."

On the surface, it would appear Hitler was unlikely to be a Rothschild, but then again, when you discover the benefits that the Rothschilds got out of this war, both financially and politically, a Rothschild connection does not appear as outlandish as it may initially seem.

1941: President Roosevelt takes America into the second world war by refusing to sell Japan any more steel scrap or oil. Japan was in the midst of a war against China and without that scrap steel and oil, Japan would be unable to continue that war. Japan was totally dependent upon the United States for both steel scrap and oil. Roosevelt knew this action would provoke the Japanese to attack America, which they subsequently did at Pearl Harbor.

1942: Prescott Bush, father of future American Presidents' George Herbert Walker and George W, has his company seized under the, "Trading With The Enemy," Act. He was funding Hitler from America, whilst American soldiers were being killed by German soldiers.

Jews are also being slaughtered by these same soldiers. Interestingly the ADL never criticizes any of the Bushes for this.

1943: February 18th, Zionist, Izaak Greenbaum, head of the Jewish Agency Rescue

Committee, in a speech to the Zionist Executive Council states,

> "If I am asked, could you give from the UJA (United Jewish Appeal) monies to rescue Jews, I say, no and I say again no!"

He would go onto state,

> "One cow in Palestine is worth more than all the Jews in Poland!"

This is not a surprise, the whole idea of Zionist support for the slaughter of innocent Jews was to scare the survivors into believing that their only place of safety was Israel. How else do you think the Zionists could ensure Jews leave the beautiful European cities in which they live, in order to settle in a desert!

1944: On 6 November Lord Moyne, British Minister Resident in the Middle East was assassinated in Cairo by two members of the Jewish terrorist group, the Stern Gang, led by future Prime Minister of Israel, Yitzhak Shamir. He is also responsible for an assassination attempt against Harold MacMichael, the High Commissioner of the British Mandate of Palestine, this same year.

Interestingly he also masterminds another successful assassination this year against the United Nations representative in the Middle East, Count Folke Bernadotte who, although he had secured the release of 21,000 prisoners from German camps during World War II, was seen by Yitzak Shamir and his terrorist collaborators as an anti-Zionist.

In Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, two further Rothschild world banks are created. The International Monetary Fund (IMF), and the World Bank.

1945: The end of the Second World War. It is reported that I.G. Farben plants were specifically not targeted in the bombing raids on Germany. Interestingly at the end of the war, they were found to have only sustained 15% damage.

The tribunals held at the end of the Second World War, to investigate Nazi War Crimes, censored any materials recording Western assistance to Hitler.

The Rothschilds take a giant step towards their goal of world domination when the second, "League of Nations," called the, "United Nations," was approved this year.

1946: On July 22 the future Prime Minister of Israel, Ashkenazi Jew, David Ben-Gurion, orders another future Prime Minister of Israel, Ashkenazi Jew, Menachem Begin, to carry out a terrorist attack on the King David Hotel in Palestine, to try and drive out the British. As a result of this 91 people were killed, most of them civilians: 28 British, 41 Arabs, 17 Jews, and 5 others. Around 45 people are injured.

Menachem Begin went on to proudly proclaimed himself as, "the father of modern terrorism." Just to put the gravity of the attack on the King David Hotel into perspective, it was at the time the biggest death toll as a result of single terrorist action ever and was only surpassed over forty years later by the Bombing of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie.

1947: The British who prior to World War 2 declared that there would be no more immigration of Jews to Palestine in order to protect the Palestinians from their acts of terror against both them and British soldiers, transfer control of Palestine to the United Nations. The United Nations resolve to have Palestine partitioned into two states, one zionist and one arab, with Jerusalem to remain as an international zone to be enjoyed by all religious faiths.

This transfer was scheduled to take place on May 15, 1948. The United Nations had no right to give Arab property to anyone, as indeed even thought the Jews owned 6% of Palestine at that time, resolution 181 granted the Jews 57% of the land leaving the Arabs who at that time had 94% with only 43%.

Information collected by the ADL in its spy operations on US citizens is used by the House Select Committee on Unamerican Activities. Subcommittee Chair Clare Hoffman dismisses the ADL's reports on suspected communists as "hearsay."

1948: In the Spring of this year, the Rothschilds bribe President Harry S. Truman (33rd President of the United States 1945 – 1953) to recognise Israel (Rothschild owned Zionist not Jewish territory) as a sovereign state with $2,000,000 which they give to him on his campaign train.

They then declare Israel to be a sovereign Jewish state in Palestine and within half an hour President Truman declared the United States to be the first foreign nation to recognise it.

The Flag of Israel is unveiled. Despite tremendous opposition the emblem on the flag is a blue coloured version of the Rothschild, "Red Hexagram or Sign."

This angers many Jews who realise this Hexagram was used in the ancient mystery religions as the symbol of, "Moloch," (described as a demon of unwilling sacrifice and is also interestingly the name of the stone owl the elite worship at Bohemian Grove), and, "Astaroth," (described as the Lord Treasurer of Hell).

The Hexagram was also used to represent Saturn, which has been identified as the esoteric name for, "Satan." This indicates that anyone killed in the name of Israel is actually a sacrifice to Satan. These dissenting Jews believe the, "Menorah," the oldest Jewish symbol should be used and pointed out that the Hexagram is not even a Jewish symbol, but of course as the Rothschild Zionists use it that is what ends up on the Rothschild, I mean Zionist, I mean Israeli flag.

In the early hours of April 19, 132 Jewish terrorists from the Irgun gang, led by future Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin, and the Stern gang, led by future Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, brutally massacre 200 men, women and children as they are sleeping peacefully in the Arab village of Deir Yassin.

Following the United Nations transfer of Palestine to an independent Jewish state and an independent Arab state on May 15, the Israelis launched a military assault on the Arabs with blaring loudspeakers on their trucks informing the Arabs that if they did not flee immediately, they would be slaughtered.

800,000 Arabs with the recent memory of the Deir Yassin massacre at the forefront of their minds, fled in panic. They asked for help from nighbouring Arab states, but those states did not get involved as they were no match for the Israelis whose up to date military hardware had been supplied by the Jewish Stalinist regime in Russia. Following this assault, the Jews now controlled 78% of the former Palestine as oppose to the 57% that had been given to them illegally by the United Nations.

The Palestinians, many of them Christians, were never paid compensation for their homes, property and businesses stolen from them during this illegal Jewish assault, and these people ended up in slum refugee cities of tents. Futhermore at least half of the Palestinians in their hurry to flee, left their birth certificates behind. The State of Israel then passed a law that only those who could prove citizenship were allowed to return to Israel, thus meaning these 400,000 Palestinians could not return and lost all their property they had left there.

Ashkenazi Jew, David Ben-Gurion, one of the father founders of Israel and its first Prime Minister, candidly describes Zionist aims in his diary (21 May 1948) as follows,

> "The Achilles heel of the Arab coalition is the Lebanon. Muslim supremacy in this country is artificial and can easily be overthrown. A Christian State ought to be set up there, with its southern frontier on the river Litani.
>
> We would sign a treaty of alliance with this State. Thus when we have broken the strength of the Arab Legion and bombed Amman, we could wipe out Trans-Jordan, after that Syria would fall. And if Egypt still dared to make war on us, we would bomb Port Said, Alexandria and Cairo.
> We should thus end the war and would have but paid to Egypt, Assyria and Chaldea on behalf of our ancestors."

1949: On October 1, Mao Tse Tsung declares the founding of the People's Republic Of China in Tiananmen Square, Beijing. He is funded by Rothschild created Communism in Russia and also the following Rothschild agents: Solomon Adler, a former United States Treasury official who was a Soviet Spy; Israel Epstein, the son of a Jewish Bolshevik imprisoned by the Tsar in Russia for trying to forment a revolution there; and Frank Coe, a leading official of the Rothschild owned IMF.

1950: Israel passes their law of return, guaranteeing every Jew worldwide the right to dwell in the state of Israel, however the Palestinians even though they had lived there for 1300 years, were denied that right.

John Davitt, former chief of the Justice Department's internal security section notes that the Israeli intelligence service is the second most active in the United States after the Soviets and of course both Israel and the Soviet Union are run by an Ashkenazi Jewish leadership.

1951: On 1 April the Israeli Secret Intelligence Agency the Mossad, which will go on to terrorize the world, is formed. The motto of the Mossad is probably the most disgusting secret service motto in the world, it is,

"By Way Of Deception,
Thou Shalt Do War."

1953: N. M. Rothschild & Sons found the British Newfoundland Corporation Limited to develop 60,000 square miles of land in Newfoundland, Canada, which comprised a power station to harness the power of the Hamilton (later renamed Churchill) Falls. At the time this was the largest construction project ever to be undertaken by a private company.

1954: "The Lavon Affair." Israeli agents recruit Egyptian citizens of Jewish descent to bomb Western targets in Egypt, and plant evidence to frame Arabs, in an apparent attempt to upset American/Egyptian relations. Israeli defense minister, Ashkenazi Jew, Pinhas Lavon is eventually removed from office, though many think real responsibility lay with David Ben-Gurion.

A hidden microphone planted by the Israelis is discovered in the Office of the US Ambassador in Tel Aviv.

1955: Edmond de Rothschild founds Compagnie Financiere, Paris.

1956: Telephone taps are found connected to two telephones in the residence of the US military attaché in Tel Aviv.

1957: James de Rothschild dies and it is reported (by the Rothschild owned media) that he bequeaths a large sum of money to the state of Israel to pay for the construction of their parliament building, the Knesset. He states that the Knesset should be,

> "a symbol, in the eyes of all men, of the permanence of the State of Israel."

On page 219 of his book, "Tales of the British Aristocracy," L.G. Pine, the Editor of Burke's Peerage, states that the Jews,

> "have made themselves so closely connected with the British peerage that the two classes are unlikely to suffer loss which is not mutual. So closely linked are the Jews and the lords that a blow against the Jews in this country would not be possible without injuring the aristocracy also."

Maurice de Rothschild dies in Paris.

1962: de Rothschild Frères establishes Imétal as an umbrella company for all their mineral mining interests.

Frederic Morton publishes his book, The Rothschilds, in which he states,

> "Though they control scores of industrial, commercial, mining and tourist corporations, not one bears the name Rothschild. Being private partnerships, the family houses never need to, and never do, publish a single public balance sheet, or any other report of their financial condition."

This attitude reveals the true aim of the Rothschilds, to eliminate all competition and create their own worldwide monopoly.

1963: On June 4th President John F. Kennedy (the 35th President of the United States 1961 – 1963) signs Executive Order 11110 which returned to the U.S. government the power to issue currency, without going through the Rosthchilds owned Federal Reserve.

Less than 6 months later on November 22nd , president Kennedy is assassinated by the Rothschilds for the same reason as they assassinated President Abraham Lincoln in 1865, he wanted to print American money for the American people, as oppose to for the benefit of a money grabbing war mongering foreign elite.

This Executive Order 11110, is rescinded by President Lyndon Baines Johnson (the 36th President of the United States 1963 to 1969) on Air Force One from Dallas to Washington, the same day as President Kennedy was assassinated.

Another, and probably the primary, reason for Kennedy's assassination is however, the fact that he made it quite clear to Israeli Prime Minister, David Ben-Gurion, that under no circumstances would he agree to Israel becoming a nuclear state. The Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz on February 5, 1999, in a review of, Avner Cohen's book, "Israel and the Bomb," states the following,

> "The murder of American President John F. Kennedy brought to an abrupt end the massive pressure being applied by the U.S. administration on the government of Israel to discontinue the nuclear program...The book implied that, had Kennedy remained alive, it is doubtful whether Israel would today have a nuclear option."

Edmond de Rothschild establishes La Compagnie Financière Edmond de Rothschild (LCF), in Switzerland as a venture capital house. This later develops into an investment bank and asset management company with many affiliates. He also marries his wife Nadine and they have a son, Benjamin de Rothschild.

1965: Israel illegally obtains enriched uranium from NUMEC (Nuclear Materials and Equipment Corporation).

1967: The treatment of the Palestinians by the Zionist Jews, finally ignites enough anger in the Arab world for Egypt, Jordan and Syria to mobilise on Israel's borders. All of these three countries are suddenly attacked by Israel and as a result the Sinai which included Gaza was stolen from Egypt, and the West Bank and the Jordan River stolen from Jordan.

As a result of this, on June 8, the Israelis launch an attack on the USS Liberty with Israeli aircraft and motor torpedo boats, in an effort to blame it on Egypt, to bring America into the war on their side, and of course follow to the letter, their Mossad motto,

"By Way Of Deception,
Thou Shalt Do War."

As a result of their attack, 34 American servicemen were killed and 174 wounded. Israel lies as usual, claiming it mistook this warship that was flying a large United States flag, for an ancient out-of-service Egyptian horse carrier El Quseir, that was 180 feet shorter. They also claim the ship was in the war zone, when it was actually in international waters, far from any fighting. The Israeli's attack on this warship lasts for 75 minutes during which time they shoot up one of the United States flags, resulting in the sailors desperately raising another one.

In the aftermath of this attack, the American sailors who survived are warned by the United States military not to discuss the matter with anyone due to, "national security." This story gets no prominence in the Rothschild controlled mainstream media and as usual Israel is in no way even rebuked for their crimes by their subservient country of America.

The following day, June 9th, Israel illegally occupies the Golan Heights which it seizes from Syria. This area goes on to provide Israel with one third of its fresh water.

Israeli General Matityahu Peled, is quoted in Ha'aretz (19 March 1972) with the following statement,

> "The thesis that the danger of genocide was hanging over us in June 1967 and that Israel was fighting for its physical existence is only bluff, which was born and developed after the war." Another sickening and deceptive statement but again at least he's consistent with the Mossad motto, "By Way Of Deception, Thou Shalt Do War."

de Rothschild Frères is renamed Banque Rothschild.

1968: Noémie Halphen, wife of Maurice de Rothschild dies.

1970: While working for Senator Henry “Scoop” Jackson, Ashkenazi Jew, Richard Perle is caught by the FBI giving classified information to Israel. Nothing is done.

British Prime Minister Edward Heath makes Lord Victor Rothschild the head of his policy unit. Whilst he is in that role Britain enters the European Community.

1973: In his book, None Dare Call It Conspiracy, Gary Allen states,

> "One major reason for the historical blackout on the role of the international bankers in political history is the Rothschilds were Jewish…
>
> ….The Jewish members of the conspiracy have used an organisation called The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) as an instrument to try and convince everyone that any mention of the Rothschilds and their allies is an attack on all Jews.
>
> In this way they have stifled almost all honest scholarship on international bankers and made the subject taboo within universities.
>
> Any individual or book exploring this subject is immediately attacked by hundreds of ADL communities all over the country. The ADL has never let the truth or logic interfere with its highly professional smear jobs…
>
> ….Actually, nobody has a right to be more angry at the Rothschild clique than their fellow Jews…
> ….The Rothschild empire helped finance Adolf Hitler.""

George J. Laurer an employee of the Rothschilds controlled IBM, invents the UPC (Universal Product Code) barcode which will eventually be placed upon every item traded worldwide and bear the number, 666. The Book of Revelation, Chapter 13, Verse 17 through 18, states the following in relation to this number,

> "And that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name.
> Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man; and his number is Six hundred threescore and six."

The whole Satanic aims of the Rothschilds are now in full view of the world, everything bought or sold carries the mark of the beast, 666.

N. M. Rothschild & Sons British Newfoundland Corporation, Churchill Falls project in Newfoundland, Canada, is completed.

N. M. Rothschild & Sons also create a new asset management part of the company which traded worldwide. This eventually became, Rothschild Private Management Limited.

Edmond de Rothschild, a great-grandson of Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild, bought the cru bourgeois estate of Château Clarke in Bordeaux.

1976: Ashkenazi Jew, Harold Rosenthal, aide to Ashkenazi Jew, Senator Jacob Javits, states,

"Most Jews do not like to admit it, but our god is Lucifer."

1978: Ashkenazi Jew, Stephen Bryen, then a Senate Foreign Relations Committee staffer, is overheard in a Washington D.C. hotel offering confidential documents to top Israeli military officials.

Bryen obtains a lawyer, Nathan Lewin, and the case heads for the grand jury, but is mysteriously dropped. Bryen later goes to work for Richard Perle.

1979: The Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty in 1979 was underwritten by United States aid which pledged $3 billion annually to Israel from the United States taxpayer (not even a drop in the ocean when you consider the amount they make off the Federal Reserve).

Shin Bet (the Israeli internal security agency) tries to penetrate the US Consulate General in Jerusalem through a “Honey Trap”, using a clerical employee who was having an affair with a Jerusalem girl.

Baron and Baroness Phillipi de Rothschild in a joint venture with Robert Mondavi, begin the construction of a pyramid in Napa Valley, California, where the leader/founder of the Church Of Satan, Ashkenazi Jew, Anton LaVey, was based. This is known as Opus 1 (which means, the first work), and the front for this temple is that it is a winery.

1980: The global phenomenon of privatisation starts. The Rothschilds are behind this from the very beginning in order to seize control of all publicly owned assets worldwide.

1981: Banque Rothschild is nationalised by the French government. The new bank is called, Compagnie Européenne de Banque. The Rothschilds subsequently set up a successor to this French bank, Rothschild & Cie Banque (RCB), which goes on to become a leading French investment house.

1982: From September 16 to 18, future Prime Minister of Israel and then Defence

Minister, Ashkenazi Jew, Ariel Sharon, orchestrates Israel's invasion of Lebanon, which provided ariel lighting in order to facilitate the killing of between 1000 and 2000 men, women and children in the Sabra and Shatila massacres.

1985: Eustace Mullins publishes, "Who Owns The TV Networks," in which he reveals the Rothschilds have control of all three major U.S. Networks, which are: NBC; CBS; and ABC.

The New York Times reports the FBI is aware of at least a dozen incidents in which American officials transferred classified information to the Israelis, quoting (former Assistant Director of the F.B.I.) Raymond Wannal. The Justice Department does not prosecute.

Richard Smyth, the owner of MILCO, is indicted on charges of smuggling nuclear timing devices to Israel.

N. M. Rothschild & Sons advise the British government on the privatisation of British Gas. They subsequently advise the British government on virtually all of their other privatisations of state owned assets including: British Steel; British Coal; all the British regional electricity boards; and all the British regional water boards.

A British MP heavily involved in these privatisations is future Chancellor of the Exchequer, Norman Lamont, a former Rothschild banker.

1986: Mordechai Vanunu a technician at Dimona, Israel's nuclear installation, from 1976 to 1985, discovers that the plant was secretly producing nuclear weapons.

His conscience made him speak out and in 1986 he provided the London Sunday Times with the facts and photos they used to tell the world about Israel's nuclear weapons programme.

His evidence showed that Israel had stockpiled up to 200 nuclear warheads, with no debate or authorisation from it own citizens. On 30th September 1986, Vanunu was lured from London to Rome. There he was kidnapped, drugged and shipped to Israel.

After a secret trial he was sentenced to 18 years for, "treason," and, "espionage," (something Israel are very familiar with) though he had received no payment and had communicated with no foreign power.

He goes on to be held in complete isolation for 11 years, only allowed occasional visits from his family, lawyer and a priest, conducted through a metal screen. Although he completes his sentence, the Israeli government continues to hold him against his will.

1987: Edmond de Rothschild creates the World Conservation Bank which is designed to transfer debts from third world countries to this bank and in return those countries would give land to this bank. This is designed so the Rothschilds can gain control of the third world which represents 30% of the land surface of the Earth.

On April 24 the Wall Street Journal reveals the, "Role of Israel in Iran-Contra Scandal Won't be Explored in Detail by Panels."

1988: The ADL initiate a nationwide competition for law students to draft anti-hate legislation for minority groups. That competition is won by a man named, Joseph Ribakoff, whose thesis proposes that not only must hate motivated violence be banned, but also any words which stimulate: supiscion; friction; hate; and possible violence, these must also be criminalised.

This ADL prize-winning paper suggests that not only should state-agencies monitor and restrict free speech in general, but they should also censor all films that criticize identifiable groups. Furthermore, even if the person making the statement can justify it, for example Christians criticizing homosexuality because the bible expressly forbids it, Ribakoff asserts that the truth is to be no defence in court.

The only proof a court will need in order to secure a conviction of hate speech is that something has been said, and a minority group or member of such group has felt emotionally damaged as a result of such criticism. Therefore, under these proposals which the ADL will have forced into law all over the world less than 15 years later, Jesus Christ would have been arrested as a hate criminal.

This law is designed to protect the Rothschild conspiracy from being revealed in that if you criticize the Rothschilds criminal cabal, you will be targeted as anti-semitic, and thus risk imprisonment.

Philippe de Rothschild dies.

1989: Many of the satellite states in Eastern Europe, through the influence of Glasnost, become more open in their demands of freedom from Communist governance in their Republics.

Many revolutions happen in 1989, most of them involving the overthrow of their respective Communist governments and the replacement of them with Republics.

Thus, the hold the Communists had over Eastern Europe (the Iron Curtain) becomes very weak. Eventually, as a result of Perestroika and Glasnost, Communism collapses, not only in the Soviet Union but also in Eastern Europe.

In Russia, Boris Yeltsin (whose wife is the daughter of Joseph Stalin's marriage to Rosa Kaganovich) and the Republican government takes steps to end the power of the Communist party by suspending and banning the party and seizing all their property.

This symbolised the fall of Communism in Russia, and resulted in the start of a mass exodus of 700,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union to Israel.

In the Israeli Journal, Hotam (24 November 1989), there is a report of a speech that then Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister, Ashkenazi Jew, Binyamin Netanyahu, gave to students at Bar Ilan University in which he states,

> "Israel should have exploited the repression of the demonstrations in China, when world attention focused on that country, to carry out mass expulsions among the Arabs of the territories."

The London and Paris Rothschilds announce the launch of a new subsidiary, Rothschild GmbH, in Frankfurt, Germany.

1991: Following the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait on August 2, 1990, on January 16 of this year the United States and Britain began an aerial bombing campaign of targets within Iraq. On 24 February the ground campaign commenced which was to last 100 hours until on February 28 when a horrendous war crime occurred.

This crime was the slaughter of 150,000 Iraqi troops with fuel air bombs. These Iraqis were fleeing on a crowded highway from Kuwait to Basra. President George Herbert Walker Bush ordered United States military aircraft and ground units to kill these surrendering troops, they were then bulldozed into mass unmarked graves in the desert, some still alive.

President Bush then ordered a cessation of hostilities. What was the significance of this slaughter and President Bush declaring the war over on this day? Well it was the day the, "Day of Purim," fell on this year. This the day the Jews celebrate their victory over Ancient Babylon, now based within the borders of Iraq and a day when the Jews are encouraged to get bloody revenge against their perceived enemies.

At the Bilderberg Conference on June 6 to 9 of this year, in Baden-Baden, Germany, David Rockefeller (a Rothschild) made the following statement,

> "We are grateful to the Washington Post, the New York Times, Time Magazine, and other great publications whose directors have attended our meetings and respected their promises of discretion for almost 40 years. It would have been impossible for us to develop our plan for the world, if we had been subjected to the lights of publicity during those years.
> But the world is now more sophisticated and prepared to march towards a world government. The super-national sovereignty of an intellectual elite and world bankers is surely preferable to the national auto-determination practised in past centuries."

1992: In March, former Federal Reserve Board Chairman, Paul A. Volker became Chairman of the European banking firm, J. Rothschild, Wolfensohn and Co.

Stephen Bryen, caught offering confidential documents to Israel in 1978, is serving on board of the pro-Israeli Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs while continuing as a paid consultant, with security clearance, on exports of sensitive US technology.

“The Samson Option,” by Seymour M. Hersh reports,

> “Illicitly obtained intelligence was flying so voluminously from LAKAM (a secret Israeli intelligence unit, a Hebrew acronym for Scientific Liaison Bureau) into Israeli intelligence that a special code name, JUMBO, was added to the security markings already on the documents. There were strict orders, Ari Ben-Menashe recalled, “Anything marked JUMBO was not supposed to be discussed with your American counterparts.”

The Wall Street Journal reports that Israeli agents apparently tried to steal Recon Optical Inc's top-secret airborne spy-camera system.

On September 16th Britain’s pound collapses when currency speculators led by Rothschild agent, Ashkenazi Jew, George Soros, borrow pounds and sell them for Deutsche Marks, in the expectation of being able to repay the loan in devalued currency and to pocket the difference.

This results in the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, Norman Lamont, announcing a rise in interest rates of 5% in one day and as a result drives Britain into a recession which lasts many years as large numbers of businesses fail and the housing market crashes.

This is right on cue for the Rothschilds, after they had privatised Britain's state owned assets during the 1980's, driven the share price up, and then collapsed the markets so they could buy them up for pennies on the pound, a carbon copy of what Nathan Mayer Rothschild did to the British economy 180 years before, in 1812.

It cannot be overstated that the Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time, Norman Lamont, prior to becoming a MP, was a Merchant Banker with N. M. Rothschild and Sons, who he joined after reading Economics at Cambridge.

1993: Norman Lamont leaves the British government to return to N. M. Rothschild and Sons as a director, after his mission to collapse the British economy to profit the Rothschilds is accomplished.

Former Congressman, Paul Findley publishes his seminal book, Deliberate Deceptions: Facing the Facts About the U.S. Israeli Relationship.

In this book he lists the 65 United Nations Member Resolutions against Israel from the period 1955 to 1992, and the 30 United States vetoes on Israel's behalf which if not made would have seen Israel have 95 resolutions against them at this point.

No matter, even with Israel's puppet the United States helping them terrorise others, the 65 Resolutions passed against Israel are more than all the Resolutions passed against all other countries combined.

Not that Israel care too much about the views of the United Nations when you consider that less than two weeks after Israel's attack on the USS Liberty (an attack designed to sink the Liberty and blame it on Egypt prompting the USA into a war with Egypt on behalf of Israeli Lies, remember the Mossad motto, "By Way Of Deception, Thou Shalt Do War"), the Israeli Foreign Minister, Aba Eban, stated of the United Nations,

> "If the General Assembly were to vote by 121 votes to 1 in favor of, "Israel," returning to the armistice lines (pre June 1967 borders), "Israel," would refuse to comply with the decision," New York Times – 19 June 1967.

The ADL is caught operating a massive spying operation on critics of Israel, Arab-Americans, the San Francisco Labor Council, ILWU Local 10, Oakland Educational Association, NAACP, Irish Northern Aid, International Indian Treaty Council, the Asian Law Caucus and the San Francisco Police.

Data collected was sent to Israel and in some cases to South Africa. Pressure from Jewish organizations forces the city to drop the criminal case, but the ADL settles a civil lawsuit for an undisclosed sum of cash.

power.

The Defense Investigative Service circulates a memo warning US military contractors that,

> "Israel aggressively collects (US) military and industrial technology."

The report stated that Israel obtains information using,

> "ethnic targeting, financial aggrandizement, and identification and exploitation of individual frailties," of US citizens.

1996: A General Accounting Office report, "Defense Industrial Security: Weaknesses in US Security Arrangements With Foreign-Owned Defense Contractors," found that according to intelligence sources, "Country A," (identified by intelligence sources as Israel, Washington Times, 22 February 1996),

> "conducts the most aggressive espionage operation against the United States of any US ally."
> A pdf file of the report is here:
> www.gao.gov/archive/1996/ns96064.pdf
> An unformated text version is here:
> http://fas.org/man/gao/gao9664.htm

The Jerusalem Post (30 August 1996) quoted the report,

> ""Classified military information and sensitive military technologies are high-priority targets for the intelligence agencies of this country."

The report described, "An espionage operation run by the intelligence organization responsible for collecting scientific and technologic information for (Israel) paid a US government employee to obtain US classified military intelligence documents."

The Washington Report on Middle East Affairs (Shawn L. Twing, April 1996) noted that this was,

> "a reference to the 1985 arrest of Jonathan Pollard, a civilian US naval intelligence analyst who provided Israel's LAKAM espionage agency an estimated 800,000 pages of classified US intelligence information."
> www.washington-report.org/backissues/0496/9604014.htm

The GAO report also noted that, "Several citizens of (Israel) were caught in the United States stealing sensitive technology used in manufacturing artillery gun tubes."

An Office of Naval Intelligence document, "Worldwide Challenges to Naval Strike Warfare" reported that,

> "US technology has been acquired (by China) through Israel in the form of the Lavi fighter and possibly SAM (surface-to-air) missile technology."

Jane's Defense Weekly (28 February 1996) noted that, "until now, the intelligence community has not openly confirmed the transfer of US technology (via Israel) to China." The report noted that this, "represents a dramatic step forward for Chinese military aviation." (Flight International, 13 March 1996).

Amschel Rothschild, 41, is strangled with the heavy cord of his own towel robe in his hotel room in Paris. French Prime Minister orders the French Police to close their investigation, and, Rupert Murdoch, born of a Jewish mother and so a Jew by Ashkenazi standards, instructs his editors and news managers around the world to report it as a heart attack, if they need to report it at all.

On 12 May United Nations Ambassador and Ashkenazi Jew, Madeleine Albright, when appearing on 60 Minutes, was asked the following by correspondent Lesley Stahl, in reference to the years of United States led economic sanctions against Iraq,

> "We have heard that half a million children have died. I mean, that is more children than died in Hiroshima. And, you know, is the price worth it?"

To which Ambassador Albright replied,

> "I think that is a very hard choice, but the price, we think, the price is worth it."

Her comments cause no public outcry. In fact, the holocaust of half a million Iraqi children is positively admired by the United States government when you consider less than 8 months later, President Clinton appointed Albright as secretary of state. Whilst appearing before the Senate Committee, who were considering her appointment, Albright is literally chomping at the bit for the blood of more Iraqi children and she states,

> "We will insist on maintaining tough UN sanctions against Iraq unless and until that regime complies with relevant Security Council resolutions."

1997: An Army mechanical engineer, Ashkenazi Jew, David A. Tenenbaum, "inadvertently," gives classified military information on missile systems and armored vehicles to Israeli officials (New York Times, 20 February 1997).

The Washington Post reports US intelligence has intercepted a conversation in which two Israeli officials had discussed the possibility of getting a confidential letter that then-Secretary of State Warren Christopher had written to Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

One of the Israelis, identified only as, “Dov,” had commented that they may get the letter from, “Mega,” the code name for Israel’s top agent inside the United States.

US ambassador to Israel, Martin Indyk, complains privately to the Israeli government about heavy-handed surveillance by Israeli intelligence agents.

Israeli agents place a tap on Ashkenazi Jew and daughter of a Rabbi, Monica Lewinsky’s, phone at the Watergate and record phone sex sessions between her and President Bill Clinton. The Ken Starr report confirms that Clinton warned Lewinsky their conversations were being taped and ended the affair. Interestingly, at the same time, the FBI’s hunt for, "Mega," is called off.

On 29 October Edmond de Rothschild dies in Geneva. Interestingly on the exact same day Anton Szandor LaVey, the founder of the Church of Satan also dies, who in his book, "Satan Speaks," he states in relation to The Protocols Of The Elders Of Zion,

> "The first time I read the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, my instinctive reaction was, So what's wrong with THAT? Isn't that the way any master plan should work? Doesn't the public deserve - nay, demand - such despotism?"

Kofi Annan becomes Secretary General to the United Nations. He is married to Nane Lagergren, a Rothschild, who he wed in 1984.

1998: The European Central Bank is set up in Frankfurt, the city from which the Rothschilds originate.

2000: George W. Bush is elected (so they tell me) President of the United States. Bush and his family claim to be descendants of the House of Plantagenet which is descended from the Royal House of Judah.

2001: On September 11th the attack on the World Trade Center is orchestrated by Israel with the complicity of Britain and America, under the orders of the Rothschilds as a pretext for removing the liberty of people worldwide in exchange for security, just as happened with the Reichstag fire in Germany where the citizens were lied to in order to give up liberty for security.

They also will use the attacks to gain control of the few nations in the world who don't allow Rothschild central banks and so less than one month after these attacks, US forces attack Afghanistan, one of only 7 nations in the world who don't have a Rothschild controlled central bank.

Less than a week before the 9-11 attack on 5 September, the so-called lead hijacker Mohamed Atta and several other hijackers made a still-unexplained visit onboard one of Pro Israeli lobbyist, Ashkenazi Jew, Jack Abramoff's casino boats.

No investigation is undertook as to what they were doing there. It is discovered that US drug agents' communications have been penetrated. Suspicion falls on two companies, AMDOCS and Comverse Infosys, both owned by Israelis. AMDOCS generates billing data for most US phone companies and is able to provide detailed logs of who is talking to whom.

Comverse Infosys builds the tapping equipment used by law enforcement to eavesdrop on all American telephone calls, but suspicion forms that Comverse Infosys, which gets half of its research and development budget from the Israeli government, has built a back door into the system that is being exploited by Israeli intelligence and that the information gleaned on US drug interdiction efforts is finding its way to drug smugglers.

The investigation by the FBI leads to the exposure of the largest foreign spy ring ever uncovered inside the United States, operated by Israel. Half of the suspected spies have been arrested when 9-11 happens.

On 9-11, 5 Israelis are arrested for dancing and cheering while the World Trade Towers collapse. Supposedly employed by Urban Moving Systems, the Israelis are caught with multiple passports and a lot of cash.

Two of them are later revealed to be Mossad. As witness reports track the activity of the Israelis, it emerges that they were seen at Liberty Park at the time of the first impact, suggesting a foreknowledge of what was to come. The Israelis are interrogated, and then eventually sent back to Israel.

The owner of the moving company used as a cover by the Mossad agents abandons his business and flees to Israel. The United States Government then classifies all of the evidence related to the Israeli agents and their connections to 9-11.

All of this is reported to the public via a four part story on Fox News by Carl Cameron. Pressure from Jewish groups, primarily AIPAC, forces Fox News to remove the story from their website. Two hours prior to the 9-11 attacks, Odigo, an Israeli company with offices just a few blocks from the World Trade Towers, receives an advance warning via the internet.

The manager of the New York Office provides the FBI with the IP address of the sender of the message, but the FBI does not follow this up. The FBI is investigating 5 Israeli moving companies as possible fronts for Israeli intelligence.

It is revealed that prior to the attack millions of dollars of put options on both American Airlines and United Airlines, were traded. The FBI have promised to followed the purchasers up, but have never revealed their findings. That is because this would lead directly to Israel, the state behind the 911 attacks.

Following the World Trade Center attack, anonymous letters containing anthrax are sent to various politicians and media executives. Like the 9-11 attack this is immediately blamed on Al-Qaeda , until it is discovered that the anthrax contained within those letters is a specific type of weaponized anthrax made by a United States military laboratory.

The FBI then discover that the main suspect for these anthrax letters is a Ashkenazi Jew, Dr. Philip Zack, who had been reprimanded several times by his employers due to offensive remarks he made about Arabs. Dr. Philip Zack, was caught on camera entering the storage area where he worked at Fort Detrick which is where the Anthrax was kept. At this point, both the FBI and the mainstream media stopped making any public comments on the case.

Jewish Defence League Chairman since 1985, Ashkenazi Jew, Irv Rubin is jailed for allegedly plotting to bomb a mosque and the offices of a Arab-American congressman. He dies shortly after slitting his throat in a suicide attempt, before he can be brought to trial.

One week prior to the WTC attack, the Zim Shipping Company moves out of its offices in the WTC, breaking its lease and costing the company $50,000. No reason has ever been given, but Zim Shipping Company is half owned by the State of Israel (The Rothschilds).

On October 3, Israeli Prime Minister, Ariel Sharon, makes the following statement to Ashkenazi Jew, Shimon Peres, as reported on Kol Yisrael radio.

> "Every time we do something you tell me America will do this and will do that....I want to tell you something very clear, don't worry about American pressure on Israel. We, the Jewish people, control America, and the Americans know it."

2002: Webster's Third New International Dictionary (Unabridged), re-printed in 2002, provides a new definition of Anti Semitism which has not been updated since 1956. It reads,

> "Anti-Semitism: (1) hostility toward Jews as a religious or racial minority group, often accompanied by social, political or economic discrimination (2) opposition to Zionism (3) sympathy for the opponents of Israel."

It was definition (2) and (3) that were added in the 2002 edition, just before the USA decide to invade Iraq under orders from the State of Rothschild, I mean Israel. Also this year, the Prime Minister of Israel, war criminal, Ariel Sharon, orders the massacre in the Jenin refugee camp in the West Bank. Best get that definition updated to protect these criminals.

The DEA issues a report that Israeli spies, posing as art students, have been trying to penetrate US Government offices. Police near the Whidbey Island Naval Air Station in southern Washington State stop a suspicious truck and detain two Israelis, one of whom is illegally in the United States. The two men were driving at high speed in a Ryder rental truck, which they claimed had been used to, "deliver furniture."

The next day, police discovered traces of TNT and RDX military-grade plastic explosives inside the passenger cabin and on the steering wheel of the vehicle. The FBI then announces that the tests that showed explosives were, "false positived," by cigarette smoke, a claim test experts say is ridiculous.

Based on an alibi provided by a woman, the case is closed and the Israelis are handed over to INS to be sent back to Israel. One week later, the woman who provided the alibi vanishes.

2003: The United States invade Iraq on 19 March, which this year is the holy, "Day of Purim," in the Jewish calendar. This, "Day of Purim," is a day the Jews celebrate their victory over Ancient Babylon, now based within the borders of Iraq, how interesting.

What is also significant is that the previous U.S. led invasion of Iraq ended on the Day of Purim ten years earlier with the slaughter of 150,000 fleeing Iraqis under the current President's father, George Herbert Walker Bush. Purim is also the time when the Jews are encouraged to get bloody revenge against their perceived enemies.

Ancient Babylon, I mean Iraq, is now one of six nations left in the world who don't have a Rothschild controlled central bank. This war is mainly about stealing Iraq's water supply for Israel and is being fought with the blood of the American military which the State of Rothschild, I mean Israel control.

Israel has always struggled for water, it had to steal the Golan Heights from Syria which provided Israel with one third of its fresh water 36 years before, yet still in Israel water extraction has surpassed replacement by 2.5 billion metres in the last 25 years.

This means the water is far more precious to them than the oil reserves which are the second largest reserves of oil on the planet.

Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamed states in a speech,

> "Jews rule the world by proxy. They get others to fight and die for them."

The Police Chief of Cloudcroft stops a truck speeding through a school zone. The drivers turn out to be Israelis with expired passports. Claiming to be movers, the truck contains junk furniture and several boxes.

The Israelis are handed over to immigration. The contents of the boxers are not revealed to the public.

Israel deploys assassination squads into other countries, including the United States. The US Government does not protest.

2004: Two years into an investigation of AIPAC's (The American Israel Public Affairs Committee – the largest political lobbying group in the USA with over 65,000 members whose only purpose is to use the USA for the purposes of Israel) possible role as a spy front for Israel, Ashkenazi Jew, Larry Franklin, a mid-level Pentagon Analyst is observed by the FBI giving classified information to two officials of AIPAC suspected of being Israeli spies.

AIPAC hires lawyer Nathan Lewin to handle their legal defense, the same lawyer who defended suspected Israeli spy Stephen Bryen in 1978. Larry Franklin worked in the Pentagon Office of Special Plans, run by Richard Perle, at the time Perle (who was caught giving classified information to Israel back in 1970) was insisting that Iraq was crawling with weapons of mass destruction requiring the United States to invade and conquer Iraq.

There were no WMDs, of course, and Perle has dumped the blame for the, "bad intelligence," on George Tenet. But what is known is that the Pentagon Office of Special Plans was coordinating with a similar group in Israel, in Ariel Sharon's office.

With two suspected Israeli spies (at least) inside the office from which the lies that launched the war in Iraq originated, it appears that the people of the United States are the victims of a deadly hoax, a hoax that started a war using the blood and money of American citizens for the purposes of Israeli oppression.

The leaking of the investigation of AIPAC to the media on August 28th, 2004 gave advance warning to other spies working with Franklin. The damage to the FBI's investigation was completed when United States Attorney General John Ashcroft ordered the FBI to stop all arrests in the case.

Like the Stephen Bryen case and the hunt for, "Mega," this latest spy scandal seems destined by officials who have their own secret allegiances to protect, barring a massive public outcry.

Police near the Nuclear Fuel Services plant in Tennessee stop a truck after a three mile chase, during which the driver throws a bottle containing a strange liquid from the cab. The drivers turn out to be Israelis using fake identifications. The FBI refuses to investigate and the Israelis are released.

Two Israelis try to enter Kings Bay Naval Submarine Base, home to eight Trident submarines. The truck tests positive for explosives.

The National Director of the ADL, Abraham H. Foxman, publishes a book entitled, "Never Again? The Threat Of The New Anti-Semitism," in which he states that the New Testament's "lie," that the ancient Pharisees were responsible for the death of Christ, has been responsible for anti-semitism throughout the millennia and thus the New Testament of the bible is, "hate speech," and should be censored or banned.

2005: On January 20, President Bush makes the following statement as part of his second inaugural address, "When our Founders declared a new order of the ages." This is not true. The founders did not declare a, "new order of the ages," President Roosevelt did when in 1933, he put it's latin translation, "Novus Ordo Seclorum," on the dollar bill.

On 7 July the London Underground Network is bombed. Israel's Finance Minister, Binyamin Netanyahu is in London on the morning of the attacks in order to attend an economic conference in a hotel over the underground station where one of the blasts occurred, but stayed in his hotel room instead after he had been informed by Israeli intelligence officials attacks were expected.

There are now only 5 nations on the world left without a Rothschild controlled central bank: Iran; North Korea; Sudan; Cuba; and Libya.

Physics Professor, Stephen E. Jones of Brigham Young University publishes a paper in which he proves the World Trade Center buildings could have only been brought down in the manner they were by explosives. He receives no coverage in the mainstream media for his scientific and provable claims.

2006: The Edmond De Rothschild Banque, a subsidiary of Europe's Edmond De Rothschild family bank group in France, becomes the first foreign family bank that has obtained approval of the China Banking Regulatory Commission and entered China's financial market.

The ADL ruthlessly leans on governments throughout the world to pass hate crimes legislation, as they are scared that the criminal cabal that is Israel and the Rothschilds is being exposed more and more on a daily basis, predominantly on the internet. Their job is to protect this criminal network and what better way to do it than by passing laws in which anyone who exposes a Jewish criminal becomes a criminal.

David Irving is sentenced to three years in jail in Austria, for denying the holocaust. It is important to note that the only historical event you can be arrested for questioning is the holocaust. This is because this has been the Rothschilds greatest weapon in brainwashing YOU, THE STUPID GOY! is that the Jews are so poor and persecuted when in actual fact they control the vast majority of international finance and international corporations throughout the world.

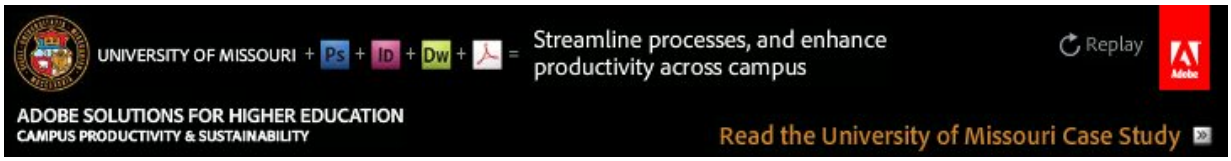
Dear Lord Rothschild,

I have much pleasure in conveying to you, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, the following declaration of sympathy with Jewish Zionist aspirations which has been submitted to, and approved by, the Cabinet.



"His Majesty's Government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavours to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country."

I should be grateful if you would bring this declaration to the knowledge of the Zionist Federation.

Yours sincerely,

Arthur James Balfour

Baron Edmond de Rothschild, 71, French Financier, Dies

By FRANK J. PRIAL
Published: November 4, 1997

Correction Appended

Baron Edmond de Rothschild, the French-born financier who was said to be the wealthiest of the surviving descendants of the legendary banking family, died in Geneva on Sunday. He was 71.

The cause of death was emphysema, The Associated Press reported.

Born in Paris in 1926 and a lifelong French citizen, Baron Edmond was taken to Switzerland as a child after his father, a senator in France, had refused to vote for the pro-Nazi Vichy regime led by Marshal Philippe Petain in World War II and had been declared a noncitizen. Because he concentrated his business activity in Switzerland and was rarely part of the brilliant social life his cousins Elie, Guy and Alain led in Paris, Edmond de Rothschild was relatively unknown outside European banking until the Socialists led by Francois Mitterrand came to power in France in 1980.

When the new Government moved to nationalize the Rothschild Bank, Guy de Rothschild reacted with characteristic Rothschild flair. "A Jew under Petain, a pariah under Mitterrand," he wrote in a much publicized letter, "for me that's enough." He left for New York.

Baron Edmond's much smaller bank in Paris, La Compagnie Financiere Edmond de Rothschild, was not nationalized and he began to be known as "the Rothschild who stayed." In 1992, Cie. Financiere was said to have about $2 billion in total assets. Paradoxically, the bank soon became known for its expertise in helping the Government divest itself of nationalized businesses.

Baron Edmond always worked independently of the other Rothschilds, but when Guy's son David founded a new Rothschild bank in Paris in 1982, Baron Edmond took a 10 percent stake. He held a similar position in N. M. Rothschild, the family's British branch. The British and French banks have since merged.

Most of Baron Edmond's investments were private and their interrelationships complex. But the linchpin of his activities was said to be his Banque Privee in Geneva, a vast holding company with an estimated $17 billion under management in 1995. Other interests included the Banca Privata Solari & Blum in Lugano, Switzerland, the Israel General Bank and the Caesarea Development Company in Tel Aviv, the Israel European Company and the Banque de Gestion Edmond de Rothschild, both in Luxembourg, along with interests in Alpine hotels, De Beers Consolidated Mines Ltd. in South Africa, Club Mediterranee, several publishing houses in Paris and a television company in Luxembourg.

In 1973, he bought a major interest in the Bank of California, based in Los Angeles, which then had $4 billion in assets and 80 branches. The bank was sold in 1985 to Japan's Mitsubishi Bank for about three times the original purchase price.

His wine interests included a share in Domaines Barons Rothschild, which owns Chateau Lafite-Rothschild and Chateau Reussic in Bordeaux as well as parts of wine properties in Portugal, Chile and California. He owned Chateau Clarke, another Bordeaux wine property, and several years ago turned ownership of Chateau Malmaison, which adjoins Clarke, over to his wife, Baroness Nadine de Rothschild.

oldings were a chain of flower shops in Paris and a 4,000-acre property east of Paris where he raised cattle and produced prize-winning cheese. He was also a major investor in the Savour Club, a large mail-order wine business.

Edmond Adolphe Maurice Jules Jacques de Rothshcild was the son of Baron Maurice de Rothschild and Baroness Noemie Halphen Rothschild. He was the grandson of the Edmond de Rothschild who invested untold millions of dollars in the development of Jewish Palestine. Maurice de Rothschild enhanced his own fortune with investments in the United States and reportedly left his son Edmond a billion francs -- about $200 million.

After taking a law degree in Paris, Baron Edmond spent three years with the Rothschild Bank, then quit to form the Compagnie Financiere, specifically to manage his own fortune.

In 1963, after divorcing his first wife, he married Nadine Lhopitallier, startling French society. Rothschild wives were expected to be cultured women of means and, invariably, Jewish. Miss Lhopitallier was a film starlet and former model with a grade school education -- and she was a Roman Catholic.

Correction: November 10, 1997, Monday An obituary on Tuesday about Baron Edmond de Rothschild, the French-born financier, misspelled the name of one of his wine interests. It is Chateau Rieussec, not Reussic.

A version of this obituary; biography appeared in print on November 4, 1997, on page D27 of the New York edition.

Billed as the first of its kind in the Asia-Pacific region and soon to be followed by other similar private investment vehicles, the Carbon Ring Consortium seeks to raise $2 million, with individual investors obliged to pay $100,000.

"With recent developments in international climate change policy, the question is no longer if, but when the global carbon trading market will emerge," said Richard Martin, chief executive officer of Rothschild Australia.

Rothschild said in a prospectus that the Carbon Ring Consortium would be open for investments until October 30.

It would be wrapped up in June 2003, when the carbon credits purchased will be distributed to investors pro rata.

Trading environmental credits is an emerging market designed to allow firms that fail to meet emissions standards to buy credits from other firms that undercut their targets.

The Kyoto accord signed by developing nations in the Japanese city of that name envisages some carbon credit trade between countries with so-called carbon sinks - forests - and others that produce higher levels of pollution than they are allowed to.

The same applies to companies, and a nascent market has already emerged in the United States where some states have limits on acid rain components like sulphur dioxide and others have limits on carbon dioxide emissions.

Greenhouse gases such as carbon dioxide are blamed by many scientists for rising world temperatures.

The investment bank said it was estimated that the global carbon trading market could be worth up to $150 billion by 2012.

It said it looked increasingly likely that the 1997 Kyoto Protocol on reducing greenhouse gas emissions would be ratified by enough countries to come into effect, notwithstanding the decision of the United States and Australia to reject the accord.

The process of investing will involve workshops to allow investors to gain hands-on knowledge of the new market.

The unregistered, managed investment scheme will be the first in a series of private investment vehicles that Carbon Ring Pty Limited, a joint venture between Rothschild and E3 International, expects to launch in the coming years, the partners said.

Banque Privée Edmond de Rothschild is one of Switzerland's most esteemed private banks, and one of 15 members of the Swiss Stock Exchange. The bank strives to maintain the highest standards, not only in its dedication to private banking, but also in ensuring a quality service throughout its business. Its focus on clients' interests, professionalism, flexibility, business acumen, and coherent strategies are underpinned by a state-of-the-art IT infrastructure.

The Challenge

Each department within Banque Privée Edmond de Rothschild requires accurate information to meet the increasing demands from management and regulators alike. The added pressure of meeting these demands has increased tremendously over the past few years, and the need for reliable and timely information is absolutely paramount.

According to Terence Denton, Edmond de Rothschild's IT Manager, "In today's hectic business world, business users are constantly being bombarded with requests for information from management and regulatory bodies. More often than not, they turn to the already heavily loaded IT department for help in providing it."

In 1999 the integrated banking system was based solely on an IMS database. Although this was an immensely rich data information base, the tools to mine that data effectively were practically nonexistent. To help unit managers make decisions rapidly and to take pressure off the IT staff, the bank decided to build a data warehouse. Denton believes the company's data warehouse strategy, with its business-oriented data marts, provides business users with greater independence to, for instance, create custom reporting.

The Solution

Edmond de Rothschild decided a reliable replication engine was crucial to the viability of the data warehouse project, but the new technology also had to work within the bank's heterogeneous database environment.

After investigating various options, Denton's team discovered Informatica PowerExchange for IMS. The team was confident the product matched their search criteria. The bank had previously decided to build its data warehouse on an Oracle database with a Sun Microsystems hardware platform using Informatica PowerCenter to manage the data mart, and BRIO as the query and navigation tool. The Changed Data Capture (CDC) component was the "final piece of the jigsaw puzzle."

Why Informatica

Keeping the content of the data marts reliably up to date across multiple business areas is a top priority at Edmond de Rothschild. Using Informatica, the bank manages the integration of changed data on its mainframe operational databases.

The bank was able to quickly deploy several data marts with immediate, measurable benefits in two crucial areas—user accessibility and rapid information retrieval. Informatica PowerExchange for IMS is critical to the data marts' success, because after an initial load of data it sends only updated data from the IMS database and only from those segments specified—contributing greatly to the timely delivery of data.

"This facility was exactly what we required," says Denton, "and it is useful to be able to choose between a batch or online replication delivery."

The Results

The bank has identified clear advantages since using Informatica. The new system now supports five independent businesses with 13 data marts representing different areas of the bank. "Requests for reports from compliance and finance to IT have become a thing of the past. Our discussions now revolve around expanding the data marts," says Denton. With data marts operating in each business area—including compliance, finance, and IT—the benefits are clear, with a positive effect on time, cost, and staff productivity.

Today the business managers consult the data mart to solve their reporting and analytical requirements before referring any requests to IT. They are empowered to be more independent, faster, accurate, and inventive. "Quite simply, they are better equipped to run their departments and focus on the real business issues," says Denton.

"I can see us enjoying an excellent relationship with Informatica for a good many years to come. Our business managers will continue to reap real benefits with the timely delivery of accurate reports and analytics to senior management and regulatory bodies alike. These activities are being performed within hours rather than days and the IT department can get on with its planned projects instead of being distracted by generating one-off reports."

PREFACE

This work is divided into three parts :—

Part I gives a History of the Rise of the London Money Power.

Part II proves that this Imperialism of Capital — the London Money Power — is foretold in prophecy, under the symbol of the Great Red Dragon.

Part III gives the Remedy for the industrial evils that afflict our country . (And, I did not scan this part)

There are many persons, perhaps, who will be deeply interested in Part I, and Part III, Who will feel but little interest in the prophetic portion of the work . The work is so arranged that all such persons can skip Part II, and pass from Part I to Part II, without any break in the connection of thought : though they will miss the most striking delineations of the character and the activities of the Money Power.

On the other hand, those who are interested in the prophetic aspect of the work, will find its structure in proper logical arrangement as a prophetic exposition ; since it is necessary to present the history of the Money Power, before the symbols of prophecy can be applied to it.

This work is the outgrowth of a life of thought, largely directed to the study of Prophecy, History, and Political Economy . Indeed, the work is the product of original thought . Its historical portion is the history of an Imperialism whose existence has been hitherto unrecognized.—Its remedy is based upon principles of Political economy that have never before been presented to the world.—Its Prophetic Exposition is part of a System of Prophetic Interpretation that is entirely new . The Author may therefore claim the indulgence due to a pioneer, whose movement is over a pathway unsmoothed by the progress of earlier thought.

As no history of the London Money Power has ever been written, the Author has been under the necessity of gathering his facts from newspaper items, and from the statements of individuals whose reliability is above question . His store of facts has been constantly increasing down to the present time . Some important facts he has learned since the publication of this work began ; other facts he learned too late for them to appear in the present edition.—No doubt, in every community facts are known which illustrate the course of the Money Power in this country . These facts will doubtless soon be published ; and it is hoped that ere long a full and connected history of the Rise of the Money Power may be given to the world.

PART I

HISTORY OF THE RISE

OF

THE LONDON MONEY POWER

Chapter I

RISE OF THE MONEY POWER—FIRST ERA

I . INTRODUCTION

AN Imperialism of Capital has grown up within the last two centuries from small beginnings, until it is now the mightiest power that has ever existed on the earth . It is an Imperialism mightier than the empire of the Caesars, grander than the empire of Napoleon in the hour of his highest glory . In comparison with it all other empires sink into comparative insignificance . This titanic power is the Imperialism of Capital, which I call, by way of distinction, the Money Power.

1st The Money Power Defined

I do not mean by the Money Power to include any persons possessed of property, who are engaged in independent business enterprise . I do not mean any American business men, or business Companies engaged in independent business enterprise, whether they be farmers, merchants, manufacturers, bankers, miners, builders, or persons engaged in any department of business enterprise . The Imperialism of Capital to which I allude is a knot of capitalists—Jews almost to a man—who their headquarters in the Money Quarter of London, in Threadneedle street, Lombard, and other streets in that vicinity, where bankers have their habitat . These Jew capitalists have succeeded in centralizing in their own hands the industry and commerce of the earth.—They own almost all the debts of the world,—the debts of nations, states, counties, municipalities, corporations and individuals,—amounting in the aggregate, it is estimated, to seventy-five billion dollars, on which they are annually receiving about four billion dollars of interest.—They own the manufactories, the shipping, and the commerce of Great Britain, and most of the manufactures, shipping and commerce of the whole world.—They have attained control of the industry and trade of the whole earth ; and are rapidly centralizing all business in their own hands . They hold possession of all the great lines of trade and business of all kinds, and they regulate all prices by their own arbitrary methods.—These Jew Money Kings have established a grand Imperialism of industry, commerce and wealth, which is thoroughly organized, and rules in the sphere of industry and trade with autocratic sway.

In our age, capital is king . This Money Power of the Money Quarter of London is the only grand preeminent Imperialism existing on the earth . Monarchs severally rule their own dominions, and no one of them has preeminent power . The Imperialism of Capital, in our time, stretches the arms of its power over the whole earth ; it alone sways the nations with preeminent rule . It buys all the products of the earth : it fixes all prices of all commodities without regard to the law of supply and demand, by its own arbitrary will . It is Imperial over industry and trade, and none can resist it . It is rapidly progressing toward its ultimate aim, of possessing itself of all the world's wealth and all the world's property . If things remain as they are, these jew money kings will, at no distant day, have achieved their aim, and will own the earth in fee simple.

The world will be surprised at the statement that such grand Imperialism of Capital exists . For it has grown up so silently, and has veiled its operations in such secrecy, that its very existence is unsuspected . The Author was as ignorant of the Money Power as all the rest of the world outside of the ring, until, when visiting England many years ago, he, through a combination of circumstances unnecessary to mention here, became acquainted with the existence of this grand centralization of Capital in England, and was given a pamphlet that was intended for private circulation . This pamphlet, and the boastful statements of the Englishman who gave it, imparted to the Author information which is carefully kept from the general public . Quotations will be made from this pamphlet later on in this work . No confidence is thereby violated, and its statements ought to be known to the world.

Thus informed of the existence of the Money Power, the author has watched its progress for over twenty years . As events occurred, his mind, strongly magnetized, as it were, by this subject, seized upon and gathered to itself all facts bearing upon the question . A newspaper item, meaningless to others, was to him an important historical fact in the rise and growth of the Money Power . He has thus, point by point, gathered the materials for the sketch which here follows.

Before quoting from the pamphlet just mentioned, it will better, in order to give consecutiveness to the subject, first trace the rise of the Money Power ; and then to make quotations, to show that it was already a grand Imperialism in the decade extending from 1860 to 1870.

II . FIRST ERA IN THE RISE OF THE MONEY POWER.

The Money Power of the World had origin in small beginnings, in the 18th century ; but it has reached its grand development in our own age . It had its origin in the British East India Company, and has grown up so quietly that its grand centralization has not attracted the attention of mankind . Indeed, it has only become powerful enough in our own age, to produce startling effects upon the industry of the world.

In the ages before the invention of the steam engine, the chief commerce of the world consisted in the interchange between the Temperate zone and the Tropics . There was but little interchange between the different countries of the Temperate zone ; for all having the same climate and agricultural productions, each country produced sufficient for its own consumption ; and, all manufactures being wrought by hand, each country had enough manufactures for the supply of its own needs, except a few articles of luxurious consumption . The chief commerce of the world consisted in the exchange of some of the products of the Temperate zone, especially specie, for articles of luxurious consumption, sugar, tea, coffee, indigo, opium, and the spices, contributed by the Tropics to the commerce of the world.

This commerce has always enriched the nation which carried it on, and made its merchants the great commercial magnates of the earth.

In Ancient Times, the Phoenicians possessed it for two thousand years, and it made them the great merchants of the earth . The share of Egypt in the traffic gave to that country its great wealth in the early eras of the monarchy . In the age of Solomon, the Jews possessed the Eastern end of the traffic for a generation, and it so enriched them that silver was in Jerusalem as stones . The development of this commerce was the sphere in which was displayed the proverbial wisdom of Solomon, and it constituted the chief glory of his reign.

The power of the Assyrian Empire was largely based upon the possession of the Eastern end of this commerce ; the conquests of the Empire along the Mediterranean, having broken up the old line of the trade by way of the Red sea.

To obtain possession of this commerce was the aim of the conquests of Nebuchadnezzar, the founder of the Babylonian Empire . He carried the traffic through Babylon, and up the Euphrates, across Syria and Asia Minor, and gave the western end of the traffic to the Lydians and the Ionian Greeks . This was the origin of the proverbial wealth of Croesus, which the Greeks, in their ignorance of the commercial relations of the East, attributed to the gold washed from the placer mines of the river Pactolus . The possession of the Western end of the trade, at this time, awakened the Greeks from the lethargy of barbarism, and stated the race upon its grand career of civilization.

The hostility of the Greeks to Persia, which caused the burning of Sardis, and led to the Persian wars, no doubt originated in the fact that Persia gave the traffic back to the Phoenicians, who restored it to its old route by way of the Red sea.

After the Christian Era, the Venetians took possession of the traffic and it made them the great merchant princes of the Middle Ages.

The discovery of the passage around Cape Good Hope gave the traffic into the hands of the Portuguese, who kept it for a century . Then the Dutch, the French and the English organized trading companies which competed with each other for the possession of this great East India trade, now, since the passage around Cape Good Hope, swelled into much larger proportions than in former times . Britain was slow to engage in it, and during the Seventeenth Century made only feeble efforts, productive of little result . In the early part of the Eighteenth Century, the British East India Company was reorganized and put in successful operation . In return for a loan of fifteen million dollars to the British government, a large sum for those days, it received a charter, giving to it the exclusive right to trade with all countries of the Indian and Pacific Oceans, between Cape Horn and Cape Good Hope.

From this time the East India Company made rapid growth in prosperity and power.

In the various wars of the Eighteenth Century between Great Britain and her commercial rivals on the Continent, the bull-dog pluck of the British sailors, and their superior nautical skill gave to British vessels so great an advantage in naval combats as secured to Britain a maritime supremacy . The British East India Company prospered, not only by the usual gains of traffic, but also by taking possession of the trading stations of its commercial rivals from which they were dispossessed by conquest.

In the great Seven Years' War, continuing from 1757 to 1764, Great Britain dispossessed France of all her colonial possessions . In India, at the same time, through the genius and energy of Clive, the British East India Company laid the foundation of its imperial greatness . Historical authorities date the rise of the East India Company to imperial power at the victory of Plassy, 1757 A.D. In 1764, it was an empire exercising imperial sway in Bengal over a territory containing a population of forty millions, and yielding larger revenues than those of the Austrian empire, at that time the greatest European power.

In 1764, the British East India Company was the grandest and richest corporation in the world . It was the only corporation which ruled a territorial empire . It was enriched by traffic, by the extension of its trade through the conquest of the trading stations of its Continental rivals and by the wholesale plunder of India.

It had been from the first the best investment of capital to be found in the British Islands . Its stock was eagerly taken by all who had the means . The mercantile class took as much stock as they could afford ; but, as we know, merchants usually have little more capital than they need for their regular business . The British Landed Aristocracy had large incomes from their estates ; and being under a necessity of seeking the best investments, in order to portion their younger children, they made large investments in the East India Company . But the great Capitalists of that age were the Jews . They were the money holders . They subscribed largely to the stock ; and as, in each generation, the stock of the Aristocracy was sold to portion younger children, the Jews, always economical, always full of money, and always in search of the best investments, bought the stock thrown upon the market . Thus it came to pass that the greater part of the stock of the East India Company, and of the other companies afterwards organized out of the dividends of that great company, fell into the hands of the Jews . The Jews became the great Money Kings of the world.

Under the impulse of Jew exactions, the career of the East India Company in India was a continued series of trickery, wrong, exaction, theft, robbery and murder . In the Eighteenth Century, the Mogul empire was in the last stages of decay ; and the East India Company, in its dealings with the native states and Princes of India, constantly shifted its ground as expediency required, sometimes treating them as independent states, and sometimes, as dependencies of the Mogul empire . It hired its soldiers to one native prince, to enable him to conquer another : it sold its favours on every side ; and when the opportunity came, it devoured the treasures and the territory of friends and foes alike . History presents no career of conquest, in which fraud, deceit and rapine were so blended as in the conquest of India by the East India Company . It was the first example in the history of the world of a trading corporation becoming an imperial power ; and its imperial rule was marked by the rapacity, chicane and fraud that characterizes a great corporation in the soulless and conscienceless pursuit of gain.

From 1764, the East India Company had control of the grand trade between the Temperate zone and the Tropics . It continued its conquests in India until, in 1857, the date of the Sepoy mutiny, it ruled almost the whole peninsula . The Money Kings who controlled it, possessed an empire compared with which the possessions of the Phoenicians and Carthaginians, and all their predecessors were as nothing, and they attained a domination over industry and trade without a parallel in the annals of the world

CHAPTER II.

RISE OF THE MONEY POWER
SECOND ERA.

The Money Power of the World entered upon a new and grander era of development when steam was applied to manufactures . In 1774, Watt perfected the steam engine ; and this new servant of man, mightier than the Genii of oriental fable, was at once set at work propelling manufactures . The power loom, the spinning Jenny and the cotton gin were soon afterward invented, and gave a great impulse to steam manufacturing industry.

The conditions of the time threw steam manufactures entirely into the hands of the London Money Power . Great Britain was the only country in Europe which had coal and iron for steam purposes . The capitalists of the East India Company were the only people in the world with capital to engage in the new industry ; for the great trading companies of other countries had been broken down by British conquests . Enriched by the trade of the Orient and the Tropics, these London capitalists at once seized the opportunity events offered them, and embarked energetically in steam manufactures.

The East India Company, as such, did not engage in these manufactures . All the stockholders would not wish to invest in them : so large a corporation would be unwieldy ; and the immensity of the monopoly might excite alarm and provoke opposition . It would be much better to operate through smaller corporations . A few capitalists might hold the stock of a great number of them without exciting jealousy ; and their management would be quiet and easy . The different corporations were like the regiments of an army : it was easy to form them into brigades, and divisions, and army corps, so as to give them the compact solidity of a grand military organization . It had the flexibility of individual enterprise, and the solidity of a despotism . The Money Kings adopted the policy of single corporate companies for each special enterprise.

They built manufactories of all kinds : they started iron mills, woolen mills, cotton mills . Manufactures of all kinds sprung up on every side . The Money Kings organized new joint stock corporations which built mills and manufactories : new companies which operated mines of coal and iron : and, as commerce wonderfully expanded through manufactures wrought by steam power, they organized new companies, which built vessels to plow the waters of every ocean, and built new warehouses, and established new trading stations all over the earth.

Commerce had languished in previous ages, because the Temperate zone had not sufficient cheap products suited to tropical demand, to offer in exchange for tropical productions . Steam manufactures opened up a new commercial era . They greatly stimulated tropical production, by offering manufactures in those markets . They also greatly stimulated industry in the Temperate zone . In all the countries of the Temperate zone, the demand for the manufactures of Britain was far beyond the ability to pay for them with exports.

The first effect of this state of things was a wave of excitement that swept over Great Britain . An industrial boom was started . Everybody who had money invested in the stock of manufacturing companies, shipping companies, trading companies . In companies for steam manufactures, the Money Kings took care to have the majority of stock : outside companies they knew they could devour at their leisure . The grand Money Kings had such advantages in their immense capital and in their perfect organization, that in commercial crises, often originated, and always manipulated by them, they managed systematically to break down rival companies, and buy them out, and to rob and plunder the minority stockholders ; until, in the end, these organized capitalists got into their own hands and very cheap, all, or the greater part of the stock of the various companies, manufacturing, mercantile and shipping, that originated in steam manufactures . They thus reduced to a system and a science the art of crushing rival companies, and freezing out minority stockholders . Their whole career was a systematic course of treachery, fraud and plunder, without a parallel in history . They advanced step by step, always causing a boom in every new enterprise that enlisted much outside capital, and always managing to operate seasons of business disaster, in which they lost a few hundred thousands by falling prices, a loss which they were abundantly able to stand, while making many millions by getting cheap the stock of broken corporations and the stock sold by minority stockholders.

Dealing in futures in Boards of Trade, was then started on a grand scale, a system originated for the purpose of enabling large capitalists to force stocks up or down as they choose, by dint of capital, without any regard to the actual value—the most satanic engine of trickery, fraud and oppression ever devised to enable the strong to plunder the weak . It is the drag net with which the Money Kings destroy multitudes of men of small means, as the fisherman takes fish in his seine . They are fishermen : the rest of mankind are their prey . They are always seeking after spoil . They are always dragging their net for the destruction of the unwary.

But aside from this plunder of the weak and the trusting, the regular profits of the new age of industry were very large . In every country of the Temperate zone, the demand for British manufactures was much greater than could be paid for by exports . And the difference in the balance of trade was always systematically arranged by lending money on mortgage for that amount, or by spending the amount of the deficit in starting some business enterprise in that country . In this way, the adverse balance of trade was not felt by the country falling behind . It bought all it wanted, and the adverse balance of trade actually made times better ; for it caused the profits of the Money Kings to be invested in the country, stimulating business into activity . It only had the disadvantage that the business investment did not belong to the nation, but to the Money Kings : and the prosperity it caused was not national prosperity, but was the bloated gains of the Money Kings.

This has been the regular method of the Money Kings for the last hundred years . Starting new manufactures, new shipping companies, new trading companies : getting in all the outside capital possible, and then freezing out minority stockholders, and throttling outside corporations ; getting all the nations in debt to them, and making parasite investments to the amount of the deficit of the balance of trade : putting in the profits derived from the East India Company, first : and then, not only putting in its profits, but continually reinvesting all the profits of all their enterprises in the country ; until their investments, accumulating like a rolling ball of snow, at last become an avalanche to bury beneath its weight the prosperity of the world.

The Rothschild Syndicate

Even in the beginning of this second era of the growth of the Money Power, it realized immense profits—profits so great as enabled the Money Kings to loan the money necessary on both sides to sustain the immense armaments of the wars of the French revolution . They let the British government and the powers warring against France have all the money they required ; and they supplied to Napoleon and his allies the loans necessary for his campaigns.

At that time, for the convenience of the Money Kings, the great house of Rothschild was established . The rise of the house of Rothschild has always been shrouded in the mystery that veils all the operations of the Money Power . The house took immense contracts on both sides ; and made to both sides immense loans . Where the money came from has always been a mystery . The common explanation given of it is wholly inadequate to account for the sudden rise of the house of Rothschild into such enormous wealth . The only way to account for it is to suppose that the Rothschild family was chosen by the Jew Money Kings as the head and fiscal agency of a grand Jewish syndicate formed at that time, to concentrate under one management the money of the Jew capitalists.

It was a great convenience, and a great source of power . The Rothschilds were chosen, perhaps, in part, on account of their superior business qualifications ; and perhaps, in part, because there were three brothers, who could be heads of separate banking houses in London, and Paris and Vienna . By such a syndicate the Jews could lend money and take army contracts on both sides . And if, in the end, one side should achieve a decided triumph, the Rothschild on the winning side could save the Rothschild on the losing side, and thus the money of the Jews would be safe in any event . It was a grand stroke of Jewish skill and policy, the organization of this grand syndicate ; but it was the first instance of the organization of a syndicate in the world and it was never known as such ; but, with the usual readiness of mankind to believe in the sudden growth of vast fortunes from nothing, the world accepted the rise of the house of Rothschild as an individual fortune, and not a syndicate . In our time, when combination of capital into syndicates is common, the house would be recognized at once as the head of a syndicate . The rise of the house of Rothschild is memorable as the first grand combination of the Jews in a syndicate, for the transaction of a vast business in which all their capital might be combined . The Rothschilds became the head of the Jew Money Kings, and have ever since been the head of the Jews, acting as a syndicate . That house is probably at the head of the Jew Money Power of the world.

When Napoleon fell, there remained but one grand imperialism in the world,—the Imperialism of Capital,—the Jew Money Power, centered in the Money Quarter of London . Since the fall of Napoleon, the nations of Europe have been maintaining war military establishments in time of peace, at an expense far beyond their revenues . The London Money Kings have loaned them money to make up the annual deficit . They have invested in national debts alone about twenty-six billion dollars . Besides these national debts, are the loans to states, and counties, and municipalities and corporations and individuals, amounting in the aggregate, as it is estimated, to over fifty billion dollars more.

And then, there are the immense amounts of their own investments in all the countries of the globe . The wealth of the Money Power is simply beyond calculation . It can not amount to less than $160,000,000,000 . It is probably nearer two hundred billions .

CHAPTER III.

RISE OF THE MONEY POWER

THIRD ERA.

The Money Power entered upon the third era of its growth with the application of steam to transportation in railroads and steamships.

The Railroad Era began about 1830 ; but for twenty years after steam was applied to railroads, industry languished throughout all countries of the Temperate zone, for want of sufficient money to transact the business of the world . But little progress was made in applying steam to transportation, until the mines of California first, and then the mines of Australia, and the Rocky Mountains, and old and new mines opened in Mexico and South America gave hundreds of millions of dollars to the circulating medium of the world . In 1850, the age of railroad and steamship building began on a large scale . Then the Money Power was fully embarked in this third era of development.

The Supremacy of the Money Power over Industry, beginning with the application of steam to manufactures, was continued on a still higher plane of power, from 1850 and onward.

The new companies organized out of the dividends of the East India Company soon threw the old parent company into the shade by their gigantic enterprises . The experience of these new corporations seems to have convinced the Money Kings that the territorial sovereignty of the East India Company was a mistake . They found by experience that it was better for them to monopolize industry, commerce and wealth under the protection of a government controlled by them, than to exercise territorial sovereignty themselves . These new corporations began to trade with India, as with the rest of the world.

The East India Company, having no manufactures, was eclipsed as a trading corporation by these new rivals ; and it soon came to restrict itself more and more to its territorial sovereignty . The Money Kings soon found that the new corporations were much better instruments for traffic, and they eventually made the East India Company merely their shield in India, behind whose protection they carried on their traffic . That company governed India entirely in their interest ; for the same stockholders operated the East India Company and the new corporations born of the new age of steam industry.

They finally found the East India Company a burden, and an embarrassment . They derived the same advantage from the protection of the British government as from the Company, and without the cost and trouble . And moreover, bonuses and other advantages given them by the British government were safe and sure, while advantages and franchises given them by the East India Company might be subsequently annulled as unauthorized and fraudulent . To get rid of the expense and danger of maintaining the sovereignty of India, they, at the time of the Sepoy mutiny, influenced the British government to assume the government of India:—and the East India Company, having served its end in giving birth to those new corporations born of its profits, passed away . The spider's brood, true to their nature, devoured their dam.

The Money Kings Greatly Enlarged Their Operations in the new age of steam transportation . They constantly invested their gains in more manufactures, more ships, and more warehouses, all over the earth . And when they made more profits than were needed for such investments—for their profits grew faster than the wants of commerce—they invested their surplus profits in various countries, in lands, in city houses, in building new railroads ; and in buying vast bodies of lands in the Tropics, on which they opened up immense plantations, for the growth of coffee, tea, indigo, rice, opium, spices, and all tropical productions.

They started new enterprises owned by themselves in all the countries of the globe:—tea plantations in China ; coffee plantations in Java and Ceylon ; sheep ranches in Australia and South Africa and South America ; sugar plantations in the West Indies and the Sandwich Islands ; gold and silver mines in California, the Rocky Mountains, Australia, Mexico, and South America ; diamond mines in India, and South Africa and Brazil ; ruby mines in Burmah ; lumber mills in Canada, the United States, Norway, Sweden and Poland ; city buildings in all countries ; and railroads all over the world . These, and many other enterprises employed the boundless capital of the London Money Kings.

City Buildings have been a favorite investment with them in countries of the Temperate zone . They derive two advantages from these investments : the buildings yield a high profit on the investment ; and the Money Kings could thus put up rents in other countries, and increase the cost of living . This last point is an essential part of their industrial system.

In order to maintain the manufacturing supremacy of Great Britain, it is necessary that the cost of living should be as cheap there as in other countries . The price of food is necessarily higher in England than in other countries ; and this has to be counterbalanced by cheaper rents . Rents are very low in England . By owning many buildings in foreign countries, the Money Kings are able to start a prevailing high standard of rents ; which increases their profit on their investment, and raises the cost of living, till it is as high or higher, in other countries, than in England . Furthermore, these high rents increase the value of property, and start foreign capital into real estate speculation, leaving to the Money Kings the safe field of productive industry . — They are wonderfully shrewd, and understand perfectly all the points that benefit their interest, and injure the interest of the rest of the world.

Railroads are Their Favorite Investment in countries of the Temperate zone . The ownership of them not only yields a large return upon the investment, but it gives to the Money Kings entire control of the internal traffic of the countries whose railroads they own . It also enables them to build up cities at points on the railroads known beforehand to themselves ; so that, by getting possession of the land around the site, they make hundreds of millions of dollars in speculations in town lots . With incomes derived from all these various sources, and constantly reinvested—with the whole world tributary to them—it is not wonderful that they have grown so rich . Having taken possession of all the lines of business in which money is to be made, it is no wonder that, for forty years, they have been the only people in the world who had a monied capital . No wonder that, continually impoverished by them, the nations of the earth have never had money to build railroads, or water works, or gas works, or any public buildings, but had always to issue bonds and sell them in London, to get money for all public improvements.

In the age of railroads, these Jew capitalists grew exceeding rich . At the beginning of the Era of Railroad Building, in 1850, no country had any capital, these London Money Kings excepted . The Money Kings alone of all the world had money ; and they have taken special care, during the whole era, to make the world continually poorer by constantly increasing its debt to them .

CHAPTER IV.

FOURTH ERA—DEVOURINGS OF MONEY POWER, SINCE 1864 :

I . aggrandizement of money power general view.

The Money Power has been continually widening its operations in each successive era of its rise . The first era was the era of the East India Company ; and of commerce based upon tropical products, and the exchange of those products for the productions and the specie of the countries of the Temperate zone . In the second era, the Money Power added steam manufactures to the trade with the Tropics, which it previously held . In the third era of its rise, the Money Power added to its previous sources of wealth the vast power derived from the possession of steam transportation in railroads and steamships.

The Fourth Era of the rise of this terrible Imperialism began in 1864 . In this era, armed with the immense capital derived from all its sources of wealth, the Money Power of the World entered upon its vast investments in mortgages in real estate ; and began its career of monopolizing, at a stroke, whole branches of industry and vast lines of trade . This era will end, if things go on as they are, in the Money Power taking possession of all business, and owning all the property of the earth.

Since 1864, the London Jew Money Kings have been continuing their operations on the basis of boundless capital . They have, in this era, vastly extended their operations, and widened the range of their monopolies . Their command of capital is so vast, that they dominate the whole sphere of industry and trade with absolute sway . As against individual enterprises, their power is irresistible.

Like a Great Serpent, the London Money Power is, in our time, enveloping the industry of the earth in the coils of its capital, and crushing all competitors in its folds and devouring them . And it has grown so great, and its monopoly of business is so enormous, that its annual income,—from interest on loans—from rents of houses and farms—from profits of business,—is so vast, that it is able to take possession of a whole line of business at once, destroying all competitors . Woe to the men who are operating in a line of business which these Money Kings desire to monopolize : they at once envelop the feeble rivals in the folds of their capital, and crush and devour them . They now have sufficient capital to seize upon and monopolize all the business of the earth . And they are rapidly doing it.

Parasite Investments

Indeed, their capital is now so vast that business operations will not afford it adequate employment . They can no longer find adequate investment for their constantly increasing income,—in extending their grand industrial enterprises—in loans to nations, states, and municipalities,—in building ships and warehouses and railroads . They can only find investment,—in building cities—in buying up city property—in purchasing and improving immense bodies of wild lands—in laying and foreclosing mortgages upon improved farms—and in buying up breweries, and flour mills, and lumber mills, and various business interests, all over the earth . They own almost all those business interests now : they will soon own the rest.

These parasite investments of the Money Kings are like the fly eggs laid in the nose of the sheep : it is an addition to the amount of bioplasm in the sheep, but, instead of being sheep bioplasm, it is foreign . The eggs will hatch ; and instead of the new life adding to the health and vigor of the sheep, it consumes its life . The worms that breed from the eggs burrow into the head, and if they can not be gotten rid of, the sure result is the death of the sheep.—In the same way, the ox fly lays eggs in the back of the ox, that breed worms ; which, in their development, make the ox as lively as the investments of the Money Power make the nation where its investments are made . But instead of helping the ox, they feed upon his life : they fever him : and if there are so many of these "wolves," as farmers call them, that the ox cannot bear the frenzy caused by their development, the ox will die.

But all these parasites, when full grown, do not continue to prey upon the animal whose life tissues have nursed them into growth . When full grown, they, fortunately for the animal, strive to leave the body on which they have preyed . But it is not so with the investments of the Money Kings . They keep planting more and more of their eggs in the body of all the nations ; and, when the eggs hatch into parasite enterprises, the parasite enterprises continue to prey upon the country, until at last they will sap its strength, and devour its life.

These parasite enterprises of the London Money Kings are like the fly eggs deposited in the body of a caterpillar . If no egg is deposited, the caterpillar spins its cocoon, and at the proper time emerges as a butterfly . But when the fatal egg is deposited, the caterpillar lives on and spins its cocoon, as if in perfect health ; but the parasite develops, and continues its work of destruction, and the caterpillar, instead of emerging from its—chrysalis state, dies in its cocoon with its vitals utterly devoured.—This is what the Money Kings are now doing for all the nations . They are laying parasite eggs of capital in the body of every nation . Either the parasite must be gotten rid of, or the nations will perish.

II . DEVOURINGS OF THE MONEY POWER IN INDIA

The Money Power of the World was nursed into imperial grandeur by the trade and wealth of India . India was its primal seat of dominion . In India, its power has always been uncontrolled and absolute . There, it has been allowed to work its will more thoroughly than any where else ; and in India we can best perceive the ultimate outcome of its policy.

1st . Plunder of Hindoo Potentates.

Until the middle of the Eighteenth Century, the East India Company was only a mercantile corporation, having a few trading stations in India, and deriving its revenues from traffic . Rising into political power through the courage and genius of Clive, it began its career as devourer, in India, by extorting the hoarded wealth of one Hindoo potentate after another, as the price of its aid or its tolerance ; and as the native rulers were successively reduced to bankruptcy and impotence in the crushing coil of the East India Company, that corporation gradually substituted its own administration for that of the native governments . In every advance, it showed the subtlety the crawling insidious guile of the serpent . It enveloped state after state in its coil, and crushed the native governments so relentlessly, and yet so quietly, that when it finally devoured the territory of a fallen potentate, the act attracted but little attention . The East India Company continued its course of quiet gradual appropriation of territory for a century, until the Sepoy revolt in 1857.

2nd . Monopoly of Industry

In the earlier period of its power, the East India Company took possession of all the trade and industry of the territories under its sway . But after the Age of Steam began, and the great British capitalists formed new joint stock corporations through which to carry on the grand industries arising out of steam manufactures, the East India Company lost its importance as a trading corporation . As we have seen, it finally restricted itself to its territorial sovereignty, and gave up to the new corporations the trade of India, giving them every advantage under its administration.

Under this policy, the new corporations of the London Money Kings, advancing step by step, took possession of the business industries of India.

They first took possession of the internal traffic and the foreign commerce of the country . They bought the native products at prices which yielded the wretched Hindoo producers a mere subsistence ; and they sold in the India markets native products and foreign merchandise at the highest prices it was possible to extort . They made all the profits ; and the entire population of India, except the officers and the agents of the Money Kings, was reduced to utter penury.

They continued their encroachments, and gradually got the industry of the country completely under their control . They superseded the old hand manufactures of the country by manufactures wrought by steam, of which these capitalists have entire possession and reap all the profits . And they broke down the old system of transportation, and substituted it by railroads owned by themselves.

For a long time, the Money Kings raised opium, and indigo, and cotton, and rice and other India products, for their commerce, upon lands owned by Hindoos . They made their profit by putting down prices to the lowest point that would yield subsistence to the Hindoo laborer . They thus kept the Hindoo population on the verge of starvation ; so that, during the last forty years, frequent famines have carried off millions of the population.

We know from the Irish famines, that a modern famine is not a dearth of food, so much as the lack of means to buy bread . During one of the famines in Ireland, an American vessel entering the harbor of Cork with provisions sent by American charity to the starving Irish, met two vessels sailing out of the harbor laden with food sent from Ireland to a foreign market . The millions of Hindoos who have perished of hunger, during the last forty years, were the victims of the Money Power putting down prices of labor, and putting up the price of commodities.

3rd . Jungle Plantations

But in the latter era of the growth of the Money Power, since the application of steam to transportation, the Money Kings have realized such vast profits from their world—wide manufactures and commerce, that they have made immense land investments in India . Vast areas of alluvial lands along the plains of the Ganges and the Bramapootra rivers have for ages been covered with the primitive jungle . Much of it is delta lands along the streams ; much of it, broad alluvial plains and uplands, stretching from the sea to the foot of the Himalaya Mountains.

The Money Kings induced the government to offer these jungle lands at a very low price, and those imperial capitalists bought them . They next wished to populate these jungle lands with a race of Hindoo serfs who would till the soli for wages barely sufficient for subsistence . They offered the Hindoos the alternative of emigration to the jungles in their employment, or of starvation in their village homes.

Some Five Million Hindoos Died of Famine before they submitted . But the Money Kings triumphed ; transplanted the Hindoos ; and opened up grand plantations in the jungle . They built railroads ; founded cities ; and now they own cities, railroads and plantations . They own in fee simple a vast empire in India,—an empire of alluvial lands, more extensive than the ancient empires of Nineveh and Babylon in the valleys of the Euphrates and the Tigris—far more extensive than the Egyptian empire in the valley of the Nile—larger than Greece and Macedon combined—wider in extent than Italy—a broader domain than the whole of Great Britain . They find it cheaper to own the land and hire peasants to cultivate it, than to buy the products of free Hindoo labor . And in that wide empire of alluvial lands owned by them in fee simple, extending from the sea to the Himalayas, and from the heart of India into Burmah, those capitalists are now producing opium, and rice, and indigo, and cotton and india rubber, and quinine, and spices, and tea, and cotton and wheat .

4th . All Markets Crushed by India Products.

And they throw all these products of a teeming soil and pauper labor upon the markets of the world, making immense profits, and forcing down the price of productions all over the earth to the pauper standard of Hindoo labor . They are now publishing in our papers that they can grow wheat so cheaply upon their jungle lands, that, in competition with them, our Western farmers can only be allowed, in future, fifty cents a bushel for their wheat ! Will not Omnipotent Justice blast such wrong doing ? !

By the Competition of their Hindoo Plantations, tilled with Hindoo Ryot labor at five cents a day, they force down the price of Carolina rice and Southern cotton to the same level . Raising products upon their own lands with Hindoo pauper labor—shipping their products upon their own railroads into their own seaport cities—and transporting them in their own ships to their own warehouses in every country—these Money Kings are able to crush down the prices of productions in every country, and force the people of all countries to sell their products at any price they choose to offer ! !

An Important Fact is learned from the course of the Money Power in India . The Money Kings find it more profitable to own lands and till them with pauper labor, than to buy the products reared by the free natives of the soil . They regard the purchase of cheap lands a good investment . They will doubtless continue the purchase of India lands, until they own all the lands of India, and all property of every kind, and the Hindoos become serfs, cultivating their lands, and filling positions in various departments of their service.

How can it be otherwise ? Every department of industry in that country, except agriculture in part, is in their hands . They have in possession every source of profit . They and their agents realize all the profits that are made : nobody else makes more than a subsistence . The Money Power has India enveloped in its coils . It is only a question of time when the Serpent will complete the devouring of all its lands and all its property .

And we shall perceive as we proceed, that the Boa Constrictor has our country in almost the same condition as India . If things go on, in a few years more the Money Kings will own a wider empire of farming lands in the United States than in India ; and the American farmer will be reduced to the condition of the Hindoo peasant laborer working for a few cents a day, or he may look on and see the lands he has lost cultivated by Chinese and Hindoos . We shall be reduced to the condition of slaves . There is a bottomless pit before us . The Money Power is preparing to plunge us into it .

CHAPTER V.

FOURTH ERA — DEVOURINGS OF THE MONEY POWER IN THE U. S.

Space will not admit of a full narration of the manner in which the Money Power is devouring industry and trade and wealth, throughout the world . While the head and the den of the Serpent are in England, its coils extend all over the earth . It is everywhere ruining business men, and taking possession of their business and property . In Europe, in Asia, in Africa, in South America, in Mexico, in Canada, in Australia, and in the Islands of the sea, it is constantly pursuing its deadly business of monopolizing the industry, trade and wealth of the world, by ruining people engaged in independent enterprise . But space will only admit of a statement, in part, of its devouring the industries of the United States .

This Knot of London Jew Capitalists is having its way in the United States more completely than anywhere else in the world, except India . In England, the Landed Aristocracy holds its own against the Money Power, in part, by the law of primogeniture, which enables it to maintain possession of the land, and much city property ; and by the marriages of the sons of the landed aristocracy with the daughters of rich Englishmen associated with the Jew Money Kings and sharing their profits .

But, in America, the Money Power has had free course to ravage and devour .

I . THE MONEY POWER HAS KEPT OUR CURRENCY CONSTRICTED .

The Money Kings have always had to have American products, as the basis of their trade with the population of Britain, and with the whole earth . They needed our cotton for their English manufactures : our wheat and pork, and beef, to feed their British operatives : our hops, and barley, for the manufacture of malt liquors, for British and foreign consumption : our fats, for the manufacture of soaps ; and our tobacco, for the British and foreign markets . Great Britain afforded them only coal, and iron and labor . American productions have constituted the grand basis of their world-wide manufactures and commerce .

It was, therefore, their interest to buy our products cheap ; and, to that end, it was their interest to have in this country as low a scale of prices as possible . An effectual means of securing a low rate of prices for cotton tobacco, wheat, cotton, cheese, and all our products, was to keep money scarce in this country, and its purchasing value very high .

And during almost our entire existence as a nation, the scarcity of money, which the Money Kings have caused, has enabled them to keep down prices to the lowest point, and cause our people to suffer from chronic hard times .

1st. The Crash of 1837 .

Our people once carried the idea that industry should be left to take care of itself, to the extreme of holding that the general Government should not supply currency to the country, but should leave it to be supplied by the states, and by individuals . Our currency was on a specie basis ; and it was held that the proper proportion between specie and currency was, specie to the amount of one-third of the paper circulating medium, to be kept in the vaults of banks .

This Abominable Currency System placed our currency, and the price of our products, completely under the control of the London Money Kings . For the Money Kings always had the balance of trade against us ; and they always purposely kept us drained of specie, so that, on a specie basis of one-third of the circulation, we could maintain only a sparse currency .

But, in 1836, our system of paper money was expanded to a point in some measure adequate to meet the business wants of the country . For the first time, our produce went up to a fair price, sufficient to give us prosperity . We then had a paper circulation of $136,000,000 ; certainly not an inflated currency for the amount of our population and trade, being less than half the amount of currency per capita we had in 1870 .

But, we did not have Specie enough to maintain the one-third specie basis . The Money Kings had no idea of paying a fair price for the American produce they were obliged to have . It was increasing the value of our exports ; and would soon enable us to pay with our products for the imports we bought of them ; and we should soon have been able to secure specie enough for a safe basis for our circulating medium . They wished to keep money scarce, and prices low ; so as to compel us to sell them our products so cheap as to keep the balance of trade against us . By thus keeping us in debt to them, they could keep us drained of specie, and keep money scarce and prices low, perpetually .

To this end, money must be made scarce, and times hard . The state banks were banking on a specie basis, and had not nearly specie enough to redeem their issues . It was only necessary for one prominent bank to fail, in order to cause a run on all the banks, and a suspension of specie payments ; with a consequent contraction of the currency, scarcity of money and low prices, again .

The Money Kings made a heavy draft for specie on New York . A prominent bank in New York failed, and the state banks all over the country went down like a house of cards

. Contraction of the currency followed at once . In 1842, five years after the panic, we had in the whole country only $64,000,000 of currency, being only a little over three dollars per capita of the population ! It was horrible . A tide of bankruptcy without a precedent overswept the country . For thirteen years, from 1837 to 1850, scarcity of money continued, keeping our prosperity depressed, and making our prices low enough to satisfy the avarice of the London Money Kings, who got our wheat, and cotton, and pork and beef at any price they chose to offer .

The astonishing folly of our people in allowing the Money Kings to put down prices in this country by means of a scarcity of currency will excite the wonder of a later and wiser age . These Money Kings never buy anything of us they can do without . They have always had to have a certain amount of our cotton, pork and beef and wheat and barley and hops . They can not do without them . If we sustain the price at a fair rate they will have to pay it . And yet, from 1837 to 1850, we allowed them, by draining us of specie, to contract our currency to three dollars per capita, and put our prices down to starvation rates ! What lamentable ignorance of the principles of political economy ! By allowing the Money Kings to keep our currency contracted, we allowed them to cheat us out of about $100,000,000 a year in the value of our exportsto get us deeper into debt to them every year, and to keep our people oppressed with direful poverty . Our fathers showed great unwisdom . Are their children wiser ?

Our produce had an actual value, which the Money Kings would have had to pay . But by basing our currency on specie, of which they could drain us, we kept our produce at an artificially low price . We thus lost every year a hundred million dollars by putting our products at an artificial price below their real value . The Money Kings are wise : they no doubt laughed in their sleeve at our simplicity in thus allowing a price to be fixed upon our products below their real value .

The London Money Kings organized the crash of 1837 . They drew on New York heavily for specie, just before the panic . The balance of trade is always against us and in their favor, and they could draw for specie as long and as heavily as they pleased . And they continued to draw specie, till the end they aimed at was accomplished, and the panic began . There can be no doubt that they did it with full intent to bring about the panic that followed .

2nd. The Crash of 1857 .

There was no expansion of the currency after 1837, till after the discovery of the gold mines of California . In 1850, the state banks again began to expand, and once more we had fair prices for produce, and prosperous times . The expansion continued till 1857 . There was no undue inflation . The currency was not in excess of the legitimate needs of business, and prices were not too high .

But the currency was in excess of our capability of redeeming it in specie . All the gold taken out of the mines in California was sent direct to London, to pay, in part, the balance of trade against us . The London Money Kings took care that we should not have specie enough to constitute a one-third basis for a currency adequate to the business wants of the country . They, having the power to regulate the amount of specie we were allowed to keep, did not choose to leave in the United States specie enough to furnish a basis for an amount of currency adequate to give us fair prices .

The fall of a Trust Company Bank in Ohio started a panic and brought on a general crash of the state banks, with the natural result of hard times, and a cheap market, in which the Money Kings could buy our produce at their own price .

The Panic of 1857 Was, Beyond Question, Engineered by the London Money Kings . They took especial pains to get possession of the circulation of the Ohio Trust Company Bank, whose fall caused the panic, and they made extraordinary drafts upon it for specie, amounting to $5,000,000, so as to insure its fall . Of two things one is certain : Either the Money Kings owned the Trust Company Bank, so that they could get possession of its circulation at any time, and start the panic ; or else they took especial pains to gather up its circulation, so that they might drain it of specie . From the name of the institution,—"Trust Company,"—in the light of our own times, when these Money Kings are starting "Trusts" all over the world, it seems most probable that the Trust Company Bank was established by the London Money Power for the express purpose of using it as an instrument to start the panic .

In either case, they are pilloried before the eyes of our people, as making secret war upon our prosperity . It is like the secret underhanded methods of the Money Kings to start a bani in this country, in order to have it ready, at any moment they chose, to start a panic by its fall ; on purpose to break down our prosperity, and give them a cheap market in which to purchase our products, necessary to their commercial system .

The Boa Constrictor thus Kept Itself Coiled about our currency system, and it has constricted our currency every time it expanded sufficiently to give us fair prices . They have thus been able to buy our products at little more than half their value, cheating us in this manner out of hundreds of millions of dollars every year, and keeping us in poverty . By the low prices thus maintained, the Money Power has kept the balance of trade hundreds of millions against us every year ; and this adverse balance of trade has been kept even, by lending us money to build railroads, and to use in every form of public improvement ; thus by its loans coiling around our industry and our property, and constantly devouring it .

The Money Kings are public enemies, all the more dangerous because they work by such sly, secret undermining methods .

For forty years, from 1820 to 1860, prices were kept down and times hard . Twice we were about to become prosperous, in 1836, and in 1856 ; when both times, the Money Kings promptly crushed our rising prosperity . In the forty years, from 1820 to 1860, they cheated us, by these low prices, out of at least four billions of dollars—enough to have made us the richest and most prosperous people on the globe .

One great Benefit of the Late War was, that it caused the Federal Government to furnish a currency that was not subject to collapse by the Money Kings withdrawing specie from the country . The Money Kings brought on the crash of 1873 . But they could not do it by withdrawing specie . They were under the necessity of resorting to other means . Before presenting the means by which the crash of 1873 was brought about, it will be better to bring up the account of their working in the country to that date, so that their operations upon the currency in 1873 may be better understood .

II . THE MONEY POWER DEVOURED OUR COMMERCIAL MARINE .

The War afforded the Money Power the opportunity to strike us a deadly blow, in taking possession of our merchant shipping . The means by which they accomplished this was in perfect accord with their watchful craft and cunning . One of their ship building establishments built the steam cruisers which swept the seas, capturing many American vessels . Their depredations so raised the cost of marine insurance, that American vessels could no longer compete with those of Great Britain . Under such circumstances, American ship owners became willing to sell their ships . The Money Kings had gained so much money by their world-wide operations that, as soon as the vessels were offered for sale, they were ready to purchase them . In a few months the American ships were all purchased by the Money Kings, and transferred from the American to the British flag . At one grand gulp the Boa Constrictor swallowed down the American navy .

While we had our commercial marine, we received for our produce the ruling price in the foreign port ; and the profits were divided between the American producer, the American merchant who exported the produce, and the American ship owner who carried it . But thenceforth, we only received the New York price : the Money Kings realized all the profits beyond our own shores .

But this was too much for them to be willing for us to receive . They wished to get closer to the producer, and leave to our people as small a part of the price of our products as possible . Having driven us off the ocean, they now invaded our frontiers, resolved upon conquering and taking possession of every branch of industry in the country . The history of the encroachments of the Money Power upon our industries is one long tragedy .

III . THE MONEY POWER DESTROYED OUR NEW YORK MERCHANTS .

The first step in the encroachments of the Money Power upon our national industries, was their overthrow of the great New York wholesale merchants . It began its movement against them immediately after the War . But it proceeded to the accomplishment of its aim with such subtlety and craft, that our people have not known of the destruction of the grandest merchants in the country .

I Only Found It Out in 1880, when I spent some time in New York city . The man at whose house I boarded told me one day in conversation that he had been rich, but had failed in business : he then obtained a support by taking boarders .

"Misery loves company," said he ; "and the only consolation I have is that all the tall trees of the forest fell, when I went down . Why sir," he continued, "not more than three or four business men in New York, who were prominent in business before the War, are in business now . They all failed . Nobody knew what hurt them ; but, from some cause, nobody knows what, business took new channels ; their business left them ; and they broke . How business changed in New York since the War," he continued meditatively, "is incomprehensible to everybody ."

Here was a grand effect ; and I began to search out the cause . I was then familiar with the methods of the Money Kings . I had been watching their course for years in this country, and it was not difficult to find and follow their trail, on the war path against the New York merchants .

A Still Hunt was started against the New York wholesale merchants . The London Money Kings owned the English manufactures and the mercantile shipping houses . They started branch houses in New Yorkfilled them with splendid stocks of goods—and then they started the English Drummer System in this country . The Drummer System was originated in England, over half a century ago, to accomplish the same purpose there against the old merchants of Great Britain, that was now wrought out by it in the United States . The Money Kings, by means of it, drew all the trade of the country to their own New York branch houses .

The Western and Southern merchants had been in the habit of visiting New York City, once or twice a year, to buy new stocks of goods . But now, the drummers of the Money King branch houses offered the Southern and Western merchants goods, by sample, of better quality, and at lower prices, than they could get them in New York . The old New York merchants waited for their customers to come . When, supplied by drummers, they quit coming, the old merchants, suppressed by English branch houses, failed, and retired from business .

It would be an interesting investigation to discover to what extent the Money Kings subsidized the old mercantile houses of New York City in their campaign . It is usually their custom to get some of the business interests already established on their side—reorganize them with a vast capital—take a controlling interest of the stock of the new companies to themselves—but leave them under the old name, and the old management . It seems that they adopted this policy toward only a few of the mercantile houses of New York City . The few old houses that remained standing doubtless became the allies of the Money Power . But they seem to have made almost a clean sweep substituting new houses for the old .

In their conquest of the New York merchants, the Money Kings employed the tactics which they always use . As they availed themselves of their immense capital to put down prices on the New York merchants, so their method always is to put down prices on every business interest they assail . The unfailing sign of their assault on a business, is a putting down of prices in the business .

The Money Kings Always Operate Through Joint Stock Corporations in order to conceal their operations . A company is started in mercantile or other business by three or four persons associated in a joint stock corporation . It can not be known but that those persons constitute the entire company . There is nothing to indicate that the stockholders are the London Money Kings, and that the company is operated on British capital . It seems to the public that it is an American firm . But if the Company books of one of these conquering Companies that break down old business interests could be inspected, it would be found that the stockholders who furnish its unlimited capital are in London .

IV . The Money Power Devoured our Railroads

The secretive methods of the Money Power are nowhere more fully displayed than in the manner in which it got possession of our railroads .

The advantages of owning our railroads were so vast and so obvious, that the Money Power, having boundless wealth could not fail to purchase them .

1st . The Foundation of their Ownership of our Railroads was laid with consummate skill and craft . They took their first steps at the time of their construction .

1 . Many Lines, like the Illinois Central, were avowedly built and run by London capitalists . — Many lines of railroad were built by them in the West in consideration of land grants . —And many lines have been pushed by large railroad companies through new districts of country, for the sake of the trade to be obtained .

2 . The Money Kings got the Other Roads

by means of mortgages . The great Trunk Lines, and indeed, almost all the railroads east of the Mississippi, were built by the issue of bonds, and were ironed by the Money Kings for first mortgage bonds . The Money Kings always got possession of the roads under an arrangement of the mortgage .

Some of us recollect, along in the 50's, what hard work we had to build our railroads . We had no wealth : we had to build them with our poverty . We had no capital : we had to build them with debt . When two cities wished to link themselves with an iron girdle, they issued bonds to the extent of their credit : they induced all the counties along the line to issue bonds ; and these bonds were always sold in London—the only place in the world where there was any cash capital—in order to get money to build the road-bed . Sometimes it required several issues of bonds, with intervals of despondency, and even despair, before the road-bed was completed . When the road-bed, or a considerable part of it, was completed, it was well known that the London Money Kings would furnish the iron and rolling stock, at the rate of $10,000 a mile, secured on first mortgage bonds .

I recollect that in 1855 to 1857, one of our cities was making tremendous efforts to build a railroad reaching toward a great business center . After two or three efforts made with intervals of deep despondency, over one hundred miles of the road-bed was at last completed ; and one of the most distinguished citizens of the state was sent to London, to negotiate for the iron for the road . He succeeded in his object ; but, being a man of enlarged views, he came back astounded . He said he found men from all over the world in London on the same business as himself : all wishing to get iron for railroads, at $10,000 a mile, secured on first mortgage bonds : and they all got the iron . He said, " These London capitalists are sure to get the railroads for the first mortgage bonds ; and no man can foresee the consequences . It will certainly work a mighty change in the condition of the earth, when these capitalists get possession of all the land transportation of the world . No man can tell what the result will be ."

We are now seeing some of the evils which this statesman of a generation ago dimly foreshadowed .

In this railroad financiering we have a fair specimen of the management of these Jew capitalists . When the railroads were first started, they made but little money . The system of operating them was as yet crude and imperfect and the business that has since grown up along them, and made them profitable, was as yet in its infancy . As a rule, the Money Kings got possession of the railroads under some arrangement of the first mortgage bonds .

The Money Kings are the owners of our railroads . It is known that the Erie railroad is owned by the great house of John Bidall Martin, in Lombard street, London . A mortgage was placed upon the Milwaukee and St. Paul, last July, for $150,000,000, which was taken in Lombard street, London . John Bidall Martin was the head of a syndicate which foreclosed the mortgage on the Wabash railroad system, two years ago .

A favorite method with these capitalists of holding railroads, is to have them bonded to them on mortgage security . They never pay for these bonds more than about forty-five per cent. of their face value . Whatever else goes unpaid, the interest on these bonds must be met, or the mortgage is foreclosed . The Roads are thus mortgaged for their full value, and the owners of the bonds are really the owners of the railroads . The mortgage, together with some preferred stock on which interest is sometimes paid, absorbs the earnings of the road . The rest of the stock receives no dividends, and is of no actual value . The bond holders are practically the owners of the roads . It is only a question of time when the bond holders will take possession of their prey . They would do it at any time if the management of those who may hold the stock does not suit them . But the probability is that they keep in their hands a controlling interest of the stock, so as to secure the present control of the roads .

In the second place, it is certain that

2nd . If the Money Kings were ever in Possession of the Railroads, they own them still .

1 . The Laws of Political Economy Prove that, if the London Money Kings ever got possession of the Railroads, they have them still . We could never have bought them back by any possibility, unless the Balance of Trade were in our favor . For, without such a favorable Balance of Trade, our people could never possibly have the means to buy the railroads back . But the Balance of Trade has been steadily against us all the while . Hence, it is perfectly manifest that the railroads are still in the hands of the Money Power . This is as certain as any fact in the world of nature . For the laws of political economy are as fixed as the laws of nature .

2 . The History of the Money Power Proves that no Americans have ever bought back Railroads once in possession of the Money Kings . It is a fixed rule with the Money Kings never to take an interest in any business, without having a controlling interest in the stock ; and having got a controlling interest in any enterprise, they work it, and never sell it . They are always buying property : They never sell ; except indeed, batches of stock, to gulls, in Wall street operations ! If the Money Power ever got a controlling interest in American railroads, they never sold it out again, and no Americans ever had in their own ownership the controlling interest in such American railroads .

3 . an objection

may be presented here, that many American railroads, and those the most valuable, are notoriously owned by Americans : that the Vanderbilts own the New York Central system—that Jay Gould owns a large system in his own right—that Tom Scott owned the Pennsylvania Central—that Garrett owns the Baltimore and Ohio—and that Huntingdon owns the Chesapeake and Ohio and its connections .

This is a matter of such importance to the American people that it ought to be thoroughly sifted . These men have claimed to be the owners of these grand railroad systems ; —but are they ? Or are they merely the agents of the London Money Kings, holding the railroads in trust for them ?

3rd . circumstantial evidence that amounts to scientific demonstration

proves that these men are the agents of the London Money Kings .

It is remarkable that very many peculiar facts have come to light about these railroad magnates, which prove at our American "railroad kings," so-called, are only the agents of the London Money Kings . The proof is stronger than could be expected, when the Money Kings everything in their power to conceal their ownership . They have always systematically concealed their trace, so that no direct evidence of their ownership can be found . Their actions are always in the dark .—But a midnight murderer or a burglar can be convicted on circumstantial evidence . So, if the ownership of the railroads by the London Money Kings were a felony, there is sufficient proof to send them to state prison .

1 . Jay Gould an Agent for British Capitalist's

A large number of facts prove this : —

1) In 1873, Jay Gould and Jim Fisk were full partners in the ownership of the New York and Erie R.R. Holding $23,000,000 of railroad stocks, they were thought to be worth over $10,000,000 each . They were full partners, and were supposed to be worth about the same amount . It is perfectly evident that Fisk and Gould were not the real owners of the Erie railroad . As the trail of a serpent can only be seen when the snake crosses a dusty road, so the track of the Money Kings can usually be seen only when it runs across the grave of an agent . The settlements made at death frequently show that the reputed millionaire was only an agent of the Money Kings .

When Fisk was killed, in 1873, he, as has been stated, was thought to be worth $11,000,000, as he was holding that amount of railroad stock . But when his estate was wound up, his family received only a few thousand dollars . Thus the settlement of his estate after his death, showed conclusively that Fisk was only an agent, holding, in connection with Gould, the Erie railroad for the real stockholders in Great Britain . There can be no doubt that Jay Gould, his partner, was their agent also .

Once finding Mr. Gould acting as the agent of the Money Kings, creates a strong presumption, that, in his subsequent operations, he is also the agent of European capitalists . But the case does not rest on mere presumption . It is perfectly certain that, in all his subsequent operations, Jay Gould has been only an agent of the London Money Kings, holding the railroads ostensively owned by him in trust for them .

2) Jay Gould's Railroad System belongs to the Money Kings . In 1873, Jay Gould could hardly have been worth more than his partner, Jim Fisk . In the hard times that followed 1873, nobody in America could make much money . Yet, in 1878, Jay Gould came out West with forty million dollars, as it was given out through the newspapers, and bought ten thousand miles of railroad ; and the American people were made to believe that it was his money, and that he himself owned, in his own right, the railroads of the Gould system . His wealth was regarded as enormous . He was reputed the richest man in America . His wealth has been estimated as high as two hundred million dollars .

But of late years, facts have transpired, which show conclusively that Jay Gould is only the agent of the Money Power, to hold and operate their railroads :—

The Wabash System is one-half of the ten thousand miles of railroad in the Gould System . Some years ago, the Wabash System became embarrassed, and was placed in the hands of a receiver . Mr. Gould no doubt supposed that it might affect his credit for the American people to suppose that he could not sustain the credit of his roads ; so he had an interview with a New York reporter, which fell under my eye, in which he said that much the greater number of the stockholders of the Wabash System were in Great Britain, and only a few in the United States : —and Jay Gould is one of the few ! —It is evident that Jay Gould is not the owner of the Wabash System !

The rest of the ten thousand miles of the Gould System consists of the Missouri Pacific, the Missouri Kansas and Texas, the Texas Pacific, and the Iron Mountain Railroads . The Texas Pacific did not belong to may Gould, for its stockholders have had it taken out of the Gould System by process of law .—The Missouri Kansas and Texas did not belong to him ; for its stockholders also, have brought suit and withdrawn the Road out of the Gould System .

Indeed, a short time since, Mr. Gould had an interview with a reporter, which I saw, in which he stated that he held more stock in the Missouri Pacific than all his other investments put together . The Missouri Pacific is a Road three hundred miles long, running from St . Louis to Kansas City . And Mr. Gould's stock in that road amounts to more than all his other investments put together ! And he does not even own all of that three hundred miles of railroad .—And yet Mr. Gould was the ostensible owner of ten thousand miles of railroad and worth two hundred million dollars ! !

When we find one of the ostensible great owners of a grand railroad system to be merely an agent of the Money Power, it gives rise to a strong presumption that the other reputed owners of great railroad systems are also agents of the Money Power .

2 . Vanderbilt an Agent of the Money Power

There is a large amount of cumulative evidence to prove that Commodore Vanderbilt was an agent of the Money Kings : —

I) Commodore Vanderbilt was originally a poor man . He first rose into prominence as the manager of a line of steamers, running in the Isthmus route from New York to San Francisco . But when he quit the ship line and went into Wall street speculation in railroad stocks, he was worth only one million dollars . Manifestly, therefore, he was not the owner of the steamship line, but was holding and operating it as the agent for the stockholders, who were largely English .

If Commodore Vanderbilt was the agent of the Money Kings in operating the steamship line, and was afterwards transferred by them to Wall street, to operate for them there, it will explain many things otherwise unaccountable .

2) Vanderbilt always operated in Wall street as a bull . In other words, he was always buying railroad stocks . I recollect reading a work written when his operations were the wonder of the whole country, in which the author said that Vanderbilt had an unlimited purse back of him . Nobody knew where he got his money, but the money at his command was practically without limit . Frequently he had the whole street against him, but he was always able to put down any combination that was formed against him . He had more money at his command than could be brought against him in all America .

It is idle to suppose that Vanderbilt was able to carry his vast operations through, with the one million dollars he was worth when he went into Wall street . Many of the operators there who combined against him were each far richer than he . We can only account for his immense operations, which required the command of unlimited capital to carry them to the successful issue he always attained, on the hypothesis that he was the agent of the London Money Kings to buy up railroad stocks for them .

I recollect that when Vanderbilt bought out Harlem, a little railroad some twenty odd miles long, the whole world was astonished that one man was able to buy and own an entire railroad . He soon afterwards bought the Hudson River railroad, and the New York Central ; and he continued to purchase railroads, until he owned a grand system extending far into the Northwest . It was impossible for Commodore Vanderbilt to have conducted his immense operations with his own limited capital . If he was the agent of the Money Kings, all is explained .

3) At his death, Commodore Vanderbilt was reputed to be worth one hundred million dollars . When, in his will, he divided out only three and one half millions among his children, that fact confirmed me in my belief that he was an agent of the Money Power, and that the three and one half million dollars was all he was really worth ; and that, in giving the rest of the property, including the railroads, to his son Wm. H. Vanderbilt, he simply transferred the agency to him . This view was confirmed by the fact that Wm. H. Vanderbilt, immediately after his father's death, went to London, as I believed, to see his principals, and have his agency confirmed .

4) A fact which occurred in 1880, was, to my mind, conclusive evidence that Wm. H. Vanderbilt was only an agent . He then transferred a controlling interest in the New York Central System to a syndicate of New York capitalists, avowedly representing English capitalists, for $50,000,000 ; which he at once invested in four per cent United States bonds. Now, I do not think that Mr. Vanderbilt would have done that, if the property had been his. The transaction is contrary to all the laws of human motive .

I] The stock made him a Railroad King—one of the most influential men in America . And it was paying him far more than four per cent .

2] A man owning a grand railroad system under his own absolute control would not jeopardize his interests, by selling a controlling interest to foreign capitalists . Nor would an astute financier like Vanderbilt have sold a controlling interest in a grand railroad system which must have been paying much more than four per cent., to invest the money in four per cent. bonds . It is not in human nature to make so bad a bargain .

3] Nor does it accord with the pride of a railroad magnate thus to abdicate power, and step down and out . If Mr. Vanderbilt was a free agent, his action is inexplicable by all the laws of human motive .

4] But if he was an agent of the London Money Kings, and an order came from headquarters to make the transfer, he would have to "obey orders ."

5] And this was probably the fact . Mr. Vanderbilt was a haughty irritable man, and exceedingly indiscreet in his utterances . If an agent, he was not the best man to keep in such a responsible position . His utterances, "d__ the people," and "I do not run my roads for the benefit of the people", exposed him to popular odium, and would not commend him to his principals .

6] At the next election after his transfer of stock Mr. Vanderbilt was elected a director in all the roads of the system ; but he was made president of only a subordinate road . He was evidently very much humiliated, and made a meek speech in which he said he had no doubt the new arrangement would be more agreeable to the stockholders .

7] He did with the United States bonds bought by him just what he would have done if he were an agent acting under orders from his superiors in London . What did he do with them ? Did he keep them in New York, as he would naturally have done if they had been his own ? No : he at once deposited them in London, in the banking house of John Bidall Martin, in Lombard street .

5) The provisions of the will of Wm. H. Vanderbilt bear out the idea that he was an agent of the London Money Kings . He divided his property among his children more equally than his father had done ; but he gave to one son $56,000,000, a controlling interest in the railroad system ; and he provided that all the property should remain together . This arrangement would secure the control of the railroad system to the Money Kings, as effectually as the arrangement made by his father .

I do not doubt, however, that Gould and the Vanderbilts are rich in their own right . The Money Kings pay their agents well . Their rule is to give them a large, though minority interest, in the property they manage . And then, the position of Commodore Vanderbilt, and later, of Jay Gould, and Wm. H. Vanderbilt, would give them vast opportunities of making a great deal of money for themselves in operations in Wall street . But all the cumulative facts prove that Commodore Vanderbilt was an agent of the Money Kings—facts which are wholly inconsistent with the idea that the Vanderbilt family really owns the railroads it holds in possession .

If the grand so called "Railroad King" in America, is only an agent of the London Money Kings, what a commentary upon the grandeur of those imperial capitalists !

3 . Tom Scott was the reputed owner of the Pennsylvania Central ;—but, since his death, we hear nothing of his heirs being the owners of that railroad system .

4 . C. P. Huntingdon has been the reputed owner of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad and connections . Where did he make the money to buy it ?

(I) At the time the Central Pacific Railroad was projected, Huntingdon was a grocer with limited means in San Francisco . He and his coadjutors built the Central Pacific Railroad . Many facts indicate that they were merely the agents of the Money Power in that enterprise . The United States government aid was only paid when a stipulated number of miles of railway had been completed : the men in the construction company had not the means to do so much work before receiving the government subsidy . All Americans who have a grand enterprise in hand go to London to get the money to accomplish it . Now, the Money Kings would not have suffered Huntingdon and company to remain principals in the ownership of the road for the construction of which the Money Kings furnished the money . They would certainly demand, as the only condition on which they would furnish the money for construction, that the franchise should be transferred to them, and that Huntingdon and his friends should become their agents to build and operate the road .

(2) When Huntingdon appeared before a Congressional Committee, he insisted that the Central Pacific road was in very straitened circumstances . When a member of the Committee asked him if he shared the depressed financial condition of the road, he paused for a considerable time before replying ; and finally answered with extreme caution,—"No : I am said to be rich ."—He insisted that he had made no money out of the Central Pacific ; but that everything he was worth had been realized from other enterprises .

I take all this to be a reserved statement of the actual truth . The Money Kings would get the lion's share of the profits of constructing and operating the Central Pacific ; to Huntingdon and the others would be allowed the jackal's portion .

(3) But, if Huntingdon made no money out of the Central Pacific Railroad, where did he get the money to buy the Chesapeake and Ohio, and the other railroads of the system ? We are forced to the conclusion that Huntingdon does not own those railroads at allthat he is the agent of the Money Kings, and holds his roads, as Gould does his system, in trust for the real owners .

His answer to the Congressional Committee indicates such a state of facts . He said "I am said to be rich ." Such would be the cautious language of a man who was thought to be the owner of a great railroad system, when he knew himself to be the agent of the Money Power .

5 . In the case of Garrett, the facts fully comport with the idea that he is the agent of the Money Kings ; but not at all with the idea of a man owning a vast railroad system in his own right . But as it would be necessary to comment on his personal misfortunes, in order to make out the case, it is passed without further notice . It is sufficient to say that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad is fully mortgaged to London bond holders .

The whole question of the ownership of the American railroads is veiled in mystery . But, however carefully it is hidden, the Money Kings have the property securely in their hands .

Everything proves that the Money Kings are the owners of our railroads . The author of a pamphlet given me in London, in 1864, told the truth when he said of the Money Kings, as will be hereafter quoted,—"We are the railway builders of the world, and the actual owners of the greater part of the railways ." They have had plenty of time since then, to have purchased what they did not then own ; and they have been very busy in Wall street, during the entire interval .

CHAPTER VI.

DEVOURINGS OF THE MONEY POWER IN THE UNITED STATES

V . The Money Power Devours Our Oil Industry

Upon the discovery of oil in Pennsylvania, many Americans embarked in the new enterprise ; spending millions in prospecting for oil, and millions more in operating successful wells, engaged in active and healthy competition in the oil market . The aggregate profits of the business attracted the attention of the Money Power, which promptly took steps to crush the American well owners, and monopolize the business .

The measures adopted were as quiet, as sudden, as effectual, as the coil of the boa constrictor about its victim . A railroad was built to the oil regions ;—but it was not built to the oil wells, so that all the well owners might ship by it, but its terminus was fifteen miles away on one side . A few wells were purchased, to start the business ; and a pipe line company was organized, and a pipe line was laid from the wells purchased, out to the railroad, with steam engines stationed at intervals, to force onward the sluggish flow of oil .

At that time, six thousand wagons were hauling oil over corduroy roads out to the railroad . Of course, the well owners, hauling on wagons, could not compete with the pipeline, after it went into operation . The profits of oil were put down to a point that barely covered expenses, with the best facilities . The individual well owners had to plug up their wells, waiting for another railroad to be built into the oil regions, over which they might ship . But these Money Kings never jostle each other . No other railroad was built . The oil well owners, in despair, had to sell out to the Money Kings, at any price they chose to offer .

The Great Standard Oil Company, operating with a capital of $90,000,000 in the United States, has now, by a long course of oppression crushing all competitors, taken possession of the entire oil industry of the country, and established a mighty monopoly .

A number of striking facts point out the Standard Oil Company as one of the monopolies of the London Money Power :—

I . The monopoly of the oil industry is part of a grand system . We find the Money Kings engaged in establishing monopolies all over the world, and especially in our country . We naturally conclude that the oil monopoly is also a part of their system .

2 . A detective can identify a burglar by his method . This oil monopoly was established in perfect accordance with the method of the Money Power . The combination of cunning, secretiveness and the deadly coil of omnipotent capital is unmistakable .

3 . No American capitalists were powerful enough to break down the oil well owners by dint of unlimited capital .

4 . No American capitalists would have engaged in such an enterprise, when the oil well owners might have foiled the attempt by obtaining English capital to counterwork them . Only the Money Kings would have engaged in an attempt that required such an immense outlay ; for only they could be sure of being able to carry out the design without interference from other capitalists . They are thoroughly organized, and never interfere with each other .

5 . It is manifest that the Standard Oil Company is not an American corporation . The method and the extent of its operations show that it is an enterprise of the Money Kings . For the Standard Oil Company is operating in Russia as largely as in the United States . It owns hundreds of millions of acres of Russian oil lands, and is supplying the neighboring markets from those oil wells, just as it is supplying the American markets from the oil wells of Pennsylvania . The Standard Oil Company, like all the monopolies of the Money Kings, is world-wide in its operations . Unlimited capital behind it enables it to construct facilities for carrying on its business,—a grand pipe line from the oil wells to the seaboard—grand refineriestank cars for transportation of refined oil,these and other things gave it such advantages as enabled it to put down all competition and maintain a monopoly of the business . It evidently aims to secure a monopoly of the oil trade for centuries to come .

Unlimited capital has enabled the Money Power to crush in its coil the original proprietors of the oil wells without the possibility of resistance . The same unlimited capital enables the Money Power to crush competition in every line of business, and thus to devour every business interest in the country . And it has been successively devouring one branch of business after another, until its grand imperialism now covers our land throughout its whole extent .

VI . The Money Power Devours Chicago

The Money Power, owning the railroads, and seeking to get into its clutches all our industries, as we shall see it has done, needed to have a great city, upon which to center the railroads and the trade controlled by it .

In 1870, Chicago was rapidly becoming a railroad and business center for the Northwest . It was the city best adapted to become the trade center of the country, except perhaps, St. Louis . But St. Louis was out of the question, its business being operated by home capital well established . In order that the Money Kings might be able to centralize the trade of the country in their hands, it was necessary for them to get a secure clutch upon Chicago .

The great fire of 1871 afforded them their opportunity . Nobody ever knew how it originated . A high wind prevailing at the time swept the flames through the heart of the city, leaving a path of desolation three-fourths of a mile wide . The business center of Chicago was reduced to ashes .

The business community had been doing business in cheap two-story houses . In rebuilding, they would, no doubt, have preferred to erect cheap two-story buildings again ; for the lower stories furnished all the room needed for business purposes .

But there has never been any money to be obtained for building, in this country, public improvements on a large scale, except in London . Chicago could only be rebuilt with London capital . The Money lenders could dictate the style of buildings to be erected,—splendid structures, from six to ten stories high, the upper stories of which could only be rented for offices or lodgings . Before the rebuilding was completed, the hard times of 1873 came on ; the crisis being engineered, as we shall see, by the London Money Power . The panic caught the Chicago business men in the trough of the sea . Business was prostrate : renters were lacking for the upper stories : payments could not be made : mortgages were foreclosed ; and the most of the grand Chicago business blocks became the property of the Money King mortgagees .

It was said that Chicago was rebuilt by loans of Eastern capital . We have learned, of late years, that Eastern capital means London capital . London is the point from which we have always had to get money for all improvements . At the time of the Chicago fire, the Money Kings had established many loan agencies in the Eastern states, as a part of their policy for concealing their money-loaning operations . And these loan agencies were the source whence the money was obtained to rebuild Chicago .

The railroads of the West and South are now concentrated upon Chicago in such a way as to center upon it in a wonderful manner the trade of those sections . Pushed forward with the might of the unlimited capital of the Money Kings, Chicago is growing at an unprecedented rate . It is now the second city in the country, and it is confidently declared that, in a few years, it will surpass New York . And it is very probable ; for railroads now bring to it the trade of Canada and the Northwest, to Puget Sound ; of the West, to San Francisco ; of the Southwest, to the Gulf of Mexico and San Diego ; of the South, to New Orleans and Mobile ; of the Southeast, to Atlanta, Savannah and St.

Augustine . Chicago is the great center of the traffic of the London Money Kings in this country .

Kansas City was planted as the outpost of Chicago, to take away the trade of the Southwest from St. Louis and carry it to Chicago . And Kansas City is springing up like a giant, with its growth pushed with all the might of London capital . Like New York it has an elevated railroad ; in cable roads it is not surpassed by any city in the country . It is not suffered to lack anything for its growth that capital can give it .

If anyone wishes to see how these grand capitalists build up cities by the might of capital, such curiosity will be gratified by observations in Chicago and Kansas City . Every suburb is planted, not by pioneers, as in other new towns, but by capitalists, who spend millions before they invite a settler . A railroad is first built to the prospective town ; then the streets are graded : gas and water pipes are put down : the sidewalks are laid :—and then, settlers are invited to make their homes in the new suburb .—Nobody can lay out towns in such a style of princely expense but the London Money Kings .

We have now come in the order of time to the crash of 1873, which ruined many thousands of our business men throughout the country .

The crash of 1873 was brought on by the failure of the House of Jay Cooke & Co . Jay Cooke was a London banker, and the agent of the Money Kings for building the Northern Pacific Railroad . The failure was arranged in such a manner that it did not involve the London house of Jay Cooke & Co. at all . But the failure of the American house accomplished its purpose . It started a crash whose influence lasted five years, prostrating all our industries, and sweeping the country with a deluge of bankruptcy ; enabling the Money Kings to hold carnival in the purchase of our produce at low prices, and in buying up property cheap at bankrupt sales .

All prices went down so low that, though we had $900,000,000 of currency in the country, it only needed $300,000,000 to carry on all the business of the country, and the other $600,000,000 was locked up and retired from circulation .

The London Money Kings certainly prepared and engineered the panic of 1873, just as they did the crash of 1837 and 1857 . We find their motive in the fact that it gave them an excuse for locking up $600,000,000, and thus causing the ruin that followed, with the hard times and low prices, in which they reaped a rich harvest of profit to themselves .

They Can Make Good Times or Hard Times whenever they please ; so completely have they gotten our country in their hands . They hold our prosperity completely in their grasp . We are become entirely dependent upon them . When they wish to make good times, they put out their money freely, in building railroads, in making city improvements, in establishing new enterprises all over the country, and in lending money to everybody who wishes to borrow and has property to mortgage as security . Then we have flush times for several years ; and everybody, under their leading, rushes into speculation, and everybody gets into debt .

Then, in Order to Make Hard Times, the Money Kings have only to lock up the money they make as profits out of their various enterprises in the country . They stop building railroads : they stop all outlays for city improvements : they stop all investments in new enterprises ; and they stop loans to borrowers . They simply lock up their profits, and let the money lie idle .—And at once business is at a stand still : the improvements which had given activity to business cease : established businesses, such as farming, manufacturing, railroading go on : everything else stops . There is universal stagnation : prices fall : a flood of bankruptcy sweeps over the land : thousands are ruined :—and the Money Kings revel in low prices of produce, and cheap purchases of bankrupt property .

This was the way in which the Money Kings operated the hard times of 1873, and several years afterwards . But they had to have a visible cause that would account for the hard times to the public, on accepted business principles . The failure of Jay Cooke did this . It destroyed confidence, and in the eyes of the public justified the locking up of the money, with all the subsequent ruin . They thus made our people believe that the crash was an unavoidable disaster, due to regular business causes, and not to their own malignant intention .

But it was done on purpose, with malicious intent to bring about the very result that followed . That it was the work of the London Money Kings is demonstrable .—They were building the Northern Pacific Railroad . Jay Cooke was their agent in doing that work . They had engaged to build the Northern Pacific Railroad, and had started the work . Jay Cooke failed, and his failure brought on the panic . The failure was a trick, a sham . Does anybody believe that the London Money Kings who had undertaken to build the Northern Pacific Railroad were unable to carry out their contract ?—that they had not money enough to complete the work, if they chose ? The idea is too absurd to be entertained for a moment . They let the enterprise drop, because they chose to do so : they had their agent Jay Cooke, to fail, because they knew that his failure would bring on a crash which they were resolved to produce, and in whose ruin they desired to glut their avarice .

They stand convicted before the eyes of the world, of an atrocious crime against the country, and against humanity . They did not even have the grace to let the London house of Jay Cook share in the failure . They sent him to America as a dynamite bomb, to explode and destroy the prosperity of the United States . And they sent him carefully disconnected from his London house, so that the ruin he wrought would not effect the London house with which he wax connected . Jay Cooke may have been an innocent victim of their purpose . They do not inform their agents of their designs .

The time may come when all the particulars of this infamous plot will be revealed to the world . They may hide their tracks as carefully as they can ; but the eye of history may, in the future, be able to gather many facts now hidden, and make the plot stand out, as St. Bartholomew stands, revealed to the loathing of mankind .

It is a dreadful thought that the Money Kings have our industries so completely in their power that they can cause another panic such as that of 1873, whenever they choose . They could start one to-morrow far worse than that, as their control of our industries is far more complete now than then . Our prosperity is entirely at their mercy .

VIII . The Money Kings Devour our New England Mills

Having brought on the hard times of 1873, and caused a broad wave of bankruptcy to oversweep our country, the Money Kings prepared to reap their harvest . Everything was so arranged that ruin, however wide-spread, would attract no special attention, but would be regarded as the natural consequence of the hard times . The time was ripe, and Money Power began at once a grand campaign against the New England Mills .

It was in its devouring the mills of New England that I first came upon the track of the Money Power, after 1873 . I knew that the Money Kings had brought on the panic of 1873, by the failure of Jay Cooke, and I was sure that they were engineering it to suit their own interests . But such was their prudence and skill that for two years I looked in vain . I first came upon their track in 1875 . I then found that the New York merchants were putting down cotton goods to an extremely low price,—one-tenth of a cent a yard below the cost of production . Drummers were everywhere urging merchants through the country to buy, on account of the low price, which they said would not last very long .

I at first wondered how, with the protection of a high tariff, the price of cotton goods could be so very low . I knew it was not accidental, for the fixed price,one-tenth of a cent a yard below the cost of production in New England,—showed that it was done by design . I began to think out the cause of the remarkable fact . In finding it, I found the trail of the Money Kings . Being familiar with the operations of our tariff system, I soon made the discovery of upon the New England mills . They had discovered a flaw in our tariff system, which enabled them, owning the English factories, and warehouses and shipping, to crush the mills of New England, despite the protection of the tariff .

In the old days of Democratic rule, before the war, Congress, in order to accommodate the import merchants New York City, so arranged the tariff that duties were payable, not when the goods were placed in the warehouse, but when they were taken out for sale . The London merchants, under our warehouse system, could store their goods in the New York warehouse, free of charge, and let them lie there for any length of time ; and might then, if they chose, withdraw them without payment of duty, and ship them to any other market . It was cheaper for them to store their goods in the New York Custom House than in their own warehouses in London . For they had to build their own warehouses, at considerable cost ; while the United States government was so accommodating as to build the warehouse and offer them free use of it for the storage of their goods .

The Money Kings availed themselves of the privilege given them by our warehouse system . They stored millions of dollars worth of goods, not really for sale, but to be offered at a nominal price, for the purpose of “bearing”down the price of goods in the New York market .

The New England Mill owners would have to sell their goods as cheap as the English goods were offered in the custom house,—at one-tenth of a cent a yard below the cost of production . They had to keep on running, even at a loss ; for the delicate machinery, if suffered to lie idle for six months, would become lobsided and worthless . They continued to run on at a loss until they failed . Sprague, of Rhode Island, was the richest of the mill owners of New England . When he failed for ten million dollars, the tide of bankruptcy swept over New England . The newspapers at the time were filled, not with business advertisements but, with bankrupt notices . Amid the thousands of bankruptcies throughout the country the ruin of the New England mills attracted but little attention .

But the mills did not cease operations . New companies were organized, of which capitalists from abroad had control : the mills were set in operation again : prices were stiffened up to a point that yielded a fair profit ; and the manufactories resumed their prosperity .

Nobody in this country wished to break down the New England mills . And nobody on earth was powerful enough to do it but these London Money Kings . When the mills had broke their former owners, no American capitalists would have embarked in a losing business . But these Money Kings knew how they had broken them down, and how easy it would be to make them profitable .

The system of the Money Kings is not known to the public . When they break a man, or a company, they do not always set the head of the business aside . They do not wish to make a commotion in business circles by many changes ; and they need the experience of the old business managers . Their system is, not to destroy, but to subordinate . Their method is the method of the Romans in extending their conquests : the Romans always left a subjugated state with a modicum of power, until the time came to reduce it to a province . The Money Kings can always kick out their allies whenever they wish, the companies being under their complete control ; and they can afford to be seemingly generous for a while, till the time comes to take entire possession . In the present era of the growth of the Money Power, the Money Kings keep in partnership with their Gentile agents : in the next era, they will kick out the Gentile agencies, and put the business in the hands of their countrymen, the Jews .

IX . The Money Power Devoured Our Iron Industry .

Our iron industry, like the other manufactures of the country, is protected by our tariff, so that whatever iron is sold usually brings a remunerative price . The Money Power could only crush our iron industry by so crushing the prosperity of the whole country that there would be no building, and no demand for iron . Even in hard times, people must have clothing and fuel ; so that textile manufactures and the coal industry continue to maintain some degree of activity . But iron products are chiefly used in construction,building houses and factories and railroads . Hard times which put a stop to improvements close up iron mines, and foundries and machine shops .

The Money Power, by the crash of 1873, prostrated the whole country . For years, all improvements stopped . Mechanics were thrown out of employment by the hundred thousand, in cities, in mines, in shops, and roamed as tramps over the country . The repairing of railroads was almost the only use for iron ; and, as the Money Kings owned the railroads, they could send iron from England at any price ; for, selling to themselves, the price made no difference . For railroad iron, the protection of the tariff was ineffectual .

For five years after 1873, all business was crushed and lifeless .— But it was the harvest of the Money Kings . They bought our products at extremely low prices, and made unusually large profits : as iron works failed, they bought their plants : as lumber companies broke from the long stagnation of business, they bought mills and forests ; and they had a grand harvest foreclosing mortgages, and taking possession of mortgaged property .

When the harvest was reaped,—when the Money Power had devoured all the weak iron and lumber companies, and had gathered in all mortgaged property, the Boa loosed its coil . By beginning to build railroads and to make city improvements, and by loans to start new enterprises, the Money Power, about 1879-80 started the country upon a new cycle of prosperity .

Possessed of boundless capitalpossessed of our railroadspossessed of the great trade centers of the countrythe Money Power has imperial control over our industry, and has monopolized the traffic in all the great products of the country .

X . The Money Power Has Devoured The Cotton Trade

The agencies of the Money Power in the Cotton States have been reduced to a perfect system . Agents have been established in every district, who make full semiweekly or weekly reports as to the condition of the cotton crop in each district . The reports begin with the plowing season, and go on through the entire year, giving every fact having any bearing upon the condition of the crop . They report the number of acres plowed—the weather—the number of acres planted—any blight ; army worm, excessive rains, drought—the prospect of crops—bolling of the cotton—the quantity picked—the amount of yield . And every morning, the telegraph brings from Liverpool, to all the agents, the price to be paid for cotton that day .

A general agent told a gentleman who was my informant, that his business was so mean and arbitrary and despotic, he hated it . He said the planters frequently struggled against the low prices which were ruining them . “But,”said he, “they had just as well fight against the course of the seasons .”” They have no alternative but submission to the prices offered by the Money Kings . And those prices mean poverty to the planter, and penury to the colored laborers who barely subsist upon their share of the crop .

XI . The Money Power Has Devoured The Wheat And Grain Trade

The construction of elevators has given to the railroads complete possession of the wheat and grain trade . At first, there was a pretence of individual purchase of grain . The Money Kings perhaps feared that the open monopoly by them of the wheat trade of the country might cause discontent and murmuring, and they at first tried to hide their monopoly of the trade . The former custom was for some man to build an elevator at a depot, and figure as its owner, buying up the wheat of the surrounding country on his own account . But those agents frequently illustrated the proverb of a beggar on horseback . Beginning to drink, they had to be removed ; thus showing that they were only agents of the railroads . This plan failing, the railroads adopted the plan of granting to some wealthy individual the exclusive right to build elevators along the line, with of course the exclusive right to buy and ship grain over the railroads . This man, who is, of course, the agent of the railroad, appoints his agents at each depot, and has a monopoly of the wheat and grain trade along the line .

In this way, a few men buy all the wheat of the country . There is no competition ; the railroads fix the price of wheat and grains to suit themselves, and grind the farmers down into absolute poverty . And they not only plunder the farmer in the price, but they cheat in the measurement which fixes the quality of the wheat . For instance, several years ago, No . I wheat was 90 cents a bushel, No. 2, 75 cents, and No. 3, 60 cents a bushel . The wheat was so graded by the buyers, that all wheat weighing 60 lbs. and over to the bushel was rated No. I ; all wheat weighing 56 lbs. and over, No. 2 ; and all wheat weighing 52 lbs. and over, No. 3 . Now, if the wheat were measured in the good old fashioned way in an honest half bushel measure, most of the wheat would weigh 60 lbs. to the bushel, and be rated as No. I . But these monopolists cheat systematically in the measure . They use an oval gallon measure, easily battered, by accident, to diminish its capacity . Into such a small measure the wheat will not pack close, when poured very gently out of a pitcher into it . They then weigh the gallon and multiply by 8 to find the weight of a bushel . By this system of measurement little of the wheat rates as No. I ; and very much of it is rated as No. 3 . In this way, when No. I wheat was selling at 90 cents a bushel, this system of measuring caused much of it to be rated as No. 3, which brought only 60 cents a bushel .

But afterwards, when these monopolists sold the wheat out of the elevators, where it was under pressure, all of it would weigh 60 Lbs. to the bushel, and was sold as No. I !

The monopolists have now progressed so far with their system of oppression, that they at present only pay the farmer for wheat about 60 cents a bushel . And the farmers have to endure this system of cheating and oppression, because there is no competition, and the railroads arrange matters to suit themselves .

XII . The Money Power Has Devoured The Live Stock Trade In Cattle

Ten years ago, there were in Chicago fifty buyers purchasing cattle for the Eastern markets on their own account . Two years ago, I was informed that four buyers were doing practically all the business . The live stock trade in cattle is in the hands of the Money Kings . No individuals can compete with them . They have broken down all the cattle buyers engaged in the business, and have either driven them out of the business, or forced them to become the agents of the Money Power . In the cattle trade, the Money Power reigns supreme, having crushed all competition and established a complete monopoly .

XIII . The Money Power Has Devoured The Trade In Hogs And Pork And Bacon

Thirteen years ago, there were pork packing firms in all the great cities of the West, doing an independent and profitable business . But in the hard times following 1873, pork packing became a losing business . For several years, hogs were high at the time the packers in St. Louis, Louisville and Cincinnati were buying and killing ; but when the bacon was put upon the market, immense capitalists put down the market, and the packers lost money . This continued for several years, until the individual packing companies, buying hogs high and having to sell bacon in the market depressed by dominating capitalists, broke .

The King of All the Pork Packers of America is Armour of Chicago . His has been an extraordinary career . A few years ago, he was a poor butcher, doing an ordinary business like many others of his fellows . But suddenly he became rich . In a year or two after his packing house was built in Chicago, he was killing six thousand hogs a day, and operating his business with a capital of $120,000,000 . These sudden fortunes, as we have seen in the case of the Railroad Kings, are suspicious . Where did Armour get his money ? He could not have made it in the ordinary way of business . It was impossible .

His sudden wealth is easily explained on the hypothesis that he is the chosen agent of the Money Kings to take possession of a grand line of American production for them . This explains his immense business, which sprung up like a creation of Aladdin's lamp . This explains the hundred and twenty million dollars so suddenly embarked in his business !

Besides the business in Chicago, Armour has packing houses in Kansas City and Omaha almost as extensive as the Chicago establishment . And, in Kansas City, he has a bank with such immense resources that, in a time of stringency in the money market, other banks in the city were compelled to lean upon it for support . All this unlimited capital is fully explained, if Armour is an Agent of the London Money Kings .

It also explains another singular fact : when the other packers, in St. Louis, Cincinnati and Louisville, lost money by their operations year after year till they broke, Armour made money all the time . As they grew poorer and poorer till they failed, Armour grew grander and grander, till he became a very colossus between whose legs pygmies creep .

Indeed, Armour was the storm king who ruled the storm which swept down the other packing houses .

The position of Armour in the Board of Trade, controlling prices, not only of pork and bacon and beef, but also of wheat and grain, is such as would be assumed by a chief and trusted agent of the Money Kings .

When we know that it is in accordance with the method of the Money Kings to employ such agents, and when we see a colossal American house which sprung up from nothing, like a mushroom in a nightwhich grew when all others broke—which thrived amid the disasters which prostrated other houses in the same line of business—the mind which seeks a cause for every effect is driven to the conclusion that Armour is a grand agent of the London Money Kings .

Another Fact shows that the London Money Kings are now controlling our pork and bacon trade through a system of agencies :—Some of the packing houses in Louisville, Cincinnati and St. Louis which broke, continued the business . Where did they get the Money ? They had, after their failure, no money with which to continue the business . Friends would not furnish them money to continue a business in which they had lost their own wealth . But they got the money somewhere, and kept on in business . Did they get their capital from the London Money Kings ? Did those imperial capitalists, when they had broken down the packing houses, subordinate them, and use their skill and energy, subsidizing them as agents ? If such was the fact, it will explain the state of things in the business world, otherwise inexplicable .

XIV . The Money Kings Devoured
The Dressed Beef Traffic .

There are many men in Chicago and other cities engaged in the fresh meat business who, ten years ago, were worth $10,000, and who are fortunate if they are now worth $50,000 . But all the great dressed Beef companies have had phenomenal successsuccess so remarkable as to be truly phenomenal .

I. Swift Brothers—one of the firms engaged in the dressed beef trade, when they started in the business were worth only $8,000 . Three years after, they were running seven hundred refrigerator cars costing $700,000, and were operating their business with a capital of $3,000,000 . Another house started on nothing, and, in ten years, was operating with a capital of $3,000,000 .

We can not account for this phenomenal accumulation of fortune by any natural business laws . But if such firms are agents of the London Money Kings for monopolizing the dressed beef trade, it accounts for it all and nothing else will .

2. Their being agents also accounts for the fact that these gigantic firms do not jostle one another—have no feeling of rivalry—do not cut one another in prices—nor seek, as individual competitors do, to gain superior advantages over each other for carrying on their business .

3. It also accounts for the dressed beef trade gaining no greater advantages over the live stock trade in the Eastern markets . Within a few years after it was started, the dressed beef trade had taken entire possession of the New England markets, and entered the markets of the Middle states . But it has made but little progress since its first success . Private enterprise that had succeeded to such an extent and with such rapidity, would have pushed on to complete possession of all the Eastern markets . But the various corporations of the Money Kings never destroy each other . They pool their interests, and compromise their differences . This looks as though there had been an understanding between the dressed beef companies and the railroad companies shipping live stock to the Eastern markets, that the dressed beef companies might proceed to a certain extent with their industry, but should not press their competition to the full control of the Eastern markets .

XV . The Money Power Has Devoured Our Whiskey Trade

The whiskey ring is a grand monopoly, involving many millions of capital . Many Americans went into distilling after the War, and for a time made a great deal of money . But about the time that the Money Power was crushing out the other industries of the country, the distillers almost all broke . Of course the thing could be explained as the result of ordinary business causes : The Money Kings always produce their results through the operation of natural causes : they have the capital to set any cause in operation they wish, for the accomplishment of any object . Soon after the distillers broke, the distilleries were set in operation on a greater scale than before .

The Grand Whiskey Ring was formed, strong enough to influence national legislation, and by increasing the tax on the whiskey, to add several cents a gallon to the value of the whiskey in stock, amounting in the aggregate to many millions of dollars .

In the breaking of the old distillers we see the method of the Money Power ; we see its method in the organization of the vast whiskey ring : in the reorganization of the distilleries ; and in the control of national legislation . There is no monopoly in the country that shows plainer marks of the methods of the Money Kings than the grand whiskey ring .

XVI . The Money Power Has Devoured Our Export Trade

The Money Kings have possession of every branch of traffic in the products of the country : of the railroads : of the ocean transportation . They have the export trade so hemmed in on every side that they can not fail to have possession of it . It necessarily follows from their buying up our cotton, our wheat, our pork, our bacon, our beef, that they export all these articles that are sent to the foreign markets . And, of course, they have established export houses through which they export the products they have purchased .

XVII . The Money Power Devours Our Currency

It follows from the facts already stated that the Money Power has possession of the great bulk of our currency .

I. It is a Money Power . Its magnates are money kings . One of the English writers calls the quarter in London where these operators have their places of business, "a city of money dealers . "It is by their possession of money that the Money Kings control trade . Most of these Money Kings are Jews : the Jews have been money dealers for centuries . They take possession of the money of a country, first : then by means of their monied capital they devour everything else .

2. All Banks, have Immense Deposits . There are two classes of depositors,— individuals who have a moderate surplus of cash over the requirements of their business ; and the Money Kings and their agents, who are buying all our produce and doing almost all the business of the country . These Money Kings are too shrewd to allow other people to bank on their deposits . It is a vast gain to own the banks, and make the profit of banking on their deposits themselves . Thus Armour has his bank in Kansas City . No doubt the other great trading and manufacturing corporations which are paying out many millions of dollars every year, also own the banks where the capital is held with which they do their business

3. When the facts are known, it will be discovered that a large number of our National Banks, especially in the East, are owned by the Money Kings .

It is certain that they have our currency in their grasp . The profits of the immense business they do are realized in money . And they are constantly loaning these cash profits to our people on mortgage . They own all our money . Our people only get it from them in exchangethe farmer for crops : the employee for labor ; and the borrower for a mortgage on property .

Owning our money, these capitalists can make hard times and low prices whenever they please, by withdrawing the money from circulation . They only need to hold their cash profits in their possession, and stop lending them back, and stop making improvements, and then stop the manufactures of iron and lumber for which the demand will have ceased :—and, at once, all business will be paralyzed, and millions of people will be out of employment . The Boa has its folds around us, and can tighten them for our destruction whenever it may choose, just as it did in 1873 .

Thus the Money Power has advanced step by step in this country, until it has devoured almost every branch of our national industry :

1 . For years it has kept our currency constricted ; and it has devoured thousands of millions of dollars worth of our produce at half price, by maintaining panic prices through scarcity of money .

2 . It has thus kept us constantly in debt through an adverse balance of trade, and has devoured our gold and silver as fast as produced from the mines .

3 . The Money Power has devoured all our mercantile shipping ;

4 . Our import trade ;

5 . Our railroads ;

6 . Our oil production and trade ;

7 . Our New England Mills ;

8 . Our iron industry ;

9 . Much property in Chicago and other cities ;

10 . Our cotton trade ;

11 . Our wheat and grain trade ;

12 . Our live stock trade in cattle ;

13 . Our trade in hogs, pork and bacon ;

14 . Our dressed beef trade ;

15 . Our currency ;

And it has, throughout all its operations, conducted its encroachments with such cunning, craft, stealth, and subtlety, that its amazing course of ravage has not been known or even suspected by the outside public .

CHAPTER VII.

DEVOURINGS OF THE MONEY POWER IN THE U. S.

Industries Now Being Devoured By the Money Power.

The Money Power, as we have seen, has already devoured many of our great lines of industry . It is now enveloping every industry it has not already devoured, and is crushing them in the folds of its capital, preparatory to devouring them .

I . The Money Power is Crushing Our Coal Mines

By their monopoly of transportation, the railroads are securing a monopoly of the coal supply for mines owned by them . In some instances, before the passage of the Interstate Commerce Law, they refused transportation to coal of other companies . They usually form a separate company which owns the coal mines, and they have given special rates to such companies .

Even under the "Interstate Law" regulating railroad traffic, their monopoly of coal mines is not hindered ; for even if they made equal charges for their own coal and that of other companies, yet the charge for themselves is simply paid to themselves ; so that they can still undersell all competitors . This state of things must give to mines owned by railroads the monopoly of the coal trade, and all other mines must be sold to them, or closed .

II . The Money Power is Devouring Our Gold and Silver Mines

As a rule, persons having gold or silver mines to develop always go to the Money Kings or their agents for the capital to develop them . And the Money Kings never put any money into a mine without having a majority of the stock given them, so as to secure to them its absolute control . They must have the lion's share in any enterprise before they will invest in it . They usually put in one of the original stockholders as their agent and manager ; and generally the mine is so managed as to freeze out the other stockholders .

A shaft is sunk down upon the "lead;" if it proves to be rich, only the poorer levels nearer the surface are worked, till the outside stockholders become discouraged and sell out their stock cheap ; then the mine is worked efficiently . But if, on the other hand, the mine proves to be a pocket, like the Emmy Mine in Utah, it is puffed in the papers until outsiders have bought the stock ; then the true state of things is revealed . Having full control of the mine, they are able, with their agent, to manipulate it as they please ; and finally they thus get control of all valuable mines .

III . The Money Power is Devouring Our Lumber Trade

It is evident that the Money Power has not yet gotten possession of all our lumber forests and lumber mills ; for, where it has gotten possession of an industry, it stiffens up prices to a uniform and profitable rate . The fluctuation in the price of lumber, and the cuts in prices between different dealers are evidence of the war of the Money Power upon all independent lumber men . The war can have but one issue . The ownership of the railroads gives such an advantage to the Money Kings in shipping their lumber to market, that, in the end, competitors must be crushed The Money Power will get possession of the coal mines and the lumber trade, as it has gotten possession of the mercantile trade of New York City, of the oil wells of Pennsylvania, and of the great lines of traffic .

IV. The Money Power is Devouring Our Flour Manufactures

Having full control of the wheat market, it would be the policy of the Money Power to make all possible profit out of the wheat before it reaches the consumer . To this end, the Money Power must manufacture the wheat into flour . The high price of flour in comparison with wheat shows that the agents of the Money Power have a large number of flouring mills in their possession . The occasional sharp falls in the flour market, crushing mill owners of small capital, and the occasional purchase of mills by the Money Kings, as in a recent deal in Minneapolis, show that the Money Power has not yet gotten full possession of the flour mills .

The possession of the railroad transportation gives such an advantage to the Money Kings in the flour market as must, ere long, with the further advantage of their immense capital, give them entire possession of the flour manufacture . Their recent purchase of flour mills in Minneapolis shows their desire to obtain such advantageous ground in the business as will enable them to crush all competitors and get possession of the entire business .

V . The Money Power is Devouring The Cattle Ranches of the Western Plains

The London Money Kings are resolved to possess not only the trade in beef, but also the production of cattle . They laid their plans years ago, for monopolizing the cattle production of the Plains . It was they who killed off the buffalo . The destruction of the buffalo was thus effected : A high price was offered for buffalo hides in whatever quantity they were offered . All men who wished to hunt buffalo could get an outfit on credit and pay for it in buffalo hides . On these terms, an army of buffalo hunters was organized . Hunters lined the banks of the streams where the buffaloes came to drink, and by shooting them down, drove the herds away ; and thus continued to shoot them as, parched with thirst, they came to the streams to drink . Some shot the buffaloes ; some skinned the carcasses ; some hauled off hides . In two or three years, the buffaloes numbering many millions were exterminated .

Nobody but the London Money Kings could have thus effected the extermination of the buffalo . None but they look so far ahead . Only they had money enough to equip such an army of slaughterers . Only they, in their immense world-wide commerce, had a market for such a vast number of hides . They had been obtaining hides for their trade in leather, shoes, and other leather products, from Buenos Ayres, in South America . It was only necessary to substitute buffalo hides for South American, for two or three years, to secure the extermination of the Buffalo .

The Money Kings saw a grand enterprise in devoting the Western Plains to the production of beef . As soon as the buffaloes were exterminated, they began to buy cattle in Texas, and cows and calves and young cattle in all the states, to start ranches on the Plains . This caused a boom in cattle all over the country ; and multitudes of enterprising Americans organized cattle companies, and started cattle ranches all over the West, from Texas to Montana, mortgaging their property, and taking money out of their business, in order to take stock in the cattle companies . The boom in prices was kept up until the Plains were fully occupied with ranches ; for the Money Kings had entire control of the cattle market ; and they offered high prices as long as it was their interest to induce Americans to invest in the beef production . In a few years, the Western Plains were fully stocked with cattle ranches .

When the ranches were established, it was time for the Constrictor to tighten its folds . The agents of the Money Power were the only buyers in the cattle market . The Money Kings themselves owned many cattle ranches in the West . They could always have a supply of their own cattle in the Market to be offered to their agents, the cattle buyers, at a very low price, so as to force down the market on other cattle owners . It would make no difference to them how low the price of their cattle—for they were selling to themselves . It was money out of one pocket into the other . They thus kept down the market for cattle, until almost all American cattle companies are now broke .

A gentleman largely interested in cattle companies told me, two years ago, that, at that time, fifty-seven per cent. of the cattle companies were broke . When we remember that many of the remaining forty-three per cent. of the cattle companies are owned by the Money Kings, it is evident that almost all the American cattle companies have failed, and that the Money Power has now almost completed its devouring of the cattle companies .

In order to destroy these American cattle companies, and also to crush the farmers raising cattle, the Money Kings have forced down the price of cattle, in defiance of the law of supply and demand . The market for beef is active, and growing with the growth of our population . The supply of beef has greatly diminished in the last few years ; two winters ago, a million cattle perished upon the Plains, from Texas to the Canada line ; four hundred thousand perished in Montana alone . The cattle market is never glutted . Beef is consumed as fast as it is offered . Prices ought to be good in the presence of an increasing demand and a decreasing supply .

Furthermore, the consumer pays as high for beef as he formerly paid when beef cattle brought a fair price . There is no reason why beef cattle should not now command a fair price . There is demand enough ; and the retail price is high enough . In view of the circumstances of the case, the pressing down of beef cattle to less than half price is an outrage upon our people . Beef cattle down to half price, with an active demand for beef, and a high retail price in the meat store ; It is a shame !

It shows conclusively that the Money Power should no longer be allowed to control our prices .

The Money Power is now crushing and devouring the cattle companies, as it, a few years ago, crushed and devoured the other business interests of our country . It put down the price of cotton goods until it broke the New England Mills, and then put up the price again when it had gotten possession of the mills ; It put down the price of oil until it broke the oil men of Pennsylvania, and then, when it had gotten possession of the business, it put up the price of oil ; It put down the price of iron wares until it got possession of the iron mills, and then it put up the price of iron.—So now, the Money Kings are putting down the price of beef cattle, until they get possession of the cattle ranches, and the farms of our farmers, and then, when they themselves have entire possession of the cattle production, they will put up the price of cattle fast enough .

VI . The Money Power is Devouring All Branches Of Production and Trade in Our Country

A new era of the growth of the Money Power has recently arisen .

It is originating vast Trusts which take possession of an entire branch of production or trade, and crush out all competition by the might of capital . A trust is a device for concentrating the investments of several Money Kings in a single line of business under a single head . For instance ; where many Money Kings have invested in a line of trade, by organizing a trust, they put all their business houses in that line and their stocks of goods into a single company, and place them under one management . The trust is thus able to control the amount of production, and all prices in that line of business ; and it can destroy all outside companies that are not in the trust . Thus, two years ago, a coffee trust was originated, which at once set to work to destroy all the coffee merchants not in the ring . It put down the price of coffee so low as to break down the competitors of the trust and no sooner was this accomplished, than the trust put up the price of coffee to more than double .

These trusts are, in effect, corporations without a charter—without any authority from the state ; and they are thus above governmental control . It is a new step the Imperialism of Capital is taking . Through these trusts, the Money Kings purpose to do as they choose, and crush out all competition with a high hand . They used to conceal their track, and hide their meanness as far as possible from the public eye . But now, emboldened by success, and intoxicated with the pride of imperial power, they unmask their aims, confident of their ability to over-ride all opposition .

1. The Standard Oil Company is a great trust operating with many millions of capital, and throttling all competition in the petroleum market .

2. Many Americans invested their means in the manufacture of cotton seed oil . But the Money Kings wanted then the oil for the manufacture of their bogus lard and butter . And they organized a "Cotton Seed Oil Trust" with millions of capital, and are taking possession of the entire industry .

3. A "Sugar Trust" has been organized, to take possession of the sugar production and traffic .

4. A "Whiskey Trust" is monopolizing the manufacture and sale of distilled liquors .

5. Recently, a "Cattle Trust" has been organized, to take entire possession of all cattle ranches, and the raising of cattle and production of beef .

6. Grand Trusts, each with millions of capital, are monopolizing production and traffic in salt, lead, cordage, nails, coke, lumber, sheet zinc, copper, crucible steel, and other products . Well did the English writer of the pamphlet soon to be quoted, say, "Nothing is too large, and nothing too small for English capital, and English enterprise ."

All these Trusts, like the Coffee Trust, will put down prices till competition is destroyed, and then they will double the price of the article they monopolize . Individual competition against these grand monopolies is hopeless . If an outside company goes into the Trust, they stop its business, and give to it a part of the profits ; till other establishments have been started sufficient to supply the market without it, and then the idle establishment, with its trade and its business connection all gone, is kicked out in the cold to die . On the other hand, if individual enterprises do not go into the Trust, goods are put down in the markets which they supply, and their business is taken away . In the Trust, or out of it, outside enterprises are bound to be destroyed .

But Trusts do not merely war upon individual competitors . There is another aspect of their operations, in which they especially war upon our national prosperity .

Trusts are of two kinds,—I) Those which operate in industrial products which are protected by our tariff ; and 2) Those which operate in branches of production in which we fully supply our own market and export a portion of the product . To the latter class belong the Standard Oil Company, and the Cotton Seed Oil Trust, and the Whiskey Trust . To the former, belong the Crucible Steel Trust, the Cordage Trust, and other various manufactures .

In the manufactures which fully supply our own markets, we ought very soon to take possession of the markets of the world . And we would soon do so, if production went on unobstructed . But the Trusts come in and arrest production, and keep us limited to the supply of our own markets, in order to maintain high prices, for their own profit . The Trusts do not merely injure the public by putting up prices;—but in order to put up the price, they commit a crime against the nation, by arresting our prosperity, and preventing us from supplying the markets of the world .

The Money Kings who are at the head of the Trusts are the London Jews who want to keep possession of the markets of the world for their English manufactures ; and the only way in which they can do this, is to arrest our growth by means of these Trusts . Such a crime against the national prosperity ought to be punished by the heaviest penalty .

Of a like tendency is the work of the Trusts which operate in those products, to which, not supplying our own markets, we afford protection by the tariff . The object of the Trusts is, to continue to obtain the high price derived from the tariff . And in order to effect this, they arrest production, so as to prevent our production from fully supplying our own markets and thus cheapening the price by home competition . They do this, in the first place, in order to get the high price of tariff protection . But they have another object which they desire especially to accomplish,—to prevent us from fully supplying our own market, and thus save it, in part, to their English manufactures . They know that, with unimpeded manufactures, we would in a few years fully supply our own market, and then, with our great advantages, would soon drive English manufactures out of the markets of the world . They wish especially to prevent this and, as the only means of doing it, they organize these trusts, to limit our production, and keep us continually dependent upon English manufactures .

These trusts are really a conspiracy against the nation ; and they ought to be treated as such . They are worse than murder ; for they destroy many individuals by the slow torture of financial ruin . And they also strike at the national prosperity and the national life . They ought to be suppressed .

VII . The Money Power is Devouring The Retail Trade

The Money Power long since engrossed the great wholesale trade of the Eastern cities, and much of the wholesale trade in the West . It is now making rapid strides toward the monopoly of the retail trade of our cities and country towns .

1st. The First Stroke of the Money Power At the Retail Trade of the country was the establishment of the great house of A.T. Stewart & Co., in New York City . A.T. Stewart was a Scotchman who, for years, occupied a little narrow place on Broadway a few feet wide, where he peddled needles, and thread and tape . He suddenly bloomed out in a palatial building, with a thousand clerks behind his counters, and twenty million dollars worth of goods upon his shelves . At the same time, there was a branch house of A.T. Stewart & Co., in Glasgow, Scotland, and another in Germany ; besides establishments in Belfast, Ireland, and in Paris . The peculiarity of his style of business was, that he had in his House a number of departments ; and, in the various departments, goods of every variety, of the best quality, and at the cheapest wholesale prices .

I . Many stories have been told to deceive the public, as to the means by which Stewart could sell such excellent goods so cheap . One story was that he bought his goods at auction, and very cheap, because they were the tail end of stocks, and damaged ; and that Mrs. Stewart renovated them, and thus enabled him to fool the ladies of New York, and make them believe them new goods . The story is absurd . A.T. Stewart could not have kept up his stock by auction purchases ; nor could he have obtained such goods at auction . It is only a clumsy attempt to account for a fact inexplicable by all the laws of business .

2 . A.T. Stewart could not have accumulated in any regular business the immense fortune of one hundred million dollars which he was credited with possessing at the time of his death . His colossal business, so suddenly established, and the excellent quality and low price of his goods, can only be accounted for on the hypothesis that the London Money Kings appointed him head agent and Manager of a great retail house which they established in New York, and supplied with goods, in order to strike the first blow for the monopoly of the retail trade of New York City . This accounts for the immense establishment which sprung up like Jonah's gourd, in a night, and the colossal business ; it also accounts for the superior quality of the goods ; and it explains how, supplied from the manufactory direct he could retail his goods at wholesale prices .

3 . The events following his death show conclusively that A.T. Steward was an agent of Money Kings .

I) He was closely watched by Judge Hilton, who dined with him every Sunday on pretext of friendship, but really, no doubt, to talk over business and compare notes . At his death, Stewart left his business in Hilton's hands . And the American people were soon afterward shocked by the intelligence that Judge Hilton had cheated poor Mrs. Stewart out of all her husband's property, giving her only one million dollars for the entire estate of which Stewart died possessed .

Now, this is absurd . Mrs. Stewart was a very sensible woman . She had a perfect knowledge of the value of her husband's estate . Judge Hilton could not cheat her out of one hundred million dollars worth of property, giving her only one million dollars for it . But if he showed her papers that proved Stewart to be the agent of the London Money Kings, she would sign the transfer conveying to Judge Hilton the property that belonged to the Money Kings, and say nothing about it .

2) The heirs of A.T. Stewart afterwards brought suit against Hilton for the property, alleging that he had obtained it from Mrs. Stewart by fraud, and the whole matter was investigated in court . It was there proved under oath, by Hilton and the book-keeper of the House, that A.T. Stewart was only worth about $8,000,000—that he owned no interest in any real estate—that he had no interest in the palatial building in which the business was done—that he had no interest in the grand buildings erected by A.T. Stewart & Co. at Saratoga—no interest in the house of A.T. Stewart & Co . in Glasgow, Scotland, nor in the German house . It was sworn that he had no interest in the business, except a commission on sales . In other words, he was simply the agent of the London Money Kings, who were the "Co." that owned the business .

3) The arrangement Hilton made of the business showed that he was only an agent in the matter . If the business had been really Hilton's, he would have continued to carry it on and make millions out of it every year, as Stewart had done . But instead, he closed out the business in a short time, attempting to deceive the public as to the cause of failure, by the farce of giving offense to the Jews, by excluding them from the hotel built by Stewart, at Saratoga .

2nd. These Mammoth Retail Stores Everywhere

I . Three immense establishments were started in New York City on the model of Stewart's, keeping in the various departments everything, the goods excellent, and retailed at wholesale prices . And these stores were avowedly in the hands of agents .

2 . And now, in all large cities, are to be found these immense retail establishments on the plan of the house of A.T. Stewart, and each with an agent at its head, managing the business for a percentage of the profits . There are several such stores in Kansas City . One of them does such an immense business that, as I was informed, the commissions of the manager amount to over sixty thousand dollars a year . The Money Kings pay their agents well .

3rd. These Stores Are Breaking Down All Other Merchants.

The House of A.T. Stewart broke down one thousand retail merchants in New York City, many of whom became his clerks . In all our cities, these grand agency retail stores are monopolizing the retail trade . I found such stores in many of our country towns . They always keep immense stocks of goods of all kinds in their various departments, which they sell at retail at wholesale prices :—and their counters are swarming with customers . The old merchants are being driven from business .

I have found these stores in different towns in Missouri, and Iowa and Kansas, where I have lectured . The American merchants are driven from business, and have to leave town . All who live by the merchants are also thrown out of employment . The towns are slowly dying . I recollect, in a town in Iowa, where I delivered the lecture on the Money Power, on the next morning as I walked along the street, a man came out of his grocery store and invited me to enter . When I went in, he wrung my hand with tears in his eyes, and said :

"Ah Sir, one of those Jew stores you told about last night is established here in town . They make a specialty of groceries, they say, and profess to sell them at cost . My business is ruined, and the business of the dry goods merchants also . The people are swarming into the Jew store to get things cheap . And I do not know what we are going to do."

What can they do but get out ? How can a man with only a moderate individual capital compete with people who have the capital of the world at their back ? They can afford to sell at a loss for a time, till they get possession of the trade . The American merchants can only give up the struggle and retire from business . If things go on as they are, in a few years more, the Money Power will have monopolized the retail traffic, as it has monopolized and is now monopolizing all the other branches of business in the country .

The Money Kings never carry any business by storm . Their approaches are always quiet and stealthy, their methods secret and tortuous . But they never yet have failed of accomplishing their end . A few years more will put them in possession of all the mercantile business of the country .

4th. A New Discovery ; A New Method of Attack By the Money Kings.

While this work has been passing through the press, I have heard of a new method of attack upon the stores of our country towns . It is like every thing else that the Money Power originates,—very effective, and sure of success if not arrested ; and it has all the traits of secretiveness, cunning, craft and slyness, that mark every thing that emanates from that source .

The * * * * Store System, as stated by one who knows, is based upon the following plan :—If a person has a small capital to engage in the business,—$500 or more,—the promoters of the plan will furnish him goods at a very low price to that amount, and as much more without interest, to be paid out of the business . On the other hand, the party binds himself to purchase a certain amount of goods every monthnot large ; and to sell the goods for cash, and at a fixed price, from thirty to fifty per cent. lower than any other merchant can afford to sell them . He will thus inevitably bankrupt all competitors .

This System has purchasing agents all over the country, to buy up bankrupt stocks as fast as the old merchants are broke . This system, of course, must be furnished with goods from New York, at first ; but after the merchants begin to break rapidly, the bankrupt stocks, purchased very cheap, will keep up the supply of goods, until the new stores are in full possession of all the business .

A list is made out of all the states and territories, with the available towns still unoccupied—one store to be started at a place .

This System is already widely established over the country, and, as my informant says, is making the merchants "open their eyes wide ." The Money Power is resolved to root out our country town merchants, and themselves take possession of the business .

VIII . The Money Power is Devouring Our Farms

So vast is the income of the Money Power from its various sources of wealth, that it can no longer find investment for it in its immense loans to the nations of the old world—in its loans to states and counties and cities and municipalities and corporations—in building new warehouses and ships for its ever extending commerce—in erecting new factories—in building new railroads—in opening new mines—in starting new mercantile establishments . All these vast branches of enterprise can not afford the Money Power sufficient investment for its enormous and constantly increasing income .

It can only find investment in mortgages of city property and improved farms, and in the purchase of new and grand branches of business .

1st. Farms Mortgaged.

Until I began to lecture on the Money Power, I had no idea of the extent to which our farms have been mortgaged to the Money Kings . I thought that perhaps one-twentieth of the farms were mortgaged . I knew that Dakota was shingled over with mortgages ; but I supposed that the condition of Dakota was exceptional . I was astonished upon reading an article in a New York paper, evidently intended to soothe the public mind, stating that the public need feel no uneasiness about Dakota—that statistics proved that there are more land mortgages in the state of New York in proportion to area and value, than in Dakota ! I was astounded at the statement . The Lord have mercy on New York ! !

I thought that, in Missouri, the people surely are out of debt . I knew that they are economical, and not overventuresome and enterprising . What was my surprise when, in the first place where I delivered my lecture on the Money Power, a good citizen said to me :—

"I don't know much about prophecy . But I do know that what you say about these foreign capitalists is true . To my certain knowledge, at least two-thirds of the farms in this community are mortgaged to foreign capital ."

I travelled widely through Missouri, and everywhere I found statements that two-thirds to three-fourths of the farms are under mortgage ! ! —In Iowa, the same state of fact exists . In some counties of that state, where farms used to sell for twenty-five dollars per acre, the farms were mortgaged for one-third of their value ; and after a number of farms were bought in by the mortgagee for eight dollars an acre, the amount of the mortgage, all the lands receded to that price.—A gentlemen told me that, in one of the counties of Iowa where he had investigated the state of things, the property valuation of the county was $3,000,000, and there are $2,000,000 worth of property mortgaged . Perhaps this is an average of the condition of things in the state .

In Kansas, a very large proportion of the farms are mortgaged—a much larger proportion than in Iowa or Missouri .

In Nebraska, as I am informed, the agents of the Money lenders are to be found in every neighborhood . They go through the country like lightning-rod agents, urging the farmers to borrow money on five years time, secured by mortgage on their farms .

2nd. Land Loan Agencies

In any of the large cities, if you go into the office of one of the Farm Loan Agencies which has agents all over the state, and ask for a loan on your farm, the agent will ask where it lies ; tell him the county, and he will ask the township ; and as soon as you tell him, he will step to the wall and, after a moment, will draw down the map of your township and will show you your farm . They are prepared to mortgage and buy every farm in the whole country .

A banker said to me :—"The money line of these Land Loan Companies always has three points,—the agent in the West, who loans the money ; the intermediary in the East, from whom he gets it ;—but the third point in the line is always London . There is where the money comes from."

How the Money for the loans is obtained was told me by an agent who loans large amounts every year, through a large number of subagents . He sent his mortgages to a little bank in an Eastern state ; from which the money was sent to him . That bank transferred the mortgage to the third party from which the money came originally . And this third party is the Money Power of London, or some of its immediate agents .

The Money Kings hide their trail in these loan transactions without difficulty . They need only to buy up the stock of a bank or an insurance company, in some Eastern state ; and then, through such an agency, they can loan millions of dollars :—and the American people think it is simply Eastern American capital ! Thus, a little bank in Connecticut can loan millions of dollars every year, when it is only making in its regular business some twenty thousand dollars a year .

The Money is London Capital, as is evident from the vast amount of it loaned in this country . Billions of dollars have been loaned upon farm mortgages, to say nothing of the vast amounts loaned on city property . No American banks or insurance companies could loan such immense amounts of money .

he London Money Kings have, in this country, an income of many hundred millions of dollars, every year, derived from interest on loans—from the profits of their various lines of investment—from the various industries they have monopolized—and from the various lines of traffic they have taken possession of . They invest in the United States all the income derived from their investments in this country ; and statistics prove that, besides this, they are sending to this country, annually, a large amount of specie for investment, being a portion of their profits derived from their vast trade with the outside world . It is manifest that the Money Power is loaning in the United States many hundred million dollars every year .

We have about reached the end of our tether . About two-thirds of the farms of the country are now mortgaged for one-third of their value, on five years time . In the ten great states of the West and Northwest,—Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri and Kansas, the valuation of farm property, according to the census of 1880, making a liberal allowance for the increase of value, amounts to $7,000,000,000 . It is estimated that the farm mortgages in those states amount to $3,400,000,000 . The farms are usually mortgaged for one-third of their value on five years time . The amount of farm mortgages given above is probably excessive . One-half the estimate is most probably nearer to a correct statement . We may perhaps safely say that, in the above ten states, two-thirds of the farms are now under mortgage for one-third of their value on five years time .

How much of the other one-third of the farms is now owned by the Money Power it is impossible to say . Thousands of agents have been loaning money all over the country for more than twenty years, on improved farms and plantations . Down South, in Mississippi or Alabama, ask in any neighborhood about the grand plantations of the past, and they will tell you those plantations are under mortgage or owned, as the phrase is, "by foreign capital." The Southern plantations passed into the hands of the Money Power in the hard years following the war ; the Western farms are passing to them now . Many of the plantations of the South and many of the improved farms of the West have had the mortgages on them foreclosed, and now belong to the Money Power . If we include the farms on which mortgages have been foreclosed together with those now mortgaged, we can see what an immense area of our country the Money Power will own, when the mortgages they now hold shall have been foreclosed .

3rd. The Money Power is Crushing the Farmers so that they can not pay their mortgages and save their farms . Having two-thirds of the farms of the country mortgaged to them, the Money Kings are putting down the price of all farming products, so that it is impossible for the farmers to pay off their mortgages . The Money Kings are the only purchasers of produce, and by establishing Boards of Trade which are absolutely subject to their control, they are able, through them, to fix prices to suit themselves . By the agency of the Boards of Trade, and by their monopoly of the traffic in all farming products, they have put down the price of farming products, until it is impossible for the farmers to pay off the mortgages on their farms .

1. The Money Power Has Put Down the Price of Beef

We have already seen how the Money Kings have put down the price of Beef, in defiance of the laws that regulate business prices, wholly setting aside and annulling the law of supply and demand .

2. The Money Power Has Broken Down The Wheat Market

Two years ago, our wheat crop was fifty million bushels short . It was naturally expected that the price of wheat would rise . I saw a quotation from a Liverpool paper, at the time, stating that it was expected that the price of wheat would be high, owing to the short American crop and the active demand, and expressing surprise at the low price of wheat that prevailed in America . The price was put down by the imperial power of the Money Power over the American markets .

When it was known that the wheat crop was fifty million bushels short, the price of wheat was seventy cents a bushel . It was naturally supposed that the price would go up . A syndicate of Cincinnati capitalists, acting on this business probability, organized with a capital of $12,000,000, to operate in the Chicago market ; not to put up the price of wheat to ninety cents or a dollar a bushel, which the condition of things would have warranted, but merely to keep the price up to the existing rate of seventy cents a bushel . They had capital enough to make their operations a sure success under the rules of the Chicago Board of Trade, which only allowed wheat to be sold as it was delivered into the elevator . The regular average amount of delivery was about three hundred car-loads a day, and they had money enough to purchase this amount of daily delivery, until they could make their operation a success .

But the wheat operators of Chicago had the elevators all over the Northwest full of wheat ; they ordered the Chicago Board of Trade to rescind the rule which prohibited the sale of wheat except as delivered into the elevators, and allow it to be sold out of the cars ; and when their order was obeyed, they rushed down to Chicago from all over the Northwest three thousand car loads of wheat a day ! They sold the Cincinnati syndicate wheat at seventy cents a bushel, till their $12,000,000 was gone ; and then, when they had broken the syndicate, they at once put down the price of wheat to sixty cents a bushel !

It was a great outrage ! When the wheat crop was fifty million bushels short, and the supply was inadequate to meet the demand, wheat, according to all the laws that regulate prices, ought to have gone up to at least one dollar a bushel . To put down the price, under such circumstances, lower than it had ever been before, was an outrage—a violation of all the laws of trade—a revolutionary overthrow of the law of supply and demand .

In the same way, and at the same time,

3. The Money Power Broke Down the Cotton Market

Two years ago, a Southern syndicate was formed, to sustain the cotton market at the low price at which cotton was then held . A capitalist at Houston, Texas, headed the movement, with $15,000,000 at his back.—But the Money Kings now own many of the cotton plantations of the South ; and they delivered cotton to the syndicate at the price offered, till the $15,000,000 were gone ; and then, when they had broken the syndicate, they immediately put down the price of cotton one and one-half cents a pound !

The Money Kings have the cotton market completely in their grasp . As one of their agents said, "the planters had as well struggle against the course of the seasons as against the prices fixed by the Money Power." They have put down the price of cotton, until it will not pay wages to the laborers who produce it . It could not be grown at all at the present price, if the negro laborers did not take their pay in a part of the crop, so that they share the oppression and poverty of the planters . The negro laborers are barely able to subsist, by raising their own provisions ; but they are brought down to the condition of the Hindoo peasant .

4th. Two Years Ago Was An Era

in the history of American prices . That was the time when the Money Power boldly and openly went into the Board of Trade and crushed all opposition, and put down prices to suit themselves, in open defiance of the law of supply and demand, and all the laws that regulate prices . Before that time, other persons dared to operate in Boards of Trade, on the indication of the markets under the Law of Supply and Demand . But the Cincinnati and Southern syndicates were so completely crushed, that no man will ever again dare to interfere with the Money Kings in their manipulation of prices in Boards of Trade . The Money Kings then made so terrible an example of their opponents as to deter all others from repeating the offense .

The Cincinnati syndicate was so sure that, with a short supply of wheat and an active demand, they could sustain their move in the Chicago Board of Trade, that some of them were tempted, when hard pressed, to use other people's money in their possession . For this offense they were prosecuted, and sent to state prison.—After such terrible examples, no one will ever dare again to interfere with the Money Kings in their regulation of prices .

Boards of Trade are instruments controlled at will by the London Money Kings, and may be made to register their will . Under the rule of the Chicago Board of Trade the Cincinnati syndicate was perfectly safe in its operation ; they had enough money to pay for all the wheat that could be offered them under the rule of the Board of Trade . When Armour went into the Board of Trade, and demanded that the rule should be changed, so as to enable the agents of the Money Kings to break down the Cincinnati syndicate, and the Board of Trade at once complied with the demand, the fact was thereby established that Boards of Trade are conquered by the London Money Kings, and made agencies by which to regulate prices as they see best, and that all persons are to be broken down who attempt to sustain against them the law of supply and demand . That was a practical announcement of the fact that

The old law of supply and demand is wholly abrogated*, and the will of the Money Kings is put in its place, as the sole regulator of prices in our modern age* .

The law of supply and demand can only regulate prices when there is a free market, and the free competition of buyers and sellers operates to regulate prices . But there is no such competition now ; the agents of the Money Power are the only buyers of all produce . Boards of Trade are subdued by them, and answer to their manipulations . By the might of Capital, they can regulate prices in any Board of Trade . They control absolutely the Chicago Board of Trade, and Chicago regulates the price of produce for the whole country . They can fix all prices to suit themselves by their imperial power over the markets, in utter disregard of the law of supply and demand, and in utter violation of all the laws that regulate prices .

The time has come for the public to consider this question of prices, and find out some new way in which we may regulate prices, and keep them at a proper and uniform standard . They can never suffer the Money Kings to regulate prices and ruin our farmers by their arbitrary exercise of imperial power, thus subverting all the legitimate laws of trade .

As long as it is left to them, they will do as they have been doing ; they will put down the prices of all produce while it is in the hands of the farmers, so as to buy it cheap ; and then, when it is in their own hands, they will put up the price, so as to sell it high ! This has been their regular habit for years . How long are the American people going to stand it ? How long will they suffer themselves to be plundered by these capitalists ? When the old method of regulating prices by the law of supply and demand is no longer operative,

we must find some other way

by which to regulate prices .

And it will not be difficult to find a much better way . One method will be presented in this work, later on . Either it, or some other method will have to be adopted, if we do not intend for the Money Kings to freeze out all our farmers, and get possession of their farms .

5th. The Money Power Determined To Have the Farms

No farm product, except hogs, brings a fair price . And the price of hogs is owing to hog cholera . With the danger of cholera, the farmers would not raise hogs at all, but for the inducement of a fair price . No Western farmer, at present prices of grain, and beef, and other produce, can pay wages, pay taxes, and support his family in comfort—much less pay off his mortgage . Some of the newspapers, setting forth the views of the Money Power, are already saying that the farm laborer of the Northwest must submit to a reduction of wages . And other newspapers declare that our farmers must lose their farms, and let us have the Tenant Farm System that prevails in Europe .

The wages of the farm laborer may be reduced, but this will not save the farmers . At the present price of produce, no mortgage can be paid off .

A distinguished gentleman of Iowa told me that he, not long since, travelled in the same seat with a general agent for farm loans who has many subagents in different counties of the state ; and, in the course of conversation, he asked him if the farmers could pay off their mortgages ? The agent laughed at the idea . He said it was impossible—that he had orders not to foreclose, except as a last resort.—The Money Power means to have the farms ;—but it wishes to appear indulgent .

Conversing with a banker in Kansas, a very clever gentleman, I spoke to him of the great evils that would follow the loss of the farms . He laughed pleasantly, and said, "I think the farmers will have to lose their farms."—From present appearances that must be the result . If things continue in their present grooves, in a few years more, the Money Power will have foreclosed its mortgages, and will own in fee simple two-thirds or three-fourths, or even a larger proportion, of the farms of the country .

And then, when the farms have been devoured, it will be an easy matter to finish the merchants and grocers of the country towns . When the Money Kings own the farms of the Northwest, as they do many of the cotton plantations of the South, they will pay off their peasant farm laborers, as they now pay off the negro laborers on their Southern cotton plantations, with orders to their own stores . Then all the outside merchants who are not already broke by the stores established by the Money Power, will have to give up business . The merchants will have the sad grace accorded to them which the Cyclops accorded to Ulysses, of being the last to be devoured .

Then the Money Kings will have accomplished their aim . They will have everything in the country . America will be the Ireland of the New World—its people peasants, groaning under the yoke of foreign landlordism .

CHAPTER VIII.

DEMONSTRATION OF THE WORK OF THE MONEY POWER IN THIS COUNTRY

That it is the London Money Power which is thus crushing our industry is proved by evidence that is a scientific demonstration . I make no assertion without proof . The demonstration has been necessarily delayed till the facts were all presented . But the proof is absolute, and overwhelming . It is, indeed, a scientific demonstration, based upon the application of the fixed laws of industry.

The evidence is cumulative . Each point of evidence strengthens the others until the conclusion is demonstrated beyond the possibility of doubt.

I . FIRST PROOF : BRITISH TESTIMONY TO THE EXISTENCE OF THE MONEY POWER, IN 1864 A.D.

The year 1864 was an era in the growth of the Money Power . The English public then first realized its growing greatness, and the idea produced a powerful impression upon the English mind . The English are reticent on the subject of the growth of the Money Power . Not a word is ever said of it in Parliament . The papers never publish a line that would enable the foreign world to know of the centralization of all wealth and property in Britain . It is their national secret.

But when they first learned of it in 1864, in the first flush of joy and pride they forgot reserve for a moment, and gave utterance to their self-gratulation . Some of these outbursts fell under the eye of the author of this work . The English writers speak in glowing terms of the rising Imperialism of commerce and wealth, then building up by the Money Kings ; but they couch their thoughts in enigmatical phrase, which would be understood by the initiated, but would not expose their national secret to the outside world.

I quote two of these press statements published in 1864, in the beginning of this grandest era of the growth of the Money Power . They fully bear out all I have stated in describing the Imperialism of capital, industry and wealth established by these Jew Money Kings.

1ST. FIRST BRITISH STATEMENT

I will first quote some statements from a brilliant writer in one of the English reviews, who gives a graphicoutline sketch of the Imperialism attained, at that time, by the Money Kings . He says :

" London, as every one knows, contains a city within a city ; and within this inner city there is yet another [the Money Quarter], the very heart of the metropolis . It is a small place . In a couple of minutes, you may walk across it, from side to side, from end to end . Yet it [the Money Quarter] is the center and citadel of our greatnessthe heart whose pulsations are felt to the farthest extremities of the empire . The occupants of the precinct [the Money Kings] have dealings with all the world . The railways which accompany the ceaseless advance of the white race into the prairies of the Far West, in America [our North-western States]—the [mining] companies which explore and develop the [mineral] resources of California and Australia—the iron roads and irrigating canals which are maturing the prosperity of India—the enterprise which covers with tea plantations the valleys and slopes of the Himalayas, and which carries our countrymen [the agents of the Money Kings] into new regions everywhere,—are created or sustained by the outgoings [of capital] of this little spot in London.

" The wastes of Hudson Bay—trading companies for the Nile—the cotton planting which is invading Africa—ocean lines of steamships—submarine telegraphs connecting dissevered continents—water works for Berlin—gas for Bombay—these and a hundred other matters and projects engage the thoughts and employ the capital which is at the command of this busy hive of operators [the Money Kings] . Almost every country is included in their operations.

" And almost every state is indebted to them . From gigantic Russia to petty Ecuador and Venezuela they hold the bonds of every government, those of Persia and Japan excepted . Prosaic as their operations are in detail, taken in the mass, they constitute a grand work . daily and hourly, it is their business to scan in detail the condition of the world . They weigh the influence of the seasons—they know the condition of every mine—the prospects of every railway—the dividends of every Company.

" It [the Money Quarter of London] is a city of Money Dealers—a Sanctuary of Plutus.—Blot out that inner heart of London, and the whole world would feel the shock ." (! ! !) (Capitals and italics mine).

His calm style and intimate acquaintance with facts and commercial principles place this writer above the charge of exaggeration . Indeed, there is reticence throughout the article ; allusion instead of statement, suggestion rather than fact . And yet, what a picture does he draw of the imperialism over industry, trade and wealth attained by the Money Kings of London.

2nd . Second British Statement

I next quote from an article in Blackwood, for 1864, in which the writer speaks of the Money Quarter of London as a Temple of Mammon, in which the Money Kings are storing up the wealth of the world . He says :—

" There [in the Money Quarter of London] they are ceaselessly storing up the wealth that flows to them from the rest of the world . Men in strange climes, and in strange dresses, and speaking all manner of tongues, are seen preparing produce and luxuries of all kinds for the Temple, which flow thither in long streams across land and sea . And still the work of storing goes on : gold, silver, and all precious things [bonds, stocks, etc.], — the delights of lifethe cream of the earth's good things—accumulate higher and higher in the chambers of the Temple [the Money Quarter] ."

3rd . Third British Statement : The Pamphlet

I do not think that any one can still doubt the fact that the Money Kings of London have established a grand imperialism of industry, trade and wealth, extending all over the world . If a shadow of doubt remain in any mind, it will be dispelled by the utterances of a pamphlet given me, in London, in 1864 . The pamphlet was intended for private circulation only, and therefore speaks out frankly with regard to this grand English Imperialism of Capital . In a discussion with the author of this work, the writer of the pamphlet lost his temper and coolness of judgment, and gave him a copy of this remarkable publication.

The author of the pamphlet speaks of the wealth of the Money Kings as national wealth, and of their capital as English capital . Where he speaks of England, therefore, he means the Money Power of London ; and when he speaks of the English, he means the Money

Kings . The writer shows but little literary skill, either in his style, or in the grouping of his facts ; but his statements are true, and his facts authentic . The following extracts from the pamphlet present a picture of the monopoly of industry, commerce and wealth, attained by the Money Power, in 1864, that will startle mankind . The writer says :—

" It is a remarkable position England occupies in the world . A little point amid the Northern seas, almost invisible to the school boy as he seeks for it on his globe, and which he may hide with his finger point as he turns the colored sphere, the British Isles are nevertheless the heart of the world—the center to which the thoughts and acts of men most generally tendand to and from which the streams of material life are ever flowing.

" If we draw on a map the great lines of commerce, we will see what a large proportion of them converge to our shores . It was once a proverb that "all roads lead to Rome"; and England, commercially, holds in the world [italics his] the same predominant position which the Eternal City held in the restricted era of the Roman empire . Our country is the chief goal of the highways of commerce . Caravans, with their long strings of laden camels and horses, are ceaselessly crossing the plains and deserts of Asiarailway trains drawn by the rapid fire car rush across Europe and America with their freights of goodsand ships in thousands bring to us, from all parts of the world, the staple supplies of our food and industry ."

* * * * "China sends raw silk, and tea ; India sends cotton, indigo and rice . We get our spices from the Philippine Islands ; almost all our coffee from Ceylon ; a portion of our cotton from Egypt ; hides, chiefly from the pampas of Buenos Ayres ; wool, chiefly from Australia and the Cape ; wood, from the Northern countries of America and Europe ; flax and tallow, from Russia ; corn, chiefly from the United States and Russia ; and the precious metals from Australia, California, Mexico and the Andes of Peru . * * * * England [i.e. the Money Power of London] furnishes employment to tens of millions of people in the uttermost parts of the earth,—the Chinaman in his tea plantations and mulberry gardens—the Hindoo in his rice and cotton fields—the poor Indian miner in the Andes—the Gaucho, as he follows his herds in the Pampas—even the Negro of Africa, and the natives of the far and fair Islands of the Pacific ."

" Of our exports, we send beer to India and Australia ; coal, to many places, to supply coaling stations for steam vessels, but chiefly to France . We send cotton yarn for manufacture to India, Holland and Germany ; cotton piece goods to the United States and Brazil . Our hardwares and cutlery go chiefly to Australia, India and the United States ; and our woolen and worsted goods to the United States, India, and China, Germany, British North America and Australia ."

* * * * "The trade of England is ubiquitous . It penetrates to every part of the earth . Fully three-fourths of the exportable produce of every country is sent direct to England, and of the remaining one-fourth, the greater part is carried by English enterprise, and at English risk to the port of consumption . In like manner, almost every spot on the earth receives its foreign supplies from this country, or by the hands of English traders [agents of the Money Kings] ; and by means of English capital . * * * * We are the great general merchants of the world ." * * * *

" We [the Money Kings] are the manufacturers for the world . Every nation in the world except England may be called an agricultural country ; each no doubt, has some few manufactures more or less rough ; but the manufactures of every one are trifling in the extreme in proportion to the raw products which it grows . Consequently, few countries export much except raw produce ; and the direct trade between the various countries of the world is very small . All trade through England ; for what little goes direct from one country to another is generally on English [Money Kings] account, carried by English [Money King] enterprise, and with English [Money King] capital ."

" We [the Money Kings] are the great carriers for the world . Thirty thousand ships sailing under the flag, or bearing the cargoes of [the Money Kings of] England, are ever on the seas going and coming from all parts of the globe . * * * * * From the Thames, the Mersey, the Tyne, and the Clyde argosies and commercial armadas are ever leaving, and jostle in our estuaries with similar squadrons making to port.

" We [the Money Kings] are the shipbuilders for the world ; and own or have mortgages on every vessel afloat . The shipping in every foreign port either belong to England [the Money Power,] or are employed by England [the Money Power,] with the exception of a few coasters."

" The shores of our estuaries, lined with miles of docks and building yards, ring with the clang of hammers ; and vast ribs, of wood and iron, curving upward from still vaster keels, show where leviathan vessels are being got ready for their adventurous career . * * * * * Both classes of our ships, both steam and sailing, are regularly increasing in numbers . In both kind of vessels, too, there is a steady increase of size . Comparing the present amount of our shipping [in 1864,] with what it was in 1850, we find that we have 11 per cent. more ships, 40 per cent. more tonnage, and 15 per cent. more men ."

" Our little islands no longer suffice for us . Our energies have far overpassed their limits . There is room for us to live and work herethat is all . *These islands are our house and garden, but our farm is detached . * * * We live upon the world .*"

The writer goes on :—

" We [Money Kings] are the railway makers of the world : and the actual owners of the greater proportion of foreign railways.

" We [Money Kings] carry the mails for the whole world . Strange as it may appear, even the letters from South America to North America have always passed through the London postoffice.

“ No one can go from one part of the world to another without passing through England ; so completely do we [Money Kings] monopolize the whole passenger traffic .”

“ We [Money Kings] are the bankers of the whole world . If the North sends money to the South, or the East to the West, the money must be sent through Londonthere is no other way.

“ We [Money Kings] are the bullion dealers of the world : all gold and silver is brought direct to England [to the Money Kings,] in payment of debts due to us [Money Kings,] and then is redistributed by us in the shape of public and private loans.

“ We [Money Kings] have the lion's share in every mine.

“ We [Money Kings] are the great capitalists of the world . * * * * * It may be truly said that there is not at any time any corner of the world in which Englishmen [the Money Kings] have not more or less pecuniary interest . Without English [Money King] capital, and English [Money King] enterprise, the tallow of Russia could not be brought from the interior to St. Petersburg ; nor the timber of Norway and Sweden and Poland be brought to the ports of embarkation ; nor the cotton of Egypt to Alexandria . English [Money King] capital performs the internal traffic of every country, and largely supplies the means of interior production .”

“ We [Money Kings] are the annuitants of the world . We have loaned money to every government, and almost to every municipality . Every country has to pay large sums to the English [Money Kings] as interest upon loans, amounting to many hundreds of millions [pounds] .”

“ Nothing is too large and nothing is too small for English [Money King] capital, and

“ We [Money Kings] are the bankers of the whole world . If the North sends money to the South, or the East to the West, the money must be sent through Londonthere is no other way.

“ We [Money Kings] are the bullion dealers of the world : all gold and silver is brought direct to England [to the Money Kings,] in payment of debts due to us [Money Kings,]and then is redistributed by us in the shape of public and private loans.

“ We [Money Kings] have the lion's share in every mine.

“ We [Money Kings] are the great capitalists of the world . * * * * * It may be truly said that there is not at any time any corner of the world in which Englishmen [the Money Kings] have not more or less pecuniary interest . Without English [Money King] capital, and English [Money King] enterprise, the tallow of Russia could not be brought from the interior to St. Petersburg ; nor the timber of Norway and Sweden and Poland be brought to the ports of embarkation ; nor the cotton of Egypt to Alexandria . English [Money King] capital performs the internal traffic of every country, and largely supplies the means of interior production ."

" We [Money Kings] are the annuitants of the world . We have loaned money to every government, and almost to every municipality . Every country has to pay large sums to the English [Money Kings] as interest upon loans, amounting to many hundreds of millions [pounds] ."

" Nothing is too large and nothing is too small for English [Money King] capital, and English [Money King] enterprise . We [Money Kings] even pave, light, watch, and drain numerous foreign cities . The very waterworks of Berlin were constructed by the English [Money Kings], and are owned in England [by them] . So endless are the ramifications of British [Money King] trade and enterprise, that the slightest misfortune to any country or people seriously affects [the Money Power of] England . A severe drought in the most remote spot on earth leaves England [the Money Power] a serious loser . A deluge in any country fills our [Money King] ledgers with bad debts . An earthquake in any quarter of the globe largely reduces English [Money King] profits . Every flood washes away English [Money King] dividends, English [Money King] exports, English [Money King] imports, and sweeps away English [Money King] capital, and ruins English [Money King] future expectations ."

"in fact more than half the world is mortgaged to england [the Money Kings] ."[(1)]
(Capitals and italics in the forgoing are mine.)

The foregoing statements make it evident that, in 1864, the Money Kings of London had already established a grand empire over industry, manufactures, commerce and wealth, which was then dominating all the countries of the globe . The Money Kings were the only great capitalists of the earth . No country had sufficient capital to build its own railroads, or make its own public improvements, or even raise and market its own products . All gold and silver was sent direct to London as soon as taken out of the mines, in part payment of debt, and then was redistributed by the Money Kings in loans to nations,—to states—to counties—to municipalities and to individuals . The Money Kings were then "the actual owners of the greater proportion of all the railways of the world ." They "owned or had mortgages on every vessel afloat ." The ocean commerce of the world was in their hands . Their "capital performed the internal traffic of every country ." The world was even dependent upon them for "money to supply the means of interior production ." Even at that date, this writer says, "More than half the world is mortgaged to [the Money Kings of] England ."

No one can doubt that, in 1864, the great capitalists of London had established an Imperialism of Capital that was then dominating the earth, and monopolizing industry and commerce.

If its capital was so great at that time, to what gigantic proportions must it have attained in the twenty-five years that have since elapsed . Its capital has at least quadrupled since then . No wonder they are everywhere seeking farm loans, and are buying up property all over the earth.

The above declarations of English writers, if there were no other proof, would alone establish all that I have said about the operations of the Money Power in this country.

ii . Second proof : scientific demonstration, deduced from the law's of political economy, applied to industrial condition of u.s.

In a natural state of things, industry moves forward in accordance with the laws of Political Economy which regulate business and trade . When we perceive that the present condition of things in the business World is utterly contrary to what the natural laws of industry would bring about, we know that some mighty influence is at work, powerful enough to override all the laws of Political Economy, and bring about the abnormal condition of things, by the might of irresistible capital . Such is the state of fact at the present time.

The Law of Scientific Demonstration has not been generally comprehended . Any Hypothesis respecting the facts of a case is scientifically demonstrated to be true, when it harmonizes and explains all the facts of the case . It is not necessary to have any outside evidence : the harmonizing and explaining all the facts of the case is, without any outside evidence, a Scientific Demonstration of the truth of the Hypothesis.

It is by such evidence that the Copernican System is demonstrated to be true . In the era before Copernicus, while the Ptolemaic theory, that the Earth is the center of the universe, was held, Astronomy was not a science . When Copernicus promulgated the view that the Sun is the center of the Solar System, and that the Earth and all the Planets move around it, the theory was held to be scientifically demonstrated to be true, by the fact of its harmonizing and explaining all the phenomena of the Solar System.

So, I now present the Theory that all these grand corporations that are overshadowing this country are run by Money King capital ; and I demonstrate its truth, by showing that it harmonizes and explains all the facts, which, on any other supposition, are a jumble of discordant incidents utterly contradictory of all the principles of Political Economy.

1st. The Laws of Political Economy
Which Are Violated

The laws of Political Economy are as fixed as the stars in their course . They are the Laws of the Business World, which are as immoveable and unalterable as the Laws of Nature . Let us note some of these Laws of the Business World :—

Principle I . In a normal state of things, all prices are regulated by two things,1) The amount of currency ; and 2) The law of supply and demand.

Principle II . A large capital in business operations is a great advantage, and gives to its possessors a marked superiority over competitors having small capital.

Principle III . Persons established in business have an advantage over those just starting in the same business, other things equal.

Principle IV . From above principles, it follows that a new Man who starts in business poor, is at a great disadvantage in competition with Rich Men who are already established.

Principle V . A New Man who is Poor, if he starts in business in antagonism with rich Men who are already established, will be at such a disadvantage that he will be almost certain to fail.

Principle VI . In Business Crises, men of large capital who are already established in business, have a great advantage over new Men just starting in the business with small capital.

Principle VII . In Business Crises, men of small capital, who are overtrading, and have to borrow money, are at such disadvantage that they are usually the first to break.

Principle VIII . It follows from the above principles, that New Men of small capital can not, as a rule, enter into competition with rich Men already established, and drive them out of business ; but in such cases of antagonistic competition, the New Men of small capital will be the first to fail.

Principle IX . And especially in Business Crises, new Men of small capital can not, as a rule, successfully enter into competition with Rich Men already established, and take their business from them ; but, in such antagonistic competition, the Rich Men already established will be able to sustain themselves, and the new Men of small capital will fail.

Principle X . The superiority of a large capital is equally apparent in all operations in stocks and produce, in Boards of Trade.For Principle XI . The Laws of Chance have their variations only within certain limits, and in the long run conform to regular law : so that, in gambling operations, the longest purse will win, in the long run.

Principle XII . In operations in Boards of Trade, new Men with smaller capital can not, as a rule, break down richer men, and reduce them to bankruptcy;but the New Men will, in the long run, fail in such operations.

Principle XIII . From the above principles it follows that, in the Business World, a man can only make a reasonable amount of money in a given time.

Principle XIV . The wealth of a country, under the operation of the natural laws of Political Economy, will increase most rapidly in times of prosperity, and will increase more slowly in eras of industrial depression.

The above Principles are Industrial Axioms . Their truth is recognized as soon as they are stated . They are Laws of the Business World, which are as fixed as the course of the Planets in their orbits . The Planets have their perturbations : and there may be occasional exceptions to the Laws of Industry laid down in these Principles . But the exception proves the rule . There can not be any general departure from these Principles.

2nd . These Fixed Principles of Political Economy
Are Now Violated in Every Particular

by the facts of the business world, in our time . We call attention especially to four points :

The Principles of Political Economy Are Violated :

I . In the abnormal condition of prices ; which are no longer regulated by the amount of currency, and by the law of supply and demand ;

2 . In the abnormal condition of business ; in which new Men who started poor have taken possession of everything;

3 . In the unheard of aggregation of wealth in the hand of New Men, who have sprung up from poverty into unprecedented wealth ; and

4 . In the anomalous fact that the wealth of our country has increased most rapidly when the general prosperity was at the lowest ebb.

1 . The Principles of Political Economy Violated, by Prices
Being No Longer Regulated by the Amount of Currency,
And the Law of Supply and Demand

The Amount of Currency and the Law of Supply and Demand would, at present, give us good prices . And the fact that prices are now broken down is evidence that there is an active and powerful agency at work subverting the laws of Political an adequate cause for the low scale of prices then prevailing.

Scarcity of money is not now the cause of our low prices . Money is now abundant in the country . We have much more money than can be used in carrying on the business of the country, at the rate of prices now prevailing . The men who purchase our farming products have such abundance of means that they are able to pay cash for all our products, without needing bank accommodations . At our great money centers, money is abundant, and the rate of interest is low . Money is so abundant in the country, that any man can get a loan, for any amount, provided he has property to mortgage as security . Hundreds of millions are for loan, constantly, on farms and real estate . Money is so abundant, that its holders are seeking in every direction for opportunities of investment.

The low prices of farming produce now prevailing can not be caused by a scarcity of money.

Nor are the low prices caused by over-production . We have not an oversupply of wheat, or cotton, or pork, or beef, or any of the great staples of the country . The growth of population keeps pace with the growth of production, and the increased supply is merely sufficient to meet the increased demand . The crop of each year is always consumed by the time the next crop is ready for market . At no time has the market been oversupplied.

The present low prices can not be attributed to a glut of the market . On the contrary, prices have gone down, especially, at times when the supply was inadequate to meet the demand . The present condition of prices is anomalous . So far as money and the law of supply and demand go, we have the conditions for fair prices.

There is now as much money in the country, and we have as good a market for produce, as in 1870, and in 1881 and 1882, when prices were much higher than now.—Prices are no longer regulated by the amount of currency and the law of supply and demand.

Prices are now regulated by a Titanic Imperialism of Capital . Facts already mentioned, and which it is unnecessary to repeat here, prove this demonstrably . The prices of farming produce are low, because the Imperialism of Capital is the only buyer of our produce, and there is no competition : because prices are manipulated by an Imperialism of Capital, in Boards of Trade, and fixed according to the will of the Money Power : because the Money Power so dominates the markets of the world that it makes the Liverpool price the standard for all countries ; while it keeps down the Liverpool price, by keeping on hand shipments of India produce, raised on plantations owned by the Money Kings, with Hindoo Ryot labor, at five cents a day.

2 . The Principles of Political Economy Violated, in the Fact That New Poor Men Have Taken Possession of Everything, in All Departments of Business.

A multitude of New Men have grown up from poverty into sudden wealth, dispossessing richer men of business in which they were well established, thus throwing all the business of the country into new channels.

New Men are at the head of the import and export trade of the country—of the trade in all lines of produce—in the oil business—in manufactures—in the great wholesale trade—in the packing business—in all the great lines of business in the country.

In New York City, New Men bankrupted the old merchants, and took away the business from them.

These New York merchants—English branch houses—afterwards put down the price of goods, and broke down the New England Mills . They were evidently in collusion with their London principals ; and their ability to break down the New England Mills is another proof of the mighty capital behind them.

New Men went into Wall Street, and broke the old operators, and acquired immense fortunes ; a positive proof that the New Operators were backed by the unlimited capital of London, which made their operations a certainty.

New Men went into the oil regions, broke down the old operators, monopolized all the wells, and secured a grand monopoly of oil ; manifest proof that they had behind them the power of an immense capital.

In pork packing, the old Louisville and Cincinnati packers were all broke, while a New Man sprung up in Chicago from poverty into sudden and immense wealth ; a demonstration that the New Man who rode the storm before which the others went down, and who put $120,000,000 into his business in a few years, is not a principal in his business, But is an agent of the Money Kings, who gave him unlimited capital for his operations.

This is an age of New Men . In all the great branches of business, the old business men have gone down, and New Men have taken their place . New Men who started poor, have, all over the country, broken down and displaced the former operators who were rich, and well established in business.

The fact is capable of Scientific Demonstration that those Americans who have thus suddenly grown up into wealth and power, are

The Agents of the London Money Power

It is impossible, under the regular laws of business, that these New Men could be independent operators, conducting business on their own account . To suppose them independent operators makes the business life of the age an anomaly,—full of facts utterly contradictory of all the laws of the business world.—Our age is moving onward, with the facts it presents in utter antagonism to all Law . Its facts are a jumble of irreconcilable contradictions to the past experience of the world, and to the fixed and immutable laws of Political Economy . Enlightened Reason revolts against the idea that these men are engaged in independent business, and rejects it as utterly absurd.

When, in all lines of business, we see New Men who were poor break down the rich men who were in the business before them, and drive them out of the business and take possession of it themselves, we may know that the New Men have, from some source, not known to the public, supplies of capital greater than is at the command of the men whom they break down.

All the facts are explained, if we suppose that the New Men, who started poor a few years ago, are the agents of the Money Power, and are using its capital . But to suppose that they have, unaided, by their own narrow means, supplanted and driven from business richer men, is the rankest absurdity.

The absurdity of the idea is manifest . It is impossible for poor young men to go into business, and bankrupt the rich men already established, and take their business from them, unless the Poor Young Men were secretly the agents of the London Money Power, and were supplied with funds by the Money Kings, so as to enable them to break down all opposition.

Napoleon said, Providence always favors the strongest battalions, in war . In business, as in war, God does not choose to work miracles by setting aside the regular laws of nature, but leaves natural laws to work out their natural results ; and men of smaller capital who launch out boldly into business in antagonistic competition with rich men already established, will, as a rule, come to ruin . In business, the longest purse wins, as the strongest battalions, in war.

Whenever we see a multitude of poor men growing rich, and bankrupting rich men already established in business, we may be sure that, from some source,

The Victors Have the Heaviest Capital.

This is Law*Law fixed as the course of the planets* . As has been said, the planets have their perturbations ; and there may be occasional exceptions to these business laws, where a poor man may grow rich in such a manner . But when a multitude of such cases occur—when, indeed, it is the rule for Poor Young Men to get rich, and rapidly supplant their predecessors in trade—so that all business changes hands—in such cases, it is certain that the poor men who thus get rich have behind them the backing of a mighty capital . This is Law . By the operation of the Law of Cause and Effect, the heaviest Capital carries with it power to crush smaller operators ; as surely as a thundercloud carries rain, or the North Wind cold.

Look Over to London, and all is plain . We have seen that in 1864, the London Money Kings were carrying on business all over the earth . In 1865, Mr. Gladstone stated in the House of Commons that the United States was the best place for investment, and advised British capitalists to make investments here . What is more natural than that they should concentrate their capital upon this country?

The Drift of Gold to the United States, proves that London capitalists have not only been reinvesting here all their profits derived from their business in this country, but that they are sending profits of their world-wide commerce over here for investment.

Where is the Money that has been coming in a constant stream for investment ? We can not find it, unless it is the money these New Men have been investing in their own name . If the capital these New Men have been investing is London capital, it makes all plain.

There is More Evidence to prove that the London Money Power has been extending its Imperialism over our country by breaking down our business men, and thus conquering and taking possession of our business, than there is to prove the truth of the Copernican Theory of the Solar System . It establishes the fact of the work of the London Money Power in this country beyond the possibility of doubt.

This evidence is enough . But it is not all :

3. The Principles of Political Economy Violated, in the Sudden Acquisition of Inordinate Wealth by A Multitude of Poor Men, in A Very Short Time.

It is needless to mention the names of the multitude of the newly and immensely rich . All know them . That they have the wealth is evident : they have the property to show for it.

The Important Question is, Whose wealth is it ? Is it theirs ? and did they make it out of their own resources ? Or is it the wealth of the London Money Kings, which they are holding in trust, and managing on commission ?

All is Plain if they are the agents of the Money Kings ;—but to suppose them to have made all the money themselves, in so short a time, and under such conditions, is a contradiction of all the fixed laws of Political Economy.

Let Us Note Some of the Facts . We have a vast number of facts in the industry of our times which, if we leave out of view the London Money Power, are the strangest anomaly in the history of the world . There are a multitude of facts in the history of our age, which, as they are commonly regarded, transcend the vivid imagination of the Romancer, or the wild dreams of Oriental fable.

When Eugene Sue needed a Colossal Fortune as the basis of that strange work of fiction, The Wandering Jew, he constructed a fortune of $42,000,000, as the result of the accumulation of several generations . But, in our times, we have the Vanderbilts credited with $200,000,000, acquired in a little over twenty years . And Armour was operating his business, in a year or two after starting it, with a capital of$120,000,000.

If Eugene Sue had stated such a thing as this in his novel, it would have been scouted as perfectly ridiculous . If the author of the Arabian Nights, in narrating the adventures of Sinbad the Sailor, had made him acquire such a fortune, the credulity of his readers would have been too severely taxed . Such a Colossal Fortune would have overtaxed the powers of the Genii of Aladdin's Ring and Lamp;and yet, we believe all that is told us about the mushroom fortunes that are said to be made in our time . Without consulting probabilities at all, we take it for granted that the natural laws of industry are wholly suspended, and that MIRACLES of accumulation are being wrought around us.

We believe that Com . Vanderbilt made $100,000,000, in twelve years !—that Jay Gould made $200,000,000, in ten years !—that Rockefeller has made $150,000,000, in fifteen years !—and that Armour made $120,000,000, in three years ! ! ! Is there anything the American people will not believe, if the newspapers tell them it is so ? ! ! Had those men possessed Aladdin's lamp, and diligently rubbed it all the while from Monday morning to Saturday night, they could not have made so much money, in the time !

The Gambling Argument Refuted

It may be said that these men made their money dealing in stocks,that they were gamblers ; and luck was in their favor ! But the mutations of chance correct their variations in the long run, and return to some regular order, by a series of changes which may be calculated . The gambler at the roulette table may win for a time on the turn of the wheel ; but as surely as he continues to tempt Fortune, he will have a turn of luck, and will lose all, at last.—So these gamblers in stocks.

They would long since have lost all they had gained, if it were mere luck ; as so many others have done, who trusted to fortune entirely, without any great unlimited capital at their back . But these men uniformly win.

Their success is the result of Capital, which enabled them to insure success . Commodore Vanderbilt went into Wall street with only a million dollars . He was constantly opposed by Daniel Drew, who was worth $15,000,000 ; and he frequently had the whole street against him . And yet he was able to carry out all his plans successfully . It is known that he had command of unlimited capital—more than could be brought against him in all North America . The operations of Vanderbilt, and Gould and others in Wall street can only be accounted for by the fact that they were the agents of the London Money Kings, and were supplied with sufficient capital to make their operations an assured success.

The Facts of the Outside World

make it apparent how impossible it is that so many Americans should have made such colossal fortunes in a few years.

An article has recently appeared which shows the concentration of wealth in a few hands in the United States, from which it appears that there is greater concentration of wealth here than in any other country . There are about seventy persons who average over $37,000,000 each, most of them having made it within the last thirty years . This makes these persons,—these Newly Rich,—wealthier than the richest capitalists of Europe, whose fortunes have been growing up for generations . It is said that “The richest dukes of England fall below the average wealth of a dozen American citizens ; while the greatest bankers, merchants and railway magnates of England can not compare in wealth with many Americans ."

The average annual income of the wealthiest one hundred Englishmen is about $400,000 ; while the average annual income of the richest one hundred Americans largely exceeds $1,000,000 !

Even the richest of the Rothschilds left only about $17,000,000, the result of the accumulation of several generations[(2)].—Earl Dudley, the owner of the richest iron mines, was worth at his death but $20,000,000.—The Duke of Buccleuch left about $30,000,000.—The Marquis of Bute is now estimated to be worth $40,000,000 ; the Duke of Norfolk, about the same ; and the Duke of Westminster about $50,000,000.

It is perfectly evident by comparison with these grand fortunes abroad, which have been actually made, and under the most favorable circumstances, how impossible it is that these Americans should have amassed these fabulous fortunes, in a day . It is impossible.

The idea is contradicted by all the history of the past : it is contradicted by the actual facts known to exist in other countries, in our time : it is contradicted by the laws of Political Economy which govern the business world : it is contradicted by the certainties which limit the possibilities of business accumulation.

The Absurdity of the Idea is too gross for belief . The men have not made these fortunes . It is impossible that they should have made them . They are the agents of the London Money Kings—have been using their capital—and are holding their property in trust for them.

4. The Principles of Political Economy Violated, in the Enormous Growth of Wealth in the United States, From 1870 to 1880 .

A Remarkable Fact Fully Corroborates the conclusions drawn from the foregoing testimony, and proves positively the workings of the Money Power in this country . From 1870 to 1880, the wealth of this country increased from $30,068,000,000 to $43,642,000,000 ; an increase of $13,574,000,000 . That is, the wealth of the country increased in these ten years of disaster over two fifths of the whole amount !

This Immense Growth of Wealth would indicate that our country was then enjoying an unprecedented prosperity,—that our merchants, and manufacturers and farmers were growing rich with unprecedented rapidity . But the fact is, that those were ten years of overwhelming and universal financial ruin . Business was dull during the whole ten years : and five years out of the ten were years of such general prostration of business, and such overwhelming ruin, as no country ever before suffered in time of peace . Prices were never so low—business was never so prostrate—bankruptcies, never so numerous.

Our people were all growing poorer : farmers were getting in debt : there were from nine thousand to ten thousand great business failures every year ; besides the multitude of small bankruptcies of which no account was kept . The American people were poorer, in 1880, than in 1870;—and yet the wealth of the country vastly increased,increased beyond precedent,—during the interval.

How do We Account for the Anomaly ? The people getting poorer, and the country two-fifths richer during the ten years ? It is easily accounted for . The accumulation of wealth was not the wealth of our people ; but the wealth of the corporations established in America by the Money Kings.

Those Were the Ten Years when Armour was building up his gigantic business, while American packers were being broken down : when the Money Kings were getting possession of property in Chicago and other cities : when the Money Kings were taking possession of the great lines of trade, buying up our cotton and wheat and pork and bacon and whiskey, and breaking those engaged in the business before : when the Money Kings were taking possession of our manufacturing interests in the North, and planting the beginnings of a grand manufacturing system in the New South : when Jay Gould was buying up his grand railroad system : when other railroads were being purchased, and when lumber forests and lumber mills and hundreds of other branches of American industry were purchased cheap by the Money Kings at bankrupt prices.

All These Purchases Required a Vast Outlay of Foreign Capital in the country ; and they account for the strange anomaly that the wealth of the country increased so vastly, while the American people, suffering from hard times and low prices, were getting poorer, and suffered one hundred thousand great bankruptcies.

There was indeed the opening up of new farms ;—but the great increase of wealth in the country was the growth of the wealth of the Money Power in America . It was the growth of grubs in the head of the sheepof worms grown from the eggs of the ox-fly in the back of the ox . The wealth was not our wealth, but the wealth of the Money Power . It did not belong to our people, or our nation, but to the horde of predacious vermin—parasites—that are preying upon us.

Synopsis of the Argument

As has been said, the evidence here adduced proceeds on the same scientific basis as the Scientific Demonstration that proves the truth of the Copernican Theory . As that Scientific Theory is demonstrated to be true by its harmonizing all the phenomena of the Solar System, so the Theory that it is the Money Power which is devouring all our industries is proved to be true by its harmonizing and explaining all the facts of the Business World that have been so perplexing to all observers.

Everybody knows that the times are out of joint . The most startling business developments are constantly occurring;but no one has been able to account for them . Our business system is like Astronomy under the old Ptolemaic System : it is a jumble of incongruous facts, wholly unaccountable by all the ordinary laws of industry, and indeed in antagonism with them.

The Hypothesis, that all the facts are caused by the work of the Money Kings through a system of agencies in this country, makes all plain.

1 . We have the existence of the Money Power set forth by English writers, who declare that it is constantly piling up the wealth of the whole world higher and higher in its Temple, the Money Quarter of London : that its capital is carrying on the business of all countries, and generally supplying to them the means of interior home production : that, twenty-four years ago, it owned almost all the railroads of the world ; and that it is carrying on its operations, all over the earth . The existence of the grand world-wide Imperialism of Capital is a demonstrated fact.

Furthermore, this Money Power always operates through joint stock corporations : it always systematically conceals its operations : thoroughly organized, it proceeds in the accomplishment of its aims of conquest in accordance with a regular method.

2. Hence, when we see in this country grand corporations monopolizing all business, thoroughly organized, proceeding in their breaking down of independent business men with regular uniform method—carefully concealing their wrecking operations from the public—working always by secret underhanded methods :—these facts create a strong presumption that these corporations are the agents of the London Money Power.

And when we see a multitude of other facts, all pointing in the same direction, it becomes a certainty.

3. We find a multitude of New Men, who started poor, going into business without capital of their own, and breaking down Rich Men already established in business, and taking the business from them.

4. We find New Men, starting poor, in a few years ostensibly having possession of vast fortunes, greater than the wealth of the Rothschilds, or the richest Plutocrats of Europe.

5. We find our country vastly increasing in wealth in the decade when business was dullest, times hardest ; and when the whole country was swept by an overwhelming tide of ruin.

6. We find business drifting into new channels—being monopolized by a few great capitalists—the multitude of small business operators being ruined, while grand companies with overwhelming capital are taking possession of all kinds of business.

7. We see times hard, while money is plenty : we see business dull in the ordinary business channels, while the railroads are pressed beyond their capacity by the constantly expanding industry of the country.

8. We have more business than ever before ; but it is gone out of the hands of the many small operators, and has gone into the hands of a few great business companies.

9. We see money abundant, and demand for produce steady and active ; and yet prices of produce as low as in old days of the 40's, when money was so scarce that we had only $64,000,000, of currency in the country . * * *

The people have seen these and other anomalies already mentioned, and have been asking the reason . The reason for this state of things is sought in vain in ordinary business causes . The action of ordinary business causes would, in a normal state of things, give us general prosperity . There is great business activity-plenty of money lying idle—an abundant market and an active demand :—there are all the elements of prosperous times, high prices and general prosperity ;—and yet, notwithstanding, we have low prices, hard times, everybody in debt, and great masses of our people on the verge of ruin . The state of things is unaccountable by all ordinary business principles.

Some Great Cause for These Effects

These uniform violations of the principles of Political Economy can not be fortuitous . In all these great lines of facts the principles of Political Economy are violated ; and the facts are too numerous, and too varied, to have occurred by chance . There is some great cause, of which all the facts are the effects.

Without the presence in our Country of a grand Imperialism of Capital, these facts, numerous, and on varied business lines, and all in utter violation of the principles of Political Economy, and wholly contrary to the results that would have followed the regular operation of natural business laws, could not have occurred . They are the natural effects which the capital of the Money Power, invested in vast amounts, would produce . And they could not have originated from any other cause.

The facts of our Industrial System are wholly inexplicable, unless we adopt the Hypothesis that the London Money Kings own all these great enterprises, ostensibly owned by Americans ; and that their capital is producing all the anomalies apparent in our Industry.

This Hypothesis harmonizes and explains all the facts of our Industrial System ; and this harmonizing and explaining the facts demonstrates the truth of the Hypothesis on the strictest Scientific principles . It is a scientific demonstration.

The reasoning is without a flaw . It is the same kind of evidence as that by which the Copernican System is proved to be true . And it is even more conclusive.

And yet this is not all the proof . There are other facts, which strongly corroborate the proofs already offered, and which make the conclusion doubly sure.

III. Third Proof : Corroborating Facts, Proving That the Capital of These New Men is the Capital of the Money Power .

If there were no other evidence, that which has been adduced is amply sufficient to prove the work of the Money Power in this country . But the last shadow of doubt is dispelled when we see so many facts in corroboration of it.

Jim Fisk dies, and at his death it becomes evident that the firm of Fisk & Gould were not the owners of the Erie Railroad, but were only agents.—Jay Gould's railroad system breaks down, and proves that he did not own the railroads he was believed to possess, but was only an agent of the Money Kings.— Commodore Vanderbilt dies, and only divides up three and one-half millions among his children . — Wm. H. Vanderbilt sells out a controlling interest in the Vanderbilt system for $50,000,000, and places the money in a London bank.—And, at his death, he leaves his property, so that it can he easily controlled by a single will.—A.T. Stewart dies, and it is proved that he was only an agent of the London Money Kings :—These and many other similar facts make it certain that these grand corporations in our country are the agencies of the London Money Power.

2 . If any agent wants to deny that the Money Kings are his principals, it is very easy to prove the denial to be true.

Let him show the stock books of his corporation, and show who the stockholders are ; and let him show that his corporation is not mortgaged to the London Money Kings . No man who is afraid to show his stock books, can deny that he is the agent of the London Money Kings.

3 . The necessity for concealment shows why employees of those corporations, when testifying in court, and before committees of Congress, can not be induced to state who are the stockholders of the corporations they serve . That is their secreta secret that is never divulged.

One of them, after answering frankly the questions that were asked him about the management of his company, begged to be permitted not to tell who were the stockholders . He said he had come prepared to answer truly all the questions that might be asked him concerning the management of the business, but he had no right to tell who were the stockholders of the corporation . He was excused by the Committee ; and the American people do not know who are the stockholders of the Standard Oil Company.

They do not wish Americans to know that all these grand corporations are owned by the London Money Kings ! They guard this precious secret with the greatest care.—The books of a corporation were once taken out of a New York court by force, and carried off to Canada, to prevent it from being discovered who were the stockholders.

They never will permit the public to see their books,—unless indeed, hereafter, they should devise a new system in which the agents might be allowed to hold the stock under trust bonds, and carry it upon the books in their own name, in order to deceive the American people . They will do it, if necessary . Anything to keep their secret !

iv. Fourth Proof : the Jews Taking Possession of Property, in Europe, As in this Country.

What the Money Power has been doing in this country, it has been doing all over the world . All over the earth it is extending its empire over industry, commerce and wealth . The national debts of the world now amount to about $26,000,000,000 . It is estimated that the entire indebtedness of the world, national, state, county, municipal, corporate, and individual, amounts to over $70,000,000,000 . If three-fourths of this indebtedness is owed to the Money Power—and this is a moderate estimate—then at four per cent., the income from interest alone, amounts to $2,150,000,000 a year . Beside this, it has the profits derived from its manufactures—from its ocean commerce—from its city rents—from its mines of coal and lead and silver and gold and copper and tin—from its petroleum—from its freights and passenger traffic on its railroads and ocean vesselsfrom the profits of its farms and plantationsfrom the profits of its merchandizing—from its trade in all the productions of our country, and of the whole world . From all these sources, the Money Power have an annual revenue vast beyond computation.

In the United States, the Money Power is Making Almost All the Money that is made . Our people used to get the Liverpool price for our produce ; the profits being divided between the producer, the merchant who shipped, and the shipowner who carried it . But after the Money Power bought our ships, we only made the profits received at the sea board . And now, the Money Power has devoured our import and export sea board tradeour railroadsour minesour manufactures, and the traffic in all our products ; and all that our people now get is, what the Money Power pays our farmers for produce, at the railroad depots . All the profits, from that point, are realized by the Money Power and its agents . And it is the same in all other countries . From these facts, we can form an idea of the immense profits the Money Power is realizing from its imperialism over industry, commerce and wealth, all over the earth.

Though the fact that the Jew Capitalists are the London Money Power, a grand Imperialism of Capital, has never been thought of before, yet thoughtful observers have noticed the rapid rise of the Jews into astonishing wealth . Since this work was written, a thoughtful book, entitled The Jews, by Samuel H. Kellogg, D.D., has fallen under my eye, from which I take some very startling facts that are new to the public . The statements are more striking in their bearing upon the Imperialism of Capital attained by the London Jews, from the fact that the author of the work has no idea of the Jewish London Money Power.

It shows that the Jews have done, and are doing, in Europe, all I have shown that they are doing in the United States.

1st . Jewish Power and Influence

Dr. Kellogg says :—"Everywhere in Europe is noted the extraordinary tendency of capital to concentrate in Jewish hands ."

A writer in the Nineteenth Century makes the following statements :—

" The Influence of the Jews at the present time is more noticeable than ever . That they are at the head of European Capitalists, we are all well aware . * * * * The Jews are, beyond dispute, the leaders of the Plutocracy of Europe . * * * * In all the vast financial schemes of recent years, the hand of the Jews has been felt, both for good and evil . The Rothschilds are but the leading name among the whole series of capitalists, which include the great monetary chiefs of Berlin, Amsterdam, Paris and Frankfort . During the ten years, 1854 to 1864, the Rothschilds furnished in loans, $200,000,000 to England, $50,000,000 to Austria, $40,000,000 to Prussia, $130,000,000 to France, $50,000,000 to Russia, $12,000,000 to Brazil, in all $482,000,000.This, besides many millions loaned to small states ."

And this was twenty-four years ago, when these capitalists were comparatively feeble ! How many millions have they loaned in the last twenty-four years ? ! !

In Prussia, where the Jews are only two per cent . of the population, in 1871, out of six hundred and forty two bankers, five hundred and fifty were Jews ; i.e. about six-sevenths of the whole number—And this was seventeen years ago . How great has been the growth of Jewish capital in the interval ! !

In Austria, a similar state of things exists . One of the religious papers of Berlin makes the statement that “The Bourse of Vienna actually lies 'wholly in Jewish hands .”

The petition of the Anti-Semites, circulated in Germany, in 1880, complains:—"The fruits of Christian labor are harvested by the Jews . Capital is concentrated in Jewish hands .”

2nd . These Jew Capitalists Are Taking Possession of the Business of Europe

So long ago as 1861, according to the Prussian official returns, out of seventy-one thousand Jews in Prussia, capable of work, thirty eight thousand, or more than half, were engaged in commerce ; while, at the same time, only one Jew in five hundred and eighty six was a day laborer.

In Berlin,—where the Jews were five per cent . of the population,—in I87I, while, out of every hundred Protestants, thirty nine were returned as “employers," out of every hundred Jews, seventy-one were engaged in commercial life : It is evident that the Jew merchants make at least five times as much profit as the Protestant “employers" engaged in various lines of business.

In Lower Austria, out of 59,122 merchants, 30,012 are returned in the last census as Jews.Over half the merchants Jews, while the Jews are less than five per cent . of the population ! And we know that the Jew stores are always extensive establishments ; while the native merchants have the small stores.—When the Jews are half in number of the merchants of our towns, what will have become of our merchants ? Where will they be?

In Algiers, even a worse state of things exists . According to Le Telegraphe, "Constantina, Algiers and Oran belong almost completely to the Jews . The whole trade of Algiers is in their hands ; and, in consequence of high and usurious rates of interest, a large proportion of the natives are fallen into the power of the Jews .” The writer adds, “Here is a dark point, full of danger for the future .”

3rd . These Jew Capitalists Are Devouring the Lands of Europe

The Jews have become to a vast extent the owners of the soil of Europe, and are rapidly becoming the owners of Europe in fee simple, as they are of the United States.

In a debate in the German Reichstag, on the famine of 1880, in Upper Silesia and Posen, it was said that one of the causes of the starvation of the people was the fact, that the lands of those countries had passed, by mortgage foreclosure, to a vast extent, out of the hands of the German Proprietors into the hands of the Jews . So far had this foreclosure of mortgages gone that, as it was stated, the German population were so stripped and impoverished that they were “almost incapable of raising themselves again .”—So will it be in this country, in a few years more . Thank God that it is not so yet.

A Berlin paper asserts, "It is a fact which can no longer be denied, that the population of the remote districts of Russia, Austria, Hungary and Roumania, are only the nominal possessors of the soil, and for the most part cultivate the land for the Jews, to whom they have mortgaged all the estates .”—One would almost suppose this writer to be speaking of farmers of Iowa and Kansas!

In Galicia, mortgages have, for several years past, increased at the rate of about eight million florins per annum ; and it is stated that one-third of the total amount has already passed, by foreclosure, into the hands of the Jews . The sheriff's sales of peasant land were one hundred and sixty-four in 1867 ; but, in 1879, these sales had risen to 3,164 ; “and it was almost exclusively the Jews who brought about these foreclosures, and acquired thereby the property .”

In the province of Berkowina, of the private mortgages registered in 1877, eighty-two per cent.,—according to the official returns,—were owned by the Jews.—In 1881, it was stated that already one-half of the real estate of that province, in town and country, had been taken possession of by the Jews, under foreclosure of mortgages . And Dr. Thaddeus Pilat, the Director of the Bureau of Statistics, expressed the opinion that “the remainder would, very shortly, go the same way .”

From Hungary, similar facts are reported In that country, in 1878, there were sixteen thousand sheriff's sales of property, far the greater part of which passed over to the Jews . The London Spectator stated, a few years ago, that the Jews had obtained possession of so many of the old estates of Hungary, “as to make a change in the constitution a necessity .”

In Roumania, the same authority says the gravest apprehensions were entertained that the Jews "would gradually oust the peasantry, till they possessed the whole land .”

In Russia it is said that, as early as 1869, seventy-three per cent. of the real estate of certain provinces in the West, where the Jews are the most numerous, had passed from the Russians into the hands of the Jews.

The Money Power is in a fair way to devour all the property of Asia Minor . Several years ago the New York Nation made the following statements :—

" Capital has fixed its eye on the magnificent region known as Asia Minor, and found it full to overflowing of material for handsome returns, which nothing prevents it from getting at, but insecurity and oppressive taxation . * * * * * * The Money markets of London and Paris, now that they will not lend the Sultan any more money, are beginning to insist, with a subtle, silent, but always in the end irresistible persistence, which unemployed capital knows so well how to exert, that he must at least give them a chance at his mines, and his minerals, and his wheat fields, olive yards and vineyards, must let them carry their own police with them, and fix their own taxation . * * * From this," the editor significantly remarks, "the Ottomans are probably in greater danger at this moment, than they have ever been from the armies of the Czar ."

In this dreadful state of things, can we wonder that the Jews are about, in every way, to dominate Europe ?

4th. The Jew Money Kings Are Menacing Europe, as Well As America, with Domination.

M. De Lavileye, the eminent publicist of Belgium, has expressed the general uneasiness that prevails on this subject, in these words : — " The rapid rise of the Jewish element is a fact which may be observed all over Europe . If this upward movement continues, the Israelites, a century hence, will be the masters of Europe ."

The London Spectator says : — " The Jews display a talent for accumulation with which Christians can not compete, and which tends to make of them an ascendant caste ."

The New York Tribune quotes one of the German papers as saying, "The rapid rise of the Jewish nation to leadership is a great problem of the future for East Germany ." And the writer states in justification of this opinion that "All the lower forms of labor, in the work shops, the fields, and ditches and swamps, fall to the lot of the German element, while the constantly increasing Jewish element obtains enormous possessions in capital and land, and raises itself to power and influence in every department of public life ."

In view of all these things, the London Spectator gives utterance to the prevailing feeling of anxiety in the following editorial, which appeared some years ago :—

" The nations feel insecure, as if they had no defense ; the working population are distressed till their irritability shakes the governments ; there is deep unrest everywhere, a sense as of over-fatigue ; a popular looking forward, not for a millennium, but for some colossal catastrophe in which all prosperity shall be submerged ; a tension which half makes statesmen wish that the cataclysm would come and be over . And we see ahead no prospect of amelioration, no gleam of hope in the sky ."

5th. The Jew Money Kings Have Lately Secured a Most Extensive Control of the Press

Dr. Kellogg says : "The increase of Jewish influence is further illustrated in the extensive control of the press [italics his] which the Jews have lately acquired . This is much insisted on, and with good reason greatly lamented, by many of the most eminent Christian men in Europe . The fact is to be observed in every country where the Jews exist in any number ." [Italics his.]

In Dresden, in a gathering of the representatives of the press, twenty-nine out of forty-three were Jews.

Out of twenty-three Liberal and Progressive papers of the Berlin daily press, there are only two which are not, in one way or another, under Jewish control.

In Italy, the Jews have control of the Liberal Press.

The most influential paper in Spain is under Jewish control.

It is well known that the Jews have control of a great portion of the Metropolitan Press of the United States . They are always open to give the gloss to events, inspired by the Money Power.

It is a part of the astute policy of the Money Power, to have Jews in control of the Liberal Press in Europe . There are two advantages they derive from this :—

I.) They keep up the agitation keep it boiling all the while—but keep it within limits fixed by themselves.

2.) The great advantage the Money Kings derive from the agitation of so-called Liberals and Progressives, is this : they are afraid the nations will rise against their own outrageous monopolies . They are destroying the business men of all countries ; and they are afraid the business class may rise up against them, and check their atrocious outrages in the business world . To prevent this, it is their policy to keep up an agitation of the working class, aiming at projects to which the business men are utterly opposed.

It is their policy to keep up a hot agitation for Communism and Socialism in the great cities ; so that the business men, in their antagonism to those ideas, will keep on the side of the Money Power . It is a significant fact that most of the agitators for Socialism are Jews, who are most probably the agents of the Money Power to keep up this agitation for their own purposes.

Thus, most of the Nihilists in Russia are Jews . Prof. Wassiljew of the Imperial University of St. Petersburg, in his testimony, given in the London Times, says, "It is an open secret that the Jews are among the leaders of the Nihilistic agitation ."

The London Spectator, in a review of Victor Tissot's Russians and Germans, says : "M. Tissot calls attention to the notable fact that the Nihilist ranks are largely recruited by Jews . * * * * * There are ten times as many Jews as there are Russians, Poles, or Germans ."

This shows that the Nihilist movement is largely an agitation against the Russian Government, started up by the Money Power through its Jewish agents . The Russian property class, in their horror of the Nihilists, keep in sympathy with the Money Power.

So, in this country, it is the interest of the Money Power to keep up the agitation of Socialism ; so that the business class, in their abhorrence of Communism, may keep in sympathy with the railroads, and the other corporations of the Money Power . It is a part of the consummate craft of these Money Kings.

No one can any longer doubt that these grand corporations are the agencies of the Money Power . The Scientific Proof is positive : and the Money Kings are doing in Europe what they are doing in the United States . Their movement in Europe, for the possession of all business and all lands, is even more advanced than it is in our own country.

V. Fifth Proof : Anticipation of the Evils the Money Power Has Caused in this Country.

There is no stronger evidence of the existence of a cause, than the fact that it has been traced to its effects before the effects were wrought out.

The Author of this work, twenty-three years ago, traced out in a published work the evils British capital has since wrought out in this country, and predicted its monopoly of our industry, and its devouring of our property . In that work, he gave two chapters to the subject : one headed "British Centralization of Commerce," the other " British Centralization of Wealth ."

Want of space forbids any extended quotations from the work . One passage must suffice, quoted from memory, as the work is not beside me :—

" The English cuckoo has no nest of its own, but lays its eggs in the nest of the hedgesparrow and the robin . When the young birds hatch, the intruder, by its larger growth, soon needs the whole nest ; and it throws out the young sparrows, one by one, upon the ground to die, while the stranger consumes all the food brought by the parent birds.—England is laying a cuckoo's egg in every nation's nest . It will not be long before the foreign egg will hatch, and, in its gigantic development, will need for its growth all the nation's wealth . Then, one by one, it will cast out of their nest the nation's young to perish, while the intruder will devour all the nation's wealth ." * * * * * * "It is the prosperity of England against the world : one or the other must go down ."

The Author, in that work, represents the American people as a prodigal heir, mortgaging his possessions to Moneybags . And he says that all would be pleasant, while Moneybags was accommodating ; but ruin would come when he insisted on having his own . Then the bankrupt prodigal would bewail his folly, too late.

All this has come upon us ; and worse than the Author anticipated . The Cuckoo's egg has hatched ; and the foreign intruder has already thrown most of the nation's young out of the nest, to perish . Manufacturers, wholesale merchants, oil men, dealers in wheat, cotton, hogs, beef, and all the products of the country have been remorselessly pitched out of the nest, to perish, while the intruder takes their place.

But the Author did not dream of the impudence of the Money Power, in daring to commit the ravages it has perpetrated in devouring the business of our country, step by step . He did not dream of its entering the country, and making Americans its agents to aid it in devouring their countrymen . He expected oppression, but he did not anticipate such mastery as it has achieved . He was expecting the money lender's harassments ; he did not realize the grasp of the mighty Imperialism, now throttling our country, and the world . He supposed they were merely English capitalists . He did not know that this Knot of Capitalists are the Great Red Dragon, the Seventh Head of the Beast, the mightiest Imperialism that has ever risen upon the earth ; which is now controlling all governments, devouring all property, and threatening to destroy all national life.[(3)]

1. The author will have occasion to quote further from this remarkable publication, later on.

2. This proves that the Rothschilds are the head of a syndicate . For that House loaned over $500,000,000 to national governments in the ten years from 1854 to 1864 ; besides all its other immense operations in the same time ; and all its previous loans . The House of Rothschild has loaned several billions of dollars . And yet the richest of the Rothschilds was worth only $17,000,000 . The House is evidently a syndicate loaning much money not owned by the Rothschild family .

3. Some may object that the Jews can not be the great Money Kings of London, because the great banking houses of Lombard street are not Jewish, but English banking houses—that the Jews are not on Lombard street, but on Threadneedle street, and others in the vicinity.

But this fact is merely a specimen of the habitual craft of the Jews . They habitually hide their operations behind other parties . Nothing is more in keeping with their policy than to hide their operations behind English banking houses.

Wherever the Money Kings break down a bank, or a business, it is their habit-to reorganize the establishment, take into their own hands a majority of the stock, give the original bankers, or business managers, the minority of the stock, and continue the business under the name of the old firm . They have done this repeatedly in this country.

In some of the many business crises of the past, the Jews may have driven these English banking houses to the wall, and subordinated them to themselves . Or, they may have entered into some business arrangement with them, and made them their agents . The fact is known that the Jews are at the head of the head of capitalists of England, and of the world . There is nothing that militates against their imperial position in the fact that a large part of the foreign business of London capital is done through English banking houses.

PART II.
THE GREAT RED DRAGON
A SYMBOL OF THE LONDON MONEY POWER.

CHAPTER I.

THE SEVEN HEADS AND TEN HORNS.

The Seven Heads and Ten Horns appear three times in the book of Revelation : 1) In the 12th chapter, upon the body of the Great Red Dragon ; 2) In the 13th chapter, upon the body of the Beast like a leopard, that rises up out of the Sea ; and 3) In the 17th chapter, on the body of the Scarlet-colored Beast, that has a Woman upon its back, called the Beast from the Pit .

In all cases, the seven heads have the same signification .

The following is the text of the passage where the Seven Heads and Ten Horns appear upon the body of the Dragon :—

"And there appeared another wonder in heaven ; and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads ." Rev. xii: 3.

The following is the text of the passage where these Seven Heads and Ten Horns appear upon the body of the Beast from the Sea :—

"And I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise up out of the sea having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy ." Rev. xiii I.:

In the 17th chapter of Revelation, where the Seven Heads and Ten Horns appear upon the body of the Beast from the Pit, they are elaborately described by the angel to John . The following is the text of the passage:—

“So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness : and I saw a woman sit upon scarlet-coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns .

“And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet color, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abomination and filthiness of her fornication : and upon her forehead was a name written, mystery, babylon the great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth.

“And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus : and when I saw her, I wondered with great admiration .

“And the angel said unto me, Wherefore didst thou marvel ? I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and ten horns .

“The beast that thou sawest was ;

“And is not ;

“and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit ;

“and go into perdition :

“and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, (whose names are not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world) when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is .

“And here is the mind which hath wisdom .

“The seven heads are seven mountains on which the woman sitteth .

“And there are seven kings :

“five are fallen ;

“and one is ;

“and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh, he must continue a short space .

"And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth into perdition .

"And the horns which thou sawest are ten kings which have received no kingdom as yet ; but receive power as kings one hour with the beast .

"These have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast . * *

* * * * "And the woman which thou sawest is that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth ." Rev. xvii: 3-13, and 18.

In each of the above instances, while they appear upon different bodies, the Seven Heads and Ten Horns are the same, and symbolize the same powers . In the 17th Chapter, the angel explains to John that the Seven Heads and ten horns symbolize "seven kings," prophetic phrase for seven kingdoms or empires . The angel says "five are fallen ; and one is ; and the other is not yet come, and when he cometh he must continue for a short space"

From this explanation, we are able to understand

The Appearance Of The Seven Heads And Ten Horns,

as they appear on the body of the Dragon . As the Dragon stands uplifted before the woman, five heads hang down dead, underneath its neck, symbolizing the five empires which had fallen at the time the Revelation was given . The Sixth Head is on the end of the Serpent's neck, and on it are ten horns . The Seventh Head is the Serpent's head, jutting out through the top of the Sixth head, and dominating all . Such is the appearance of the Dragon, with its Seven heads and Ten horns .

What is the symbolic signification of the Seven Heads and Ten Horns ? What power do they symbolize ?

Before giving the true exposition, it will be best to notice

1. the erroneous interpretation formerly given of the seven heads.

In former interpretations, the Headed Beast was interpreted as symbolizing the Roman empire, exclusively . This interpretation could be made, only by an entire misapplication of the facts of history . The Five Heads that had fallen at the time of the vision, have been interpreted as symbolizing the five forms of administration that existed under the Roman Republic,—Kings, Consuls, Decemvirs, Military Tribunes, and Dictators .

1st. I Object To This,

1 . That there were only two forms of government in Rome that had fallen at the time the vision was given,—the Kings; and the Republic .

The Republic was always a government of the Senate and the People, throughout its entire existence . And, during its entire existence, the Executive of the Republic was in the hands of the Consuls, except during brief intervals .

2. Again, I Object To The Interpretation, That

It is a violation of all the facts of history to call the Decemvirate, the Military Tribunes, and the Dictators, such forms of the Roman government as would be symbolized by "heads."

1) The Decemvirate was a brief rule of ten persons who had been sent to Greece, to obtain new institutions, and who ruled about a year, while they put the institutions in operation . They were overthrown in a popular uprising against the crime of one of their number .

2) The Military Tribunes were a temporary arrangement, that lasted only a few years . It was only another name for the Consuls ; and it was adopted, in order that one of the officers might be a Plebeian . It was merely a temporary expedient for a special purpose, and was soon set aside .

3) The Dictatorship only existed in times of great public danger when a Dictator was appointed, whose authority only lasted six months . It is absurd to call the Dictatorship a

"head" of the Beast . What sort of head is that, which comes on and falls of constantly ? Such a symbol is ridiculous .

4) These forms of administration can not be called "heads". The government of the Roman Republic was continuous all the while; and these changes of administration did not affect its identity in the least .

France, since the Revolution of 1789-93, has had nine different dorms of executive administration,—the Monarchy, Convention, the Directory, the Consulate, the Empire, the Monarchy again, the Republic, the Empire, and the Republic . All these were much more fundamental than those changes of the Roman executive . And yet, France has been the same power all the while .—Who would think of saying that any prophecy would represent France, during the last hundred years, by a beast with nine heads ? The idea is absurd . The French nation has been the same, all the while .

3. I Object To This Application Of The Symbol That

If the Different Forms of the Roman Administration Are to be Continued as Heads, then the Triumvirate of Octavius, Antony and Lepidus must be counted also; and it will make six heads that had lived, instead of five ! !

4. I Object To This Interpretation That

A Head, in Prophecy is Never the Symbol of a Mere Form of Administration . A head in prophecy, always symbolizes a kingdom, or an empire . The four heads of the Macedonian Leopard, in the second vision of Daniel symbolize the four kingdoms into which the Macedonian Empire was divided .—And these seven heads, in like manner, represent seven empires that have risen in the earth .

2nd. But The Greatest Absurdity Of This Exposition remains to be stated .—By making the “Seven Heads” symbolize the seven forms of Roman administration, former expositors had to find fulfilment for the Seventh Head in some form of Roman power ; and they found it in the Heathen Roman empire .

1. But The Dragon Is A Power Of The Latter Days.

This is certain .

1) It is contemporary with the Beast from the Pit; and all expositors agree that the Beast from the Pit is a power that has not yet risen .

2) In the Great Final War of the Earth, just before the Millennium, the Dragon is engaged in the war, in alliance with the Beast from the Pit and the False Prophet .

3) And all the facts respecting the Dragon, in the Apocalypse, prove that it is a power of the Latter Days .

The idea of making the dragon symbolize the Heathen Roman empire is perfectly absurd . It is this kind of interpretation,—such a straining of all the facts of history, such a jumble of symbolism and imagery,—that has made of this grand symbol, the Beast with Seven Heads and Ten Horns, an epithet of contempt and derision, hurled by the scoffer against all prophecy.

ii. the true interpretation of the seven heads and ten horns.

The Beast with Seven Heads and Ten Horns is a most remarkable symbol . It is so peculiar, so complex, and yet so simple, that it will not fit any powers but those it was intended to set forth .

As the four heads of the Macedonian Leopard, in the second vision of Daniel, symbolize the four kingdoms into which the Macedonian empire was divided, so here, the Seven Heads symbolize seven empires . But, as we might suppose, from the analogy of the vision of Daniel, that the seven empires were contemporary like those of the Macedonian Beast, it is expressly stated that they are consecutive .

The Seven Heads Symbolize Seven Empires having relations with the people of God, and existing from the earliest times down to a time yet future . Of these empires, five had fallen at the time of the vision .

1st. Exposition Of The First Five Heads.

The first Five Dead Heads hanging down under the neck of the Dragon symbolize five empires that had fallen at the time the revelation was given : "five are fallen" .

1. The First Dead Head Hanging Down

under the neck of the Serpent . Symbolizes the Egyptian empire; which under the Eighteenth Dynasty, as we learn from the records of the Egyptian monuments, recently deciphered, extended over Western Asia beyond the Euphrates and the Tigris . It was the Nineteenth Dynasty which persecuted Israel . The Pharaoh of the Persecution, under whom Moses was born, was the second king of the Nineteenth Dynasty . The Pharaoh of the Exodus died at Memphis, some twenty years after that event, with his Asiatic empire all lost, and with Egypt divided between himself and two rival kings, who reigned in the Delta . The great Egyptian empire fell before the judgments of God, visited upon Egypt for the deliverance of His people .

2. The Second Dead Head Hanging Down

beneath the neck of the Dragon is a Lion's head, and symbolizes the Assyrian empire, which carried away the Ten Tribes into captivity in Media .

3. The Third Dead Head Hanging Down is also a Lion's head, and symbolizes the Babylonian empire, which carried Judah away captive to Babylon .

4. The Fourth Dead Head Hanging Down is a Bear's head, and symbolizes the Persian empire, which restored the Jews to their own land, and always treated them kindly .

5. The Fifth Dead Head Hanging Down

beneath the neck of the Dragon is a Leopard's head, and symbolizes the Macedonian empire, which, under Alexander the Great, overthrew the Persian empire, and which, under Antiochus Epiphanes, afflicted the Jews with a grievous persecution . These five empires had fallen, when the vision of Revelation was given .

2nd. exposition of the sixth head, with its ten horns.

The Sixth Head was the Roman Empire, which was then in existence, and of which the angel said "One now is". The Sixth Head, the Roman empire, was slain by the "sword" of the Northern Barbarians, in the year 476, a. d., at which time historians date the fall of the Western Roman empire .

The Northern Barbarians Planted Their Kingdoms in the territories of the Roman empire . In the year 476, a.d.,—the very year of the fall of the Western Roman empire,—we find, for the first time, Ten Kingdoms within its boundaries .

In the eye of prophecy, the Babylonian, the Persian, and Macedonian empires continued to exist geographically, after their fall as political powers ; just as Ireland and Poland are still recognized as having a geographical existence, after they have ceased to be political powers . According to prophecy, the Roman territory was that part of the Roman empire which was not covered by the Babylonian, Persian and Macedonian empires,—the territory extending from the head of the Adriatic to the Danube, and thence westward, within the Rhine and the Danube, to the Atlantic and the Mediterranean, and including England and a part of Scotland .

Within This Territory, We Find Ten Barbarian Kingdoms in the year 476, a.d. And there have been Ten Kingdoms in the territories of the Roman empire ever since that time .

Not always the same kingdoms : sometimes, some would fall, and others would rise in their place: sometimes, in eras of transition, there have been one or two more or less than ten kingdoms . But when these eras of transition were over, and Europe returned to its normal condition, there would be Ten Kingdoms again . There have been Ten Kingdoms in Southern and Western Europe, for thirteen hundred years : there are Ten Kingdoms in Europe now, within the limits of the Roman empire .

These Ten Kingdoms are fully set forth in my work, "Key to Prophecy," and it is not necessary to present them further here .

These Ten Kingdoms within the territories of the Roman empire are symbolized by the Ten Horns, which grew out of the dead Sixth Head . This Sixth Head corresponds with the fourth beast of the second vision of Daniel . That beast symbolized the Roman empire : so here, the Sixth Head . That beast had ten horns ; so, on the Sixth head here, are the same ten horns .

3rd. The Seventh Head.

The Seventh Head is the Serpent head,—the empire of the Dragon . It is the subject of this work to prove that the Seventh or Dragon Head symbolizes the London Money Power—the Imperialism of Capital centred in London . We will proceed in the next chapter to give the proof . At present we will proceed to the identification of

4th. The Beast From The Pit.

After explaining to John the Seven Heads and Ten Horns, the angel goes on to give an explanation of the Scarlet Beast,—the Beast from the Pit . The angel says of him : "The beast that thou sawest was, and is not ; and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition ." And he says again : "The beast that was and is not, even he is the eighth, and is one of the seven ."

1. This shows that the Beast from the Pit rises after all the other seven empires have risen,—after the rise of the Dragon Empire, the Seventh Head . "He is the Eighth ."

After the rise of the Dragon empire, another empire rises, which is the Eighth in order of time, but which is actually not a new empire but is one of the first Seven Empires : that is, it is a new imperial power, in whose dominion one of the dead six empires comes to life again, and is re-established .

All expositors agree that the Roman empire,—the dead Sixth Head,—is to be re-established in the dominion of the Beast from the Pit . There are many other prophecies which foreshow this re-establishment of the Roman empire . The re-establishment of the Roman empire under the dominion of the Beast from the Pit is set forth with great clearness in the 13th chapter of Revelation, and also is the First and Second Visions of Daniel .

In the 13th chapter of Revelation, this re-establishment of the Roman empire is set forth . The context reads as follows :—

"And I stood upon the sand of the sea,

"and saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the names of blasphemy .

"And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion .

"And I saw one of his heads as it had been wounded to death [or slain;] and his deadly wound was healed .

" And the Dragon gave him his power and his seat and great authority ."

"And all the world wondered after the beast . And they worshipped the Dragon which gave power to the beast: and they worshipped the beast, saying, Who like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with him ." Rev. XIII: 1-4.

I have, in one place, slightly transposed this passage, so as to give the proper order of sequence .

The Seven Heads here, as has been already explained, are I) Egypt ; 2) Assyria ; 3) Babylon ; 4) Persia ; 5) Macedon ; 6) Rome ; 7) The Dragon head; which I expound as the symbol of the Money Power . This is the point now being established .

2. It Is Important To Fix The Time when the vision begins .

The Beast, in its first rise from the Sea, represents Medieval Europe, after the fall of the Roman empire, under the Ten Kingdoms . This is evident both from history, and from the symbolism of the Beast:—

1) The Ten horns represent the Kingdoms of the Northern Barbarians who overran the Roman empire . It is Europe under the Ten Kingdoms that is here represented . That the time is during the reign of the Ten Kingdoms is evident from the fact that the ten horns in the symbol are crowned ; which shows that they are reigning in the era set forth in the vision .

2) The Beast rises up out of "the Sea." The "Sea" is a prophetic image frequently employed, to represent a chaotic condition of society, in which all the elements of social life are unsettled . Such was the condition of the territory of the Roman empire after the fall of the Western empire . All the institutions of Roman civilization were broken down : society was dissolved by the Barbarians who overswept the Roman empire, ravaging, destroying, burning ; until the remnants of the Roman population were reduced to the condition of serfs, hoveled in the forests which grew up in the cultivated provinces that were reduced to desolation . Out of this chaos modern Europe emerged .

3) When the Beast rose it had the Sixth or Roman head "as it had been wounded unto death," that is, freshly slain . This was true of the Roman empire, which was just recently slain by the "sword" of the Northern Barbarians .

All the symbolism shows that the Beast represents Europe during the era of the reign of the Ten Kingdoms, after the fall of the Roman empire .

4) The description of the Beast also agrees perfectly with Europe under the Ten Kingdoms .

1] "The Beast was like a leopard."—In the Macedonian Leopard (Daniel vii), the spots indicate the great number of Grecian states that entered into the Macedonian empire . The Amphyctionic Council of the Grecian states made Phillip, King of Macedon, and afterwards Alexander, the head of Greece for the war with Persia, while each state continued to maintain its independence .

So here, the spots of the Leopard indicate the Ten Kingdoms of Europe, which have maintained a sort of loose combination through their community of religion and interest, but have always maintained their independence as separate states .—They were combined during the Crusades by a common religious enthusiasm ; and all through the Middle Ages, they were united in their allegiance to the Papacy .—In Modern Times, community of interest has caused them to combine against any preponderant nation, to maintain the Balance of Power . The ten crowned horns have thus been united on the head of the Beast from the Sea .

2] "The feet were as the feet of a bear."—The Persian bear was slow in its conquests; and these bear feet show that the states of Europe were, like Persia, slow in their military operations . And indeed, the Ten Kingdoms of Europe have always been slow and sluggish in any military conquests, and generally close their slow wars with but little or no conquests on either side .

3] "His mouth was as the mouth of a lion ."—This lion mouth tears and ravages, and shows the ferocity of the European states in their furious and bloody wars .

There can the no doubt that the Beast from the Sea represents Roman Europe after the fall of the Roman empire, under the dominion of the Ten Kingdoms .

3. The Healing Of The Deadly Wound.

The Seer defers the mention of the deadly wound, until he speaks of the healing of the wound . The first act which John saw was the healing of the deadly wound . This symbolizes the Restoration of the slain Roman head to life,—the re-establishment of the Roman empire .

After the healing of the dead Sixth Head, that head, when restored to life, is the Beast from the Pit . This fully explains the symbolism of the Beast from the Pit :—

1) It shows the Beast from the Pit was the Eighth empire in the order of time, but was not a new head, but one of the seven heads, being the Sixth Head restored to life .

2) We also perceive how the Beast from the Pit might be called "The Beast that was, and is not, and yet is ." It is the Roman empire ; it is not, in its new form, actually the Roman empire but the German empire ; and yet, it is the Roman empire, re-established under a new form .

3) The Beast from the Pit is the Roman empire reestablished, under the imperial supremacy of Prussia over the kingdoms of Southern and Western Europe . The symbolism plainly shows that the power under which the Roman empire is to be re-established is Prussia:—

1] From the nature of the symbolism, none of the ten horns can be the Beast from the Pit . For a horn can not be a head, much less can a horn be a Beast . The horns are all on the Sixth Head of the Beast: they are all accounted for ; and none of them can be the Beast from the Pit .

This shows that none of the Ten Kingdoms of Western and Southern Europe can be the Beast from the Pit . This excludes all the kingdoms in the territories of the Roman empire, within the Rhine and the Danube, from the head of the Adriatic westward to the Atlantic, including England and part of Scotland . Neither France, nor Austria, nor Italy, nor Spain, nor Britain, can be the Beast from the Pit ; for they are horns on the head of the Beast . A common sense analysis of the symbol would have prevented all the blunders that have been made in expounding the Beast from the Pit as the symbol of the French empire .

2] The Beast from the Pit must, from the nature of the symbol, be some power in Europe outside of the Rhine and the Danube . It must be either Prussia or Russia .

But it is not Russia, because in prophecy, Russia is called by name as at the head of Europe, at an era after the Beast from the Pit has fallen .(*)

Hence, as the Beast from the Pit can not be any of the ten kingdoms of Europe within the Rhine and the Danube, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, can not be Russia, it must be Prussia .

The very nature of the symbolism demonstrates the fact that Prussia is the Beast from the Pit .

We will find that identifying Prussia as the Beast from the Pit is a strong point of the evidence in proving the Dragon to be the symbol of the London Money Power .

CHAPTER II.

MODE OF IDENTIFYING SYMBOLS WITH THE POWERS THEY SYMBOLIZE.

As I wish to set forth the evidence that the Dragon is the symbol of the London Money Power in regular order, I desire, in the first place, to show the method by which expositors of prophecy prove that the symbols of prophecy symbolize the powers which they set forth . This can best be done by means of illustrations .

To illustrate the laws of prophetic symbolism, I will take, as examples, the first two beasts of the second vision of Daniel .

In Prophecy, objects in the natural world are employed to symbolize or represent objects which they resemble in the political world .—Thus, an earthquake, which breaks down and destroys objects in the world of nature, is made the symbol of a revolution which breaks down and destroys political institutions .—A storm of lightning and thunder, the effect of conflicting winds and opposite electrical conditions, in the natural world, is made the symbol of a great war arising out of furious opposing elements in the political world .—Thus also, a wild beast, cruel, sanguinary, is a proper symbol of a political empire .

Thus, in the second vision of Daniel, four beasts which rise one after another, are made the symbols of the successive empires of Babylon, Persia, Macedon, and Rome . Upon this expositors are agreed .

1 . In identifying these beasts with the powers they symbolize, the first thing to notice is the historical order of succession . The first Beast that rises, of course symbolizes the empire that rises first in the order of time . No one would make the first Beast symbolize Persia, the second empire, or make the second Beast symbolize Babylon, the first empire .

Hence, any facts mentioned which enable us to determine the historical order of events may be very important elements in identifying the symbol with the power it symbolizes .—These identifying facts, for want of a better name, I term Historical Marks .

2 . Furthermore, in prophetic symbolism, symbols are chosen which resemble, in character, the power symbolized . Thus, a lion is made the symbol of the Babylonian empire, and a bear, of the Persian empire ; because those wild beasts resemble, in character, the empires they symbolize . These resemblances in character between the symbol and the power symbolized, I term Parallelisms of Character .

But Historical Marks and Parallelisms of Character do not always sufficiently designate the power represented by the symbol .—And hence, in symbolic prophecy another means of identity is; also : employed certain facts are stated respecting the symbol, which represent corresponding facts that are true of the power symbolized . These points of resemblance in respect of facts, I term Coincidences of Fact .

Let us now observe the manner in which the Lion is identified with the Babylonian empire,—by Marks—by Parallelisms of Character—and by Coincidences of Fact .

1 . the lion with eagle's wings .

The following is the text :

“And four beasts came up from the Sea, diverse from one another .

“The first was like a lion, and had Eagle’s wings .

“I beheld till the wings thereof were plucked ;

“and it was lifted up from the earth, and made to stand upon its feet like a man, and a man's heart was given to it .” Daniel vii : 3, 4.

All expositors are agreed that the Lion is the symbol of the Babylonian empire . We will, by way of illustration, identify it by Marks, by Parallelisms of Character, and by Coincidences of Fact .

1st. Historical Marks.

First Mark :—There is only one important Mark which aids the expositor in identifying the Lion with Babylon . But it alone is sufficient . Babylon was the first of the four great empires which arose in succession ; and we would naturally expect the first of the four beasts to be the symbol of Babylon .

It is apparent that this Mark alone would not be sufficient to identify Babylon as the power symbolized by the Lion . The evidence is cumulative . The Marks, the Parallelisms and the Coincidences, all go to establish the identity . And when all four of the beasts are thus identified with the powers they symbolize, the force of the Historical Mark becomes intensified . For we know that, if the other beasts symbolize respectively Persia, Macedon and Rome, then, most certainly, the first beast symbolizes Babylon .

In some of the symbols of prophecy, however, the Historical Marks are quite numerous .

2nd. Parallelisms Of Character.

There are several Parallelisms of Character between the Lion with Eagle's wings and the Babylonian empire :

First Parallelism of Character :—The Lion is a ferocious carnivorous wild beast .— The Babylonian empire, under its founder Nebuchadnezzar, was a sanguinary conquering empire, ravening and destroying among the nations, like a lion among flocks and herds .

Second Parallelism of Character :—The lion is a magnanimous wild beast .—Unlike the tiger and the leopard, which raven with the mere lust of slaughter, it only destroys to appease hunger .—The Babylonian empire only assailed and conquered the countries which resisted its possession of the great trade between the East and the West, leaving all other nations in peace . And Nebuchadnezzar sought, first, to treat the subject nations of the West with leniency, and was only provoked to severity by repeated revolts .

Third Parallelism of Character :—The Lion had Eagle's wings .—The lion lies in wait for its prey, and springs upon it from ambush . To indicate that this was not the case with this symbolic Lion, it was furnished with Eagle's wings .—These Eagle's wings show the rapidity of the conquests of Nebuchadnezzar . At the head of his Chaldean horsemen, the conqueror overran in few campaigns Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and North Africa as far as the Straits of Gibraltar .

3rd. Coincidences Of Fact.

Besides the above Parallelisms of Character, there are mentioned two Coincidences of Fact respecting the Lion with Eagle's Wings, which represent corresponding facts in the history of the Babylonian empire .

First Coincidence of Fact :—I beheld till the Eagle's wings were plucked .—The plucking of course prevented the Lion from sweeping on any longer in its career of conquest . Deprived of the Eagle's wings, the Lion henceforth would be like other lions, and lurk in its habitat, lying in wait for prey . The plucking of the Eagle's wings indicates a sudden event which stopped, once for all, the Babylonian career of conquest . The conquering career of Babylon was terminated by the madness of Nebuchadnezzar . That event plucked the wings of the lion; and henceforth, Babylon remained content in the enjoyment of the wealth and grandeur derived from its possession of the grand commerce between the Indian Ocean and the Mediterranean, which flowed through the city .

Second Coincidence of Fact :—"It was made to stand on its feet like a man, and a man's heart was given it ."—In some of the bas reliefs from Niniveh, we see the hunted lion rearing upon its hind feet, confronting the hunters, whose spears are transfixing it .—In its fall, Babylon was like the hunted lion . For years, it held the conqueror at bay behind its city walls, standing like a lion upreared against the hunters . During all the siege, Babylon had the man's heart, afraid to meet the foe in the open field . But it fell fighting, and hopeful of victory to the end .

Now, by this one Historical Mark, these three Parallelisms of Character, and these two Coincidences of Fact, all expositors agree that the Lion with Eagle's Wings is sufficiently proved to be the symbol of the London Money Power .

ii. the persian bear.

In the same way, the Bear is proved to be the symbol of the Persian empire .

The following is the text :

"And behold another beast, a second, like unto a bear .

"And it raised up itself on one side .

"And they said thus unto it, 'Arise, devour much flesh'." Daniel vii: 5.

1st. Historical Marks.

There is one Historical Mark which aids in identifying the Bear with the Persian empire :—

Historical Mark :—As the Persian empire was the second empire in the order of succession, we naturally are led to expect that the second beast is its symbol .

2nd. Parralelisms Of Character.

There are two Parallelisms of Character between the Bear and the Persian empire;—

First Parallelism of Character :—The Bear is not an exclusively carnivorous animal : it subsists largely on vegetables and fruits .—This shows the bear to be less ferocious than the lion and other carnivorous animals .—And the Persian empire was the mildest of all the empires of ancient times . It treated the conquered nations with greater leniency . It suffered the people carried into captivity by Babylon, to return to their own countries . It allowed the Phoenicians to resume their trade by way of the Red Sea . The countries desolated by Babylon resumed their prosperity under Persian rule .

Second Parallelism of Character :—The Bear is a clumsy, slow moving animal .—So, the Persian empire was slow and clumsy in its military movements . Great numbers of women and children accompanied its armies; and the officers carried with them all the appliances of luxury . All military movements were impeded by the vast quantities of baggage which were carried with the armies .

3rd. Coincidences Of Fact.

The Bear is also identified with the Persian empire by three Coincidences of Fact .

First Coincidence of Fact :—"The bear raised up itself on one side ."—Persia was on the Eastern side of the empire, and all the conquests of the Persians, in founding the empire, were made toward the West . The Persian empire, like the bear, "raised up itself on one side."

Second Coincidence of Fact :—The Bear "had three ribs in its mouth between its teeth."—These ribs indicate three victims fallen prey to the Bear .—The Persian empire, in its rise, overthrew three powers,—Lydia, Babylon and Egypt .

Third Coincidence of Fact :—"It was said unto it, Arise, devour much flesh."—The bear was thus indicated to be an animal very destructive of human life .—The Persian empire conquered many countries not under the Babylonian yoke . It extended its conquests far to the North, and East and South ; it subdued all Asia Minor ; and its invading armies penetrated into Greece, and the plains of Southern Russia .—And, during its entire existence, the Persian empire was convulsed with frequent revolts . The conquests and revolts occasioned very destructive wars .

By this Historical Mark, these two Parallelisms of Character, and these three Coincidences of Fact all expositors agree that the Bear is proved to be the symbol of the Persian empire .

CHAPTER III .

PROOF THAT THE DRAGON IS THE SYMBOL OF THE LONDON MONEY POWER .

By illustrations given in the last chapter, the reader can perceive the method by which the symbols of prophecy are identified with the powers they symbolize . We are now ready to proceed to identify the Dragon as the symbol of the London Money Power .

And here, I wish to say that, if there were not more evidence to prove that the Dragon is the symbol of the London Money Power, than there is to prove the identity of the other symbols of prophecy with the powers they symbolize, I should not venture to advance the idea at all, in this age of general scoffing of prophecy .

But there is about eight times as much evidence to prove that the Dragon is the symbol of the London Money Power, as there is to prove the identity of any other prophetic symbol with the power it symbolizes .—There is one Historical Mark, three Parallelisms of Character, and two Coincidences of Fact, to prove that the Lion with Eagle's Wings is the symbol of the Babylonian empire ; and one Historical Mark, two Parallelisms of Character, and three Coincidences of Fact, to prove that the Bear is the symbol of the Persian empire .—But, on the other hand, there are no less than six Historical Marks, twenty Parallelisms of Character, and twenty-two Coincidences of Fact, to prove that the Dragon is the symbol of the London Money Power . It seems as though divine inspiration had purposed to give such an array of evidence to establish the fact that the Dragon is the symbol of the Money Power, as would force conviction upon the most incredulous .

The Marks, the Parallelisms of Character, and the Coincidences of Fact, which prove that the Lion with Eagle's Wings is the symbol of the Babylonian empire, and the Bear, of the Persian, are not very striking ;—but the Historical Marks, the Parallelisms of Character, and the Coincidences of Fact, which prove the Dragon is the symbol of the London Money Power, are, all of them, striking, and some of them very remarkable-so remarkable, indeed, that no idea of a chance resemblance can be entertained for a moment . They prove that Divine inspiration intended thus to mark the Dragon unmistakably as the symbol of the London Money Power . It is evident that Divine Providence wished to make the proof of the identity of the Dragon with the Money Power so certain than none can doubt ; but that, as it is said in another prophecy of the Dragon in the Old Testament, “He who runs may read”. The proof dispels all doubt, and compels belief .

As the world may be slow to accept the fact that the Dragon is the symbol of the Money Power, I shall array the evidence in regular order, even at the risk of seeming tedious .

1st . Recapitulation .

Let us now briefly review the facts respecting the Seven Heads and Ten Horns :

1 . The angel says of the seven heads, “there are seven kings,” that is, kingdoms or empires . Of these seven empires he says, “five are fallen”.—These are the Egyptian, the Assyrian, the Babylonian, the Persian, and the Macedonian empires, which had all fallen at the time the vision was given .

2 . The angel continues, “And one is .” This was the Roman empire, which was in existence at the time when the Revelation was given .

I) Immediately after the fall of the Roman empire, ten Barbarian kingdoms were planted in its territories, which have been in existence ever since . These Ten Kingdoms are symbolized by the Ten Horns which grew upon the dead Sixth Head of the Beast .

3 . The angel continues, “And the other, [the Seventh Head] is not yet come ; and when he cometh he must continue a short space.”—This is the Dragon head ; and, as I shall prove, it symbolizes the London Money Power .

4 . The angel then proceeds to explain the Beast from the Pit as an Eighth empire, but not an eighth head, being the Sixth Head come to life again, or the Roman empire re-established.—This Eighth empire, as we have seen, is the empire of Prussia at the head of Germany, extended over Southern and Western Europe .

5 . The Dragon gives to Prussia its imperial dominion, as we learn from the 13th Chapter of Revelation, “The Dragon gave to the Beast his power, and his seat, and great authority.”

6 . And then the prophet saw that the Dragon and the Beast wielded a united imperial sway over the empire : "they worshipped the Dragon which gave power onto the beast : and they worshipped the beast saying, who is like unto the beast ? Who is able to make war with him ? "

2nd . Six Important Historical Marks are here found, which will go far toward enabling us to identify the Dragon empire :—

First Mark :—The Dragon empire is the seventh empire in order of time .—Hence it is an empire which rises after the fall of the Roman empire, 476 a.d.

Second Mark :—The Dragon empire, "When he cometh must continue a short space ."

I . Both of these marks prove that the Dragon empire is not the Papacy : for I) The Papacy rose in the Pontificate of Leo the Great (440 a.d.-460 a.d.) before the fall of the Western Roman empire ; and 2) The Papacy, instead of continuing "a short space," has been in existence more than 1,400 years .

Leaving the Papacy aside, what empire has risen since the fall of the Roman empire, 476 a.d. ?

2 . It can not be the empire of Charlemagne ; nor that of Charles V ; nor that of Napoleon I. For those empires were only the temporary rising into power of one of the horns ; and in each instance the access of power continued only for a generation . The nature of the symbol precludes the idea that either of these empires could be the Seventh Head ; for, as has been said, a horn can not become a head . The ten horns are all upon the Sixth Head : they are all accounted for : from the nature of the symbol, neither of them can be the Dragon .

3 . Aside from these empires and the Papacy, no empire has risen in Europe since the fall of the Roman empire, 476 a.d., except the Money Power of London . It is the seventh empire of the earth . It is the grandest Imperialism that has ever existed in the world .—This is especially an age of industry ; and it has established an empire over industry, of which it is the head . It is at the head of the mighty movement of the age in which the whole world is marching . The kingdoms of Europe are all dependent upon it for loans . They all truckle to it, and do its will . They are kingdoms : it is an empire .—Being the one empire that has risen since the fall of the Roman empire, it is the seventh empire : and this Mark proves it to be the power symbolized by the Dragon .

That the Dragon empire is the London Money Power is corroborated by the other Historical Marks mentioned of the Dragon :—

Third Mark :—The Dragon empire a power of modern times .—In the 13th Chapter of Revelation it is contemporary with the healed head, or Beast from the Pit,—the Prussian empire . And all expositors agree that the Beast from the Pit is a power that has not yet risen . In the 13th Chapter of Revelation, the Dragon is represented as aiding in the rise of the empire of the Beast from the Pit, and as wielding with it a partnership imperial sway .—The Dragon empire is certainly a power of modern times, existing contemporaneously with the Beast from the Pit, a power that has not yet risen . This agrees perfectly with the Money Power, which has also risen in modern times .

Fourth Mark : —The Dragon is represented, in the 13th Chapter of Revelation, as attaining its highest power at a time yet future .—This agrees with the Money Power, which is, in our time, rapidly rising in power, and will reach its highest point of dominion at some time yet future .

Fifth Mark :—The Dragon empire is the Seventh head : the Beast from the Pit, or Prussian empire, is the eighth, in order of time .—Therefore it rises after the Dragon empire ; the Dragon empire being in existence at the time of its rise, and aiding it to attain its imperial dominion . Hence, if the Prussian empire is about to be established in the near future, the Dragon empire is now in existence .—And as the Money Power is the only such imperial power now in existence, it must be the Dragon .

Sixth Mark :—The Dragon empire was only to continue a short space.—And, as it is in existence at a time yet future, according to prophecy, its rise to imperial dominion can not be very far in the past .—This agrees with the Money Power, which, as we have seen, rose to imperial dominion in the year 1757, A.D., and has now been in existence one hundred and thirty years .

The Dragon Agrees With the Money Power in all these particulars . There is no other power now in existence that agrees with these marks in any particular . The Historical Marks of the prophecies point unmistakably to the Money Power as the imperialism symbolized by the Dragon .

This Far, the Conclusions Reached Are Sure . It is impossible to dispute them . The clear statements of prophecy are irresistible .—1) It is certain that the Roman empire is not yet re-established .—2) It is certain that the Dragon empire is in existence before the re-establishment of the Roman empire, and aids in its re-establishment—3) It is certain that, if the Roman empire is about to be re-established at an early day, the Dragon empire is now in existence .—4) It is certain, as the Dragon empire is to “continue only a short space” that, as it is in existence at a time yet future, it has risen to imperial power in very recent times .—5) It is certain that the Dragon is a power of modern times .

On the other hand, the Money Power is the only great Imperialism that is now in existence .—The Money Power is an Imperialism that has not been long risen .—The Money Power is an Imperialism that is still rising .—The Money Power is an Imperialism which has, by its loans, enabled Prussia to crush Austria and France, and to become the first power in Europe ; and which, according to present indications, will soon, by its loans, enable Prussia and her allies, Britain, Austria and Italy, to crush Russia and France and attain to imperial dominion over Southern and Western Europe, and thus re-establish the Roman empire .—And just as the Money Power has wielded the power of Britain in the past, it will wield the power of Prussia, the Beast from the Pit, in the future .—All these Marks point unmistakably to the Money Power as the Imperialism symbolized by the Dragon .

CHAPTER IV.

continued.

ii . second proof :—parallelisms of character .

1st . what is a dragon ?

A great error has obtained as to the personality of a Dragon . During the ignorance and superstition of the Middle Ages, the idea of a mythical Dragon arose, which resembled a winged crocodile . But the historical dragon of antiquity, which was the universal conception of a dragon prevailing at the time the Revelation was given, was a great serpent . A fact is mentioned in the early history of Rome which shows what was the classical and historical idea of a Dragon .—When the Roman army, under Regulus, invaded the Carthaginian territories in North Africa, a great dragon appeared in the neighbourhood of the Roman camp, and devoured a number of the soldiers . The Romans were greatly terrified, but finally killed the monster by hurling stones upon it with their balistas . This dragon was undoubtedly a boa constrictor, which had found its way across the desert from Central Africa . The Dragon of Revelation, then, was a great red serpent .

2nd . Parallelisms Of Character .

We have seen that certain things in the natural world are chosen by Divine inspiration, to symbolize the powers they set forth, on account of a resemblance in character between the symbol and the power symbolized .—Thus, the Great Red Dragon is chosen by Divine inspiration to symbolize the London Money Power, because, in all the realm of nature, nothing but a great serpent resembles the Money Power, in its character, and its modes of action . In its character, and all its activities and methods, the Money Power is like a snake . The Great Red Dragon, like all great serpents, belongs to the constrictor species . We must, therefore, look to the Boa Constrictor for the points of character and action, in which the parallel is to be found . Prophecy represents the Money Power as a great Serpent, with its den in England, but its body extending in mighty coils all over the earth .

First Parallelism of Character :—The dragon is a devourer . The Boa Constrictor, when it has devoured a sheep or a deer, remains torpid until its meal is digested : then it lives for nothing else but to lie in wait, watching for another victim . Its whole sluggish life is absorbed in devouring . So the Money Power is a devourer of industry, commerce, wealth and property . It lives for nothing else but to accumulate . It differs from a Boa Constrictor only in its inordinate size . A Boa Constrictor, if it swallows a sheep, is torpid for a time, till its meal is digested ;—but give it a mouse, and it is still hungry and wants more . This Great Dragon, the Money Power, is so vast, that it can never be gored to repletion . It is devouring industry, trade and property, all over the earth, and it never has enough . The inspired prophet speaking of this Money power, says, "He enlargeth his desire as hell, and he is as death, and can not be satisfied, but gathereth unto him all nations, and heapeth unto him all people ."

We have seen how the Money Power is devouring all over the earth . It is devouring in Europe—in India, and all over Asia—in Egypt, South Africa, on the Congo, and wherever Africa is penetrated—in South America—in Mexico and Central America—in Canada—in the United States—in Australia, and the Isles of the ocean . Everywhere it is devouring the industry and wealth of the earth . It aims to devour all industry,—all manufactures-all banks—all shipping—all railroads—all commerce—all traffic, import and export, internal and foreign, wholesale and retail—all transportation—all mines, of coal and iron and silver and gold—all oil wells all city property—all farms—and all the wild lands of the world .

Besides the fact of its being a devourer, there is a certain method in its devourings that identifies the Dragon with the Money Power . These points of similarity I point out in the several Parallelisms of Character next following :—

Second Parallelism of Character :—Unlike the lion or the tiger, which spring upon their prey with a roar, so that all the neighbourhood knows when the victim is destroyed, the Serpent steals secretly upon its victim, and seizes it noiselessly .

So the Money Power is sly and secretive in its methods, and steals upon its victims secretly, and destroys them without noise or struggle . The secret sly methods of the Money Power are exemplified in every assault it has made upon our industries . Thus it stole upon the merchants of New York City—the oil well owners of Pennsylvania—the operators in beef, pork, cotton and all the various business enterprises it has devoured . So silently, so stilly is it now stealing on the cattle ranches—the coal mines—the retail merchants—the breweries—the flour mills—the farmers—and all the business interests it is now devouring .

Third Parallelism of Character :—The serpent charms its victims, and lures them to their doom .

So the Money Power has charmed and is charming the world, with the lure of its money . It lures people from all over the world to its London den, to get money to build railroads, and water works, and gas works—and, in the end, all that was built with the money it devours .—It lures miners after money to develop mines : and it crushes the miner and devours the mine .—By starting a boom in cattle, it lures farmers, merchants, mechanics, to borrow money on mortgaged property and put it into cattle ranches : and then it devours the mortgaged property, and the ranches in which the borrowed money was invested—By starting booms in cities and towns, it lures all classes who have property, to borrow money on mortgage and invest it in town lots : and then it devours both the mortgaged property, and the boom investment .

Fourth Parallelism of Character :—Unlike the lion and the tiger, and all other beasts of prey, which rend and tear their victims in furious assault, the Boa destroys its prey by enveloping it in its coils, and crushing it .

So the Money Power always envelops the industry it assails in the coils of its capital, and crushes it by constriction .—Thus it enveloped the oil industry—the New England Mills—the New York merchants—and all the industries it has devoured . In every instance, it used its immense capital in such a manner as to crush the operators instantly, as the boa constrictor crushes its victim in its coil . —The method of the Money Power is identical with that of the Boa .

Fifth Parallelism of Character :—The Boa constrictor crushes only to devour, and devours all it crushes .—In this it is unlike the tiger or the leopard . The tiger will destroy forty sheep, and eat only one ; or will kill half a dozen bullocks, and devour only a part of a single carcass . In this they resemble political despotisms, of which such wild beasts are made the symbols . For such political powers wage grand and destructive wars, and in the end, the conquering state gains only a petty acquisition . Thus, all the grand wars of the first Napoleon ended in but small accessions of territory : Prussia, after crushing France, gained only Alsace-Lorraine .

This is unlike the Money Power which, like the serpent, attacks only to devour, and devours all it attacks . It never attacks any business interest, unless it means to devour it . It did not attack the New England Mills, or the iron interests of Pennsylvania, till the time came for them to be devoured . A caged Boa will leave the rabbits in its cage unharmed for days, till it is ready to devour them . So the Money Power will work side by side with business interests for years, without showing any hostility, till the time comes when it is ready to take possession of them ; and then, it makes its attack suddenly, and crushes them inexorably . We find illustrations of this, in all the operations of the Money Power in this country . It has never assailed an American business which it did not devour . It is now assailing the cattle men—the lumber men—the wholesale merchants-the retail merchants- the farmers, and other business interests ; and is crushing them ; and, unless its career be arrested, it will devour them all, as it did the New York merchants and the oil well owners .

Sixth Parallelism of Character :—The Boa always has to beslime its victims, before it can devour them .—It pounces upon a deer and crushes it, bones, flesh and tissues, till all within its hide is perfectly soft . Then, before beginning to swallow the victim, it beslimes it from head to toe ; when it begins to swallow gulp after gulp, until the entire victim is engorged in its maw .

Thus the Money Power always beslimes its victims with the slime of its capital before devouring them . Thus it beslimed our railroads with construction capital—our mines with capital, to develop and operate them—blocks of city property and broad areas of farming lands, with mortgages .—The Money Power always beslimes everything with its capital, before devouring it ; and it surely devours all business, and all property, it is allowed to beslime .

Seventh Parallelism of Character :—The Serpent's victims are paralyzed and powerless to resist .

It is one of the most remarkable phenomena in the destructions of the Money Power, that none of its victims have ever been able to make the slightest resistance . There is always a conflict in ordinary trade contests, before one of the parties is crushed . But the victims of the Money Power never resist : they are paralyzed in the coil of the python, and submit quietly to their fate . Thus the New York merchants, the oil well owners, the mill owners of New England, the cattle companies, and all whom the Money Kings have crushed have submitted to their fate as quietly as a rabbit in the coils of a boa . This paralysis of its victims is one of the reasons why the destroying career of the Money Power has attracted so little attention .

Eighth Parallelism of Character :—The Serpent swallows its prey whole .—In this it is unlike all other beasts of prey . The lion, the tiger and all other beasts of prey devour their prey mouthful at a time, and leave the bones and horns and hoofs . And they always leave a portion of the prey to the jackals and other beasts that follow their footsteps .

The Money Power is like the serpent in this regard . It always takes entire possession of every industry it seizes upon . It did not content itself with dividing the business with the New York merchants, or the oil well owners ;—it devoured the entire business . So with every business : it never divides with previous competitors ; it devours the whole business it takes possession of .—It never will engage in any business, unless it is put into a joint stock company ; and it always demands the controlling interest in the stock, before it will invest . And then it is only a question of time when it will devour it all .

Ninth Parallelism of Character :—The lion and the tiger gorge their prey at once : unlike them, the serpent is a long time swallowing its prey : it requires many gulps before it is finally engulfed in its maw .

In this characteristic, the serpent strikingly resembles the Money Power . As has been said, these Money Kings always want a controlling interest in an enterprise before they will invest, and then they begin a systematic process of gulping down the remaining stock of the company . They never buy up all property in an enterprise at once . They begin with a mere start, as the serpent begins with the head of its victim ; and then they keep on devouring till they have swallowed the whole .—Thus, they began with a few wells in the oil region, to start the business : afterward, they kept on devouring till they had swallowed it all .—So in a gold or silver mine, they must always have a controlling interest in the stock ; and then they begin systematically to freeze out the other stockholders .—This small beginning and persistent continuance in devouring, till all is engorged, is not the least striking of the parallelisms between the Dragon and the Money Power .—Who can doubt that Divine inspiration meant by the Great Red Dragon to set forth the London Money Power ?

The Serpent is chosen by Divine inspiration to be the symbol of the London Money Power, because, in all the realm of nature, the serpent alone perfectly resembles the Money Power . In its character, as well as in its processes, and methods and modes of activity, the Money Power is like a snake .

We have seen the striking parallelisms between the Money Power and the Serpent, exhibited in its methods of devouring : let us now mark some of the parallelisms, in disposition and intrinsic character .

Tenth Parallelism of Character :—The serpent is the synonym of worldly wisdom, craft and cunning : "wise as a serpent".

The Money Power displays the wisdom of the serpent in all its policy—in its entire career . It never takes a step that is not thoroughly matured . It never alarms its victim by a premature attack . Its assaults are always made on a well considered plan, and have always been successful .—How skilful its attack on the oil wells ! first building a railroad, and then constructing a pipe line to it . How thoroughly matured the plan ! how skilful the execution ! Like the combinations of a great military genius, the movement was irresistible !—What consummate skill in its mode of getting possession of the railroads, by first mortgage bonds for the iron ! first furnishing the money to build the road bed, on city and county bonds that had to be paid ; then getting possession of the railroads upon first mortgage bonds for the iron !—How wise its attack on the New York merchants ! by establishing branch houses, and then starting drummers to take away their trade !—How crafty their booms ! building up a city by lavish expenditure of capital, and getting multitudes to invest and make partial payments, and then stopping all investment and letting the boom collapse ; so that, when prices fall, they can take back the property for the remaining payments, and have it all ready for the next boom !—Still more crafty their booms in small towns, where they buy the land around a country village, build up the town to fifteen thousand in a couple of years, and so make the world believe it will be a city of one hundred thousand inhabitants ; and when the gulls have bought prairie lots at high prices, let the boom drop, pocket the money made, and take back the lots, for final payments !

But why particularize ? They never make a blunder . All their acts are marked by wonderful skill and wonderful wisdom . But if there is any act showing most consummate craft and skill, it is their wonderful attack on the New England Mills . We have a saying, "Sharp as a Yankee ." But these Jew Money Kings far surpass all American shrewdness . American wisdom had exhausted itself in devising measures for the protection of the New England Mills from the competition of foreign merchants . But these Money Kings found a flaw in our system of protection, through which they crept like a serpent, and enmeshed the New England Mills in the coils of their capital, and crushed and devoured them . And they did it all so skilfully, so quietly, so secretly, that, to this day, nobody knows it was done !

The serpent is wiser than all the beasts of the field ; and it only, is a fit symbol of this crafty secretive devourer . The Money Power is a veritable embodiment of the wisdom of the serpent .

Eleventh Parallelism of Character :—The serpent hides in the grass .

So the Money Power systematically hides its operations from the eyes of mankind, in such a manner that its path can hardly be traced . It always operates through joint stock corporations, in which its identity is concealed under the agencies it establishes . The stockholders of these corporations are the London Jew Money Kings . But they elect directors and officers in the country where the corporations are established ; and the people believe that the men who manage the corporations are their owners .—The Money Kings put a man at the head of a railroad system, as its ostensible owner, and the public does not suspect that the owners are in London .—They loan money by billions of dollars, on city property and improved farms, through their agencies, and make the public believe that it is American capital .—They ruin business, and own property all over the country, and yet manage to conceal their identity .

They have induced government to fix the laws of joint stock corporations, with the special purpose of concealing their identity .—All other real estate is transferred on record books open to public inspection . These joint stock corporations own real estate in railroads and city property, in business houses in which they transact their business, in improved farms, in wild lands ;—and yet the stocks which represent all this real estate are treated by the law as personal property, and are transferred like a horse, or any other personal property . All transfers of stock are made on the books of the company, and the public is never allowed to know who the stockholders are . The whole system of laws regarding joint stock corporations has been devised for the special purpose of concealing the stockholders from the public .—As a snake hides in the grass, so the Money Power systematically hides its operations and its existence, behind the concealment of joint stock corporations .

Indeed, when this hiding secretive Money Power, always seeking concealment, is now presented as an Imperialism actually existent in the world, all are astonished, and wonder how such a terrible Imperialism could have risen in the earth, and mankind be kept in utter ignorance of its existence . It is now overshadowing the whole earth with its monopolies of trade and industry, and has almost ruined the world, and yet its existence is unknown . How strikingly like a serpent hiding in the grass !

The trail of a snake can never be found, except where it crosses a dusty road . So, it is only at death where evidence can usually be found that a man is the agent of the Money Power . If A.T. Stewart were still living, he would be universally believed to be worth over $100,000,000 . His death revealed him as the agent of the Money Power . The track of the serpent could only be found as it ran across his grave . So, the death of Jim Fisk revealed the fact that he and his partner, Gould, instead of being the owners of the Erie railroad, were the agents of the Money Kings .—The Money Power hides all its operations under the guise of agencies .

Who can doubt that it is the crafty, secretive hiding Money Power which is symbolized by the Dragon ?

Twelfth Parallelism of Character :—The serpent crawls on his belly . The curse of baseness was fixed upon it at the beginning .

The whole course of the Money Power is a tissue of fraud, falsehood, trickery and treachery, comparable to nothing but a serpent crawling on its belly . Its career is a living lie, as it systematically hides itself behind its agents, pretending that they are the owners of the business they control . Like the garroter, it throttles and plunders its victims in the dark . Like the gambler, it entices its victims to bet in its gambling hells, the Boards of Trade, upon the rise and fall of stocks, and the rise and fall of produce ; while it holds the game in its hands, and stocks the cards for the robbery of its victims . It is a slugger, whose purse, filled with gold, is its sandbag, with which it strikes down in the dark its victims, in all the busy avenues of trade . There is honour among thieves : the robber is true to his “pal;”—but the Money Power systematically plunders its partners, freezing out minority stockholders, and all men who take part in its enterprises .

It knows that if the world knew of its system of plunder, mankind would rise up against it : it therefore robs through agencies, and makes agencies the “cribs” where it hides its plundered goods . Its whole career, from the first, has been a tissue of lying, robbery, fraud and concealment . It has acted falsehood in the past, to hide its trail : And now that it is discovered, and exposed to the eyes of the world, it will no doubt attempt to escape, like the scuttle fish, by making the waters around it inky black with falsehood, causing its minions to swear in the columns of the press, that its existence is a myth, that the discovery of it is a “mare's nest,” and that this exposure of it is all imagination .—The Money Power is always a snake crawling on its belly . Its whole life is a living lie .

Thirteenth Parallelism of Character : -The serpent is a cold blooded malignant beast . In this it strikingly resembles the Money Power, which is without either heart or conscience ; and which, in pursuit of its selfish aims, displays a cold blooded remorselessness, without a parallel in the history of the world .

The Money Power operates entirely through vast imperial joint stock corporations ; and, in such corporations, there is no place for human sympathy, or a sense of individual responsibility . Such a corporation has no conscience—no soul .—An individual is withheld from too flagrant wrong, by sympathy, by conscience, by a sense of moral responsibility ; but no one connected with the management of these grand Money Power Corporations feels any sense of personal responsibility . The stockholders feel none ; for they are away off in London, and do nothing but elect the directors . The directors feel no sense of personal responsibility ; for they are not principals, but only agents ; and they simply appoint the officers and leave the management to them . The officers feel that they have no individual responsibility, because they are under orders, like the officers of an army, and are not acting for themselves, but for the directors and the stockholders . They come to feel that their only duty is to take care of the interests of the corporation .—The management of these imperial corporations is utterly selfish, without a tinge of sympathy or generosity .

This does not apply to ordinary business corporations, where individuals incorporate themselves into a company for the transaction of business . There are many advantages in such an incorporation, and it is free from objection . In such corporations, conducted as individual enterprises, on a moderate scale, the sense of justice influences the minds of the stockholders, and pervades the management, as much as in the individual management of business .

But an imperial system of corporations, bent upon attaining a universal control of industry, and a universal monopoly of wealth and property, like an ambitious conqueror, is utterly selfish and remorseless . The cold blooded heartlessness of these Money Kings is glaringly displayed in the entire course of the Money Power . Its whole course is a black night of oppression, injury and wrong . It is as useless to attempt to particularize, as it is to seek the darkest cell in a dungeon, or the foulest corner in a lazar house . The Money Kings are bent on getting all the business, all the wealth, and all the property of the earth into their own hands : they can only do it by bankrupting all the business men in the world, and reducing the great mass of mankind to the condition of serfs, subject to their will, and dependent upon them for bread ; and they are pursuing their aim of the subjugation of mankind with ruthless energy .—The Money Power is as cold blooded, pitiless and malignant as a snake .

I have now presented thirteen Parallelisms between the Dragon and the Money Power :—

I.) I have showed that, like the Boa Constrictor, the Money Power is a devourer .

2.) I have showed eight points of Parallelism between the serpent and the Money Power, in respect of the manner in which they both devour their prey .

Both steal secretly on their prey, and destroy them silently ; and so secretly, that the world knows nothing of the destruction :—both charm their victims, and cause them to come to them, and place themselves in their power :—both crush their victims in their coils, the serpent, of its body, and the Money Power, of its capital which constitutes its body :—both crush only to devour, and devour all they crush :—both beslime their victims by their secretion before devouring them, the serpent with slime, the Money Power with money :—both paralyze their victims by their attack, beyond the possibility of resistance :—both swallow their prey whole, leaving nothing behind :—both swallow their prey gradually .—The devouring of the Money Power is, in all points, like the method of the serpent, and is like that of no other beast of prey on the earth .

I have showed four points of Parallelism in Character between the Money Power and the serpent .

Both have certain personal characteristics peculiar to themselves, among all the beasts of the earth, and all the powers that have ever risen .—Both are wise, and skilful, and cunning and crafty, beyond all comparison with others of their kind :—both are secretive, and habitually hide themselves from the eyes of men, the one in the grass, the other behind its joint stock corporations :—both are despicable, false and treacherous, habitually crawling on the belly :—both are cold-blooded, and malignant and remorseless .

But these thirteen Parallelisms do not exhaust the likeness between the Serpent and the Money Power . There yet remain seven other parallelisms to be mentioned . The proof already offered is sufficient to convince the most incredulous that the Dragon is the symbol of the Money Power . But the evidence is abundant even to nausea . I proceed to mention four other parallelisms between the Dragon and the Money Power, in respect of the modes of activity .

Fourteenth Parallelism of Character :—It was a "Great" Dragon .—The great Boa, unlike other wild beasts which appear in one spot, may stretch its long body afar .

Prophecy well chooses the python as the symbol of the Money Power ; which, while its head is in England, stretches its body all over the earth, embracing in its folds India, China, Africa, Australia, Europe, South America, Mexico, Canada and the United States . Everywhere, the body of the Boa appears . It is as active in Europe, and Asia and America, as in England . England is its den ; but the Dragon is, indeed, a great Dragon ; its body encircles the earth, and it has everywhere enveloped industry in its folds .

Fifteenth Parallelism of Character :—The Boa, as it lies along, may throw its folds around many objects .

So, the Money Power has, in its huge length, many folds, which encoil about many objects . We call these folds of the python "Rings," or Monopolies . Each monopoly is a "Ring," formed by a fold of the serpent, thrown around a branch of industry, or branch of trade . "The whiskey ring," "the railroad ring," "the oil ring," "the cotton ring," "the wheat ring," "the cattle ring," "the coffee ring," "the sugar ring," "the packing ring," and all the other grand monopolies are each only fold of the serpent thrown around the industry . Woe to the man who attempts to operate inside of one of these "Rings ." Instantly the coils of the Boa will be around him, and he will be crushed in its folds, and devoured .

Sixteenth Parallelism of Character :—The grand Boa Constrictor habitually twines upon a tree, while watching for victims which pass beneath .

So, the Money Power twines about the government, while plundering its people . The Money Power habitually twines about governments . The British government is its servile instrument : it sways India with autocratic rule : the European governments yield to its will .—In our own country, it too often controls Congress, and State Legislatures, by lobby influence . The lobby,—"the third house,"—controls all legislation that effects the interest of the Money Power ; procuring legislation to suit its aims, and preventing legislation injurious to it . Not only does the government leave industry defenceless in the grasp of the Money Power : it also, by vast land grants,* by paying interest on bonds in gold that were, by law, to be paid in paper, and in various other ways, gives to it immense bonuses . Our country is hardly in a less degree than England in the grasp of the Money Power .

Seventeenth parallelism of Character :—The Boa Constrictor, waiting for its prey, hides in a tree, behind the green foliage .

So, the Money Power hides its own bloated wealth under the guise of national prosperity . Thus, our people are deceived by the statement that the United States is now the richest nation in the world . The wealth consists, not so much in the wealth of the American people as, in the growth of the Money Power and its investments . The Money Power has built railroads, factories, and city improvements ; is opening up bonanza farms ; is pushing forward with its capital many branches of production and trade ; but it owns them all . The American people are getting poorer : the Money Power has mortgages upon two—thirds of our farms : the Money Power alone is getting rich .

It is investing in our country the revenues it derives from its world—wide manufactures and commerce . These investments increase the amount of its wealth, located in this country . But it is not our wealth : it is not the green foliage of national prosperity . It is the body of the Boa ; and, instead of helping our people, its wealth is an engine of oppression, destroying Americans engaged in independent business, crushing our farmers, and devouring our national wealth .

Two oaks, standing in the forest, are alike vigorous and flourishing . A wild ivy vine twines around and around one of the oaks, and girdles it from bottom to top in its twining folds, and wraps trunk and limbs in a mass of most luxuriant foliage .—How gloriously the oak seams to flourish .—But soon it ceases to grow :—and finally, it begins to wither .—But the ivy vine flourishes more and more luxuriantly : its twining folds around the oak grow larger and larger ; until the tree is strangled in its clasp, and dies !—Our country is the oak ; the Money Power is the twining ivy vine . Already our oak is pining . Limb after limb has withered and fallen . The great farming branch, with many others, is slowly dying . But the twining ivy vine,—the Money Power, with its vast possessions,—is flourishing ; and it crowns our dying country with a greener foliage than in the days of our greatest and most real prosperity .—The serpent folds of the Money Power are throttling us .

Besides these Parallelisms, there are three others which show, especially, that the money power is the enemy of the human race.

Eighteenth Parallelism of Character :—The serpent is the immortal enemy of the human race .

So also, a necessary antagonism exists between the Money Power and the human race .

The People Can Only Prosper by Doing the Business which the Money Power is doing, and covets to monopolize entirely . If the individuals keep the business, they prosper, and their countries flourish ;—but the Money Power, under such conditions, will languish . On the other hand, if the Money Power takes the business, those who had it before are reduced to poverty, just in the degree in which the Money Power flourishes . The prosperity of the Money Power is the ruin of the human race .

The Money Power is hostile to the well being of man beyond all despotisms that have ever existed . It is more oppressive than any national despotism . A despot rules by law, and makes specific exactions by taxation . No despot desires to break down people in business—to plunder them of their property—to reduce them to bankruptcy—and to appropriate their property to himself . No despot enters the home, to take it from the owner .—The Money Power does all this . It crushes individuals : it oppresses people en masse . It cheats : it swindles : it extorts : it plunders : it destroys : it devours .

The Minotaur, a monster which, every year, devoured a shipload of victims which Athens was compelled to furnish, is the most horrible monster of legendary antiquity . But the Money Power is worse than the Minotaur . That monster was kept in its den, and could only devour the victims brought to it . The Money Power is an immense Serpent, going at large, and devouring all the victims it can find . More, it is a Crowned Imperialism, which controls governments, and is above all law . It bankrupts the merchant, the manufacturer, the miner, the farmer ; and drives them and their families out from their homes into the world, beggared, and perchance to die heartbroken and despairing .

The Money Power is worse than any despot that ever reigned . The despot is restrained from excessive wrong and oppression, lest the prosperity of his people be destroyed .—But it is the aim of the Money Power to destroy the prosperity or all persons engaged in independent business ; in order that, amid the ruin it works, it may ravage, and devour industry and wealth .

The Money Power is worse than any monster that ever roamed the earth, or was conceived by human fancy . For the monster needs only to devour a few, to appease its hunger ;—but this Serpent is so huge, that it encircles the earth with its folds, and the ruin of nations can not appease its insatiable appetite to devour .

Were a wild beast abroad, destroying as the Money Power destroys, masses of men would gather to hunt it to death .

Were a despot to oppress and ruin his people, as the Money Power is oppressing and ruining our country, he would be blown up with dynamite, or his head would be brought to the block, in less than a year .—The Money Power, like the Serpent, is the Arch enemy of the human race .

Nineteenth Parallelism of Character :—The color of the dragon is red .—This is a lusus naturae . Nobody ever saw a red snake . There must have been a special appropriateness in the color here, for it to be applied to the serpent .

This color always, in the book of Revelation, indicates that the power symbolized by a red color is a cruel, bloody despotism . And indeed the red color was indispensable, in order to indicate the bloody character of the Money Power . For the Money Power is a great destroyer—perhaps the greatest destroyer of human life, of all the despotisms that have arisen on the earth .

But it does not destroy its victims on the battle-field . It is described in the third vision of Daniel, where it is said of it : "In peace, shall he destroy many ." Daniel viii : 25 . It does not strike its venomed fangs into the body, but the soul . It reduces its victims to want and beggary ; and multitudes of them, in utter despair, turn their faces to the wall and die . Its victims have died—are dying—all over the earth .

Great Britain is the seat of its power ; and there, by penury and want and vain longing and despair, it is, every year, crushing thousands of the poor into untimely graves . I saw in London such poverty, and misery, such utter wretchedness, that the constant spectacle of suffering I could not relieve broke down my health, and I was compelled to leave the country before I had intended, in order to save my life . Among the London poor, you hardly ever see a hoary head . Poverty and want and helplessness and despair drive them to untimely graves, long before time can furrow the brow or blanch the hair . The whole generation dies in the prime of middle life, destroyed by the conditions with which the Money Power surrounds them . They are as actually murdered as though the dagger were driven to their hearts . It is true, no blood is shed ;—but the Serpent never sheds the blood of its victims—they die a bloodless death, crushed in its oils . So the poor people of Britain die, every generation, crushed to death by the constricting coils of the Money Power—crushed into direst poverty and want, till death comes to their relief .

India is completely in the coils of the Money Power . The Monster killed five million Hindoos with Famine in order to compel them to become its serfs upon its plantations redeemed from the jungle . And now, under the control of industry in India by the Money Power, half a million Hindoos die of starvation, every year .—It is said that, in the wars of Napoleon, waged during twenty years, all over Europe, and in Egypt and Syria, two million men perished . In a time of profound peace, the Money Power, in a single country, destroys as many lives every four years, as Napoleon destroyed in twenty years ! !

In the United States, during the long oppression of low prices which it has maintained since 1820, with brief intervals, and in the terrible financial crises it has induced, thousands have died of heart-break, and multiplied thousands of penury . During its long continued course of conquest in this country, in which it has been engaged for the last twenty years, it has broken down one branch of industry after another, and devoured them ; and it has driven to untimely graves myriads of our countrymen .

There have been, for the last twenty years, about ten thousand failures, every year of prominent business firms . The men in moderate circumstances who have broke are a great multitude who have not been reported . Only the big fish caught by the Money Power are counted : the multitude of little minnows that it has cast out of its net to die, are left to rot in the sunshine without notice . Not to speak of myriads of small failures, in this country, caused by the Money Power, in the last twenty years, there have been, in the United States, two hundred thousand great failures, for the most part victims of the Money Power .

What became of those victims ? Alas, we know not . Some died of heart-break : many drag on hopeless lives in some subordinate position : the sons of ruined families have, many of them, swelled the ranks of the reckless, hopeless multitudes of our cities : many of the cultured daughters are teachers, or seamstresses, or clerks ; and many have sunk, through despair, into the great social deep lower than the grave ! !

All over the earth, the Money Power has its holocausts of victims . They fall in the midst of peace . They die, and make no sign .—Well is this bloody destructive Money Power represented by the Great RED Dragon .

Twentieth Parallelism of Character :—Inspiration drops the symbol at last, and calls the Dragon the devil .—The Devil was incarnate in the serpent, in Eden, to induce the fall of the human race . In the book of Revelation, Satan is represented as incarnate in the Dragon . The Money Power is an embodiment of Satanic selfishness, craft, cunning, skill, fraud, deceit, malignity and destructiveness . It constantly breaks down industry in its selfish greed : it destroys the prosperity of the whole earth, in the pursuit of gain : it crushes multiplied millions of the human race : it overshadows the whole age with darkness .

It would destroy the dawning era of liberty and advancement now rising upon the world, as the serpent destroyed Eden . It would break down our grand Republic, and establish upon its ruins a mighty Despotism, to overshadow the hopes of man : it would, with Jewish hatred of Christianity, break down our churches : it would destroy our rising civilization, and reduce mankind to the condition of serfs, without the possibility of education or enlightenment : it would arrest the progress of the world toward the Millennium, and grind mankind beneath the heel of a despotism worse than that of the Feudal Ages .

The Money Power seeks to destroy our Republican liberties, and to bring the world under a subjection to its own grand Imperialism of wealth and monopoly ; in which it, and its agents, will be the privileged Aristocracy, having all culture, and refinement and power ;—while the mass of mankind are its serfs, tilling its lands, and doing its work in the various departments of business life, and sunk into abject poverty, with all its concomitants of ignorance, vice and debasement .

Instead of allowing the human race to share in the benefits derived from the power of steam, it seeks to monopolize all those benefits to itself, and use them as a weapon to crush all individual industry, and to subdue the world beneath the imperial sway of its capital . It converts the blessings conferred by Divine Providence upon mankind into a curse . It seeks to introduce a new Feudal Era, in which it, and its agents, will parcel out the world anew, and bring back the wrong and oppression of the Dark Ages .

The iniquity of the Money Power surpasses human depravity . It is Demonic,—in its selfishness and greed—in its cold-blooded heartlessness—in its knavish trickery—in its bold robbery—in its cunning and craft and chicane—in its falsehood—in its lying concealment—in its malignity—in its murders of victims driven by ruin to despair and death,—in all this—and in its other unspeakable turpitude, and wrong and baseness, the Money Power is utterly satanic and devilish .

Who can Doubt That the Dragon is the symbol of the London Money Power ? Let us briefly recapitulate the line of evidence :—

There are but three Parallelisms of Character between the Lion with Eagle's Wings and the Babylonian empire ; and only two, between the Bear and the Persian empire ; and none of them very remarkable .—But here are Twenty Parallelisms of Character between the Dragon and the Money Power ;—ten times as many, and far more remarkable .

Review the Entire Career of the Money Power as it has been presented, and its every trait, its every act reveals it as a gigantic Serpent .

1) It is Like a Serpent in being essentially a devourer .

2) It is Like a Serpent in Its Method of Devouring Its Victims :—it charms its prey, luring them to their doom—it seizes its prey secretly—it paralyzes its victims by its attack—it crushes its prey in its coil—it crushes only to devour, and devours all it crushes—it beslimes its prey before devouring it—it swallows its prey whole, leaving nothing—it swallows it by repeated gulps, and only after repeated efforts engulfs it in its maw .

3) The Money Power is Like a Serpent in Its Characteristics :—it is full of worldly wisdom and craft—it hides in its agencies, as the serpent hides in the grass—it continually grovels in debasement, lying, fraud and trickery, as the serpent crawls upon its belly—it is cold blooded, remorseless, cruel .

4) The Money Power is Like a Serpent in Its Habitudes :—like the serpent it stretches afar ; its head in England, its long body enveloping the whole earth in its coil—it throws many coils of its huge length around many industries, in various countries all over the earth, every coil a “ring”—it hangs on governments for support, as the Boa Constrictor hangs on a tree it hides its own bloated gains under the guise of national prosperity, as the Boa hides in the leaves of a tree.

5) The Money Power is a Veritable Serpent in Its Relations with Mankind :—it is the necessary enemy of mankind, because its interests are opposed to the well being of humanity, there being as natural an enmity between the Money Power and mankind as between the serpent and man .—The Money Power, like the Dragon, is RED with the blood of multitudes of victims, slain by it in its continual wars upon industry—finally, the Money Power is, indeed, the very embodiment of Satanic malignity toward mankind .

In Every Particular, the Symbol has Its Counterpart . Not one point of likeness fails . No other power can possibly be found that embodies all the characteristics of a serpent . In no other power that has ever existed can these characteristics be found . The Money Power is the only Imperialism that has ever risen on the earth, that is like a snake, in any particular . It is like a snake, in every point . And it is like nothing else .—These strange and startling resemblances cannot be fortuitous and accidental . They prove most indubitably that the Money Power it the Imperialism symbolized by the Great Red Dragon .

CHAPTER V.

III . Third Proof : Coincidences of Fact.

We have now seen the twenty Parallelisms of Character by which the Great Red Dragon is proved to be the symbol of the London Money Power . But these Parallelisms are only part of the evidence . We have seen that a symbol is also identified with the power symbolized, by Coincidences of Fact, where certain things are stated of the symbol, which represent similar things that are true of the power symbolized . There are twenty-two Coincidences of Fact, which prove that the Money Power is the Imperialism symbolized by the Great Red Dragon . These will now be presented :—

1st. The Dragon and Beast.

First Coincidence of Fact :—In the 13th Chapter of Revelation, it is said "the dragon gave to the beast his power, and his seat and great authority ." And again, "they worshipped the dragon which gave power to the beast ."

It has already been explained how, according to the 13th and 17th Chapters of Revelation, the Roman empire is to be re-established under the dominion of Prussia, extended over Southern and Western Europe . And it is here stated how the Roman empire is to be re-established under the headship of Prussia,—"the Dragon gave to the Beast [Prussia] his power, and his seat and great authority ."

This Establishment of the Prussian Empire over Southern and Western Europe by the aid of the London Money Power is not yet accomplished ; but it is so near in the future that we may now see the means of fulfilment . We know that the loans of the London Money Power to the nations of Europe enable them to keep up their standing armies, and to meet the expenses of war . No country in Europe can sustain a war without the loans of the Money Power . In the great war of 1870, between Prussia and France, all the world thought France would be the victor, because she had the greater financial resources . But the Money Power gave to Prussia unlimited loans, and enabled her to put two millions of men into the field, so that she crushed France like an eggshell, in a campaign of only a little more than four months .

If we now observe the state of Europe, we shall perceive that its present condition indicates that the great nations are on the eve of a great war ; in which Prussia and her allies will triumph through the aid of the Money Power .

Europe is Now Divided Into Two Hostile Camps :

Russia and France, on the one side ; and Prussia and Britain, and Austria and Italy on the other . Of these two coalitions, Russia and France are, in respect of military force, much the more powerful . They are able to bring into the field, in round numbers, six million soldiers ; while Prussia and her allies can only bring into the field, in round numbers, four million men .

But the Money Power is a New Force in the Field . It alone has imperial power in our age, sustaining kings, and in war giving the victory by its loans, where it pleases . No nation in Europe can put forth all its strength in war, without the loans of the Money Power . And, in the great war now impending in Europe, the aid of the Money Power will be given to Prussia and her allies . Loans will be refused to France and Russia, and those powers will be unable, for want of money, to bring their vast forces into the field . Prussia and her allies will have unlimited loans, and will be able to equip and keep in the field all their forces : the sure result will be that Prussia and her allies will be the victors in the conflict ; and Prussia will become imperial over Southern and Western Europe .

In the New Era of the Imperialism of the Money Power, it needs a grand imperial government that can enforce its demands all over the earth . The British government is now its subservient instrument ;—but Great Britain is not sufficiently powerful to enforce its demands against the great nations of the earth . It needs a more powerful nation to be its instrument . And Germany, under the headship of Prussia, is the nation it has chosen .

The Pamphlet given me, in England, shows the desire of the Money Power to have a great Imperialism capable of ruling the world, to further and support its claims . The writer of the pamphlet said that, in order to support the claims of British capitalists, it was necessary for England to be the most powerful nation on the globe ; and that it was the policy of England, in order to this end, that the nations should be divided up into small states, so that England could subdue and control them .

In the Table of Contents of the pamphlet, appear the following headings :—"England has a Money Interest in Every Nation ." "Every War a War upon England ."

“England Should invariably Chastise .” “English Rule a Blessing to Foreign Nations .”—The writer proceeds :—

“ Having her property [the property of the Money Kings] dispersed all over the earth, England should, for her own protection, constitute herself the police of the world ; as she is the carrier, the banker, the merchant, the Annuitant, the post-office of the world . When the outrage of war is committed on England's commerce,—that is, whenever any war is undertaken,—it should be the standing order of the people of England to their public servants that, the instant any country marches an army across its own border, the English fleet in the district shall blockade every port of the offending power, and if necessary, bombard the maritime towns ; that the British fleet throughout the world shall seize upon and make prize of everything afloat belonging to the offender ; and further, that a British army shall, without a moment's delay, be sent to assist the nation invaded, and protect our property .”

The writer next proceeds to set forth the power of Great Britain to maintain this imperial position . He sets forth the resources of Britain under three heads,—“Naval Supremacy :” “The Military Character of the People” and “The Wealth of England .”—He says :—

“England is the only nation which has at all times maintained its army without a conscription . * * * * * No one doubts our means of supplying the waste of war . The cost [of the Crimean war] that has crippled Russia for twenty years, has never for a moment been felt by us . The large outlay during the Crimean war did not curtail the smallest luxury of the poorest Englishman . The war was thoroughly popular, as all wars are in England . There is no instance of public meetings to protest against a war ; for the people of England often urge a war, but never tire of one .”

The writer of the pamphlet advocates the breaking up of all the great powers (this was in 1864), into small states, which could not resist the power of Great Britain . He says :—

“A combination of such states as Denmark, Holland and Belgium would give us little more trouble than a Caffir war, or an attack by the Maories of New Zealand . * * * * * It is England's interest then that there shall be no large territories ; and, fortunately, nature has limited within comparatively narrow bounds the extent of country which can most beneficially embrace one community . * * * * * England can avail herself of these natural limits without the slightest injury to mankind ; and should never fail to assist every people who are struggling for a separate existence ."

This writer represents the interest of the Money Power . His statements show that the Money Power feels the need of a great Imperialism able to dominate all nations, in order to further and guard its interest . This writer evidently hoped that Great Britain would become such an Imperialism, by breaking up the great nations of the earth, fomenting discontents, and supporting revolts .—But the tendency throughout Europe and America is toward the growth of great nations . It is now evident that Great Britain is not powerful enough to dominate the earth .

But the Money Power desires such an Imperialism as its agent, as is evident from the foregoing quotations . Such an Imperialism is indispensable to it . And as there is no hope of Great Britain becoming such an overmastering Imperialism, the Money Power has chosen Prussia to become its grand Imperial Agent in the future, and is raising Prussia to imperial power for that purpose . Hence it aided Prussia by its loans to crush France ; and it is now preparing, by its policy and its loans, to exalt Prussia to an imperialism over Southern and Western Europe .

Thus will be fulfilled the statement of prophecy :—"The dragon [the Money Power] gave to the beast [the Prussian empire] his power, and his seat and great authority," i.e. imperial dominion .

Second Coincidence of Fact :—We see from the Dragon giving power to the Beast, that the Dragon does not symbolize a political power .

For one political power never gives power to another, but exercises it itself . Thus, France will not give political power to Spain, nor Great Britain to Ireland, nor Russia to Poland . Political powers always exercise their own political power, and will not give it to another state . If the Dragon were a political power, it would not give power to the Beast [the Prussian empire], but would exercise it itself .

This fact harmonizes perfectly with the Dragon being the symbol of the Money Power . The Money Power is not a political Imperialism . It needs some political government as its political agent, to legislate in its interest, and fight its battles .

The two foregoing Coincidences of Fact are already in part fulfilled . The Money Power has not yet raised Prussia to imperial rule over Southern and Western Europe . The work is not yet completed . But it is begun, and is far on the way toward accomplishment . The Money Power, by its loans, enabled Prussia to crush Austria and France . Its loans have enabled her to re-establish the German empire, and from being the weakest of the five great powers, to become the mightiest power in Europe . It only needs one more step, which will be taken in the next war in Europe ; and then, the Money Power will have completed its work, and given to Prussia imperial power and dominion over Southern and Western Europe .—So much is already done, that we can readily see the way to the single remaining step .

2nd. The Two Horned Beast.

There is presented in the 13th chapter of Revelation, another beast, a Two Horned Beast, which is seen "coming up out of the earth ."

This Beast has been the vix crucis of expositors . No expositor has ever applied it to any power that has yet risen, to the satisfaction of himself, or others . This Beast is the Dragon .

John says of it :—"I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth . * * * * * And he spake as a dragon . * * * * * and he causes the earth, and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast whose deadly wound was healed ."

1. I prove that the Two Horned Beast is the dragon by Three Marks, mentioned in the above passage :—

I.) The first mark that proves that this Beast is the Dragon, is the manner in which John saw it "coming up out of the earth ."—This is the action of a serpent, not of a quadruped . When John saw the Beast rise up out of the Sea, the action was instantaneous : "I saw a beast rise up out of the Sea ." The beast rose out of the Sea, and that was the end of its rising . But it was different with this Two Horned Beast : John "beheld" it for a long time ; and all the time he "beheld" it, it was "coming up out of the earth,"—This slow crawl out of the ground is the action of a serpent crawling up out of its den, and of nothing else .

2.) I identify this Two Horned Beast with the Dragon by its voice : "He spake as a dragon ."—Now, we know a horse by its neigh, and a chicken by its crow, as well as by sight ; and we recognize a serpent by its hiss . In all nature, a serpent is the only beast whose voice is a hiss . If this beast spake as a dragon, it hissed ; for a hiss is the only sound a serpent utters . The Two Horned Beast hissed : It was the Dragon .

But we are not left to inference on this point .

3.) That this Two Horned Beast is the Dragon, is established beyond the possibility of a doubt by Divine inspiration representing it as doing the same thing the dragon had just before, in the same Chapter, been represented as doing .—It has just before been stated that the Dragon gave to the Beast whose deadly wound was healed "his power, and his seat and great authority ." And here, it is said, this Two Horned Beast "causeth the earth and them that dwell therein to worship the first beast whose deadly wound was healed ."—This is just the same thing the Dragon does : The dragon gave to the beast whose deadly wound was healed imperial power : this Two Horned Beast causeth all men to render to the imperial beast worship or homage .—The act is the same in both instances : this Two Horned Beast is the Dragon .

I have been careful to prove the identity of this Two Horned Beast with the Dragon, because,

2. There are eight Coincidences of Fact between this Two Horned Beast and the Money Power ; and all of them so remarkable as to make it absolutely certain that this Two Horned Beast is the symbol of the Money Power .

1.) The following is the text respecting this Two Horned Beast :—

"And I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth :

"And he had two horns like a lamb :

"And he spake as a dragon .

"And he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, ['i.e., in his presence']

"and causeth the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed .

"And he doeth great wonders, so that he causeth fire to come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men .

"And [he] deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by those miracles [or wonders] which he had power to do in the sight of the beast ;

"saying to them that dwell on the earth that they should make an image to the beast which had the wound by a sword and did live .

"And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak and causeth that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed .

"And he causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads : and that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name .

"Here is wisdom . Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast : for it is the number of a man ; and his number is six hundred and three score and six . Revelation xiii : 11-18 .

2) Let us note the Coincidences of Fact, presented between this Two Horned Beast and the Money Power :—

Third Coincidence of Fact :—"He had two horns like a lamb ."—In prophecy, a horn is a symbol of a kingdom or political power . Thus, the ten horns symbolize the Ten Kingdoms of Modern Europe within the territories of the Roman empire . The two horns on the head of the Persian Ram, (Dan. viii,) symbolize the two kingdoms of Media and Persia, united in the Persian empire . So here, these Two Horns on the head of the Serpent, symbolize two kingdoms whose power the Dragon wields . The horns being lamb-like horns, indicates that the two kingdoms under the control of the Serpent are especially Christian kingdoms .

These two horns symbolize the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, which were united, in the reign of Queen Anne, into the United-kingdoms of Great Britain . Great Britain is the name, then established by law, for the two united kingdoms of England and Scotland . And these are the two most preeminently Christian kingdoms in the world .

Prophecy only recognizes England and Scotland as the two horns on the head of the Dragon . The Money Power rules Great Britain with absolute sway . The British Parliament always registers its will . No matter what party is in power, Great Britain always legislates for trade, and, when necessary, fights for trade . When the Landed Aristocracy ruled the country, they had Corn Laws, to keep up the price of grain for the benefit of the Land Owners . But when the Money Power wanted free trade in grain and provisions, for the benefit of manufacturers and merchants, Parliament submitted to its will, and threw over the policy of the Tory Landed Aristocracy .

The Tory party, representing the landed Aristocracy, has had to advance to the ground of the Money Power, and plant itself on the platform of the Whigs, in order to live . The British Parliament is now the creature of the Money Power . The Money Power rules Great Britain . Prophecy, with striking fidelity to fact, represents Great Britain,—England and Scotland,—as the two horns on the head of the Serpent .

Fourth Coincidence of Fact :John saw this two Horned Serpent "coming up out of the earth ."—He looked at it for a long time,"beheld" it,—and all the time he "beheld" it, it was still "coming up out of the earth ." It was always crawling up out of the ground, but never got entirely out . Though constantly crawling up out of the ground, a part of it always remained in the ground .—This is a strange and, seemingly, impossible state of facts,—a snake always crawling up out of its den, and yet never getting entirely out . And yet this strange thing is true of the Money Power .

The Money Power always acts through joint stock corporations . The stockholders and bondholders of the various corporations all over the world, are in London . There is the Serpent's den . The stockholders are hidden from the world in their den . The world only sees the directors and the officers of the corporations, and their hired operatives .—But as the stockholders make more money, they organize more corporations, and elect more directors, and more officers, and employ more operatives . So that the Serpent is constantly growing greater in its den ; and as it grows in the den, more of its body crawls up out of the den, and becomes visible to the public eye .

What a strange astonishing similitude is this ! and yet it fits the Money Power perfectly . And it will not suit any other power that has ever risen upon the earth . God foresaw the action of the Money Power, and He chose a symbol that resembles it perfectly, and mentioned facts respecting the symbol that exactly suit the Money Power .—It must be a terrible monster which Divine Omniscience took such pains to point out, by making its symbol unmistakable .

Fifth Coincidence of Fact :—The Two Horned Serpent "exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him,"—or in his presence .—The first beast, as we have seen, is the Prussian empire ; and the statement in the text means that the Money Power will exercise all the power of the Prussian empire in the presence of the empire .

We can Understand how the Money Power will Wield the Power of the Prussian Empire, by observing the manner in which it is now exercising the power of the British empire . In Great Britain, the Money Power is the power behind the Throne, greater than the Throne . It wields the power of the British government by controlling the Parliament, and has been doing so for more than a century . It is avowed that the British government is administered in the interests of the manufacturing and commercial classes . No matter what party is in power, all parties alike do the will of the Money Power .

We had, a few years ago, a remarkable instance of the subserviency of the British government to the Money Kings . When Disraeli was Prime Minister, the Tory Administration entered upon a new career of bold imperialism, in its treatment of other countries . This imperial policy of the Tories was stigmatized by the Liberal party as "Jingoism ." Gladstone appealed to the moral sentiment of the Liberals, who are the most religious portion of the British population, against the "Jingoism" of the Tories, and unseated them from power on that issue alone . But immediately after the Gladstone administration came into power, it outjingoed Jingo .

It happened that the Khedive of Egypt was unable to pay the interest on his debt to the Money Kings . Those capitalists appealed to the British government ; and the Gladstone Administration at once proceeded to enforce their claims against Egypt . It did what had never been done before by the British government . It invaded Egypt, conquered the country, discrowned the Khedive, and administered the government in the interest of the Money Power . The British government debased itself to become “receiver” for the Money Kings .

And this high handed outrage upon a weak state was justified before the world by the plea that it was necessary, in order that those imperial capitalists might receive the interests on their loans . And so thoroughly established is this grand Imperialism of Capital, that all the nations of Europe accepted this plea as perfect justification .

A Principle is Established in this Transaction that is full of Menace to the Nations of the Earth . It is now recognized as an established principle that the monetary claims of the Money Power are higher than the right to national existence ! ! So long as a country which the Money Power has ruined can pay the interest on its debts—well .—But when it is reduced to bankruptcy, and can no longer pay the interest, it thereby forfeits its national existence ; and the Money Power has a right to have it conquered, in order to secure its debt ! ! !

This is the logic of the conquest of Egypt ! It is well for the nations to ponder it ! ! !

The British Government also Conquered Burmah, three years ago, in the interest of the Money Power . The cause of the conquest was kept quiet until, last year, a Mr. Robert Sutherland, in making a trip from India to England, passed through the United States, and in an interview with the reporter of a New York paper stated the facts .

Mr. Sutherland stated to the reporter that he is “Resident Manager of the Burmah and Bombay Trading Corporation, one of the largest Trading Companies [of the Money Power] in the East .” Mr. Sutherland further said : “Burmah possesses the only Ruby mines in the world, and they are very valuable . The desire of the French in Tonquin to get control of these, and the Teat forests, led to the recent trouble with King Theebaw, and the overthrow of that monarch's rule . He repudiated a very large claim against him by the Bombay and Burmah Corporation, claiming that the agents had made false returns .”

And no doubt they did ; for they defraud and cheat everybody . But the corporation appealed to the British government . And, continues Mr. Sutherland :—“To prevent his trading with the French, the British government took up the claim of the Corporation, its members being British subjects, and the war over its enforcement led to Theebaw's capture, and the extension of the British protectorate over the whole of Burmah .”

In plain English, this statement means that this corporation of the Money Power claimed exclusive commercial rights in Burmah . They cheated the Burman Emperor, making false returns, and when the Burman government exercised its right to abrogate its trade relations with the corporation, the British government, at the instance of the Trading Company, invaded Burmah, dethroned the emperor and sent him prisoner to India, and annexed Burmah as a conquered province .

Some years ago, the British government invaded China, because the Chinese government excluded the opium which the corporations of the Money Power were producing in India, and forced China, at the cannon's mouth, to receive the opium and allow its people to be debauched, in order that the Money Power might continue to reap its profits !

If the British government had conquered China, and made its emperor a captive, and annexed the country to its dominions, the act would have been on a par with the conquest of Egypt and Burmah . The claims of the Money Power are advancing . Its imperial policy requires the conquest and complete subjugation of any nation that is ruined by it, or which attempts to resist its oppression !

If any have doubted that this London Money Power is a great Imperialism, they can doubt no longer . It may have seemed doubtful to some, while I stated its course in the United States, whether the picture of its imperial power might not be overdrawn . But when we see it reducing Egypt to bankruptcy, and plundering Burmah by fraud, and then having those countries conquered in order to enforce its claims, none can doubt its proud and haughty claims to imperial supremacy .

Great Britain can crush China, and conquer Egypt and Burmah, in the interest of the Money Power .

But Great Britain is not powerful enough to enforce its claims against the United States, or any of the great nations of Europe ; and hence the necessity, as already mentioned, of the Money Power raising Prussia to imperial dominion, in order to use its power for the enforcement of its claims . It will have need of the Prussian power to enforce its claims against every country on the globe ; for it is bankrupting all nations, as it is the United States ; and every country will have to take ground against it, as Burmah did, or be reduced to bankruptcy like Egypt . And the fate of resistance, and of bankruptcy, is the same,—the conquest and the annexation of the victim nation . In this way the Prussian empire would attain to universal dominion, by enforcing the claims of the Money Power .

If the Money Power is not checked in its career, it will carry out its policy to the full extent . It will bankrupt all the nations of the earth, and have them conquered, and their resources administered by a political imperialism in partnership with the Money Power, which will act as "receiver" for bankrupt nations, as England has done with Egypt .— The people of that empire would, in the end, become its grand agents, and share with it the plunder of the world .

Sixth Coincidence of Fact .—This Two Horned Serpent is represented as "saying onto them that dwell on the earth that they should make an image to the beast that had the wound by a sword and did live ."

For a long time, I was perplexed as to the meaning of this "image of the beast ." But the meaning is simple and plain .

We have here a remarkable prophecy predicting the representative form of government . In the age when the Revelation was given, the representative form of government had never been thought of . The state always acted for itself, through the Monarch, or a Constituent Assembly in which governmental power was vested . The idea had never occurred to any one to have a representative body in which the governmental power should be vested . Such a Representative Body, whether called Congress, or Parliament, or by any other name, is the representation or the image of the State . Each member is the representative or "image" of his constituents, and the whole body is the representative, or "image" of the nation . A Congress "representing" the nation would naturally, and with strict propriety, be called the image of the nation .

It is astonishing how perfectly all parts of this prophecy hold together . It is truly wonderful that we should have here, in Revelation, a plain and distinct prediction of the representative form of government, long before it grew up in modern times . This "Image of the Beast" is the Reichstag, or German Parliament, which will be extended over the states of Southern and Western Europe . All the states that become a part of the German empire will represent themselves in the Reichstag . This Reichstag will be the representative body, or "Image" of the empire ; and this "Image" will "speak," and govern the empire .

It is by means of this Parliament or "Image," that "the Dragon shall exercise all the power of the" Prussian empire in the presence of the empire . The Dragon will control the Parliament with its money, and will thus control the Prussian empire, as it has the British empire, during the last century .

Seventh Coincidence of Fact : This Two Horned Serpent " had power to give life to the image of the beast [the imperial Parliament,] that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed ."

1 . That is, the Prusso-German empire will aspire to universal dominion . Influenced by the Money Power, the Imperial Parliament will enact laws inflicting death upon all who refuse to submit to its sway . It will be the policy of the Money Power to have a grand universal empire, by means of which it will be able to plunder all nations, and get possession of all the property in the world .

2. But there is another fact indicated in this statement :—When the German empire shall first be established over Southern and Western Europe, the several nations which enter the empire will retain their independence in respect of all internal affairs, merely entering into a union for trade purposes, and for the administration of foreign relations .—But with the universal tendency of imperial power to centralize itself, the German Parliament will assume ascendancy over the subject states, and will compel all, under penalty of death, to submit to its sway .—And in this encroachment upon the rights of the subject kingdoms, the Dragon will be the active agent, furthering the aims of despotism .

Eighth Coincidence of Fact :—This to Horned Serpent "doeth great wonders, so that he causeth fire to come down from heaven on the earth, in the sight of men ."

This is a startling statement . I used to think that when the power symbolized by this Two Horned Beast should rise, and begin to "cause fire to come down from heaven," I would be sure to recognize it ; for, when it should "cause fire to come down from heaven," its identity would be unmistakable .

But the Money Power had been "causing fire to come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men" for over forty years, before I recognized its identity . "Fire from heaven" is lightning : lightning is electricity . For more than forty years the Money Power has been "causing fire to come down from heaven in the sight of men," to run the telegraph . In all our Cities, it "causeth fire to come down from heaven," to run the electric lights . In all the cities, and many of the towns, "fire from heaven" runs telephones . And in many of the cities, electric motors run street cars by "fire from heaven ."

And the Money Power "causeth" all this "fire to come down from heaven ." As fast as any new electric invention is made, the Money Power buys the patent, organizes electrical companies all over the world, and sets the invention in operation . Edison is evidently its paid agent . He has spent over a million dollars in electrical experiments . He has in his laboratory forty assistants, and is expending at least $40,000 a year in his experiments . He can not personally afford any such outlay . He must be the agent of the Money Power ; and as fast as he makes a new invention, they buy it, and put it into operation . They only paid him $6,ooo a year, for seventeen years, for the telephone—nothing like the value of the invention ; but enough, seeing that they paid him while experimenting, and supported his laboratory .

The Money Power owns the telegraph lines, the electric light companies, the electric street car companies, and all the applications of electric force . All over the earth, it constantly " causeth fire to come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men" ! !

Who can doubt that the Two Horned Serpent is the Symbol of the Money Power ?

Ninth Coincidence of Fact :—The Two Horned Serpent "had power to do great miracles" or wonders .

We live in an age of wonders . It is a common expression to speak of the "wonders of steam," the "wonders of electricity," the "wonders of mechanical invention ."

And all these "wonders" the Money Power has set in operation by its capital . It has built the steam ships—the railroads—the telegraph lines—the telephones—the electric railway lines—the water works—the gas works :—and it has set in operation, by its capital, the thousand mechanical wonders in use in every kind of manufactures .

Tenth Coincidence of Fact :—The Two Horned Serpent "deceived them that dwell on the earth as to those miracles [or wonders] which it had power to do ."

This is perfectly fulfilled in the Money Power, which is now deceiving mankind as to the wonders it is working with its capital . It lauds itself as a great benefactor of mankind . The blessings of Capital are constantly held up before the public . We are constantly told that Capital is necessary to our civilization—that it is beneficent in its operations—that Capital is indeed men's chief benefactor—that the world cannot do without Capital . It is triumphantly asked where would the world now be without the railroads, the telegraphs and the thousand inventions Capital has set in operation ? We are continually reminded that the human race ought to realize the benefits it derives from Capital, and ought to be profoundly grateful for them . And the inference is suggested that, in recognition of these benefits, mankind ought, in all things, to do the bidding and consult the interests of Capital ! !

By these self laudations put forth through the press controlled by it, the Money Power is deceiving mankind .

It is admitted that the wonders Capital has wrought have been of the greatest benefit to mankind . No one would be willing to go back to the old days of stage coaches and tallow candles . We can not do without our railroads, and steamships, our telegraph lines, our water works, our gas works, our electric lights, our street railways, and all the appliances of our modern civilization .—But there is a consequence of all this that the Money Power keeps out of view .

By Means of these things, the Money Power is Rapidly Bankrupting Mankind, and getting all wealth into its own hands . There is more work now being done by steam than could be done, with old methods, by five such races as now people the earth . The Money Power has taken possession of steam, and mechanical inventions ; and it is making all the profit derived from those sources .—Let a small knot of capitalists make all the profit on the labour of five such races as now people the earth—let them make it, not for one year or one generation, but for ages ; and let them constantly reinvest, and enlarge their operations ; and let them invest their profits, age by age, in property of all kinds :—and it is only a question of time, when they will do all business, and own all property .

We reach the same conclusion by another course of fact . When the Money Power began its career, 175 years ago, it is a moderate estimate to put its capital at $50,000,000 . The commerce of the world has always been needing capital ; and business has always afforded the best opportunities of investment . The capital of the Money Power would certainly double itself once in fifteen years . Then it has doubled 11 3/5 times since 1715 . If this is the case, the capital of the Money Power now amounts to $163,840,000,000 . This is probably below the mark . The wealth of the Money Power can hardly be less than $200,000,000,000 .

This is a vast amount ; but the facts bear it out . In the First Era of the growth of the Money Power, down to 1775, it had use for all its capital in extending its operations . In the Second Era,—from 1775 to 1830,—it had sufficient capital to make immense loans to the monarchs of Europe .—In the Third Era,—from 1830 to 1864,—it had money enough to make loans for building railroads, water works, gas works, &c.; but it waited for the people to come for the money .—But since 1864, in the Fourth Era of its growth, it has been going into all kinds of enterprises ; and now it is seeking new investments, and begging people to sell it their property all over the earth . The Money Power has so much money, now, that it can not find investment for it . In one more double it will about have all the property of the earth . In the beginning of its career, a double of its capital meant $100,000,000 . Now a double of its capital means $400,000,000,000 . And all the property of the world is less that $600,000,000,000 .

The labour wrought by steam and invention is too vast, for a few capitalists to be suffered to monopolize these grand agencies of industry for their own exclusive benefit . The monopoly of those appliances in the hands of a few capitalists is ruining the world .

The monopoly of steam industry must be stopped, and some way must be discovered by which the masses of mankind may be allowed a chance to share the profits derived from steam and invention .

How well Divine Inspiration foreknew the craft of the Money Power, and how thoroughly it has exposed it . In exposing the pretence of the Money Power as to the beneficent influence of capital, it has completely unmasked the deception of the claim that the operations of Capital, as now carried on, are beneficent to mankind . The exposure of its deception is the first step toward a new and better order of things, in which the operations of steam and invention, instead of inuring to the exclusive benefit of the Money Power, shall be used by the people of every country for their own national and individual prosperity .

Mankind is slow to accept a new thought, and some persons may be unwilling to believe that the Money Power is thus taking possession of all the property of the world . But divine Inspiration declares that such is its purpose :—

Eleventh Coincidence of Fact :—This Two Headed Serpent "causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand or in their forehead ; and that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name ."

This "mark" is the brand in the hand or on the body, by which slaves were marked, in ancient times . It is the aim of the Money Power to get all industry and all business into its hands, and reduce all mankind to the condition of its paid servants, branded in the hand, or on the forehead, with the badge of servitude .

A very intelligent man, after hearing my lecture, suggested to me that the "mark in the hand" designates the multitude of operatives who render manual service to the Money Power ; while the "mark in the forehead" designates those who render to the Money Power brain service . This would include all great agents, having control of departments of industry or trade ; all editors who wield their pens in the service of the Money Power ; all lobbyists and legislator who sell themselves to promote the aims of the Money Power ; and all in any department of business,—lawyers and other professional men,—who render brain service to the Money Power .

The mind shrinks from the idea that a grand Imperialism of Capital should get every department of industry and enterprise into its possession, so that none except its paid agents can do any business . But we have seen how entirely the Money Power has obtained control of all business, in India . We have seen how it is monopolizing almost all business in the United States, except farming and retail traffic—and how it is rapidly getting possession of these . We have seen how one more double, which will only take fifteen years, will give it more than all the property of Christendom, and two more doubles will give it all the property in the world .

A.T. Stewart broke down one thousand retail merchants in New York City, so at they could not buy nor sell, until they failed in business ; then they took the "mark in the hand," and went behind his counters ; and they could sell all the goods the New York people wanted to buy .

Some time ago, Armour began a campaign against the butchers of Davenport, Iowa . He wanted them to sell his meats . They refused : they wanted to buy and kill their own cattle ; for there is a grand profit in buying and killing cattle and selling beef, at present prices . But Armour determined to coerce them : he began to sell dressed beef in Davenport so low that the butchers could sell no beef . They surrendered, and agreed to sell Armour's beef ; they took the "mark in the hand" ; and then they could sell all the beef the people of Davenport wanted to buy .

Business men are now being driven out, not of the beef trade only, but of many lines of business . The Money Kings have already obtained possession largely of the wholesale trade, and of all the great lines of business in the country . They have the import and the export trade : they buy all our products of every kind . They have almost everything except merchandising and the farms ; and, as we have seen, they are rapidly getting possession of the retail trade, by the retail stores which they are establishing throughout the country ; and will soon have possession of our farms, by their foreclosure of mortgages .

The New York Times expects the Money Power to get possession of the farms by foreclosure of mortgages, and in a leading editorial, published Aug . 12th, 1877, it anticipates this result, and prepares the public mind for it . It says :—

"There seems to be but one remedy, and it must come,—a change of ownership of the soil, and the creation of a class of land owners, on the one hand, and of tenant farmers on the other,—something similar in both cases to that which has long existed and now exists in the old countries of Europe . * * * * Everything seems ripe for the change .

"Then will begin a new era in agriculture, and one that seems very desirable . * * * * * Those farmers who are land poor must sell, and become tenants, instead of owners of the soil ."

The Times regards the farmers losing their farms as inevitable, and it looks forward with complacency to the time when all our farms will be devoured by the Money Power . When that event occurs, the farmers will be serfs upon the soil redeemed by their fathers from the wilderness .

In a few years more, if things go on in their present grooves, this prophecy will be fulfilled ; and no man in America can buy or sell, unless he is the paid agent of the Money Power . And if it is not checked, it will, ere long, extend its ownership over the whole world, and make all mankind its employees and servants, with its brand in their hand, or on their forehead .

Twelfth Coincidence of Fact :—The number of the name of the Beast : "Here is wisdom . Let him that hath understanding count the number of the Beast : for it is the number of a man ; for his number is six hundred and three score and six ."

The manner in which this number of the name of the Beast is mentioned makes it evident that the number of the name is a very important means of identifying this two horned beast with the power it symbolizes .

From a very early period, the Christian fathers turned their minds to the exposition of this symbolic number . Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyon, in Gaul, who lived in the Second Century, gives three names that have this number 666 .—The first name was Euatnhes, which he merely mentions, and passes by, with the remark, "but we affirm nothing respecting this ."—The second name he gives is Lateinos . This name has been very generally adopted by expositors, who supposed this Serpent to be the Papacy .

The third Name which Irenaeus Gives as Containing the Number 666, is Teitan ; and this name he himself adopts .

It may be that this is the Name intended by divine Inspiration ; and that, when this Dragon Imperialism shall be fully developed and known to the world, and its history be complete, it shall have a ruler or king in whose name the fated number will appear . But in the present state of our knowledge of the subject, I accept Teitan as the fated number ; and it is my belief that this is the number that was intended in the text ; And for the following reasons :—

1. Titan Was the Great Legendary Giant of the Olden Time . We still use the name to designate any colossal power . I believe that one reason why divine Inspiration called this Serpent Titan, was to indicate its immense power, its huge proportions, its Titanic strength .

1) The Money Power is the most colossal empire that has ever risen upon the earth . It is a Titanic empire ; the greatest that has ever existed . And the Serpent, its symbol, is a "great" Serpent, stretching its mighty folds all over the earth . It is a titanic Serpent .

2) In its relations with the Beast, the Dragon has all the power ; for "The Dragon gave power to the beast ;" and this Serpent "exerciseth all the power of the first beast in his presence ."

3) So, in the third vision of Daniel, the Little Horn which was the symbol of the Roman empire, grows so great, at last that its top stands up among the stars . It becomes a "titan" Horn . And the vision of it was so terrible that it entirely unnerved the prophet, so that he was sick for three weeks .

This horn became a Titan Horn only after the re-establishment of the Roman empire, under the joint rule of the Money Power and Prussia . The power of this Joint empire shall be so colossal that nothing can represent it but a titan Horn rising up above the earth, till its top is among the stars .—The fact that this "Little Horn" became a "titan" Horn has never been observed by expositors .

2. but the special reason why the dragon is designated by the name "titan," is its antagonism to god .

1) The Titans, according to the Heathen legend, warred against Jupiter, and hurled their missiles against Olympus ; and they were only beaten, at last, by Jupiter smiting them with his thunderbolts . Titan according to the legend, was the king of the Titans, and was thus the Arch-rebel against the gods .

2) It is believed that the legendary war of the Titans against the gods, was the heathen mythological form of the rebellion of Satan and his angels against God . So that, the Satan of the Bible is the mythological Titan .

3) In the biblical idea, Satan is embodied in the serpent . And the Dragon, in the book of Revelation, is called the Devil and Satan . This indicates that the Dragon symbolizes that power which, in the political world, is the great antagonist of God, as Satan is in the spiritual world .

4) The Dragon is the Great Antichristian Power of the Latter Days . In its full development, the head of the Dragon power is the Antichrist .

1] We have seen how the Jews are even now hoping and expecting to overthrow Christianity . A very intelligent Jew once, in the heat of discussion, gave me the idea of the Christ which the modern "reformed" Jew holds . He said the prosperity of the Jews in the earth—he did not choose to say their dominion—is what is set forth in the writings of the Prophets under the figure of the Christ .

In the Jewish idea, the Dominion of the Jew Money Power is the Christ . And, at the least, I think that the head or king of the Money Power will claim to be the Christ .

Christ means "The Anointed One," in allusion to his being the promised royal descendant of David, the promised King of Israel . The Money Power, it seems, will at last choose a king, who is to be the acknowledged king of Israel,—the long expected, the long promised One,—the Christ . They will not claim that he is Divine or the Son of God . For they deny that, in the Deity, there is the relation of Father and Son . They deny the Divine Trinity . They "deny the Father and the Son ." They recognize only the unity of God .

The Jews have always expected a temporal sovereign as the Christ . They rejected the Lord Jesus, because He said "My Kingdom is not of this world ." They expect a Christ whose kingdom is of this world—who is merely a temporal monarch . The time will probably come when, in the plenitude of its power, the Jew Money Power will set up a king, and declare him the promised Messiah . They will declare him the founder of a new Dynasty that is to rule the earth forever .

They will proclaim him the first of a line of kings,—Anointed Ones,—who, in their expectation, will all bear the title of "the Christs" ; as the kings of Egypt were called "the Pharaohs," and the emperors of Rome, "the Caesars ."—The present attitude of the Jew Money Power is a stern menace to Christianity .

2] The Jew London Money Kings would break down our churches . In monopolizing the trade of our towns, and getting possession of our farms, the Money Power hopes to succeed in accomplishing the aims against Christianity which the Jews are known to entertain . If the Money Power should succeed in its aims, our churches will inevitably be broken down . Strike down our farming yeomanry and the tradesmen of our towns, and who would sustain our churches ? our schools ? Our churches in town and country would be pastorless for want of support . Our school systems would fall into wreck in the universal poverty that would prevail . Our Christian civilization would lie in ruins .

It is well known that the Jews, in our day, entertain strong hope of overthrowing Christianity .—Prof. Godet, of Lausanne, utters the following warning of the danger threatening Christendom from the hostility of the Jews . He says :—

”On hearing this word 'Jewish,' many of you perhaps smile . That which bears that title does not seem to them very dangerous for the Church . They do not say, 'Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth ?' but 'Can anything dangerous to us come out from thence ?' To this contemptuous smile, I will oppose another, that of the Israelites themselves,—I mean the intelligent Israelites,—when they see us Christians bestirring ourselves for the propagation of the gospel, * * * * * and carrying the religion of the Bible to the ends of the earth . 'This religion,' they say quietly, 'is our religion . All these pains you are taking for us . * * * * * For the God of the Christian is the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob,—the God of the Jews . The doctrine of Jesus is none other than that of our prophets . One thing only separates us from these Christians,—the worship of the Christ . Let this absurd dogma of the divinity of a man,one that is contrary to the most elementary principles of Monotheism,let this last remnant of the ancient paganism living on in Christianity fall to the ground, and the gospel, thus purified, is Judaism . Christians, we are waiting for you ! It is not we who are coming over to you ; it is you who are coming over to us .' * * * * * So think, and so speak clear sighted Jews .” (1)

Inspector Lictor Platt, in a recent course of lectures before the University of Berlin, said :—

“Everywhere one thought rules the Jews—the thought that the Christian idea shall at last be vanquished by the Jewish ; and their common effort is directed to this end,—to supplant Christianity in the collective life of the nations .”(2)

The Christian Editor of one of the leading evangelical papers of North Germany writes in the same strain :

“Among the Jews themselves, the conclusion is reached, not that the Jews will have to return to Christianity, but that the Christians will have to be turned to the Jewish faith .”—Neue Evang. Kirchen-Zeitung, Feb. 4, 1882 .

A Jewish writer, quoted in the same paper, asserts with all assurance "Reformed Judaism is the confession to which the dominating church must return, if she will complete her reformation ."—Neue Evang. Kirchen-Zeitung, Nov. 19, 1881 .

I have taken the above quotations from Dr. Kellogg's book, The Jews . The author of that work says :

"This attitude of aggressive antagonism to Christianity, which the Jews are assuming, however little noticed by the unthinking many who never look behind acts and events for agents and causes, is a sign of the times as grave as it is remarkable . The confident expectation and determination of these enfranchised Jews, that not Christianity, but Judaism,—divested indeed of what was ceremonial and temporary,—shall yet win the world against Christianity, when we remember their control of the Capital of the world, their profits, and their confessedly marvellous success in modern life, acquires a serious significance ."—The Jews, page 210 .

The Jews are fully conscious of their Imperialism of Capital, and are looking forward to the time when, in full possession of all the industry, and wealth and property of the world, they can give entire direction to secular affairs, and form to religious belief . Let them get possession of our farms, and the business of our towns, and they will not hesitate to attempt to crush out our churches, by reducing their members to such poverty that they will be unable to sustain the expense of public worship .

If the Dragon empire, in its ultimate development, is the Antichrist, there is a peculiar fitness in Divine Inspiration calling it "Titan," the Satan of heathen mythology .

The Greeks had a well known method of expressing names by numbers . Each letter of the alphabet had as its equivalent a definite number . According to this system, the name Titan has the number 666 . The Greek spelling of the name was Teitan . The numeral equivalent of these letters are as follows :

T 300 + 5 + 10 + 300 + 1 + 50=666,

3rd . The Dragon and the Man-child .

We now turn to the symbol of the Dragon in the 12th Chapter of Revelation, where are presented ten other Coincidences of Fact . Until now, we were not prepared to take up the exposition of the Coincidences of Fact set forth in this symbol of the Dragon, inasmuch as it was necessary, first, to understand the relations of the Dragon to Great Britain and the Prussian empire .

The following is the text in the 12th chapter of Revelation :

"And there appeared a great wonder in heaven ; a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars .

"And she, being with child, cried travailing in birth, and pained to be delivered .

"And there appeared another wonder in heaven ; and behold a great red dragon having seven heads and ten horns, and ten crowns on his heads .

"And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven and did cast them to the earth .

"And the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born .

"And she brought forth a man-child who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron .

"And her child was caught up unto God and to His throne .

"And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and three score days .

"And there was war in heaven : Michael and his angels fought against the dragon : and the dragon fought and his angels ; and prevailed not : neither was their place found any more in heaven .

"And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world : he was cast out, and his angels were cast out with him .

"And I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, now is come salvation and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ : for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night .

"And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony ; and they loved not their lives unto the death ." Rev. xii : 1-11 .

In the remaining portion of the chapter there are other Coincidences of Fact, which prove that the Dragon is a symbol of the Money Power ; but, as they require, in order to bring them to bear on the question, a comparison with other prophecies not yet explained, they are omitted . But, without them, there are, in the part of the chapter already quoted, ten Coincidences of Fact, which prove beyond the possibility of doubt that the Dragon is the symbol of the Money Power .

Before presenting these Coincidences, it is first necessary to give an

1. exposition of the other symbols .

In the 12th Chapter of Revelation, the scene is laid in

1) The Lower Aerial Heaven .

The Lower Aerial Heaven, in the Book of Revelation, is Always the Symbol of America, considered geographically as a country . The principle on which this symbolism is based is very simple and clear .

John received his Revelation on the Isle of Patmos, in the Aegean Sea . The Revelation, like all the other prophecies, was given by vision . The Isle of Patmos is in the Southeastern part of Europe .—As the Seer looked out toward the West, he beheld Europe spread out before his eye ; and, beyond it, was another country, up in the air above Europe ; and above this country was the highest Heaven, where the Throne of God was placed . Above the earth of Roman Europe was a sky, in which sun and moon and stars were held

This was the Apocalyptic Landscape which John beheld in his vision . He was, no doubt, familiar with the geography of his time, and recognized the outlines of Roman Europe, which he called "the Earth ." He naturally, in accordance with the ideas of his age, supposed the Eastern Continent to be the whole of the world, and that there was nothing on this earth beyond . He therefore called the country which he saw in the air, above Europe, "Heaven ." But that country was America ; and was placed in the Apocalyptic landscape above Europe, in the air, in perfect accordance with the laws of perspective .

In Accordance with the Laws of Perspective, the Foreground of a Landscape is always at the bottom of a picture, and the background, at the top . As John looked toward the West, therefore, he saw Roman Europe at the bottom of the landscape, as though on the ground, while America would appear above, at the top of the landscape .—But, with three thousand miles of perspective, America would be diminished to a point, and be invisible . In this respect, the law of perspective would have to be set aside ; and America would be brought into the foreground sufficiently to be clearly visible, and placed above Europe, as though in air . In accordance with the law of perspective, America, in the book of Revelation, is always presented in the landscape in the lower aerial heaven .

2) A Glorious Woman

appears in the Lower Aerial Heaven,—America,—"clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars ." Expositors generally agree that this Woman is the symbol of the Christian Church . The Two Witnesses, in the 11th Chapter of Revelation, are also the symbols of the Church . As the Two Witnesses prophesy clothed with sackcloth "one thousand two hundred and three score days," so the Woman is in the wilderness "one thousand two hundred and three score days ."

The mistake into which expositors have fallen, in supposing that the woman is presented here before she fled into the wilderness, has been the cause of much error in the interpretation of this vision . Owing to this error, expositors have looked for the fulfilment of the vision in events that occurred in the Early History of the Church .

But, in the sixth verse, where it is said, "The woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and three score days," it does not mean that the woman then fled into the wilderness for the first time . Several considerations make this evident :—

I] The Greek verb rendered "fled" is not in the imperfect tense, so as to indicate action beginning and continuing ; but it is in the aorist, indicating completed action . The woman was not then making her first flight into the wilderness : she had been there for a long time, and only emerged from obscurity for a brief space, at this time, and now returned to it again .

2] The woman fled into the wilderness, "where," says the Seer, "she hath a place ." She had been in her "place" a long time ; she now returned to her "place ."

3] This return to her "place" is like her subsequent return, in the 14th verse, where the woman again flies to her "place" in the wilderness . In both instances, the woman flies to her refuge ; but it does not mean, in either case, that she flies thither for the first time . Hence, the woman flying to her "place" does not give us any clue to the era of the vision : that must be learned from other facts .

3) A Man-Child was born of this woman,—the Christian Church,—in the Lower Aerial Heaven, “who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron .”

This Man-child is the symbol of the United States ; as is evident from the concurrent teachings of prophecy :—

I] The Man-child is born in the Lower Aerial Heaven, which is America as a country .

2] The Man-child is represented as born, the child of the Church . And the United States is, in a remarkable manner, the child of the Christian Church, as I have shown in my lecture on The United States in Prophecy . All the American Colonies were founded and settled by Christians seeking a refuge in the New World, where they might worship God according to the dictates of their conscience . There were the Puritans in New England, the Baptists in Rhode Island, the Dutch Calvinists in New York, the Swedish Lutherans in New Jersey, the Scotch Covenanters from New York to North Carolina, the English Quakers in Pennsylvania, the Episcopalians in Virginia, the French Huguenots in South Carolina, and the German Moravians in Georgia . The United States is emphatically the Child of the Church .

3] In the first vision of Daniel, the United States is represented under the symbol of the “Stone” which was “cut out of a mountain without hands” ; which is interpreted by the Prophet as a kingdom set up by the God of heaven . This is very similar to the representation of the origin of the United States,the Man-child,—in the book of Revelation . In Daniel, God is represented as the founder of the country, without anything being said of any human instrumentality : Here in Revelation, the human instrumentality, the Church, is especially mentioned . But the divine or Providential origin of the country is set forth in both instances .

4] The Man-child was “to rule all nations with a rod of iron .” And it is the accordant voice of prophecy that the United States is to be a world-wide Republic, ruling all the nations of the earth .

5] “The Man-child was caught up unto God and to His Throne .” This indicates the providential deliverance of our country in the War of Independence, and the providential protection that has kept us throughout our entire career as a nation .

Having identified all the other symbols of this vision of the 12th chapter of Revelation, we are now ready to identify the Dragon, beyond the possibility of doubt or question .— We have identified the Woman, the Man-child, and the place of his birth . This being done, we cannot mistake the interpretation of the Dragon .

2. coincidences of fact .

Thirteenth Coincidence of Fact :—In the birth hour of The Man-child, "The Dragon stood before the woman, which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born ."

The United States was born as a nation in the War of Independence . At that time, the Great Red Dragon attempted to devour the infant nation . Great Britain was the power which then attempted to destroy our national existence . We must, therefore, either identify the Dragon with the British government, or with some power in Britain, behind the throne, greater than the throne .

As we have seen, the Dragon is not the symbol of Great Britain . The Dragon is the seventh grand form of Imperialism in the world : Great Britain is no such Imperialism . England and Scotland are Two of the Ten Kingdoms of Europe . They are represented in prophecy as the two horns on the head of the Dragon . Moreover, Prophecy represents Great Britain and the United States as united in the great future war against the Dragon and the Beast .—The Dragon is not the symbol of Great Britain as a nation .

Hence, the Dragon must represent some power having its seat in Britain, and having the British government under its control ; and which influenced Great Britain to war against the United States, in our War of Independence .—This is just the historical status of the Money Power . It controls the British government with autocratic sway . It has controlled it for over a hundred years .

The Money Power was the prime mover in the oppression of the American Colonies, which drove them to revolt . The Landed Aristocracy, the Moneyed Capitalists, and the Mercantile Class of Great Britain were all united in holding stock in the British East India Company, which was then the Money Power ; and their combined influence had complete control of the British Parliament .

During the trial of Warren Hastings, there were, in the administration party, a large number of the stockholders of the East India Company who had seats in Parliament . But the Administration party was in a minority in the Company, which sustained Hastings against the government . Many of the Opposition in Parliament were, no doubt, also stockholders . The connection of the Company with the government was very close ; so that it would carry in Parliament any policy on which the Company was united .

In England, the Money Power is a Third Estate, greater than King and Parliament . In 1775, as now, the British Parliament was the pliant tool of the money Power, and registered its will . It was not yet the age of steam, and the Money Power looked to Colonial dependencies as the chief source of gain . With its experience in India, it naturally desired to make another India of the American Colonies ; and it derived great profits from their commerce, and great revenues from their taxation .

No sooner was the Seven Years War over, than the Money Power, impelled the British Parliament into a system of oppressive taxation and commercial restrictions, which drove the Colonies into Revolution . The whole question in dispute between the Colonies and the Mother country was taxation, industry and trade ; matters in which the Money Power was specially interested, and in which it wished to enforce the policy that would promote its interest . The tax on tea, which drove the Colonies to revolt, was enacted for the special benefit of a corporation connected with the East India Company, which had a great quantity of tea on hand . While the nominal tax was retained, the tea was made lower than before in the interest of the Company, so as to enable it to sell . The law of the British Parliament for the benefit of the East India Company was the special occasion of the Revolution .

The Money Power through its control of Parliament drove the Colonies to revolution ; and then, instead of attempting to allay discontent by concession, it attempted to destroy our national existence, by war .

There can be no doubt that the Dragon, which wished to devour our infant nation in the War of Independence, was the Money Power, which then ruled the British Parliament .

This Coincidence of Fact, alone, is sufficient to prove that the Dragon is the symbol of the London Money Power .

Fourteenth Coincidence of Fact :—"On his heads," were "seven crowns ." The Seventh or Dragon Head was, at that time, a crowned Imperialism .

In 1775, the East India Company which was the head of the Money Power was a crowned Imperialism . According to history it became an imperial power in 1757, at the victory of Plassy . In 1764, it was ruling an empire in Bengal of forty million subjects, having greater revenues than the most powerful kingdom of Europe .—In 1775, the Dragon head had just become a crowned Imperialism .

Fifteenth coincidence of Fact :—The tail of the Dragon "drew the third part of the stars of heaven and did cast them to the earth ."

In the Revolutionary War, the British forces overran about one-third of the United States . In the latter years of the Revolution, the British forces held their headquarters in New York City, and broke down all organized resistance in North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia, and overran part of Virginia . About one-third of the country was thus "cast down" by the invading forces . The tail of the Dragon "cast down one-third of the stars" that glittered on our flag .

Sixteenth Coincidence of Fact :—But the Dragon did not succeed : "the Man-child was caught up onto God and to His Throne ."

This catching up of the Man-child to the Highest Heaven, as beheld by John, symbolized the providential deliverance of the United States in the Revolutionary War, and the Divine protection of our country ever since . Our Revolutionary fathers all recognized the hand of Divine Providence in the success of our country . Washington, speaking of the events of the Revolution, said :—

"The hand of Providence has been so conspicuous in all this, that he who lacked faith must have been worse than an infidel ; and he more than wicked who had not gratitude to acknowledge his obligations ."

Seventeenth Coincidence of Fact :—"And there was war in heaven : Michael and his angels fought against the Dragon : and the Dragon fought and his angels ." Here is a future war represented as occurring in America,—the Lower Aerial Heaven,—between the Dragon and Michael .

The place where this war occurs is clearly set forth : It is the same Lower Aerial Heaven where the Man-child was born . The Man-child is now grown up to man's estate, and is called Michael . In the fourth vision of Daniel, also, Michael is presented as the symbol of the United States .

I could not for a long time see the basis of this symbolism . I could not see the point of similarity between Michael and the United States, which always lies at the foundation of all symbolism .

But it is very plain . Michael is the Archangelthe Chief of the Hosts of God in heaven . Divine Inspiration always regards the United States from the standpoint of its future grandeur and glory, when it shall rule the whole earth in righteousness, for God . There is a striking fitness in the Leader of the Hosts of God in heaven being made the symbol of the United States, the great future leader of the Hosts of God on earth, during the grand millennial age .

Only the fact that there is to be a future war between the Dragon and Michael, between the Money Power and the United States, can be learned from this passage .

In the fourth vision of Daniel, there is a synchronous prophecy, which represents the Prussian empire as invading the United States . Speaking of the King who "shall do according to his will"—which is the Prussian empirethe angel tells Daniel that he shall overthrow many countries, and says :—"He shall enter also into the glorious land ." Daniel xi : 41 .

In Daniel viii : 9, it is said of the Roman empire, there presented under the symbol of "a little horn," that it "waxed exceeding great toward the South, and toward the East, and toward the glorious land ." As the Roman empire actually grew great toward the South, and East and West, it is manifest that its Westward growth is here set forth as a growth "toward the glorious land," the growth toward the East and South being previously mentioned . This shows that "the glorious land" lies toward the West of Europe . That designation can only point out the United States .

The Angel Called our Country "the Glorious Land," in view of its future destiny, as an Universal Republic, giving religion, liberty and civilization to the world throughout all coming ages . The warlike entrance of the Wilful King,—the Prussian empire,—into the Glorious Land, foretells a Prussian invasion of the United States .

Putting the two Prophecies Together, they Foretell an invasion of the United States, by the Prussian empire as the agent of the Money Power . In the future the Money Power will exercise the power of the Prussian empire, as it now exercises the power of Great Britain . As it influenced the British government to invade China ; and to conquer Egypt and Burmah, so it will influence the German empire when extended over Southern and Western Europe, to invade the United States .

Prophecy does not say what cause of quarrel the Money Power will have against our country . It does not say whether we shall be utterly bankrupted as Egypt was, and unable to pay the interest on our vast debt to the Money Power ; or whether we shall attempt to resist its encroachments before we are finally ruined, as Burmah did . Whatever its ground of umbrage, the Money Power will set the Prussian empire upon us .

And Prussia will not be reluctant to undertake the conquest . Our Republic is a standing menace to monarchy . We are the most powerful nation on the globe ; and our influence in the world is even mightier from our moral power, than from our national greatness . If things could go on prosperously with us for thirty years more, Europe would become Republican by the progress of liberal ideas . The despotic Prussian empire over Southern and Western Europe will never be safe while the Great Republic of the West stands . The stability of monarchical institutions requires that the American Republic shall be overthrown and subjugated .

The Invasion would not be Attempted with a small Army . Prussia, at the head of Southern and Western Europe, and backed by the unlimited loans of the Money Power, might easily put two million men in the field . It is probable that the army of invasion will reach that number . The British government, under the rule of the Tories, will give its support to the Prussian empire, and lend its fleets for the transportation of the invading army and its supplies . According to military probabilities, the line of invasion will be the St. Lawrence River and Lake Ontario, and thence down east of Lake Erie, in an attempt to take possession of the line of the Alleghanies, and cut off the Eastern and Middle States from the West and South .

And together with this, having command of the ocean the invaders will probably attempt to seize and capture New York City from Long Island, and renew the attempt of Burgoyne to cut off New England from the West, by taking possession of the line of the Hudson .

The statements of Prophecy indicate a conflict of unexampled magnitude . Prussia invaded France with one million men ; the rest of her forces being kept at home to guard the frontiers . And the invading army crushed France almost without a struggle . But when Prussia shall invade America, it will be Greek meeting Greek, and the mightiest conflict will ensue on which the sun has ever shone .

Eighteenth Coincidence of Fact : "The Dragon prevailed not ; neither was their place found any more in heaven . And the great Dragon was cast out, he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him ."

When this great future conflict comes, we shall understand the design of Providence in permitting the outbreak of the late War . It will then be seen that our Civil War saved our country and the world . If, when this future invasion comes, we were distracted by a sectional issue, and unarmed, as we were in 1860, our position in the face of a grand invasion would be hopeless . Before we could prepare for war, the heel of the despot would be upon our neck . But when the invasion comes we shall be thoroughly armed with the weapons of our Civil War ; and, all distracting issues past, North and South will present a solid front to the foe . We shall be fighting for religion and liberty, for home and property rights . The country will be fired with unexampled enthusiasm . The fiery valour of the South will be united with the cool stubborn courage of the North ; and together they will be irresistible . We learned in the late War the value of flanking movements, and developed a new arm of war in mounted infantry . When the invader shall march into the country, we will meet him in front, and envelope him with flanking movements . He must either fight or retreat . There will be quick, hard rapid fighting . Prophecy indicates that we press the fighting, and put the invaders on the defensive . We attack ; we defeat them ; We drive them out of the country .

Thenceforth, the Money Power has no place in the United States .

Nineteenth Coincidence of Fact :—It is said that the Dragon "deceiveth the whole world ."

The Money Power has deceived the whole world down to the present time . It has deceived the whole world as to its existence . It has hidden itself in its London den, and made the world believe that the agents it appointed to manage the companies it organized in the various countries, were the owners of the companies they manage . It has deceived the whole world as to the right laws of industry, making the world believe that the system of industry which is reducing the world to bankruptcy is beneficial to mankind . It has deceived and betrayed everybody who has trusted it, systematically "freezing out" those who have put money into enterprises controlled by it . It has deceived the whole world by booms in city property, and by booms in business enterprises, which it has started for the purpose of robbing the public of its money invested in them . It has deceived the whole world, and made it believe that prices should be left to regulate themselves by the law of supply and demand ;—when it constantly regulates prices, by the might of capital, through the instrumentality of Boards of Trade, which are absolutely controlled by it . It deceives the whole world in making people believe that Capital is beneficent ;—when it is using its capital to bankrupt the world, and reduce mankind to the condition of serfdom .—The Money Power is the Arch-deceiver .

Twentieth Coincidence of Fact :—The Dragon is called "the accuser of our brethren ."

This will probably be fulfilled in the future . When the Money Power shall be exposed, the people of God will denounce it from pulpit and platform . Then the Money Power, through the papers which it controls will denounce all who take ground against it with all manner of false accusation .

So fearful will be its accusations at only they will dare to assail it, who take their life in their hand, and "love not their lives onto death ." In many papers, the Jews a majority of the stock, and have them completely under their control . Others they will suborn with bribes . The Shimeis of the press will be manifest as the mouth-pieces of the Dragon, by their accusations of those who expose the Money Power .

Twenty-first Coincidence of Fact :—But the accused overcame the Dragon, "by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony ."

God reigns . The Money Power shall fall, though all wealth and influence and power be on its side . They who expose it, though they be "the weak of this world shall confound the mighty ."

But they will "overcome him," not by human might, but "by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony ." The "blood of the Lamb" has redeemed the human race from the thraldom of evil ; and He, unto whom "all power in heaven and earth is given," will not suffer the Money Power to deprive mankind of its promised Millennium of blessedness, and grind it down beneath oppression and wrong . He will guard His servants,—will give "the word of their testimony" power to rouse the people .—Let them present "the word of their testimony,"—the testimony of prophecy against the Dragon, which will be the power of God to overthrow this titanic evil .

Twenty-second Coincidence of Fact : Divine inspiration here calls the Dragon "that old serpent called the devil and Satan ."

The Jew Money Power is the embodiment of evil in the Latter Days . It is the enemy of God and man . The Jew Money Kings are infidels to a man . They embody the very spirit of Antichrist : holding only to the unity of God, they "deny both the Father and the Son ." They wish to break down all industry, as it has heretofore existed in the world : They wish to break down all business men, and reduce them to poverty, and dependence on themselves : They wish to break down society as it now exists, and reorganize it on the basis of their own ascendancy, and the subordination of mankind to them : They loathe Christianity, and wish to break it down and substitute for it an infidel Judaism . Hoping to establish a universal monarchy under the rule of a Jewish king, they are in principle opposed to Republicanism . Desiring, in this country, to take from the people all their property and reduce them to the condition of peasants, they know that they can not accomplish their aims while Republicanism exists . They know that a free people will not submit to such wrong, and that they can only establish their power by the overthrow of Republicanism .

Already from some of their agents we have ominous utterances of a purpose to subvert Republicanism . If the Money Power should get possession of our farms, and succeed in breaking down the business men of our towns, the days of the Republic will be numbered . Then we may fear that the state of things suggested in the following article in the Nevada Chronicle, will be inaugurated :—

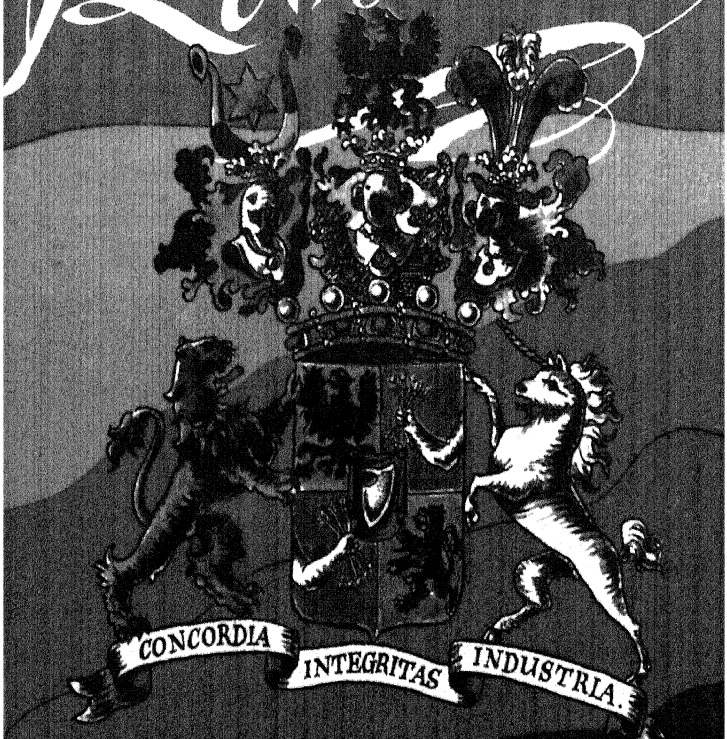
"We need a stronger government ; the wealth of the country [the Money Power and its agents] demands it . * * * * * The Capital of the country demands protection . The wealth of the country has to bear the burden of the government, and it shall control it . The people are becoming educated up to this theory rapidly, and the sooner this theory is recognized in the constitution and the laws, the better it will be for the people . * * * * * To avert fearful bloodshed,—a strong central government should be established as soon as possible ."

The Money Kings will establish an empire in this country, if they get possession of all industry and property .

It will not be difficult for them to bring it about . With their absolute control of industry, they can make times so hard as to cause intolerable suffering . Stopping the construction of railroads, and city improvements, and manufactures and iron mills, they can fill the country with hundreds of thousands of starving tramps . They can then get their paid emissaries to pretend great sympathy for the people, as their emissaries lead the Nihilists of Russia, and the Liberals of Central Europe and Italy . And when they become popular leaders, they can easily excite the starving people to outbreaks and insurrections . Such outbreaks are always easily suppressed by military force ; and in the victory over the outbreaks, an Imperial government might be established . Such outbreaks are always suppressed ; and their suppression is the method by which Republics are converted into imperial despotisms .

Let the Money Power succeed in carrying out its aims, and our country is ruined . The grand yeomanry of our country is our pride and safety . It is the backbone of the Republic—the strong column that upholds the temple of our liberties and our Christian civilization . Let our farmers lose their farms, and our yeomanry become peasants, and all is lost .

This is the greatest crisis the world has ever known . Upon its issue depends the destiny of mankind forever . It will determine whether the world shall go on to a millennium of liberty, peace and blessedness, or be crushed by the triumph of the forces that are striving to arrest the progress of our age, and bring upon the world a new Feudal Era, in which the mass of mankind will be reduced to the condition of serfdom beneath the yoke of an Aristocracy of Jew Money Kings, who will grind man down beneath the heel of oppression forever .



For, that yoke, once fixed upon the world, can never be shaken off . The Money Kings, with a mighty government under their control, would keep the masses of mankind reduced to the condition of peasants in hopeless bondage . In this age of warfare with cannon and gunpowder, an unarmed peasantry could never cast off the yoke of the Money Power, in control of the government, and having possession of all wealth .— There are two Millenniums before the world : one, a millennium of peace and blessedness, under the reign of Liberty and Religion ; the other, the reign of Oppression and Wrong, under the rule of the Money Power . The present crisis will determine which shall dominate the earth, from now to the end of time . The destinies of the Future are now hanging in the balance . Either the Money Power must go down, or the hopes of humanity must set in darkness .

Well is the Money Power called Satan, for it is the very incarnation of Satanic malignity and evil .

Who can doubt that the Great Red Dragon is the symbol of the Jew London Money Power ? Its identity with it is proved by six Historical Marks—by twenty wonderful Parallelisms of Character—and by twenty-two strange and startling Coincidences of Fact . There are thus forty-eight separate and distinct points of resemblance ; in respect of historical facts, of resemblances of character, and of coincidences between facts mentioned of the symbol and facts true of the Money Power . The proofs that the Dragon is the symbol of the Money Power are just eight times as numerous as those which prove that the Lion with Eagle's Wings is the symbol of the Babylonian empire, or the Bear, the symbol of the Persian empire ; and, in their strange and wonderful similarities, these proofs are a hundredfold stronger than those which identify any of the other symbols of the prophetic scriptures with the powers they set forth . Divine Inspiration has heaped proof upon proof, evidence upon evidence, until the mind almost wearies of it ; and until no dispassionate mind can resist the mass of evidence that forces conviction .

The proof presented in this work is not one-sixth of the evidence presented in the prophetic scriptures, that the London Money Power is the grand Imperialism so bitterly denounced in the Bible as the great Archenemy of God and man ; and which is foretold in prophecy, as destined to rise and be overthrown, in the Latter Days . When all the evidence is before the public, it will convince the most incredulous mind that God, in the inspired prophecies of scripture, has depicted the Dragon in this perfectly unmistakable manner, in order to save mankind from its power .

THE Rothschilds

A Family Portrait by

FREDERIC MORTON

PROBABLY no other family in the last two centuries has been so constantly in the center of Europe's great events as have the Rothschilds. Probably no other family has contained such varied and spectacular personalities. Surely no other family has had anything like their wealth, influence and prestige. In this book, Frederic Morton, one of our notable younger novelists, has written an intimate family portrait. Exercising the skill that Aldous Huxley has called "a gift for admirably vivid and complete characterization," Mr. Morton has re-created the men and women of six startling generations.

The Rothschilds' story begins at the end of the eighteenth century with Mayer Amschel Rothschild, a Frankfurt money changer. From a cramped house in Frankfurt's Jew Street he built a financial empire that his five sons carried to five European capitals and finally to world-wide power.

Mr. Morton dramatizes both the family solidarity and the bold flair that effected the dynasty's business triumphs. But always his emphasis is on the human aspect. Through anecdote and character portrayal, often using the main figures' own colorful language, he recalls legendary personalities: James Rothschild, who outwitted Napoleon's secret police; Nathan, who scooped the British government on the news of Wellington's victory at Waterloo; Baron Lionel, who bought

PREFACE

FOR the last 150 years the history of the House of Rothschild has been to an amazing extent the backstage history of Western Europe. How the Rothschilds gained eminence and kept it to this day is a phenomenon that transcends business ability. It is rooted in the virtuoso use of the family as a power unit.

Being a novelist, I have an incurable interest in emotion. A money-changer becomes a great banker, not just because he is good at arithmetic, but because his impulses and reflexes are geared for success. The pages that follow, therefore, focus most closely on the "human" side of the Rothschild epic.

The importance of arithmetic remains. I am neither a trained economic historian nor a trained financial expert. I am aware, furthermore, that a team of scholars might have to spend years in the tremendous archives of the London and Paris banks to produce a detailed technical chronicle of the House. The aim of this book is different. It is to dramatize the personal, flesh-and-blood reality of the myth known to the world as "Rothschild."

Nonetheless, I have tried to provide the story with all necessary economic and historic underpinnings, and here as well as in other phases of the manuscript I have had the advantage of help from others.

I want to thank most members of the present-day Rothschild clan for the toleration and even encouragement of my curiosity in their offices and homes. Specifically, I am grateful to Baroness Hilda de Rothschild for a general introduction to the subject; to Baron Philippe and his wife Pauline for directing my attention to numerous social and esthetic Rothschildiana; and to Baroness Elie for her information on family art collections. Much appreciated was the cooperation of Baron Guy, head of the French house; his sister, Bethsabée, and his mother, Baroness Edouard; Lord Rothschild; Mr. Edmund, senior partner of the English bank, and his wife, Elisabeth; and the dean of the family, Baron Eugene, and his wife Jeanne. Various members of the family have also provided me with portraits of their ancestors.

I am indebted to a number of Rothschild business associates, such as Mr. Leo Spitzer and Mr. Leonard Keesing of New York; Mr. Leo Kelly and Mr. J. F. Goble of London; Major Peter Barber of the Exbury estate; M. Robert Jablon of Paris. In Vienna, Ritter Wilhelm von Gutmann, Frau Clementine von Ruzicic and Herr Richard Karlberger have given me some valuable facts; as has Mr. Cecil Roth of Oxford, and not only through his excellent account of the Victorian family phase in England, The Magnificent Rothschilds.

For their advice and comment, I am also grateful to Mr. Cecil Beaton, Mr. James J. Rorimer (Director of the Metropolitan Museum of Art), Mr. Vincent Sheean, Mr. Peter B. Kenan, of Columbia University's economics faculty, and Mr. Gilbert Millstein.

Dr. Wilhelm Schlag, cultural officer of the Austrian Consulate General in New York, has been invaluable in procuring art material.

While everyone mentioned above has contributed to the manuscript, no one except myself is responsible for its inadequacies or mistakes.

This is the place to record my obligation to Ted Patrick and Harry Sions of Holiday, who first presented me with the idea of the project. Sections of this manuscript in an altered form have been printed in their magazine.

And now I must admit the biggest debt of all. My wife, Marcia Colman Morton, has been an indispensable partner in this enterprise, from initial research to final revision. The writing of this book has constantly benefited from her editorial resourcefulness and her mysterious good humor.

ARE THEY STILL THERE?

1. A Procession at Pauillac

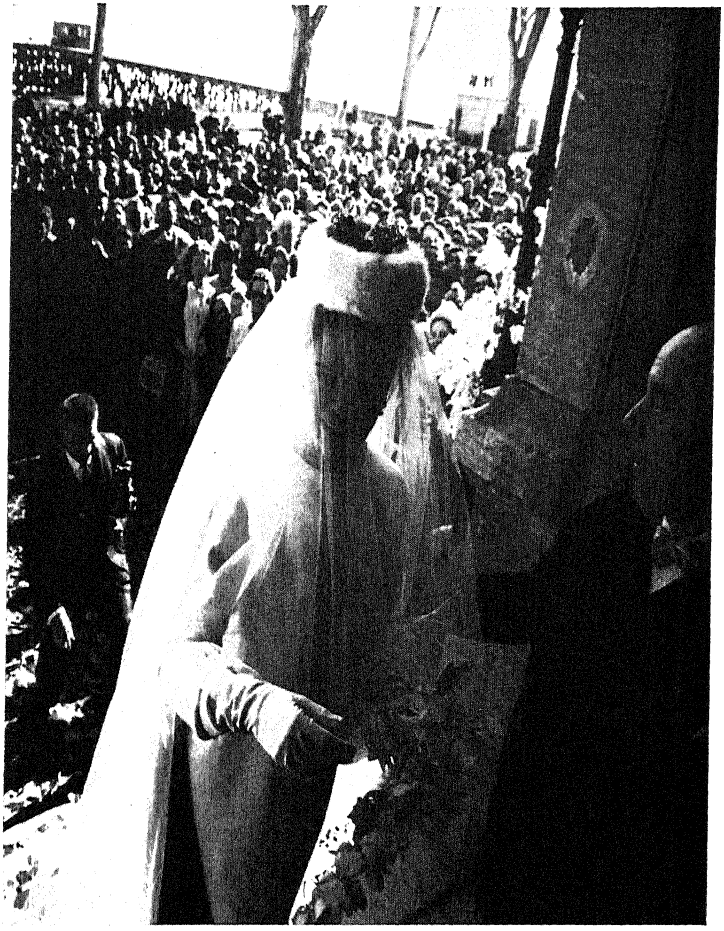
ON Saturday afternoon, March 4, 1961, an expectant crowd shifted its feet on the cobbles of a small village in southwestern France. Windows brimmed with faces, bristled with binoculars. Shortly after two P.M. a crimson-sashed band sent a fanfare across adjoining vineyards. A specially imported battalion of gendarmes took up positions along the curb. And slowly the fairytale came into view.

It was headed by a master of ceremonies with ivory staff, black garb and silk stockings and by two tiny pages in breeches. Behind them glided, at slow ceremonial pace, the presidential fleet of limousines usually reserved by the mayor of nearby Bordeaux for General de Gaulle. A splendor of orchids smothered the first car from figurehead to tail lights. It bore a princess on her wedding day.



She was gowned in white satin (signed by that august overseer of contemporary idylls, Monsieur Balenciaga), crowned with a diadem of white mink and diamond stars. Her hand held a spray of apple blossoms flown in that morning from Turkey. The bridegroom at her side was—with gratifying appositeness—a very handsome, very talented, very poor young man.

The guests riding behind them had been brought from Paris by a private contingent of Pullman cars added to the Sud Express. And since weddings must have picture-takers, this one had Cecil Beaton, on leave from his post at Buckingham Palace as her Majesty's official photographer. Here he attended to his duties in top hat, striped trousers and morning coat.

Still, any occasion can glitter for a hundred thousand dollars. It's not mere shininess that makes a fairytale, but the glow of familiarity; the magic comes not from telling, but from telling once again.

It was being told once again in the village of Pauillac on March 4, 1961. This was a Rothschild wedding. Baron Philippe of Château Mouton Rothschild was giving in marriage his daughter Philippine. Each tint making up the iridescence of the occasion had a tradition handed down by nanny, butler, dowager—by all the archivists with and without livery. Even as the procession still filed down the street, the service entrance of Château Mouton admitted a wedding cake nearly seven feet tall. In pure spun sugar it celebrated the five Rothschild arrows: the family escutcheon conceived a hundred and forty years before, amid Frankfurt pogroms, in the face of cross fire from Austria's College of Heraldry. And when the wedding limousines stopped before the great gates of the château, a troop of estate workers helped the gendarmes form a cordon; they all wore armbands of yellow and blue—the famous colors that had marked Rothschild couriers as they raced through disaster and triumph from Napoleon to World War I.

No modern name breathes a more storied eminence. No nonroyal family has held so much power so consistently, so peculiarly. Today many members of the clan cannot disguise a lordliness which has become exotic, if not downright exasperating, in our age. It would be insufficient to sum up the family as "still very wealthy." The Rothschild fortunes in England and in France are as ineffable as ever.

To the world at large, "Rothschild" means proverbial and rather dead money. But to the very rich, to those who actually know the clan or would like to, "Rothschild" conjures something very alive, something enviably, ridiculously, unattainably exaggerated; something like a gilt coach drawn by twelve white steeds.

In the private railroad cars that whisked the clan to the wedding, the Byzantine implications of the name were confirmed by a Byzantine amenity. Alexandre, the Dior of the world's coiffeurs, admits to his Paris establishment only Tout-Paris (as highest society in France is called) or certified Olympians such as Jacqueline Kennedy and Princess Margaret. Aboard the Pullmans scuttling to Bordeaux, Alexandre and selected stars of his staff waited, combs ready. Their presence was a prewedding favor from the host. Any Rothschild guest could have her tresses perfected by the master himself while white-gloved butlers offered her champagne and caviar. Alexandre well knows the splendor of the family. His own appointment book, a daily Almanach de Gotha, gives a clue. In that book, as in the imagination of the haut monde, a designation like "Comtesse Pierre" is meaningless if a surname isn't added. But "Baronne Elie" or "Baronne Philippe" can only mean "de Rothschild."

"They are the true successors to the Bourbons in France," an editor of the French Vogue sighed early this year. "There are no others where the first name is enough."

In fact, the celebrants at Pauillac and the people over at Buckingham Palace seem to be the only families left with great functioning kingdoms at their disposal. And for generations the people at Buckingham Palace have recognized the kinship: Queen Victoria often dined and slept in Rothschild houses; the Duke of Windsor fled to a Rothschild (an Austrian one) directly after his abdication. Where kings have vanished, presidents must suffice: the only time President Coty of France dined officially at a private residence was with Baron Philippe, the bride's father, at his Parisian duplex in 1952.

Like any child born at such an altitude, the bride inherited, in addition to everything else, history. It has been said that on the day of its birth the average Rothschild baby is 150 million dollars rich and 150 years old. The figures may be imprecise, but the idea is accurate. Over the past century and a half, a Rothschild personality has crystallized itself with such definition that no new bearer of the name can entirely escape it. The young Rothschilds today (there are over a dozen under the age of twenty-one) may discuss Sartre or dig cool jazz, but their lives are still part of an old genealogical design. This is due to inbreeding on a royal scale. It is also due to a formidable sense of the ancestral—a Jewish as well as an aristocratic characteristic.

Even the most shocking aspect of the event at Pauillac rested on family precedent. The village priest had solemnized Philippine's union with a Catholic (delivering a somewhat embarrassed sermon on the Old Testament and the virtues of the Jews). Actually he was only refreshing a venerable Rothschild scandal. From the very first this vehemently Jewish dynasty has permitted its daughters—not its sons—to marry Christians.

Also traditional was the confusion of the guest register at Château Mouton. Seventy-odd Rothschilds signed it. And many of them, through many generations, have the same given names. By this the house emphasizes its unity and continuity, re-creates its ancestors and infuriates its biographers. There is nothing so confounding as the Rothschild family tree. The English branch, for example, began with Nathan Mayer; proceeded to Lionel and Nathaniel; went on to Lionel Walter, Lionel Nathan, James Nathaniel and Nathaniel Charles. Today it contributes to family reunions the present Lord Rothschild, named Nathaniel Mayer Victor, and a son of his, Nathaniel Charles.

Not content with the repetition of first names, the Rothschilds have evolved a lineage of pseudonyms—a peculiarity relevant to the nuptials at Pauillac. Henri de Rothschild, the bride's grandfather, wrote some successful dramas under the nom de plume of André Pascal. His son Philippe produced plays and motion pictures as Philippe Pascal. And Philippe's daughter Philippine, the bride herself, receives billing as Philippine Pascal at the Comédie Française. The fact that in Jacques Sereys she married a director of the Comédie shows how every Rothschild interest finds dynastic expression.

What would be a trifling inclination elsewhere becomes here a stately family landmark. The clan's sweet tooth has not only given the Rothschild soufflé to the world's menus; not only goaded the master chefs in family employ to push the art of pastry beyond its previous frontiers; not only produced a clause in the 1905 will of Baron Alphonse leaving 25,000 gold francs to his "dear son-in-law Albert . . . so that he may buy himself some chocolates"; but also engendered the delectable dogma that on all intra-family visits chocolate soufflé be served.

2. Chutzpah and Orchids

The orchids decking the bridal car manifested another Rothschild habit: impatience with imperfection, however slight. For the Rothschilds, sticking to the best is an obvious imperative, the equivalent of a shoemaker sticking to his last. More than any other group in the world, they have chutzpah. This is a Yiddish word related phonetically and philosophically to the Greek hubris. The latter term conveys uncompromising and in the end self-destructive pride. Achilles died of hubris, but Rothschilds positively prosper on chutzpah.

The orchids lighting up Philippine's limousine came from a giant estate in Exbury near Southampton. Here stand thirty hothouses, built of teak and putting nearly four acres under glass. They belong to Edmund de Rothschild, the present senior partner of the family bank in London; and the petals he breeds owe their queenliness to the imperious connoisseurship first instituted by his father, Lionel. During World War II, for example, much of the hothouse personnel was drafted. Lionel realized he could not provide for all his young seedlings. "Many, many hundreds were destroyed," Lionel's orchid man recalls. "Mr. de Rothschild did not feel inclined to sell them, thinking it impossible for another man to give them as much care as their quality required. . . ."

Turn to the rhododendrons, also very much in evidence among the floral garlands at Pauillac. They, too, had been imported from Exbury. Once Lionel de Rothschild's army of two hundred gardeners nourished and manicured his vast flower pavilions there. Today Edmund, his heir, owns a landscape which contains more hundreds of thousands of superb rhododendron plants than any other spot on earth. This is due not only to care, but to a chutzpah unmerciful.

"Mr. Lionel," recalls the estate manager, Peter Barber, "developed over twelve hundred rhododendron hybrids. But he was ruthless with his burnings. He might watch a large batch of seedlings for ten years. He'd wait till they had all flowered in order to pick out the very best ones in the lot—and destroy all the rest. This was a strict rule. He wanted not one flower of merely good quality in his gardens."

In unpleasant contexts, too, the family remains addicted to the impeccable. During World War II Chaim Weizmann, the head of World Zionism, lived in London's Dorchester Hotel. The present Lord Rothschild had also moved there, since the drafting of male servants had made the maintenance of more elaborate households impossible. During a German raid Weizmann watched the young lord trying to calm his three tots in the bomb shelter—a vain occupation that lasted through the whole bomb-ridden night. At last Weizmann asked his Lordship why he hadn't sent his children to the United States, like so many other people of means?

"Why?" his Lordship said, squashing the pacifier in his fist. "Why! Because of their blasted last name. If I sent those three miserable little things over, the world would say that seven million Jews are cowards!"

Even in a frivolous milieu like Paris' Saint-Germain-des-Prés quarter, the family's consciousness of a special responsibility will not go to sleep. One evening last year three smart young couples sat on the sidewalk terrace of one of the more bohemian cafés. A hurdy-gurdy player came up with his cap. The three men in the group reached for some coins. "Merci," said the hurdy-gurdy player and was about to leave when in a twinkling the handsome girl called Philippine pressed a note on him. Nobody took much notice, except perhaps those knowing who she was: no longer just a girl on a date, but suddenly a Rothschild confronted by a beggar.

3. A Golden Silence

And yet a bourgeois practicality has always tempered such royal self-awareness, such imperial wealth. There is, for example, a curious garment of Baron Philippe's which may well have seen use that great day in Pauillac. A very early riser and therefore an early retirer, Philippe likes to be asleep as soon as the postprandial amenities are finished. And so his tailor must design a silken, soft-collared item which serves both as dress shirt under his dinner jacket—and as night shirt. A pleasant ingenuity, it lets him play the impeccable host in his pajamas.

The same spirit invests the dozen or so châteaux and mansions from which Philippine's relatives converged on Pauillac. These huge baroque bowers are studded with more Louis XIV, XV and XVI furniture than the three kings had together. For decades now, in interior decorators' argot the phrase "Rothschild style" has connoted Bourbon meubles sprinkled with Renaissance bibelots, an opulence of ormolu and boiseries—"the Rothschild grand French manner," Cecil Beaton terms it. But all this expresses delight in luxury, not distraction by it. In the midst of frank splendor sits a wholesome Jewish appreciation of the utilitarian. The great Paris town house of the Baroness Edouard, for example, has a master bathroom orchestrated in marble and silver. Only one element seems dissonant; on closer inspection it turns out to be a small telephone switchboard. With it the Baroness can secure any number or extension quickly, discreetly, privately, without her usual secretarial apparatus.

But the clan keeps more than random switchboards secluded. It is no accident that Philippine's principal wedding banquet took place in the wine cellars of Château Lafite Rothschild, another family chateau near Pauillac. For all its matchless splendor and concentration of wealth, the feast was held underground in a remote corner of France. Rothschilds love to glisten. But to the sorrow of the socially ambitious, Rothschilds glisten only in camera, for and among their own kind.

Their penchant for reticence seems to have grown in recent generations. The founder of the house enjoined it a long time ago; but some of his sons, while storming Europe's innermost bastions of power, wrapped their hands around every weapon, including the rawest publicity. Today the family grooms the inaudibility and invisibility of its presence. As a result, some believe that little is left apart from a great legend. And the Rothschilds are quite content to let legend be their public relations.

The two big banks in London and Paris (probably the world's largest private financial institutions) and Baron Edmond's huge business headquarters in the French capital have not so much as a name plate outside. Though they control scores of industrial, commercial, mining and tourist corporations, not one bears the name Rothschild. Being privately held partnerships, the family houses never need to, and never do, publish a single public balance sheet or any other report of their financial condition.

On the social side "Rothschild" means Society with an S superbly, softly, capital. In Europe, where snobbery is measured on a more languid scale than on our side of the Atlantic, a mere four generations of wealth do not inevitably entitle a family to a place at the very heart of fashion. Yet just here the Rothschilds are, barely glimpsed and rarely heard, behind the walls of the St. James Club in London, inside the hedges of the Comtesse de Paris; not so much partaking of the exclusiveness of such sanctums as confirming it by their presence.

The family's giant charities are also carried on quietly. Not too well known is the fact that Guy, the head of the French house, is president of the Fonds Social Juif Unifié (the name of United Jewish Appeal in France); or that a special department of the London bank draws up a monthly list of charities (Jewish and non-Jewish) to be dispensed by the senior partner; or that a very powerful—and very shy—B. de Rothschild Foundation, supervised by Bethsabée, Guy's sister, operates in New York, Paris and Tel Aviv. It sponsors (and houses) the Martha Graham Dance Company, supports French ballet and Israeli artisans, contributes extensively to the education of American Indian tribes, backs research into the arts of classical India—all under an umbrella of silence.

The clan, finally, abstains from press agentry in its maze of cultural and sporting endeavors. True, racing fans may know that the blue-and-yellow silks of Baron Guy, riding winners at Ascot, Longchamps and Deauville, are the same color as the banners over Rothschild castles on both sides of the Channel. Zoologists might be aware of an ornithoptera Rothschildi (a gorgeous "birdwing" butterfly in New Guinea) and a Rhea Rothschildi (a South American ostrich), both creatures found on Rothschild-financed expeditions. Wine drinkers may worship Mouton Rothschild and Lafite Rothschild as two of the world's supreme clarets. Botanists and garden lovers have benefited from the family fondness for thoroughbred flowers—the Rothschild supreme azalea, the many Rothschild-named rhododendrons and the fantastic orchids developed at Exbury.

These golden footprints of the family are recognized, at least by specialists. But at the Louvre, at the British Museum, at a dozen other institutions, there are this very moment hundreds of researchers and art students bent over a cornucopia of treasures without knowing that once all this glittered in Rothschild libraries and drawing rooms. The Rothschild donations in toto make the Medicis' look meager.

In Vienna the House of Rothschild vanished under the heels of the Wehrmacht in 1938. Yet it survives, and not merely in the giant collections left to the Kunsthistorisches and the Kunstgewerbe museums. Its memory is literally fragrant: every spring the city floods its parks and squares with flowers which come from the former Rothschild hothouses in the Hohe Warte suburb.

Every day peasants from all over Austria pilgrimage to the Stefanskirche, the national cathedral. All Austrian provinces provided native materials for its reconstruction after World War II damage. The family, a province unto itself, contributed the stones from their principal palais. The residence in the Prinz Eugenstrasse was too monumental to find a new owner in 1956. It was demolished just when the Stefanskirche needed a transfusion of precious marble. And so the stones from the Jewish dwelling were brought directly to the Catholic cathedral.

There is only one crucial Rothschild city which bears few palpable imprints of the clan. Frankfurt does have a Rothschild Park; its municipal archives contain some yellowed clues to the family's beginnings. But the bombed ruins of the original Rothschild house were cleared away four years ago to make way for a new office building. Not many Rothschildiana survive by the Main River.

Yet here, in a cramped ghetto dwelling, the great Pauillac wedding had its roots. Here, with a yellow star pinned to his caftan, Mayer Amschel Rothschild kept a small store two centuries ago, and married Gutele Schnapper, and raised with her those five incredible sons who conquered the world more thoroughly, more cunningly and much more lastingly than all the Caesars before or all the Hitlers after them.

Here their story—and their name—entered history.

II

JEW STREET

1. Little Orphan Mayer

IT IS almost impossible to meet a present-day Rothschild without first meeting his forefathers. The hall of his house and the anteroom of his office invariably teem with paintings, busts, reliefs, sometimes even small monuments, of ancestors. All these Valhallas are curiously incomplete: of the dynasty's founder no likeness is known, although Mayer Rothschild could have afforded, toward the end of his life, the finest brush strokes money can buy.

Still, the very absence of a solemn portrait fleshes out the impression contemporaries have handed down. It is a picture quite different from those of the squat, relentless, monstrously practical geniuses he fathered. The patriarch was a tall, gentle person with a scholar's hunch to his narrow shoulders. In his smile there hovered a not very businesslike twinkle.

A strange dream must have stirred inside the man; something prompted him to consistently peculiar choices. The most peculiar of all resulted, one spring day of 1764, in his return to his native Frankfurt on the Main.

Mayer's ancestors had long been small merchants in the town ghetto. But his best prospects lay elsewhere. As the brightest in a brood of children, he had been sent to a Yeshiva near Nürnberg to become the family pride—a rabbi. He studied well, but briefly. Both his parents died, and with them the source of tuition. Luckily some relatives secured for young Mayer an apprenticeship in the Jewish banking house of Oppenheimer at Hannover.

Another lad in his position would have clung to just that city. Germany was still a patchwork of principalities, each with laws unto itself. In contrast to Frankfurt, Hannover tolerated Jews—tolerably. Mayer did well. His path was clear: to stay at Oppenheimer's; to advance; to become chief clerk; and, with God's help, possibly even to die a partner. Instead, Mayer went home. He did the wrong thing and became immortal.

Yet when he re-entered Frankfurt that spring day, not a shred of grandeur greeted him, only petty humiliation. Crossing the river Main, he had to pay Jew toll. From afar he could see, and smell, the quarter where he had been born twenty years earlier. The ghetto brimmed along a single dark alley, just twelve feet broad. It stretched, as Goethe later said, "between the city wall and a trench."

On his way Mayer could not escape the street urchins whose favorite amusement was to shout, "Jew, do your duty!"—whereupon the Jew had to step aside, take off his hat, and bow. Having thus entertained the local children, Mayer reached the heavy chains with which soldiers manacled the Judengasse (Jew Street) every night.

Inside, the ghetto was not very encouraging either. Shops spilled heaps of secondhand clothes and soiled household goods into the alley; this welter reflected an ordinance that barred Frankfurt Jews from farming, from handicrafts, even from dealing in nobler goods such as weapons, silk or fresh fruit.

And the young Jewish girls Mayer encountered—they, too, were subject to the stern hand of the gentile. Another city edict limited the Jews to five hundred families and to no more than twelve marriages a year.

Even when Mayer reached his own block and an old friend hailed him with "Heh, Rothschild!" that very word could only be a reminder that he really had no family name at all. It was a privilege his race did not possess. To invent some sort of identification, Jews often used the house signs which predated numbered addresses. Mayer's ancestors had once lived in a house with a red shield (Rothschild) at the more prosperous end of Jew Street. The name still stuck, though the family had declined to a danker, humbler place behind the Sign of the Saucepan.

It was at the Saucepan that Mayer finally turned in. He walked through a gloomy and littered court to the back-yard quarters where his brothers Moses and Kalmann ran a secondhand shop. It was here that he reached the end of his journey and the beginning of an epic.

2. A Dreamer in the Ghetto

In the damp quarters of the Saucepan, Mayer Amschel proceeded to toil patiently for years. And at this point we must ask: Did he really foresee the advantage of sacrificing a bright and orderly progress in a Hannover counting house for the sake of a dark hole in Frankfurt's Jew Street? Had he understood the opportunity sleeping in his native city? Did he know that the local lord, young Prince William of Hesse-Hanau, was a plutocrat among princes; that at William's court a financial empire was being built which would need financial viceroys? Did the dream really descend through the narrow roof and touch Mayer's thought at night?

But in daylight—what a distance between Mayer and a prince! In the daylight he was one of three brothers in caftans, rooting about among old chests, hip-deep in high-grade junk and low-grade antiques. He couldn't have afforded one horse of the many splashing mud against ghetto walls as they sped to William's castle at Hanau.

As time went on, it appeared that Mayer would not even be able to afford a saddle. He had begun to develop, with more enthusiasm than profit, a new department in the secondhand store: he traded in old coins. The years in the Yeshiva still lived in him. He was a rabbi manqué and carried on his bent back old racial longings for poetry and lore. The dinars and thalers he now bought up; the obscure mintages from Russia, from the Palatine and from Bavaria; these he could analyze, annotate, interpret, explain, describe, relate—but not sell.

Or so it seemed at first. In Jew Street there was too great a need for current money to bother with the retired kind. Nor were Christian burghers more receptive to such trinkets. It was necessary to go farther, into the manors and castles around Frankfurt. Mayer ventured forth. After all, he had the shadow of a connection; back in Hannover he had run errands for a General von Estorff, now attached to the court of Prince William at Hanau.

And the General deigned to remember. Mayer found that the General's courtier friends showed a nice interest in his quaint coins and heirlooms. They listened to his surprisingly learned numismatic chatter. They were amused by the ghetto music with which he celebrated his wares.

They fingered the catalogue written with such loving flourishes. And then they bought!

They bought again from time to time. Mayer, emboldened, sent his curlicue-embellished catalogues to princes and princelings all around. One day he was ushered into the presence of William himself. His Highness, legend claims, had just won at chess and therefore regarded the world kindly. Mayer sold him a handful of his rarest medals and coins. It was the first transaction of a Rothschild with a chief of state.

He returned to Jew Street, triumphant but not rich. He had thoughts of marriage, but the upkeep of his family could not depend on random euphoria in high places. So Mayer instituted in the House at the Saucepan a Wechselstube—that is, a rudimentary bank where the multifarious currency of the Germanies could be exchanged. The fairs held in Frankfurt brought all sorts of ducats, florins, carolins and what-nots into town. From this diversity Mayer now steadily profited.

He became good son-in-law material. One began to see him quite often over at the home of Gutele Schnapper, a small but energetic seventeen-year-old, whose father kept shop at the good end of Jew Street. The dowry here promised to be fair. Gutele was sweet, her beef stew excellent. Could a nice young Jew ask more?

Mayer did. Those old coins and the high gentlemen who bought them. . . . Again the dream stirred sotto voce and further bent his shoulders. Again he rejected the sound bourgeois way to merely sound success. He did not use the exchange profits to enlarge the Wechselstube, his primary source of income. The money was invested in the numismatic trade.

Mayer bought out some needy coin collectors. With his newly bolstered line he attracted the Duke Karl August (Goethe's patron at Weimar) and other spectacular customers paying drab prices. He sold consistently, if sparsely, to his lord, William. And he enjoyed himself.

His brothers—who pursued the solid, stodgy used-goods department of their common business—could never quite fathom that persistent smile in Mayer's beard. They watched him, puzzled. How he hovered over his catalogues! How carefully he had them printed now, in complicated Gothic letters! How he kept revising their elaborate title pages, how he worked on their phrasing which, even for those days, seemed a bit odd and archaic. He was, the brothers thought, like a Talmudist writing a book.

And indeed, Mayer really began to write. They were letters of practical import, petitions to various local princes. Yet their convoluted charm and their painstaking love of formalities, sometimes lapsing into ghetto idiom—all that seemed typical Mayer.

"It has been my particular high and good fortune," he would begin, "to serve your lofty princely Serenity at various times and to your most gracious satisfaction. I stand ready to exert all my energies and my entire fortune to serve your lofty princely Serenity whenever in future it shall please you to command me. An especially powerful incentive to this end would be given me if your lofty princely Serenity were to distinguish me with an appointment as one of your Highness' Court Factors. I am making bold to beg for this with the more confidence in the assurance that by so doing I am not giving any trouble; while for my part such a distinction would lift up my commercial standing and be of help to me in so many other ways that I feel certain thereby to make my way and fortune here in the city of Frankfurt."

And sure enough, one day, on September 21, 1769, passers-by in the poor end of Jew Street had something new to look at. A stooped young man with a black beard was nailing a sign onto the Saucepan house. It bore the arms of Hesse-Hanau, and underneath proclaimed in gilt characters: M. A. ROTHSCHILD, BY APPOINTMENT COURT FACTOR TO HIS SERENE HIGHNESS, PRINCE WILLIAM OF HANAU.

Now, a factorship was a commonplace honor. The appointment only confirmed publicly that the appointee had done business with the court. It carried no obligations on the part of the prince, gave no magic fillip to Mayer's career.

Yet it created a certain excitement in the neighborhood. The Saucepan landlord was impressed and agreed to sell a quarter-share of the house to the three brothers—something Mayer had long wanted. Gutele's father, hitherto reluctant, let her become the new dignitary's wife. The title also exempted its owner from a few of the disadvantages from which Jews suffered; a kind of passport, it made traveling a little easier.

Whenever Mayer passed the front of the Saucepan, he lingered for a moment and played his odd smile over the plaque. Gutele began to bear him children, and he even held his babies up to the sign, explaining the escutcheon and the lettering. His brothers smirked. His wife was busy cooking and washing. But the tots in his arms stared at the plaque with serious eyes. They seemed to recognize it as the first fragment of an enormous fulfillment.

3. Mayer's Serenity

The young prince who conferred the distinction—a supporting player in the Rothschild drama—was an interesting man. Despite the relatively small size of his domain, William had blood as blue as any monarch in Europe. A grandson of George II of England, a cousin of George III, he was also a nephew of the King of Denmark and brother-in-law of the King of Sweden. Obviously his relatives were doing well. What made them even more important to William—and what gave him a signal part in Mayer Rothschild's story—was the fact that just about the entire collection of majesties owed money to little Hanau.

When it came to money, this nabob, whose crest had been famous in Germany since the Middle Ages, was sharper than next year's parvenu. He was the first great royal burgher. Like his father, Landgrave Frederick of Hesse-Cassel, William trafficked in valor. But the son squeezed out of this commodity a good deal more than had papa. William conscripted his male subjects and processed them for the auction block. He refined and perfected his troops; he shined and sharpened them on the parade grounds; he made sure of the officers' pigtails and the enlisted men's muskets. And when a batch was ripe and enticingly packaged, he sold the lot to England, which used "the Hessians" to keep peace in the Colonies.

William's merchandising of the peacekeepers brought him enormous wealth. Every time a Hessian was killed, the prince received extra compensation to soothe him for the victim's trouble. The casualties mounted, and therefore his cash. This he loaned out, with shrewd lack of prejudice, to just the right people—candlestick makers with impeccable credit ratings or kings who paid interest in the form of favors. Between the influx of royal dispensations and bourgeois thalers, he became the richest ruler in Europe. Quite probably he amassed the greatest personal fortune between the Fuggers and—the Rothschilds.

In a life so austerely filled with business, William knew only one avocation: adultery. Even to that enterprise he applied himself with, one might say, touching conscientiousness. In addition to the three children by his official wife, the Princess Royal of Denmark, he sired at least twenty-three illegitimate offspring by other consorts. They were all very soigné bastards, with patents of nobility purchased by William from his august debtor, Emperor Francis of Austria.

An indirect consequence of one of Serenity's liaisons helped strengthen the so-far tenuous bond between him and Mayer Rothschild. The eight children of Frau von Ritter-Lindental, one of his fertile mistresses, had a tutor named Buderus; and Buderus' son Carl attached himself to the court as a treasury official. Young Carl, whom we will encounter again, soon endeared himself to the prince's thriftiness. According to a chronicler, he conceived a plan "for increasing the milk profits from one of the prince's dairies by the simple expedient of forbidding the practice . . . of omitting fractions of a heller [penny] in the accounts. Young Buderus showed that this would increase the revenue by 120 thalers. This discovery appealed so strongly to the prince . . . that he entrusted Buderus with the accounts of his private purse in addition to his normal duties."

It was Buderus who helped invent the Hanau salt tax, out of which Serenity's multitudinous progeny was supported. And it was Buderus who began to be quite interested in Mayer Amschel, appearing at Hanau every so often with quaint wares. Buderus liked the Jew. He liked, as well, the rare coins he got as holiday presents. There were many holidays in the year. Through Buderus, Mayer's Wechselstube was given a few of Serenity's London drafts for discount—that is, for cashing. Rothschild had at last broken into state banking.

But in a tiny and insignificant way. Prince William was not at all aware of Jew Mayer. He just liked to scatter his foreign bills of exchange among as many discounters as possible; a concentrated dumping might depress the exchange rate. Buderus could help Mayer to a few further footling transactions; then the flow seemed to stop altogether. An event occurred which made even greater the gulf between low little Mayer and the high prince.

William's father died. In 1785 his Serenity succeeded to the immense possessions, to the palace, and to the title of Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel. William's retinue—complete with wife, mistress, scions, bastards, courtiers, and all—left Hanau and thus the vicinity of Frankfurt. The whole splendid court settled into the great palace of Wilhelmshöhe at Cassel.

That same year Mayer and his wife Gutele pushed their pots and barrels to a somewhat larger ghetto house, this one with a green shield: an obscure, cluttered, piddling migration within Jew Street, worlds below the princely progress from Hanau to Wilhelmshöhe. Yet it was Mayer's, not William's, journey that ended in a landmark meaningful to our day.

4. A Dynasty Aborning

In his old age Mayer looked back on his life and confessed that the 1780's were his favorite years. He was in his own forties then, and the decade had a kind of homey, cheerful cast. On the one hand, the fury which was to raise the Rothschilds to The Rothschilds still bided its time. On the other hand, they had shaken off the ghetto's more soiled and naked exigencies.

The ugly back yard at the Saucepan lay behind them.

The Green Shield was a much finer house. It fronted the street, rose three stories high and expressed Mayer's standing as an established merchant. True, here as everywhere in the ghetto space was scarce. The Green Shield, though tall, was narrow, its rooms small and dark. Two bedrooms must serve the parents and their constantly growing brood (twenty children were born, ten survived). Cupboards had to be wedged under the steep, creaking staircases, and a few were built into the wall.

It was not a quiet existence, either. Outside, Jew Street surged and screamed. Inside, staircases and flooring, both venerable, groaned. Every time the front door opened, an ancient bell clanged. It had, during its lifetime, warned not only of customers but also of pogroms and police.

The bell sent Mayer scuttling a hundred times a day. He was busier than ever. To maintain the house, to support the family, he had added a dry-goods counter to his regular business—the coins, the Wechselstube, and the secondhand trade. No one shared the burden, for brother Kalmann had died in 1782, while brother Moses had withdrawn. Mayer sweated through all these struggling departments and smiled his odd smile.

Indeed, he found increasing cause for contentment here. The store, with its more spacious quarters, invited more attractive customers. Schönche, the eldest child, who sat behind the cashier's desk, was given a new dress. Mayer soon rid his place of the disorder of the used-goods trade. Eventually he dealt not only in cotton but also in wine and tobacco, and the dignity as well as the aroma of these wares pervaded the whole building.

Also on the ground floor was the kitchen, a mere twelve by five feet large and with a hearth just big enough for a single pot. Next to it stood—extraordinary luxury!—a pump. The Rothschilds were among the blessed few in Jew Street who needn't leave their four walls to get drinking water.

The kitchen, of course, constituted Gutele's province as mistress of the house. So did the carefully kept living room upstairs. (Many years later it was to be called "The Green Room" because of the color of its faded upholstery and because Gutele stubbornly persisted in living and sitting in state there while her sons reigned over Europe from their palaces.)

On Saturday evenings, when prayer was done at the synagogue, Mayer liked to inveigle the rabbi into his house. They would bend toward one another on the green upholstery, sipping slowly at a glass of wine, and argue about first and last things deep into the night. Even on work days, when Mayer had finished with his coins and cottons and drafts, he was apt to take down the big book of the Talmud and recite from it in happy Hebrew singsong while the entire family must sit stock-still and listen.

But Mayer was not just bookish. The Green Shield had a kind of terrace looking out on the back yard. Since Jews were not allowed to set foot in public gardens, this served as the family recreation ground. Here Mayer played with the children while Gutele, like the good Jewish wife she was, sat quietly in the background, knitting, sewing, crocheting, mending. On the terrace Mayer showed his daughters how to tend some grass and flowers and talked in fanciful tropes about the various plants—almost as though they were old coins. Here, too, he celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles (which must not be held under a roof) beneath pine twigs through which the ghetto stars were shining.

The building had another feature to which he resorted just as often but much more circumspectly. On the other side of the small yard lay the counting house—the first, primitive Rothschild bank, covering all of nine square feet.

It contained a large iron chest with a mechanism so contrived that it could not be opened on the side with the padlock but only by lifting the lid from the back. Yet the chest served largely as decoy. The walls were riddled with secret shelves, and a trap door led down into a hidden cellar which was quite separate from the "official" house cellar. Equally separate was the purpose of this second cavern. In it were stored documents, contracts, deeds and, after a while, strange papers relating to his Highness, Landgrave William of Hesse-Cassel—seemingly so distant.

Invisible bonds began to connect an underground hole behind the Green Shield with the great towers of Wilhelmshöhe. Few knew of the tie while it was being forged. And no one suspected that the tycoon prince would be eclipsed by the ghetto peddler; or that the Jew Street family would, within Serenity's own lifetime, surpass by far his own fabulous wealth; would drown the fame of his ancient name with their own; would, in fact, reduce him to a thoroughbred steppingstone.

III

FIVE FLYING CARPETS

1. The Boys Erupt

NO TRUMPETS announced the Rothschild accession to world power. At the end of the 1780's Mayer Rothschild meant little or nothing to Prince William in his high castle at Wilhelmshöhe. Mayer's name remained entirely inconspicuous in the Frankfurt ghetto itself.

The premise of the family's conquest lay in the very unobtrusiveness of their crouch and the silence of their leap. Their aim was so high; compared with it, their position so low; their first foothold so precarious, their resources so feeble; any alerted rival could have destroyed them with a single stroke.

Yet the three puissant devices by which Mayer's house was to overwhelm a continent were already doing their work in miniature.

1. The Rothschild clientele consisted, to a calculated degree, not of other bourgeoisie but of some of the noblest personages in Germany—and never mind if their high positions exacted low profits.

2. Rothschild courted the Landgrave with low prices (thus faithfully imitating William's own tactics with the imperial palace in Vienna). This earned Mayer the increasingly crucial cooperation of Buderus who, as the prince's financial lieutenant, exerted influence over the greatest money hoard in Europe.

3. Mayer had sons.

Here was, and is, the simplest, most important power instrument of all: to have sons. In essence the dream poem in Mayer's soul was dynastic. All the connectionmaking, the storytelling and charming, the bit-by-bit selling he did at local courts was dynastic investment. Had he not been a father, it would have been vain gesticulation; he would have died unknown, a species of feckless Semitic troubadour. But since he had sons, he became a mover of mountains. All his travail turned out to be the perfect seed for his children to grow and pluck; and all their tireless harvesting toil would be but new sowing for their children and their children's children.

Perhaps the early Romans were the most successful nation we have known; perhaps Napoleon the most formidable individual. It is quite possible that the people still bustling obscurely at the Green Shield were the family par excellence in modern history. As long as Mayer lived alone with his wife, he was just another Jew—or, if you will, a Caesar without centurions. But soon those boys marched out of Gutele's womb like so many dauntless legions.

First came Amschel, future treasurer of the German Confederation. Then Salomon, who in the end achieved exactly the exalted station in imperial Vienna that remained Landgrave William's perpetual daydream. Then Nathan, who rose to more power than any other man in England. Then Kalmann, who wound the Italian peninsula around his hand. Then Jacob, who was to lord it in France during Republic and Empire.

In the beginning, of course, those five, together with their five sisters, were just an eager litter of ghetto apprentices, taking the load off Mayer's stooped shoulders. They ran errands, manned counters, added figures.

But swiftly their characters became plain. They were quite different from old Rothschild. When Mayer talked Jewish history (would one of them perhaps go to the Yeshiva?) or spun yarns about his coins, their eyes, while obedient, turned blank. They became alive at the market place. They vibrated at the Wechselstube. They were fiendish calculators. They came running into the house with something—often cotton cloth—they had snatched up for a song and which they sold dearly, with an astounding pressure and speed, a few hours later.

Success itched in their bones. Yet their gentler father was needed to release it. A precedent established itself to pattern the future: in the House of Rothschild, brilliance may be individual but accomplishment is joint. Brothers and cousins complement each other, and so do generations.

The harsh, tremendous new energies in the House of the Green Shield might have foundered if not for Mayer Amschel. He softened them. He supplied graciousness, the one thing the brothers would always lack. He put forward a pleasant face at a time when the skill of pleasing was still more useful than the ability to negotiate. In other self-made success stories the more polished sons build from the spadework done by the father. Here the father put the subtle touches on the sledgehammer schemes of his boys.

The first scheme consisted of a complex and ingenious putting together of two and two. On the one hand, there was the Rothschild cotton-cloth line, paid for with money going to England—that is, to textile jobbers in Manchester.

On the other hand, his soldier-vending Serenity, the Landgrave, got money from England in the form of drafts. On the third hand (Rothschild reasoning is usually octopus-armed), those English cotton jobbers could be paid directly with the Landgrave's London drafts—and the discount fees pocketed both ways—if only William would give Mayer such discount business again and in more generous quantities. On the fourth hand, why couldn't Mayer show up at William's new court in Cassel right now, with some good stories and a do-me-a-favor-priced collection of fine old coins?

"Right now" meant 1787, two years before the French Revolution. Mayer packed his velvet case of numismatic treasures. Shortly afterwards the Landgrave acquired very cheaply a score of rare items, together with a petition from M. A. Rothschild recalling Mayer's Court Factorship and some of the minor discounting he had done in years past.

The court took its time. At last, in 1789, drafts worth 800 pounds sterling arrived at the Wechselstube. It was a first trickle that became steady and strong and hugely profitable.

But this new income did not nearly satisfy the dynamic new impatience at the Green Shield. What was draft-discounting—which was really just check-cashing—compared to the handling of bonds in which the Landgrave invested much of his gigantic income? And who did the handling? Wasn't it those big Frankfurt bankers, Bethmann Brothers and Rueppell & Harnier? Weren't there spats between court and counting house?

Suddenly the Rothschild boys stood, hat in hand, before the big bankers. "Please," they said in their funny Jew Street German, "let us be go-betweens between you, the dignified financiers, and him, the difficult William."

The bankers looked amused at these eager, uncouth apparitions. Yes, in them there wasn't an iota of dignity to be hurt, and maybe they had just the raw vitality to satisfy Serenity's "mach' schnell" needlings. Established Frankfurt agreed. It paid those young ghetto louts a small commission for being its messengers and William's butts.

Established Frankfurt was served well. William liked the way the youths snapped to. And his treasurer, Buderus, became a secret partner in the Wechselstube now turned regular bank.

Soon Salomon was an almost daily fixture at Cassel, incorporating Rothschild into the financial apparatus of the court. Soon Amschel was arranging—and participating in —some of the Landgrave's mortgage business. Soon Nathan, who had quarreled with an English textile salesman over prices, found himself in Manchester; soon he sent directly discounted cotton right through the French Revolution to the Rothschild store, just as prices started rocketing. Almost by accident the family had taken its first step toward forming an international network.

Soon the Green Shield team fanned out in all directions. In every stagecoach a young round-faced Rothschild sat, portfolio wedged under one arm, eyes avid but impenetrable. And Mayer himself followed, soothing where there had been too much sharpness, conciliating and smiling as consummately as his sons had argued and promoted.

Soon the Jewish community at Frankfurt took a surprised look at the phenomenon in their midst. For over twenty years Mayer Amschel's tax assessment had been the same, a moderate figure of 2,000 gulden. Abruptly in 1795 the amount was doubled. The next year his official worth reached 15,000 gulden, the highest possible fiscal category in the ghetto.

This change did not constitute a world-shaking event, like some others about to take place. Napoleon was inventing imperial France. Corsican thunder rolled down the shores of Europe. But in Frankfurt another brand-new power reached beyond national borders. It marched on tiptoe, and not with hobnailed boots. Mayer Rothschild executed in total secrecy his first important loan operation involving a foreign state.

2. Something Rotten in Denmark

Someone once said that the wealth of Rothschild consists of the bankruptcy of nations. There is more to it than that, of course. But certainly the family's initial international coup took place in 1804, when the entire treasury of Denmark consisted of a deficit.

Mayer, kept au courant by Buderus, knew the fact well. He knew furthermore that Landgrave William suffered from an almost unbearable surplus. Highness, therefore, was beyond doubt willing to help out Denmark—particularly since a kingdom makes pretty good collateral. Only, the Danish monarch was Highness' uncle. It's always bad business to show poor relations how rich you are: loans within the family can easily degenerate into gifts.

The thing to do was to make the loan incognito. Not through Bethmann Brothers, of course, or through Rueppell & Harnier, or any of the other big banks identified with his Highness. Why not use an obscure but efficient outfit; an outfit which would turn the trick for a smaller commission, yet with guaranteed anonymity; an outfit—well, let's see now . . . an outfit, say, like Rothschild's?

Mayer just dropped his intricately wrought hint to Buderus. Buderus redropped it into Highness' ear. Highness smiled. From Frankfurt to Copenhagen the stagecoaches began to swarm with Mayer's boys.

Bethmann Brothers and Rueppell & Harnier, the big Frankfurt bankers, did not notice anything at first. After a while, though, they could not help wondering. The Rothschild outfit seemed so awfully preoccupied each time they asked it to do some menial brokerage chores. Furthermore, quite some time had passed since the Landgrave had last asked them to arrange foreign loans.

Inquiries directed to his Highness' treasurer, the Honorable Herr Buderus, received polite impassive answers. Questions put to Copenhagen met with a most curious statement: all Danish loans, replied the finance minister, had been handled by people acting for some nameless but terribly nice millionaire.

"What people?" exclaimed Bethmann Brothers.

". . . schild something." These people moved so fast it was hard to catch their names.

". . . schild?" Rothschild? Rothschild! Bethmann Brothers were in an uproar of investigation. And the cat was out of the bag. Those ghetto hawkers! Daring to undercut the most powerful and long-established bankers in Germany!

Furious appeals went out from Bethmann and Rueppell & Harnier to the Danish government, to the Landgrave, even to Buderus—flaming statements about Mosaic presumption and Christian loyalty. Patrician Frankfurt was up in arms. Broadside after broadside crashed against the Jew Street schemers, who were still, after all, chained in at night.

The court at Cassel hemmed and hawed. In the end the shouting did no more than make the shouters hoarse. That family was simply too useful to his Highness. Buderus said so, and the prince knew it for the truth. Their energy, their funny accents, their ubiquity had become indispensable.

The last quality was decisive. They were everywhere. One father and five sons had become a preternatural force that devoured distance, precedents, limits and frontiers.

Old Mayer now gave this new force formal status. In 1800 he entered into a partnership with his two eldest sons. He established rules which became pillars of a dynastic constitution. All key posts in the firm were manned by members of the family—luckily a large one—not by hired hands. (To this day, only Rothschilds are partners or owners of the great Rothschild banks.) When Schönche, the eldest daughter, married, her husband was not employed in the business; but when Amschel wed a year later, his wife promptly received a position. (To this day the female line is as rigidly kept out of Rothschild affairs as the male line is included.) Mayer also began a system of secret bookkeeping in addition to the official one. (Today Rothschild business is "secret" to the extent that it consists, despite its immense size, of private partnerships which need publish no balance sheets or other information.)

Family and business were welded into one formidable machine. Daily the Rothschilds exerted smoother and greater power. They still lived in Jew Street, but their commercial quarters expanded to offices and a stockroom outside the ghetto. In the subterranean passages under the Green Shield counting house the gold mounted, together with packets of securities.

Above all, the Rothschilds' position with the Landgrave was supremely entrenched. Mayer had been appointed Oberhofagent (Superior Court Agent); the two eldest sons could now call themselves Hessian Pay Office agents. Daily their influence over the Hessian court, and over its income of a million thalers per year, was widening. They loaned money to the Landgrave's son, in loyal imitation of the Landgrave, who loaned to the royal dukes of England. They were on the point of becoming chief bankers to William, one of the world's richest monarchs.

And then, in the year 1806, when Mayer's dream almost became substance, Napoleon seemed to sweep it away. He was sweeping away everything else. Prince William, like the cautious billionaire he was, tried to straddle the fence between Bonaparte and the Austro-British alliance. But the French Emperor had small patience with vacillators. When the Grande Armée came down on Prussia in October, 1806, it came down on Hesse as well.

It appeared to be all over. Frankfurt suffered occupation. The lines of international commerce were shattered. Nathan, the Rothschilds' foreign bastion, looked marooned in England. And in the wee hours of the morning of November 1 Prince William himself panted into his carriage and had the horses goaded northward to Schleswig.

The next day French troops flooded into his castle, Wilhelmshöhe. "My object," read Napoleon's order, "is to remove the house of Hesse-Cassel from rulership and to strike it out of the list of powers."

Thus Europe's mightiest man decreed erasure of the rock on which the new Rothschild firm had been built. Yet, curiously, the bustle didn't diminish at the House of the Green Shield. The clouds which the great Emperor had blown so grandiosely across Europe were joined by smaller but no less portentous counterparts. Dust whirled behind the carriages in which those round-faced young Rothschilds still sat, avid and impenetrable, portfolios wedged between body and arm.

They saw neither peace nor war, neither slogans nor manifestoes nor orders of the day, neither death nor glory. They saw none of the things that blinded the world. They saw only steppingstones. Prince William had been one. Napoleon would be the next.

IV

ROTHSCHILD VERSUS NAPOLEON

1. Round One: Contraband

IN THE predawn blackness of November 1, 1806, there was a glow of muffled lanterns in the secret back-yard cellar of the Green Shield. Mayer Rothschild buried as quickly as he could a cartful of documents—minutes of Prince William's Privy Council. Those weren't the only things William wanted hidden from Napoleon's troops; that same hour some trusted footmen shoveled a hoard of jewels beneath the staircases of the prince's various castles.

Unlike the dossier entrusted to Mayer, the jewels were found. Thereupon Carl Buderus, now William's undercover representative in occupied Hesse, called for his carriage. He had tea with the French governor-general, La Grange. Subsequently, about a million francs dropped into La Grange's palm. This brilliant interpretation of the law of gravity had brilliant results. The greater part of William's bright treasure was permitted to move out of the staircases, beyond musket reach of the French, into the hands of the evicted prince.

Still, jewelry made up only the merest fraction of the prince's wealth. As Europe's most blue- and cold-blooded loan shark, William had huge debts maturing in his favor all over the continent. In addition, there were his British investments that paid him dividends of nearly 2,000 pounds * (18,000 dollars) a month. And now he sat in Denmark, exiled, cut off from the administration of such affairs. For the stewardship of much of William's vast and complicated riches Carl Buderus chose Mayer Rothschild.

Of course, corporatively speaking, Buderus himself had become a quasi-Rothschild. A secret contract signed in 1809 confirmed the old verbal agreement that gave the prince's treasurer a certain share in the Green Shield business. But was this vested interest enough cause to hand a ghetto merchant such enormous responsibility? Wasn't Buderus pressing his luck too far? Who were the Rothschilds, after all? Without great financial or noble antecedents; as Jews, without civic status; without protection now that Serenity had been cast beyond the frontier—they seemed no different from the mass that thrashed about helpless on the tidal wave of Napoleon.

Yet they were different, as Buderus knew. Theirs was a wonderfully lopsided knack. A heroic energy drove them. But since they lacked the heroic imagination to go with it, they were never driven too far. This gained them a thing rarer than triumph then: survival.

In those seething teens of the nineteenth century, millions of men were undone by the history which a few grandly made. The victims were pushed into disaster. The victimizers strutted into it in regal uniform. Rothschild & Sons juggled ledgers quietly, unrelentingly, through ruin and havoc. Their limitations were as miraculously appropriate as their talents. It was an unconquerable combination —the steady-eyed sobriety of the burgher, powered by a demonic drive.

* This translation into today's dollars—like all others in this book—is necessarily a rough calculation; the establishment of exact dollar equivalents is in most cases impossible.

Napoleon's finance ministry could not cope with the family. The ministry was declared by the Emperor the legal successor to William's exchequer. It thoroughly canvassed all princes and potentates who owed William money. It tried every device, from threats to rebates and easier terms, to direct all due sums into the Emperor's purse. It toiled in vain. Mayer's boys skimmed through Europe in their coaches and scooped up the debts as they flew by. During their years in Highness' employ they had acquired connections, knowledge, persuasiveness and momentum—all irresistible.

They were impossible to stop or to get hold of. But their father at Frankfurt was a more stationary target. Yet when the French police swooped down on the House of the Green Shield, all they found was a careworn old Jewish couple trying to run a store, with most of their grown sons gone—ach! scattered by the brutal war. Their books appeared to be in order. Pro-Serenity or un-Napoleonic activities? Hardly a trace of them.

The moment the boots died away, old Mayer descended into his back-yard cellar to resume work with his real books and his real correspondence.

Before long this correspondence was conveyed in the private Rothschild coach. The coach had a false bottom, and the letters a secret language consisting of a jumble of Hebrew, Yiddish and German and a code system of pseudonyms. English investments were called "stockfish." Old Rothschild turned into "Arnoldi," as if he were the hero of an Italian romance; whereas His Serene Highness, Prince William, was Judaized into "Herr Goldstein."

The care and feeding of Herr Goldstein became Mayer's province. Not an easy job, because Herr Goldstein kept throwing fits over a certain embarrassing circumstance: the Rothschild boys were collecting whole fortunes of Hessian moneys, but only a trickle reached Herr Goldstein, and no precise accounting whatsoever.

Old Mayer, a genius when it came to cajolery, explained, appeased, pacified. Buderus helped as well as he could. But sometimes old Rothschild had to do his tranquilizing in person and undertake the seven-days journey over rough roads to William's exile near the Danish border. He reported how closely the awful French were breathing down his neck and his boys'; how often he had been searched and questioned, harassed and fined; how it became daily more arduous and dangerous to play games with Napoleon. Was it any wonder, then, that the swift transmission of debt collections or accounts thereof had grown impossible these days? Downright suicidal for his boys and himself? Let it please his Highness to content his Serene Self in patience. Nothing was surer than the fact that his Highness would get his money.

Mayer was right: his Highness did get every last penny —eventually. Meanwhile . . .

Meanwhile it just so happened that Nathan in London found himself in possession of very considerable funds. He happened to buy not only cotton—his original line—but foodstuffs, colonial wares and every other kind of goods which Napoleon's blockade had declared contraband on the Continent.

Nathan's bales and boxes then happened to vanish, to reappear shortly on Hamburg docks. Here Amschel and Salomon happened to hover. And then fresh wares happened to materialize on starved store shelves everywhere: in Germany, in Scandinavia, in the Lowlands, in France itself. Cotton goods, yarn, tobacco, coffee, sugar, indigo—there it was at last, at famine prices gladly paid. Who cared if somebody made a famine fortune?

Napoleon's one-track-minded police cared. After a while the constabulary became downright obsessed with the quaint idea that there was a connection between such widely separated things as contraband, Prince William's debts, and old Mayer of Jew Street.

On October 30, 1810, two French infantry regiments combed Frankfurt's warehouses, especially the Green Shield establishment in the ghetto. There they found nothing, for a better reason than usual. The Rothschilds' hands were really clean. Toward the end of 1810 they had gotten just about all they could out of smuggling.

On September 27 of that year a printed letter had gone out to all business friends of the family. Mayer (said the announcement) was changing the name of his enterprise to "Mayer Amschel Rothschild und Söhne." The firm's shares were now held not only by himself, but also by Amschel, Salomon, Kalmann and even Jacob, at that time seventeen years old. Of Nathan the announcement did not say one word. Nor did the official new partnership contract allot him a single share. Yet, as usual, the officially omitted was really the most important. Nathan, who lived in England and therefore in enemy country, did more crucial work than ever in Mayer's business. It was he who had organized the smuggling. And it was he who conceived the family's next strike, beside which contraband would look like an outdated trifle. It had been just the beginning.

2. Round Two: A Million-Pound Idea

In 1804 Nathan Mayer had moved from Manchester, the textile center, to London, the hub of the world. Here the cotton merchant turned merchant-banker, a designation under which N. M. Rothschild & Sons are listed in the London telephone book even today.

All the early English merchant-bankers began as traders with wares and credits everywhere; eased naturally into trading-cum-financing; and wound up as the first great international financiers of modern times. Among these condottieri Nathan ranks first. Through him the Rothschilds stopped buying and selling goods, even profitable contraband. Through him they switched to the ultimate commodity. From 1810 on, and to this very hour, the family would buy and sell money only.

Nathan sized up the opening provided by Napoleon, that unruly but on the whole useful market factor. And Nathan's secret letter put it to the Green Shield in Frankfurt: Bonaparte had now swallowed up nearly all the countries in which Prince William had once put his idle millions out to pasture—right? Only England was left to loan to—right? England, that rock against Napoleon. And consols (English state bonds), the Gibraltar among European papers. His Highness had invested in them in times past—right? Wasn't it time his Highness invested in them again, thoroughly, and through the good offices of Nathan Rothschild, who was so chockful of connections, willingness and go?

Mayer and Buderus laid the suggestion at Prince William's feet. Highness, however, felt a reluctance. There had been all those debt-collecting troubles with the family. On the other hand, the collected moneys were coming in by and by, adding to an already vast hoard.

Those countless thalers itched. Father Mayer charmed and blandished under a fine new wig and three-cornered hat. The old man's accent remained unchanged, as did his synagogue-going. Yet he had bloomed from a hustling tradesman to a full-fledged courtier. He now not only sold old coins to the Landgrave, he also bought them from him for his own private collection. He put his coach (with those secret compartments) at the disposal of the Landgrave's mails. He helped arrange Serenity's sundry exiles in Schleswig, Denmark and Bohemia.

If his Highness trusted him that far, why not entrust to his son Nathan the purchase of consols? Particularly since the dear boy was willing to waive commission and only asked the teeny brokerage fee of one eighth of one per cent?

At last William agreed. Why not, indeed? Between February, 1809, and December, 1810, Nathan received 550,000 pounds sterling with which to buy consols for the prince. It was, and is, a breathtaking sum, the equivalent of some five million current dollars. It dwarfed all the Landgrave's loans and dividends which had so far passed through Rothschild hands.

The moment it touched Nathan every farthing became a shilling, every shilling a guinea. The dear boy struck with such bull's-eye intuition, so powerfully, so fast, and at the same time so discreetly that no lucid records have survived. We do know that the agreement with William called for a purchase of consols at an average price of 72. Nathan did not buy at 72. He invested the money for his own account, took a rapid profit, and then took a second profit when he bought the prince's consols. These had meanwhile dropped to 62, just as he had foreseen. The saving in price, of course, went into his own pocket.

At the same time he harnessed his infallibility to another chance. With stunning spunk, precision, speed, he specu-lated on the rise of gold bullion. Daily he leaped in and out of the market with tens of thousands of princely pounds, never missing a beat, never too early or too late.

After a while, of course, William began to fidget. So little news was forwarded to him from London, and not a single bond certificate. Mayer went to work, conjuring all the difficulties of communication Napoleon interposed between Dear Boy's London and Serenity's Prague. Serenity subsided. He even released further substantial funds.

Then, in 1811, young Kalmann Rothschild smuggled himself in and out of England to present the prince with his first consol certificates for 189,500 pounds sterling. William was relieved. But he had had enough of nervous exertions. "I am getting sick of my investments," he wrote to Buderus. "I really prefer to have my money lying idle."

In 1811 this decision no longer bothered the Rothschilds much. Another, a last, milestone had been turned.

Nathan, the milestone specialist, was the first to round it. Seven years before, he had come to London as a raw-tongued foreigner. Now, barely thirty-four, he enjoyed a preternatural reputation. All purchases he had made on behalf of the Landgrave had been registered in the name of Rothschild. Few suspected that the torrents of capital coursing through Nathan's office weren't necessarily his own. His actual wealth, though, had mushroomed as explosively as his credit. It waxed so huge that even William, the richest prince on the Continent, became too puny to be the chief account in Rothschild's book. He was just the beginning. Something still bigger had to be found.

3. Round Three: The Giant Gold Smuggle

"The East India Company," Nathan would reminisce at a dinner party near the end of his life, "the East India Company had 800,000 pounds' worth of gold to sell. I went to the sale and bought it all. [Nearly eight million dollars!] I knew the Duke of Wellington must have it. The government sent for me and said they must have the gold. I sold the gold to them, but they did not know how to get it to the Duke in Portugal. I undertook all that and sent it through France. It was the best business I have ever done."

This sums up rather gruffly an enormous, incredibly cunning operation. Basic to it is the fact that Napoleon played handmaiden to the family one more time.

In 1807 he had produced for them an ideal goods shortage; in 1810, just the perfect kind of poor investment situation. Now he obliged with an exquisitely placed front line. The Emperor's marshals were fighting Wellington behind the Pyrenees, far away from English supply lines. To feed his army, the Duke had to issue drafts on the English treasury. A whole mob of Sicilian and Maltese financiers cashed these at outrageous discounts and pushed them along laborious paths to London for redemption. Sporadically the Rothschilds had participated in the traffic. But until 1811 this had been a sideline.

Now 800,000 pounds' worth of gold waited for Nathan in a vault. What scores of bankers had done by way of IOU's and notes seeping toward London, he and his brothers wanted to accomplish alone by hard money seeping to Spain. By profitable commission from His Majesty's Government, Nathan became, in effect, chief broker and paymaster general to England's most important army.

There was only one way to route the cash: through the very France England's army was fighting. Of course, the Rothschild blockade-running machine already had superb cogs whirring all over Germany, Scandinavia and England, even in Spain and southern France. But a very foxy new wheel was needed in Napoleon's capital itself.

Enter Jacob—henceforth called James—the youngest of Mayer's sons. On March 24, 1811, he registered with the French police on his arrival in Paris, his domicile being 5, rue Napoleon. Undoubtedly he was helped by Grand Duke von Dalberg, a high Napoleonic dignitary who had just been given a most advantageous loan by old Mayer. Probably James knew Paris a little from some previous visits. But he was only nineteen. He had lived in the ghetto most of his life; he spoke only German and Yiddish. Yet he moved through the sleek, treacherous ground of French high finance with a blinding speed and a sure-footed virtuosity that matched any exploit of Nathan's.

Two days after his official arrival, Mayer's youngest was already the hero of a report by the French finance minister to Napoleon. "A Frankfurter named Rothschild," wrote the minister, "is now staying in Paris and is principally occupied in bringing British ready money from the English coast to Dunkirk. He is in touch with bankers of the highest standing in Paris. . . . He states that he has just received letters from London . . . according to which the English intend to check this export of gold. . . ."

In fine, the minister had been fed some very carefully edited gossip, which gave away the existence of a gold stream but kept him in strict innocence of its destination. He had swallowed James's "letters" and other custom-tailored evidence showing—the exact opposite of the truth—that Britain feared being weakened by the outflow of money.

James calculated well. What the British enemy seemed to fear, Monsieur le Ministre automatically desired. In the space of a few hundred hours Mayer's youngest had not only gotten the English gold rolling through France, but conjured a fiscal mirage that took in Napoleon himself. A teen-age Rothschild tricked the imperial government into sanctioning the very process that helped to ruin it. What had happened to Bethmann Brothers would now happen to an empire.

The family machine began to hum. Nathan sent big shipments of British guineas, Portuguese gold ounces, French napoleons d'or (often freshly minted in London) across the Channel. From the coast James saw them to Paris and secretly transmuted the metal into bills on certain Spanish bankers. South of the capital Kalmann materialized, took over the bills, blurred into a thousand shadowed canyons along the Pyrenees—and reappeared, Wellington's receipts in hand. Salomon was everywhere, trouble-shooting, making sure the transit points were diffuse and obscure enough not to disturb either the French delusion or the British guinea rate. Amschel stayed in Frankfurt and helped father Mayer to staff headquarters.

The French did catch a few whiffs of the truth. Sometimes the suspicious could be prosperously purged of their suspicion. The police chief of Calais, for example, suddenly was able to live in such distracting luxury that he found it difficult to patrol the shoreline thoroughly. On the other hand, the commissioner of the Paris police proposed more than once that young James be arrested. But the protection of the finance ministry proved stronger.

While Napoleon struggled his might away in the Russian winter, there passed through France itself a gold vein to the army staving in the Empire's back door.

Soon the Rothschilds became England's lifeline not only to Wellington but also to her allies. During the final years of the Napoleonic war, Britain appropriated immense subsidies for Austria, Prussia and Russia. Yet she had no convenient means with which to effect payment. The shipping of bullion involved a prohibitive risk. Issuing single huge drafts on the British treasury would ruin the sterling rate. John Herries, the Exchequer officer in charge of foreign financing, knew one sure answer: let Nathan do it.

Nathan and his brothers did it by operating simultaneously from their variously shifting bases. Between them, Mayer and boys established the first great international clearinghouse. They expedited most of the fifteen million pounds Britain advanced to her friends. With so light a touch were these stupendous transactions juggled, with such soundless grace, that the sterling rate never suffered a dent. The only perceptible commotion was the abacuses clicking in the counting houses. To this day the Rothschild commissions are unknown and incalculable.

But even all that was just the beginning.

4. Round Four: The Scoop of Scoops

The Battle of Waterloo established England as the foremost European power. To the Rothschilds, her chief financial agents, Waterloo brought a multimillion-dollar scoop. The fame of that scoop has endowed it, in later years, with carrier pigeons and other legendary appurtenances. But like most family feats, it was based on very hard work and very cold cunning.

The hard work had started a long time before. As soon as the boys had fanned out from Frankfurt, they had started sending each other industriously, endlessly, items of commercial or general interest. Soon a private news service developed. (At the London house it survived down to World War II in the form of a dozen blue-clad couriers ready to fly off at a moment's notice to Rio, Melbourne or Nairobi.)

Rothschild coaches careered down highways; Rothschild boats set sail across the Channel; Rothschild messengers were swift shadows along the streets. They carried cash, securities, letters and news. Above all, news—latest, exclusive news to be vigorously processed at stock market and commodity bourse.

And there was no news more precious than the outcome of Waterloo. For days the London 'Change had strained its ears. If Napoleon won, English consols were bound to drop. If he lost, the enemy empire would shatter and consols rise.

For thirty hours the fate of Europe hung veiled in cannon smoke. On June 19, 1815, late in the afternoon a Rothschild agent named Rothworth jumped into a boat at Ostend. In his hand he held a Dutch gazette still damp from the printer. By the dawn light of June 20 Nathan Rothschild stood at Folkstone harbor and let his eye fly over the lead paragraphs. A moment later he was on his way to London (beating Wellington's envoy by many hours) to tell the government that Napoleon had been crushed. Then he proceeded to the stock exchange.

Another man in his position would have sunk his worth into consols. But this was Nathan Rothschild. He leaned against "his" pillar. He did not invest. He sold. He dumped consols.

His name was already such that a single substantial move on his part sufficed to bear or bull an issue. Consols fell. Nathan leaned and leaned, and sold and sold. Consols dropped still more. "Rothschild knows," the whisper rippled through the 'Change. "Waterloo is lost."

Nathan kept on selling, his round face motionless and stern, his pudgy fingers depressing the market by tens of thousands of pounds with each sell signal. Consols dived, consols plummeted—until, a split second before it was too late, Nathan suddenly bought a giant parcel for a song. Moments afterwards the great news broke, to send consols soaring.

We cannot guess the number of hopes and savings wiped out by this engineered panic. We cannot estimate how many liveried servants, how many Watteaus and Rembrandts, how many thoroughbreds in his descendants' stables, the man by the pillar won that single day.

5. Round Five: Conquering the Victors

The climax of Waterloo was followed by peace—and a bleak surprise. During the war the Rothschilds had been irresistible. Now a snag developed, perhaps because someone indispensable had passed from the scene.

On September 16, 1812, on the Day of Atonement, old Mayer prayed and fasted the entire day in the Frankfurt synagogue. The next morning an old wound from an operation broke open. He had barely enough strength to dictate a new will, which placed his business exclusively in his sons' hands.

> . . . my daughters, sons-in-law and their heirs having no part whatsoever in the existing firm M. A. Rothschild und Söhne . . . nor the right to examine the said business, its books, papers, inventory etc. . . . I shall never forgive my children if they should against my paternal will take it upon themselves to disturb my sons in the peaceful possession of their business.

Any violator of family harmoniousness was to be limited to the legal-minimum share of a total estate probated at far below its real value.

Then, the last dynastic chore completed, initialed, notarized, at 8:15 P.M. on September 19, 1812, he died in Gutele's arms, the last truly Biblical patriarch of our time.

What he could not bequeath to his sons was his personality. They had no pliant dignity, no easy graciousness, no savoir-vivre with which to beguile a prince or flirt in a salon. Their fortune was the product of elemental vigor and precision-timed craft. These had served them well during the urgencies of war. But now older values resumed their accustomed place. One didn't smuggle at the Congress of Vienna. One danced. The Rothschild boys were not dancers; ergo, they would not do as bankers.

The economics of post-Napoleonic Europe centered largely on the efforts of various countries to tap financial resources from within; that is, to float national loans. Here the Rothschilds, with all their immense new capital, found themselves treading air.

Only little Prussia let them handle a loan. Austria, the big plum, preferred more genteel company. Its ancient court lived on precedent and punctilio. Already back in 1800 there had been a brush with those pushy Frankfurters. They had signed a letter "k.k. Hofagenten" (Imperial-Royal Court Agents) when actually entitled to merely one "k." (Imperial only). Now in 1816 the brothers were multimillionaires. Yet only after the strongest pressure from John Herries, their particular supporter in the English treasury, would Vienna accept an English subsidy managed by these grabbers of the extra "k."

The boys, trying hard for a good impression, acquitted themselves with special subsidiary brilliance. By devising ways of waiving commissions and interest charges, they saved the Austrian treasury several millions. As a result, in 1817 Vienna threw them the little "von," much as one throws a dog a bone.

But the Rothschilds were not the kind to be fobbed off with a distinction by no means singular even for Jews. Nathan asked for the honorary Austrian consulship in London. He was answered by evasions. The five brothers together worked out far-reaching and favorable propositions. There was no real reply at all.

In France the situation seemed even worse. Here Louis XVIII had literally borrowed the splendor of the Bourbon restoration from Nathan and James Rothschild. They had advanced him British drafts to finance his magnificent entry into Paris. But that had been in 1814, with cannonades still a palpable memory. Now, three years later, the old patrician bankers were back, calling the tune from their drawing rooms. Compared to their manners, any move from the Rothschilds sounded like a hopelessly rude noise.

The new French government prepared a great loan of 350 million francs and entrusted it to Ouvrard, a distinguished French financial name, and to Baring Brothers, fashionable English bankers. To these, Mayer's sons were "simple coin changers." The loan, sans Rothschild, became a huge success.

In 1818 negotiations began for an additional issue of some 270 million francs. Again Ouvrard and Baring were front runners; the Rothschilds, futile haunters of the finance ministry. This loan, though, was to liquidate the French war indemnity. Its ultimate disposition would take place at a conference with the victorious powers at Aix-la-Chapelle.

In terms of family history, the forgotten congress at Aix is a much more important landmark than the still notorious scoop of Waterloo. Aix marked the first social confrontation between the great world and the newly great Roth-schilds. It began as a round of banquets and soirees à la Congress of Vienna, with the Rothschilds fascinated and frozen out like children before a Christmas window. It climaxed with a furious thunderclap. And when the roar subsided, the children were in possession of the store.

Nobody foresaw this development during the first week, possibly not even Salomon and Kalmann, who attended as family representatives. To begin with, England had sent Lord Castlereagh instead of John Herries, their old friend. Salomon and Kalmann must have felt at sea in a world so charged with antique protocol, with such finely beveled compliments. Their natural habitat was the stock exchange, not the ballroom.

Still, the most expensive tailors had fitted them vests and cravats of the finest material. Their coaches glittered. Their horses shone. What if their grammar was a little primitive? Furthermore Kalmann had just married Adelheid Herz, of the most soigné Jewish family in Germany. The bride was to spearhead the family's bon ton.

Yet it was all no use. Whenever the brothers wanted to see Prince Metternich, he was just being feted by the Duke de Richelieu. Lord and Lady Castlereagh could not be found, since they kept driving about with Prince Hardenberg. The Rothschilds were left out of all these cordialities. Baring and Ouvrard, their rivals, seemed included everywhere.

Only secretaries were available, and the secretaries smiled coolly: Yes, negotiations with Baring and Ouvrard were proceeding toward a conclusion. Why change partners in midwaltz? Hadn't Baring and Ouvrard succeeded with the 1817 loan? Weren't the bonds of the 1817 loan rising on the Paris bourse that very moment?

The Rothschilds decided to try once more. They completed their purchase of Friedrich von Gentz, a brilliant publicist, friend to Metternich, and man-about-congress. They took a big option on David Parish, a stylish young banker sporting good connections with Baring. They bought every buyable social grace in sight. They checked and rechecked the impeccability of their trousers and frocks, of the servants' livery. Everything was in order.

Nothing worked. In the salons, one was amused by the puzzlement in Kalmann's face, by the Levantine frowns of Salomon. Unnoted in the general merriment went another circumstance: the couriers who entered and left the brothers' residence with growing frequency.

Through October, 1818, Aix bowed, gamboled, promenaded and ignored those Rothschild clods. On November 5 something strange happened. The French government bonds, the famous loan of 1817, began to fall after a year's steady rise. Day after day they dropped more steeply. And not only that—other securities wavered. Tempests came down out of a blue sky. A crash loomed, not just in Paris, but in bourses all over Europe.

The music stopped at Aix. The noble gentlemen stood about dazed in the suddenly suspended splendor. After all, one had made one's little investments.

It was the princes who frowned now while, curiously, Kalmann and Salomon smiled. A rumor shivered through the drawing rooms. Could those Rothschilds have . . .

Those Rothschilds had. With their boundless reserves they had bought the rival-issued bonds for weeks and weeks, bulling the paper while secretly cornering it. And then, in one relentless swoop, the boys had dumped the whole appalling load. Across the entire Continent the underpinnings of finance groaned. The great world knew now what it meant to cut a Rothschild.

Metternich, the Duke de Richelieu, Prince Hardenberg did what must be done. A stern interview ensued between them and Ouvrard and Baring, in whose (as yet unborn) new loan they had already reserved parcels on their own account. One talked; one parted; the loan-to-be dissolved into nothing.

Then Salomon and Kalmann were bowed into the presence, and lo! their clothes were now the very eye of fashion, their money the darling of the best borrowers.

And as the music began again, and two princesses obediently took the arms of two stout, round-faced men, everyone knew that it had happened at last. Europe had become richer by a great name. The boys had become The Rothschilds.

V

THE MISHPOCHE MAGNIFICENT

1. By No Other Name as Great

ON THE last day of May, 1838, a weird battle took place in Bossenden Wood near the village of Dunkirk in England. The Forty-fifth Regiment came down on a band of insurrectionary mystics and in a bayonet charge killed their leader, John Nicols Toms. Half visionary, half charlatan, Toms had whipped up the countryside with his messianic tirades. Until the army made an end of him, he was receiving veneration as King of Jerusalem, Prince of Arabia, King of the Gipsies—and Count Moses S. Rothschild.

His last claim seems the most remarkable. The name Rothschild had been prominent for barely two decades. The five brothers wearing it were the sons of a curio dealer in Frankfurt's Jew Street, their origin branded unmistakably on their manners and their speech. What moved the popular imagination to invest "Rothschild" with a lure as shimmering as "Prince of Arabia"?

Money is part of the answer. Of money the brothers now had unimaginable amounts; or rather, amounts rendered imaginable only by comparison. Lytton Strachey, considering Queen Victoria "exceedingly wealthy" even among great reigning monarchs, put the maximum value of her fortune at five million pounds. Poor Victoria. A shopping spree involving almost her Majesty's entire worth could be managed by one family branch effortlessly, at a moment's notice. This the Suez Canal purchase was to prove.

The total wealth encompassed by the clan during most of the nineteenth century has been estimated at well over 400 million pounds (6,000 million dollars). No one else, from the Fuggers to the Rockefellers, has come even close to that hair-raising figure.

But it takes more than a vast fortune to create the myth that celebrated Rothschild. It takes, above all, a compelling air on the part of the celebrity itself. After Aix the five brothers walked in the sober and unshakable belief that the divine right of kings had been overthrown by the divine right of money and that Amschel, Nathan, Salomon, Kalmann and James were money. The doubts and hesitations to which other nouveaux riches are heir did not trouble the five brothers much. A story goes that Nathan was once asked by his small son how many different nations there were in the world. "There are only two you need bother about," Nathan is reported to have answered. "There is the mishpoche [Yiddish for family] and there are the others."

No matter how apocryphal this conversation, it reflects a real attitude, which has survived to this day. It still puts subtle, superb capitals on two common words the Rothschilds use when speaking of their clan. They say: "The Family"—which is quite different from the family of other people. The birth of those capitals can be read plainly on the Family tree.

Starting at the topmost branch, we find that of old Mayer's five sons, the two oldest married solid, simple German-Jewish girls. The next wedding took place in 1806, when "Rothschild" already signified a comer to insiders. Nathan brought home Hannah Cohen, daughter of Barnett Cohen, the richest Jew in England. Next it was Kalmann's turn in 1818. By then it was natural that any Family member could option the very pick of brides. Kalmann chose Adelheid Herz, the Herzes being the cream of cultured Jewish society in Germany.

Finally James, the youngest, took a wife. The Austrian Emperor had already created him and his brothers barons, and they themselves the world's wealthiest family. At the previous celebration they had been very important. Now they knew themselves unique. July 11, 1824, expressed that uniqueness forcibly. James walked under the chupah (the Jewish wedding canopy) with Betty, his own niece, child of his brother Salomon.

It quickly became a dynastic dogma that, as in the case of the Habsburgs, the most brilliant possible match for one member of The Family was another. Of the twelve marriages consummated by the sons of the original five brothers, no less than nine were with their uncles' daughters. Of fifty-eight weddings contracted by the descendants of old Mayer, exactly half took place between first cousins.

What caused so many intramural infatuations? For one thing, there was the fact that only a Rothschild father could afford a dowry worthy of a Rothschild son-in-law. There was also a desire to consolidate, not dissipate, fortunes; and, perhaps most important, not to squander the name on strangers.

The name was the thing. The growth of the myth consisted largely of the nurture, breeding and thoroughbreeding of the name. In 1836 an incident made plain just what those two magic syllables signified to the men who bore them. At that time one other family meant still more to Jewry. The Montefiores, of ancient, most aristocratic Jewish stock, had long been the standard-bearers and great philanthropists of their faith in England. Sir Moses Montefiore had been knighted long before a grandson of Nathan was. Now a young Montefiore, himself extremely wealthy and closely allied to The Family by marriage, approached his aunt, Nathan's wife, about the possibility of a partnership in the Rothschild bank.

A long, shocked silence ensued at the Rothschild offices in New Court, St. Swithin's Lane. At last the answer came forth: ordinarily, New Court would never entertain the admission of an outsider (as a matter of fact, no Family house ever did again, to this day). However, they might be willing to create young Montefiore a junior partner, in view of his close relationship and the exceptional patrician luster of his name—provided, of course, he change that name to Rothschild.

2. The Crest

Montefiore (who decided to remain Montefiore) would have been less surprised at this pronouncement had he looked into the records of the Heralds' College of the Austrian Empire. This office, charged with the correct preparation of patents of nobility, was the first to feel the almost engagingly naïve hauteur with which the brothers imposed their favorite ten letters, Rothschild, upon the world.

Early in 1817 the College's collective patience was tried by a communication from The Family. The boys had just performed their standard miracles in the transfer of British subsidies to Vienna, had whisked more money sooner and cheaper than other bankers, and had promptly insinuated that they were ripe for an honor or two. Privy Councillor von Lederer, who sat at the Austrian distinction-conferring desk, felt that a gold snuffbox, bearing his Majesty's monogram in diamonds, would be in order.

The finance minister, Count Stadion, like finance ministers everywhere, was more sensitive to Rothschild expectations. He thought the privy councillor's proposal painfully inadequate. After all, the five wizards in question had the same relation to diamonds, however arranged, as Newcastle had to coal.

At last a compromise was achieved between his urgings and the privy councillor's frosty mention of "the special consideration that the brothers Rothschild are Israelites." Austria raised the brothers to the bottom level of minor nobility, with the right to carry the simple prefix "von." The Rothschilds were requested to devise a coat of arms consistent with their rank.

This is where the letter to the Heralds' College came in. Enthusiastically it set forth the boys' idea of their escutcheon:

> First quarter . . . an eagle sable surcharged in dexter by a field gules * (having reference to the Imperial and Royal Austrian Coat-of-Arms); second quarter . . . a leopard passant proper (a reference to the English Royal Coat-of-Arms); third quarter, a lion rampant (with reference to the Hessian Electoral Coat); fourth quarter, azure, an arm bearing five arrows (a symbol of the unity of the five brothers) . . .
>
> * Gules is the heraldic word for red.

The heraldry office choked. People who were barely "vons" thinking they could get away with a positively ducal inventory of honor symbols!

And still their impertinence continued:

This from persons who even with their "von" would, strictly speaking, not even be truly noble, but merely members of the gentry! The College drew a deep breath and composed a report to the court.

> They ask for a coronet, a center shield, supporters, the Leopard of England, and the Lion of Hesse. . . . Their suggestion is entirely inadmissible . . . the gentry are entitled only to a helmet . . . otherwise there would be nothing to distinguish the higher ranks, as coronets, supporters and center shields are proper only to nobility. Moreover, no government will grant the emblems of other governments, as nobility is conferred for services to one's prince and one's country, but not for services to other countries. The lion is a symbol of courage only, which does not apply to these petitioners.

The College then got out its knives and cut presumption down to its proper size. It slashed away until the seven-pointed coronet—consonant with a baronial dignity at least—became a poor little helmet. Almost the entire honorary fauna was slaughtered, pious storks, loyal greyhounds, sundry lions and all.

Only a fraction of one bird survived: half the Austrian eagle. The arm holding the arrows was also spared; but even here the College wrenched away one in the bunch, so that only four arrows remained (the fifth brother, Nathan, was not officially involved in the money transfer). This sadly plucked crest became the Rothschild escutcheon on March 25, 1817.

Not for long. For then came the Congress of Aix; and after Aix, a personal loan of 900,000 gulden obtained from the House of Rothschild by Prince Metternich, his Majesty's almighty chancellor. It was, on the one hand, a perfectly straightforward transaction, fully repaid seven years before its due date. On the other hand, it was contracted on September 23, 1822. And six days later an imperial decree raised all five brothers and all their legitimate descendants of either sex to the rank of baron.

At the Heralds' College the teeth that daren't bite now gnashed. The Rothschilds' armorial headgear bloomed into the very seven-pointed coronet the brothers had first proposed, attended now by three plumed and truly splendid helmets. The center shield was restored, the illustrious beasts resurrected in a form even more magnificent and allusive than the erstwhile version had intended. In place of the loyal greyhound reared the brave Hessian lion, while the pious stork had been transfigured into nothing less than a prancing unicorn. The half-eagle now shone whole, and a second royal bird raised its wings among the helmets. Concordia, Integritas, Industria, proclaimed the scroll upon which the entire splendor was pedestaled.

But most gratifying seemed the lower left and upper right panels of the crest. Each contained the full, unstinted, intrinsic symbol of The Family. In each, a hand grasped not four but five arrows.

If you hold up against the light the present-day stationery of N. M. Rothschild & Sons, London, you will see, under the contemporary typeface imprinted by the latest electric typewriters, this same old escutcheon. Amid all the heraldic opulence, those five arrows glow the brightest, representing the five demon brothers who, having conquered, now began to reign in five different capitals as five great unofficial kings.

3. The Five Dynasts

(a) Mr. Nathan

It seems a paradox that Nathan Rothschild, for whose sake The Family had sneaked that extra arrow into the crest, never displayed that crest; never used the baronial title or let himself be thus styled; and never wore any of the various medals bestowed on him in the course of his life.

Actually, his behavior conformed exactly to the clan's dynastic logic. Every brother settled in the country most fitted to his temperament, or else he fitted his temperament to the country. Nathan sensed that liberal England would take poorly to a baron manufactured by absolutist Vienna. As a naturalized British citizen, he was wary of foreign honors. More importantly, he disdained fanfare, flounce and flourish. His forte was not manner but power. Like the English, the master race of shopkeepers, he pocketed continents while grunting dryly about the weather.

Of course, he grunted with a ghetto accent. But that did not keep him from becoming the greatest and most phlegmatic of Whig tycoons. He knew even before Heinrich Heine phrased it that "the main army of Rothschild enemies is made up of have-nots: they all say to themselves, 'What I have not, Rothschild has.' "

Nathan sensed that the kind of envy his kind of wealth excited could not be smiled or bowed or entertained away. And so he dealt with it through the loaded pistol that always lay under his pillow. He dealt with it through gruffness and bluntness. The Austrian Empire appointed him consul general in London for his enormous influence, not for his diplomatic tact.

Almoners, particularly those acting on behalf of the poor Jews of London, reported that they got thousands, even hundreds of thousands, of pounds out of Mr. Rothschild, but hardly a word and never a courtesy. Other rich men could enjoy their charity. It is, after all, an honor to give much. But not for Nathan Rothschild. He was so renownedly rich that all he could ever give was not enough.

In his own fashion he liked to revenge himself on paupers for giving him such trouble. "Sometimes," he said to his good friend Sir Thomas Buxton, the antislavery leader, "sometimes to amuse myself I give a beggar a guinea. He thinks I have made a mistake, and for fear that I should find him out, off he runs as hard as he can. I advise you to give a beggar a guinea sometimes; it is very amusing."

But he did not shed gold coins on those who knew who he was. A predatory light gleamed in the eyes of porters and footmen as soon as they recognized the stocky, thick-lipped Rothschild silhouette, and this always irritated him. To a bootblack who asked why his tip consisted of a penny when his son always dispensed a shilling, he answered, "The boy has a millionaire father. I don't." The Rothschild penny was the ancestor of the Rockefeller dime.

Art dealers, thriving on millionaires with one tenth of his fortune, had little luck at Mr. Rothschild's house. "Can't throw away money on paintings," he said. And when Nathan said something, no argument, snobbish or esthetic, could unsay it. The world of beauty was irrelevant to him. And snobbery—a fine imitation of self-esteem for those who can't afford the real thing—meant nothing to a man who let a baronage lie fallow. Once an art dealer, equipped with a letter from the Chief Rabbi of England, did make something of a dent. "All right," Nathan said, "give me a thirty-pound picture. I don't care which one. Good-bye."

To the top echelons of society he was not much more suave. "Yesterday," wrote Wilhelm Humboldt to his famous naturalist brother, Alexander, "Rothschild dined with me. He is quite crude and uneducated, but he has a great deal of natural intelligence. He scored off beautifully Major Martins who was being fatuously sentimental about the horrors of war and the large number who had been killed. 'Well,' said Rothschild, 'if they had not all died, Major, you would presumably still be a lieutenant!' "

The Duke of Wellington made a habit of the Rothschild house, and though his Grace could be a magnificent boor himself, he brought along some of the most exquisite gentlemen, and ladies, of the realm. None could ameliorate Nathan's manners. Talleyrand, France's ambassador to the Court of St. James, often visited Rothschild, delighting Nathan's wife with his ancien régime courtliness, enchanting the children with the miniature statuary he could fashion from bread lumps. Nothing rubbed off on Nathan.

At a ball given by the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Montmorency appeared to talk rather pointedly of his long line of ancestors. "So you are the first Christian baron," Nathan rasped before the whole assembly. "I'm the first Jewish baron. That's more interesting, but I make less fuss about it." The ladies blanched. The orchestra quickly struck up a minuet. The Iron Duke smiled.

When Nathan did make a fuss, the Bank of England trembled. He once presented for payment there a draft he had received from his brother Amschel. The bank returned it on the ground that it cashed only its own notes, not those of private individuals.

"Rothschilds are not private individuals!" the banker thundered. His revenge is legendary. He appeared in Threadneedle Street next morning and asked that a ten-pound note be exchanged for gold. An astonished teller complied. Nathan repeated the request all morning, all day long; and so did nine clerks of his, with nine other equally swollen purses at nine other windows. In one day he reduced the bank's gold reserves by almost 100,000 pounds.

At the opening hour of the next day the stout, relentless man was back again with his note-laden clerks. A bank executive appeared and asked, with a nervous laugh, how long this jest was to be kept up?

"Rothschild will continue to doubt the Bank of England's notes," said Nathan, "as long as the Bank of England doubts Rothschild notes."

At Threadneedle Street a directors' meeting was hastily convoked. It declared that henceforth the bank would be pleased to cash any check of the five brothers.

By that time Nathan had already moved his family from New Court, St. Swithin's Lane (now completely absorbed by his offices) to the great mansion at 107 Piccadilly. Informed that his younger daughter, Hannah, possessed musical gifts, he gave her a harp of pure gold, and Rossini and Mendelssohn taught her to pluck sweet sounds from the instrument. His wife filled the halls with treasures, gathered great people around the table. They all came to see this phenomenon which had soared out of the Frankfurt ghetto to the summit of the British Empire. They admired the queer marvel. Some fawned, and more than one became a sincere friend.

Inevitably, sniggers hid beneath certain smiles. It was then that the ambiguity of his eminence stirred in Nathan. On one such occasion a great violin virtuoso had finished a private recital at 107 Piccadilly. It was the host's duty to pronounce a few words of thanks. "You made beautiful music," said the man with the Jew Street accent. There seemed to be an imperfectly suppressed laugh. Nathan stopped. He jingled some change in his pocket. "That's my music," he then went on. "People listen to it just as carefully. But somehow they don't respect it as much."

In one very practical way (the way he preferred) Nathan was wrong. The most practical form of respect is memory. Today we remember the virtuoso only as background to a Rothschild bon mot. As for Nathan, not only his words but his works endure into our time. The English state loans he issued, to the tune of twelve million pounds, tied his house to His Majesty's Government for generations to come, so that even today the bank at New Court is still gold broker for the Bank of England. He founded the Alliance Insurance Corporation, a giant that still flourishes mightily and is still headed by the London Rothschilds. And the three-million-pound loan with which he saved Brazil's finances still has its repercussions. New Court, in 1962, clips more South American coupons than any other private bank.

A cold self-confidence, a lightning-quick astuteness marked each of his ventures. "I'm an offhand man," he once said to Buxton. "I never lost any time. I came prepared for everything and closed bargains on the spot. . . . I always said to myself, what another man can do, I can do too."

The fact was, of course, that other men could not do what he did. The stock exchange has never known his like before or (with all due respect to Bernard Baruch) since. His darts and feints and intricate ferocities there are about as hard to trace as tracks in a jungle. But we do know that he practiced upon his rivals the gambit of Waterloo with an invincible variety of wiles.

Say, for example, that his brothers' couriers brought him news likely to produce an eventual rise in stock X. By some unostentatious purchases he would accumulate a moderate quantity of the stock. At the same time word would go out from him to each of a number of secretly commissioned agents: buy a bit of X. Then Nathan would suddenly sell his holdings. The mass of speculators, always on the lookout for a bellwether, would begin to watch X worriedly. Whereupon, at a predetermined signal, all Rothschild agents would rid themselves of every X share they had. The speculators would panic. The sudden rush knocked even professionals off their skeptic stance: Nathan's infallibility was once more proved. Everybody dumped his X shares. Meanwhile another set of Rothschild agents bought up all the X available at a very depressed price—just prior to the general release of the news that raised the stock higher than ever.

The next time the competition prepared itself for that kind of Nathan trick—only to fall into a trap constructed of opposite elements. You couldn't stop or even comprehend Rothschild, nor even the reason why he, having so much, wanted to conquer more. How many yellow stars imposed on how many ancestral caftans, how many flinchings and humiliations on Frankfurt sidewalks would this man avenge today after driving from New Court to the bourse?

Napoleon on the battlefield was clad in no more dread mystery than Nathan Rothschild on the Royal 'Change. Like Napoleon, he always materialized in the same pose: he leaned against the "Rothschild pillar" (the first on the right as one entered from the Cornhill entrance), hung his heavy hands into his pockets, and began to release silent, motionless, implacable cunning. An anonymous contemporary has described it well:

> Eyes are usually called the windows of the soul. But in Rothschild's case you would conclude that the windows are false ones, or that there was no soul to look out of them. There comes not one pencil of light from the interior, neither is there one gleam of that which comes from without reflected in any direction. The whole puts you in mind of an empty skin, and you wonder why it stands upright without at least something in it. By and by another figure comes up to it. It then steps two paces aside, and the most inquisitive glance that you ever saw, and a glance more inquisitive than you would ever have thought of, is drawn out of the fixed and leaden eye, as if one were drawing a sword from a scabbard. The visiting figure, which has the appearance of coming by accident and not by design, stops just a second or two, in the course of which looks are exchanged which, though you cannot translate, you feel must be of most important meaning. After these the eyes are sheathed up again, and the figure resumes its stony posture.
> During the morning numbers of visitors come, all of whom meet with a similar reception and vanish in a similar manner. Last of all the figure itself vanishes, leaving you utterly at a loss. . . .

This sovereign calm never left Nathan. It was his armor against the high world over which he was a ruler without ever having been its equal. The story goes that one day there swept through Nathan's offices in London an august ducal personage. He wore a visage of such fury that no clerk dared stay him. He broke into Nathan's private chamber and shouted his grievance. Nathan, not lifting an eye from his ledger, said, "Take a chair."

The personage, purpling, roared his ancient lineage at the Jew, his illustrious connections, and slapped down a crested card before the banker's nose. Nathan glanced at the card for a fraction of a second.

"Take two chairs," he said and continued writing his accounts.

(b) Beau James

If the classic English backdrop of the nineteenth century is the counting house, the classic French one is the drawing room. If Nathan Rothschild became Britain's most formidable business myth, his small red-haired brother, James, cast the longest shadow through the best French salons.

This youngest of Mayer's boys had come to Paris early enough to speak quite well the language in which he loaned. Soon he joked, laughed, and almost scintillated in it. Before long he became an odd but triumphant combination of beau and octopus. His red hair was always carefully curled in the latest dandies' fashion. In 1817, when he was less than twenty-six and had hardly washed the gold dust of the Wellington smuggle off his hands, he already knew how to throw a dinner that included the Austrian ambassador and Paul von Wurttemberg, one of the gayer princes of the blood. Four years later, at the age of twenty-nine, he was considered for the general consulship of the Austrian Empire in Paris—an honor coveted by some pedigreed grand seigneurs.

A confidential report to the Austrian Emperor was decisive:

> It is true that in the decision regarding the appointment of the London Rothschild as Consul . . . your > Majesty expressly laid down that it would have to continue to be the rule that no Israelite be appointed Consul. Yet if the exception made by your Majesty in favor of the London Rothschild has proved in the highest degree beneficial, it is likely to be no less so in the case of the Paris Rothschild. . . . He is a young man of parts, who is intimately acquainted with several members of the Polytechnical Institute in Paris and of the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers, as well as with many of the most cultured French manufacturers and businessmen. . . . I cannot suggest a more suitable person for his Majesty. . . .

On August 11, 1821, our young man of parts received the appointment. To house his dignity in style, he bought the magnificent Palais Fouché in rue Laffitte. Formerly occupied by Napoleon's police commissioner (the very one who had once tried to arrest James), it now opened its portals to the finest and most expensive paintings, sculptures, meubles—and guests. The youthful Baron could even afford what George IV of England kept trying, vainly, to lure away from him: the ineffable, the historic, the by-ordinary-millionaires-quite-unattainable chef Carême.

But James did not truly begin to reign until he had found a consort. Betty Rothschild, his niece, became not only his bride but his foremost social engine. She was a dark beauty in the grand manner. Ingres painted her in a famous portrait. She excited gallantries in breasts as different as Heinrich Heine's—who immortalized her in a poem called "The Angel"—and General Changarnier, commander-in-chief of the National Guard, whose sentiment de coeur for the Baroness furnished some luscious Paris gossip.

At rue Laffitte, Belle Betty and Beau James held a continuous glittering levee. Heine and the general were not the only attendant luminaries. Rossini came almost daily and composed little musicales for Rothschild receptions. Meyerbeer was a close friend. Honoré de Balzac quaffed James's coffee by the liter. The writer had noticed Rothschild at Aix-les-Bains, and made his acquaintance and borrowed his money at almost the same time. The debt was repaid with an amusing story about the creditor, "Roueries d'un Créancier," dedicated to James. Another tale, "L'Enfant Maudit," Balzac inscribed to Betty. At the great novelist's funeral Baron James was among those walking immediately behind the coffin.

Relations between James and George Sand were somewhat more acidulous. At a charity bazaar he kept avoiding the perfume booth manned by the author in her renowned trousers. Finally she left her station to waylay the rich man: Baron James simply must buy a bottle for 5,000 francs.

"What would I do with perfume?" James grinned. "Give me your autograph. I'll sell it and we'll split the proceeds."

Sand wrote a few words on a sheet and handed it to James. It read, "Receipt for ten thousand francs for the benefit of the poor oppressed Poles. George Sand."

Heine, who was watching the baronial face that moment, put his arm around his friend's shoulder and said with mock emotion, "For a great sorrow it is always difficult to find words."

James did not really grieve. His social standing gained if he lost interesting amounts in interesting ways to interesting people. It was his policy to figure in chic anecdotes connected with the beaux arts. When Eugène Delacroix wanted to paint him as a beggar, he agreed instantly. The following morning a pauper in rags rang the bell of Delacroix's studio. A disciple answered, looked at the pitiful creature, and sent it away with a franc piece. He thought no more of the incident until twenty-four hours later a liveried servant handed him the following letter: "Dear Sir, You will find enclosed the capital which you gave me at the door to M. Delacroix's studio, with the interest and compound interest on it—a sum of ten thousand francs. You can cash the check at my bank whenever you like. James de Rothschild."

The story enriched his pleasant notoriety. So did the fact that he bought the great Lafite vineyards (for four million francs, or 1,540,000 dollars) merely because their name resembled his Paris address.

For all his Bohemian dalliance, James never forgot to be the richest man in France. His bank, de Rothschild Frères, outpaced every rival. His wealth was estimated at over 600 million francs, or about 150 million francs more than all other French financiers put together. He loaned the King of Portugal twenty-five million francs. He increased the five million francs the King of Belgium had left in his safekeeping to twenty million. He became one of the principal creditors of the French treasury.

Heine wrote:

> I like best to visit the Baron in his office at the bank, where, as a philosopher, I can observe how people . . . bow and scrape before him. It is a contortion of the spine which the finest acrobat would find difficult to imitate. I saw men double up as if they had touched a Voltaic battery when they approached the Baron. Many are overcome with awe at the door of his office, as Moses once was on Mount Horeb, when he discovered that he was on holy ground. Moses took off his shoes, and I am quite certain that a lot of these financial agents would do the same if they did not fear that the smell of their feet would be unpleasant to him. This private cabinet of his is a very remarkable spot, inspiring one with lofty ideas, as the sight of the sea or the starry heavens does. Here we see how little man is and how great God!

The passage suggests Heine's ambivalent thoughts about his friend. This German Byron realized he was just another exotic item in the great Rothschild collection. Once, when James threw a great feast for a select company of bankers, the poet was invited to brighten the dessert with intellectual display. Dessert arrived, but not Heine. A footman, sent to his lodgings, brought back Heine's regrets to James: "M. le Baron, I usually take my coffee where I have had my dinner."

In the same mood he would write: ". . . I went to see M. de Rothschild, and saw a gold-laced lackey bringing the baronial chamber pot along the corridor. Some speculator from the bourse, who was passing, reverently lifted his hat to the impressive vessel. . . . I have committed the name of the man to memory. I am quite sure that he will become a millionaire in the course of time."

There were commentaries still sharper than that. Ludwig Börne was, like Heine, a prominent German writer resident in Paris; like James, he had been brought up on Frankfurt's Jew Street. He bore down sardonically on those other local boys made good:

Would it not be a great blessing for the world if all the kings were dismissed and the Rothschild family put on their thrones? Think of the advantages. The new dynasty would never contract a loan, as it would know better than anybody how dear such things are, and on this account alone the burden on their subjects would be alleviated by several millions a year. The bribing, both active and passive, of ministers would have to cease; why should they be bribed any longer, or what would there be to bribe them with? All that sort of thing would be ancient history, and morality would be greatly promoted.

In point of fact, all French kings after Napoleon (except Louis XVIII, who died in office) were dismissed. James participated crucially in every reign. But as each ruler toppled, the Baron emerged more powerful than ever. He and Betty ran a salon so lavishly balanced that it always rode the crest, no matter what the wave.

On July 31, 1830, for example, the rule of Charles X suddenly collapsed. It seemed only logical that Baron James would harmoniously collapse with it. In many ways he had been the monetary arm of the regime. The Bourbon had entrusted to him the conversion of a series of 5 per cent state loans into 3 per cent—a gigantic deal. He had financed the Bourbon side of the Spanish civil war of the 1820's. The badge he wore of the Legion of Honor was pinned on him by a Bourbon. To all intents and purposes, he was an integral part of the Bourbon plague.

At any rate Rothschild appeared quite unprepared for the change that threatened in July, 1830. His rivals took obvious precautions, but Beau James gave balls attended by the Duke of Chartres and the Duke of Brunswick. He seemed to sleep through the summer dawn while barricades mushroomed in the streets, the old king fled and the people cheered into power Louis Philippe, son of the famous Philippe Egalité of the Revolution and himself a supposedly zealous proponent of liberal ideas. Conservative Rothschild seemed in for a brute awakening.

Then—surprise!—a month after the overturn a deputation called on the "Citizen King" to congratulate him on ascending the throne. And who should be among them but Baron Rothschild? Who was signaled to remain behind after the ceremony was over, who was given the honor of a long, intimate chat? James, that Bourbon conspirator, turned out to be a long-time friend, dinner companion and financial advisor to the newest Majesty.

Louis Philippe was even more nouveau to the purple than James to multimillionairedom. Out of this fact Rothschild welded a powerful camaraderie between two self-made men. Under his flatteries the new king's reign turned into a paradise for the haut bourgeoisie. The Baron's star shone high. De Rothschild Frères was given a virtual monopoly on all state loans; it handled Louis Philippe's private investment accounts. James became a shaper of French foreign policy. The royal presence often graced Betty's parties. Her husband now received the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor.

Eighteen years later the barricades were up again. Again James, apparently unconcerned, seemed to dance into the very muzzles of the revolution. On February 23, 1848, he attended a ball at the Austrian ambassador's. On February 24 the Citizen King fled. Mobs began to loot the Palais Royal, to destroy the royal castle at Neuilly and to burn capitalist pleasances like the Rothschild villa at Suresnes.

James sent his wife and daughter to the safety of London. He also paid 250,000 francs to M. Ledry-Rollin, Interior Minister of the Revolution, "for patriotic purposes." Furthermore he wrote and publicized a letter to the provisional government which today hangs in the office of Baron Guy de Rothschild. In it James offers to give 50,000 francs to those wounded in the street fighting. The letter is dated February 25—the very first day of the post-Louis Philippe era. He was still the old magician. He had lost nothing in speed, calm and efficiency since the days of the Wellington gold smuggle. And he still came out on top. After a few weeks, even fanatical republicans considered him indispensable.

The editor of the radical Tocsin de Travailleurs wrote:

> You are a wonder, sir. Louis Philippe has fallen, the constitutional monarchy and parliamentary methods have gone by the board. . . . But you have survived. The banking princes are going in liquidation and their offices are closed. The great captains of industry and the railway companies totter. Shareholders, merchants, manufacturers and bankers are ruined en masse; big men and little men are alike overwhelmed; you alone among all these ruins remain unaffected. . . . Wealth fades away, glory is humbled and dominion is broken, but . . . the monarch of our time has held his throne; but that is not all. You might have fled this country where, in the language of your Bible, the mountains skip about like rams. You remain, announcing that your power is independent of ancient dynasties, and courageously extend your hand. . . . Undismayed you adhere to France. . . . You are more than a statesman, you are a symbol of credit. Is it not time that the bank, that powerful instrument of the middle classes, should assist in the fulfillment of the people's destiny? . . . After gaining the crown of money, you would achieve the apotheosis. Does that not appeal to you?

It did not—once more for shrewd reasons. The ministers whose ranks James had been invited to join were replaced in turn. Louis Napoleon swept them away when he was elected President of France in December, 1848. Four years later he proclaimed himself Napoleon III, by the grace of God and the will of the people, Emperor of the French.

But now James really seemed stranded. He had no positive connection with this new power. Quite the contrary.

Everyone knew how he and his brothers had made their first great fortunes at the expense of Napoleon I, the present Bonaparte's uncle. And as if that were not sufficient, Louis Napoleon's favorite financiers were James's worst rivals.

The Baron, however, was his usual unfazed self. "Ah," he is reported to have said with a smile when the news broke that Achille Fould, his archenemy, had been appointed the new Napoleon's finance minister. "I think I smell a new Waterloo."

It was a premature remark. The battle into which he launched now was so long and so intricately vehement that a separate chapter must accommodate it. And yet the long run proved Beau James right. The history of Rothschild is the history of other people's Waterloos.

(c) King Salomon

Quite early in the nineteenth century his Highness, Prince Metternich, Chancellor of Austria, had some public thoughts about bankers who interfered in matters of state. "The House of Rothschild," he said, "plays a much bigger role in France than any foreign government. . . . There are, of course, reasons for it which seem to me neither good nor gratifying: money is the great motive force in France, and corruption is quite openly reckoned with. . . . Among us [in Austria] this commodity finds but few friends."

For the mishpoche those were hardly hospitable words. Austria still maintained an anti-Semitic hauteur. In contrast to England and France, the Jews were not permitted to own land anywhere in the Habsburg domains. They could not serve in the government or the courts of justice.

The practice of law was closed to them, as was the teaching profession or any kind of political function. Jewish marriages, restricted in number, required special permission. A Jew must pay poll tax and report regularly to the "Jewish Office." If he was of foreign nationality, he was given a residence permit good for a short period only. In fact, the Austrian police bore down so conscientiously on aliens of the wrong religion that the clan did not risk sending a representative to the Congress of Vienna. Waterloo came and went, and no Rothschild had got within earshot of an Austrian minister.

But after the explosion at Aix, the Danube became ripe for The Family. It acted with its usual dynastic prudence. The precisely most suitable brother assumed charge of the Habsburg department. He was not an ill-humored daredevil like Nathan; not a luxuriant dandy à la James. Those two would not have done nearly so well in the lofty shadows of the Hofburg. No, it was Salomon who went forth. Among all Mayer's sons, he most favored the father. A courtier by temperament, his specialty was ingratiation. He could talk to Austria's hallowed nobility as though they all sat perched in a splendid forest of family trees. Last, not least, he was a diplomat.

No foreign minister could have planned his first move toward Vienna better. Casually he hinted to an Austrian official that the entire House of Rothschild might shift the center of its worldwide operations from Frankfurt to a more congenial place elsewhere. This inspired a confidential report which shortly afterwards reached some exalted desks. On September 26, 1819, the minister of the interior of the Empire, asked to comment on the matter by the finance minister, replied:

> Your Excellency must be aware that foreign Israelites may reside here only on obtaining the special "toleration" permit . . . special exceptions can be made only with the personal approval of the Emperor. Meanwhile your Excellency may rest assured that we are far too well aware of the advantages that would in many respects accrue to the Imperial State of Austria through the settlement of such an eminent firm within its borders not to advise his Majesty most emphatically to give his consent as soon as a formal application in this matter is received.

The house in toto did not move, of course. Salomon journeyed alone to Vienna, where he received a residence permit in expectation that the entire business of all the brothers was to follow. And though he only opened a firm of his own, disappointment never had a chance to set in. Salomon had a way with negative sentiments. Before the government could catch its breath, he floated an Austrian state loan of some fifty-five million gulden as an Austrian loan had never been floated before.

It took the form of a lottery, an unusual and attractive feature. But that was just the beginning of Salomon's wisdom. He released only a fraction of the issue. Not a word was said about there being much more to come. The thing was to appetize, not to gorge, the Viennese investing public. And he made the hors d'œuvre even more palatable by anticipating the mouth-watering arts of Madison Avenue. A public-relations campaign began. Articles in newspapers praised thrift, advised the investor, broadcast the meaning and the rewards of high finance. The issue rose mightily. When Salomon announced another thirty-five-millions worth of bonds, there was surprise, anger—and finally a rush to buy.

Everyone who got hold of the issue gained; most of all, Salomon. The operation, he was to confess later, had netted him six million gulden. Such profits, of course, were apt to produce a little indignation. But it was not easy to stay indignant at the man. He bore himself so simply and modestly. Since he could not own a house, he rented a single room at the Römischer Kaiser, one of the city's better hotels.

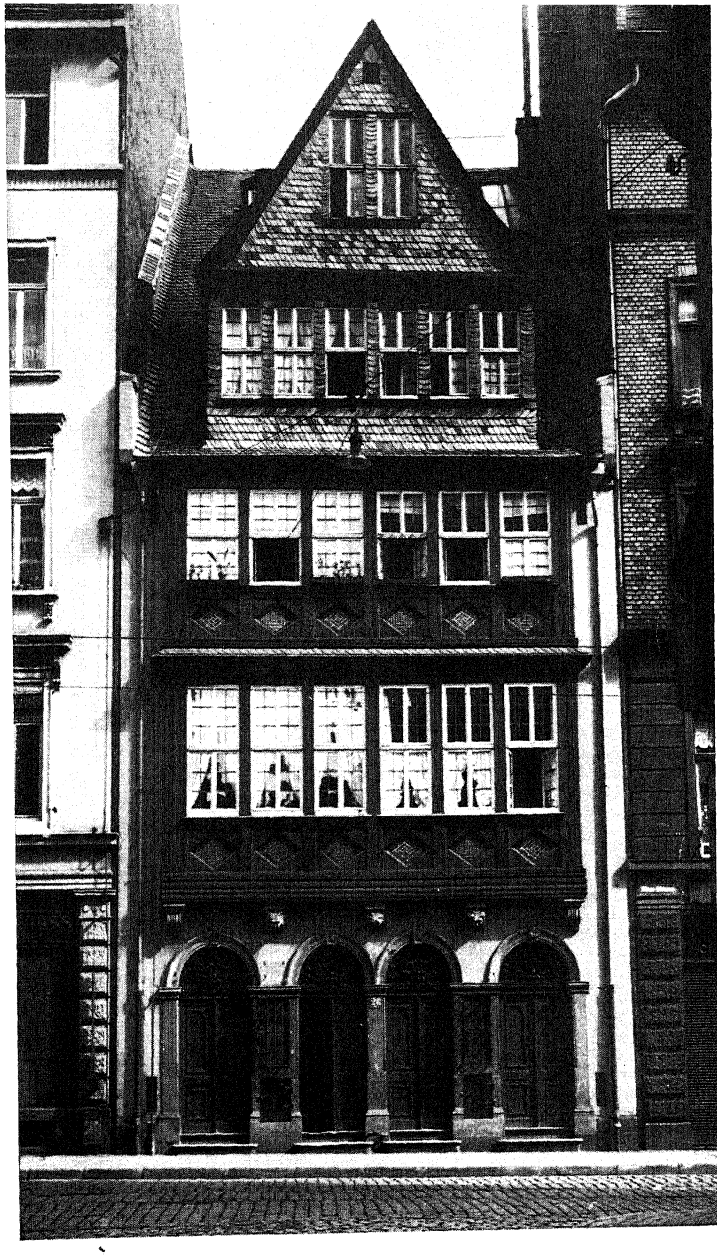
True, he soon rented another room, and then another, and then an entire floor, until—by accident, as it were—he had hired all of the hotel. The parties he gave here were terribly pleasant and sympatisch to a select roster of guests that soon included Metternich himself.

In an unpretentious way Salomon's inn radiated amusement, advice, even practical help. The Rothschilds' early Frankfurt rival, Moritz Bethmann, visited Vienna in the early 1820's and came away amazed. "Salomon has won the people's affection here," he said, "partly through his general modesty and partly through his readiness to be obliging. Nobody leaves him without being comforted."

The persons Salomon comforted became steadily more important and profitable. In 1825 he was called upon to finance Europe's most delicate affaire d'amour. It involved no less than the Archduchess Marie Louise, daughter of the Austrian Emperor and wife of the exiled Napoleon. The Congress of Vienna had considered her victimized by an errant deportee of a husband; as compensation, she got the dukedoms of Parma, Piacenza and Guastalla. For additional relief Metternich provided a manly young majordomo named General Adam Albert von Neipperg. The General wore a black eye-patch (the result of a sword thrust during the war), had considerable social gifts and diverted the Archduchess so well that on May 1, 1817, and again on August 8, 1819, two events took place, both blessed.



Both were also clandestine, because Napoleon, far away on St. Helena while being fruitfully cuckolded, did not die until May, 1821. The children of so august a womb had to wait many months before they came into anything like an official life. Their births were not registered. Their nannies nursed them in closed-off castle halls. Until Marie Louise's secret morganatic marriage to the General in September, 1821, she pretended even to her imperial father that little Albertine and little William Albert simply did not exist.

The tots were the bastard offspring of an adulterous union, but they were also the grandchildren of the Emperor of Austria. His Majesty created them the Counts von Montenuovo, this name being the Italian equivalent of Neipperg (Neu-berg, or "new mountain"). Besides a name, they also needed a fitting inheritance. Their mother's dukedom—a kind of hardship grant—was not hereditary. Something had to be done, in a soundproof way.

Something was. Salomon Rothschild tiptoed into the picture. It became his assignment to conjure a safe, no-risk patrimony for the Montenuovos without selling any of their mother's lands; without an unpopular increase in Parma's public debts; without raising an undue commotion.

At the Römischer Kaiser the hotel tenant got busy with his army of clerks. As usual, he found an ingeniously comfortable solution. Marie Louise was to declare that she had spent much of her private revenue on an itemized list of public buildings in Parma; that as reimbursement she took some ten million francs of state funds for herself, a sum to be instantly converted into bonds by Rothschild and sold on Marie Louise's behalf to a great number of different people in different countries. Some four of the ten million would be reapplied for public purposes, so that, as Salomon stated, "any bad impression . . . would be counteracted by the argument . . . that the proceeds went to projects beneficial to the community. . . ." The rest of the moneys would be the little Montenuovos' legacy, secure from anybody who might question their right to it or their ticklish genealogy.

"It is quite important," wrote Salomon to Metternich, ". . . that the claims of the Archduchess' legal heirs cannot be disputed. The preparation of bearer bonds (issued by an eminent firm like Rothschild's), the holders of which will be constantly changing, seems to me to meet any possible eventuality." A weapon more modern and more powerful than a great army's ten thousand muskets would prevent seizure of such bonds or of the money received for them —the Rothschilds' hell weapon: loss of international credit standing.

"All governments," Salomon continued, "who have an interest in maintaining an inviolate credit system would use their influence to prevent such a thing from being done. . . . I am pleased to say that I am confident of arranging this matter to the full satisfaction of her Majesty the Archduchess and of his Majesty the Emperor and King."

When it came to investing the sum thus produced, Metternich extended to the Archduchess "the guarantee that your Majesty cannot do better than act in accordance with Rothschild's suggestion."

Was this the same lofty prince who had once sniffed at a Rothschild's interference in France?

Now the first minister of the continent's first empire went to great lengths to avoid crossing the Jew Street boy. The year of the Marie Louise affair, Salomon intimated that he would like to have a decoration conferred on his coreligionist and executive employee, von Wertheimstein. A démarche from a great kingdom could not have aroused more wary diplomacy from Metternich.

To Marie Louise's husband he wrote:

> Herr von Rothschild wants a little St. George (of the order of Constantine) for his managing clerk. . . . I feel that it is not in the best of taste . . . that such an order be conferred upon a clerk, and I suggest that you reply that the order of Constantine constitutes a genuine religious brotherhood, and is not simply a distinction, and, as the Jewish religion forbids its adherents to take the statutory oath of the order, the chancellor of the order would not be able to confer the cross. Temper your refusal with appropriate expressions of your extreme regret, and the matter will be disposed of. Write to Herr Salomon on these lines, but do not mention me, as nobody can take offense at a statutory provision, while a single personal remark can do untold mischief, and I myself have committed the great offense of making it impossible for the Rothschild family to obtain an Austrian decoration. If he thought I was implicated he would regard me as a positive cannibal.

The Metternich-Rothschild alliance endured. In 1835 a deathbed intrigue in the Imperial palace welded it still closer. During the early March days of that year, old Emperor Francis was bled three times, and still his fever increased and his lung inflammation grew worse. Not only the life of a man but the future of the Empire trembled in the dark halls of the Vienna Hofburg.

Chancellor Metternich was the dying Francis' strong man. Ferdinand, his heir, had somewhat less-than-normal brains and seemed likely to be influenced by his uncles, Archdukes Joseph, Carl and John—all Highnesses of a not necessarily pro-Metternich bent. Count Kolowrat, the chancellor's opponent, began to loom large in the hushed proceedings by the Emperor's bed. On the bourse the sudden uncertainty produced a panic that rattled the economic foundations of Metternich's government.

Chancellor and banker bestirred themselves. Metternich summoned Bishop Wagner, the Emperor's confessor, to his office. Here a will was drafted containing the provision: "I hereby name ——— as the man whom I most emphatically commend to my son as a loyal counselor worthy of his fullest confidence." The Bishop took the paper to Francis' chamber, and the failing Emperor inserted with his own hand the right name in the right space just before he died at midnight on March 2, 1835.

Not only that: speaking about advice within the family, the imperial will took the extra precaution of passing over the Archdukes Joseph, Carl and John; and instead enjoined Emperor Ferdinand to resort to his youngest uncle, Archduke Ludwig—who was almost as weak and malleable as Ferdinand, the ultramalleable, himself.

While Metternich put things in order at the palace, Salomon (who was kept au courant on the latest developments) sped to the bourse. He announced that he had the greatest confidence in the continuity and prosperity of the government. He went further and lined up James in Paris. Both brothers made a radical offer. If anyone wanted to sell any Austrian securities, they would buy them instantly, at the top price of the day. The market listened. The market calmed. The pro-Metternich investors carried the day.

"I must admit," reported Metternich's ambassador from Paris, "that the enormous influence exercised by the House of Rothschild succeeded in immediately curing the panic which had begun to affect nervous spirits."

Some spirits did remain a trifle fidgety. "It is quite well known," a high government officer wrote in his diary, "that the new Emperor's illness has made him feeble-minded. He is prepared to sign anything that is put before him. We now have an absolute monarchy without a monarch."

There was an absolute chancellor, however, in the form of Prince Metternich. And there was Rothschild, his absolute banker. Nothing withstood Salomon. David Parish, that most fashionable of Central European bankers, with whom The Family had been thrilled to conclude an alliance a few years earlier at Aix—David Parish went bankrupt and jumped into the Danube. Other great Viennese banks, like that of Geymueller, crashed. Salomon survived at their expense and waxed.

Through a complicated series of transactions he obtained the lease of Austria's huge mercury mines in Idria. The only other known mercury deposit was in Spain, with whose government Nathan happened to be negotiating at the moment. Couriers careered between the brothers' offices, and soon the House of Rothschild exercised a world monopoly in a key metal, whose price they fixed at will.

Salomon was also the chief banker behind Lloyd, Austria's big steamship line. He financed the first important Central European railways, a quaint and important event of which more in a separate chapter. He became as dazzling a myth as James or Nathan. His first two initials, S. M., happened to be the same as the Austrian abbreviation for his Majesty ("Seine Majestät"), and a popular saying spoke of two local suzerains, Emperor Ferdinand and King Salomon. It was more than a joke. Among the people besieging Salomon's office were those who begged a royal "laying on of hands." King Salomon only had to touch his palm to some bond or stock, and its owner went away certain of its rise.

And yet he knew no rest. After all this he was still a Jew in a very gentile Austria. He was still a hotel guest, although a most glorified one. His brothers luxuriated in castles, and he, who was as infinitely rich as they—was he to leave behind a dynasty living on room service?

By immense charities (from the erection of whole hospitals to subsidizing the municipal water supply) and by immense pressures, he forced Vienna to make him the legal equal of his valet. He became a full-fledged citizen. Now he could buy the Hotel Römischer Kaiser. But he was a Rothschild. His retinue would not fit into a single building. He could easily afford a domain on a par with those of the greatest princes in the Empire. By way of the next step he first coleased and, once more by special permission, subsequently bought outright the immense coal and iron works of Vitkovitz in Silesia. Under Hitler and even in our day this purchase was to produce dramatic repercussions. In the second quarter of the nineteenth century Vitkovitz meant to Salomon the possession of industrial real estate—which was almost, but not quite, as good as being a regular landed magnate.

Yet no less than a regular landed magnate Salomon burned to be. Soon a brief was brought before the Emperor for the acquisition of a Rothschild demesne in Moravia. Instantly the nobles of the province were up in arms. Their privilege to be shared, and thus defiled, by a Jew!

Salomon sighed. It would have to be the old room-by-room technique of the Römischer Kaiser all over again. He smoothed the jeers off noble lips by putting something pleasant into noble hands. From Prince Esterhazy on down, practically every other aristocrat began to enjoy his loans. He made himself more serviceable than ever to his old friend Metternich. In the vivacious Countess Melanie Zichy-Ferraris, the Chancellor married his third wife and a Rothschild debtor. There was now a great deal of just plain social entertaining back and forth between the Metternichs' Schloss Johannisberg and Salomon's house in Vienna; "our Salomon" Melanie did not hesitate to call him even before the Emperor. Baroness James de Rothschild of Paris got Melanie frocks; Baroness Kalmann in Naples sent Melanie picturesque scarves; from London came Rothschild gifts in the form of exquisite plant cuttings. There were all these pleasant things. There were Salomon's incomparable philanthropies (the governor of Silesia reported that the institutions set up by Salomon in Vitkovitz were "a blessing and model for the whole country"). And there were unobtrusive but unflagging hints.

In 1843 it came to pass. The last bulwark of prerogative opened. Salomon received permission to purchase inheritable agricultural real estate. He bought, almost at once, four huge and splendid demesnes in Moravia, Prussia and Silesia, all complete with castles, moats, waterfalls, lakes, swans, peacocks, cattle, grottoes, kennels, stables, stud farms and game preserves. Abruptly he had become one of the largest landed proprietors of the realm.

He became more. During the sudden drop on the Vienna bourse in October, 1845, he happened to be attending a Family conference in Frankfurt. An express message conveyed through the Austrian minister begged him to return. The Chancellor cried that it was essential for the state's finances that either Salomon or a deputy in the form of another Rothschild be in constant residence in Vienna. Salomon's bodily presence had grown indispensable to Austria.

That is, to Metternich's Austria. But what if the time of the absolute chancellor were drawing to an end? What would then become of the absolute banker?

In February, 1848, Louis Philippe fell off the throne of France, to the temporary discomfiture of his friend James de Rothschild. Salomon was not pleased, either. The clangor from the Paris barricades rose with such sudden democratic fury that it was heard in Vienna's innermost drawing rooms. His Majesty's first minister was now in his seventy-sixth year, but his ear remained acute. "If the devil fetches me," Metternich said to old Salomon, "he will fetch you too."

At eight o'clock in the evening of March 13, his Highness was fetched. All day long the citizenry marched through the streets, burning the Chancellor in effigy. Metternich resigned. Twenty hours later the bearer of Europe's most formidable name fled to Frankfurt with a thousand ducats' cash loan from Salomon plus a Rothschild letter of credit.

The financier's turn came in a few months. On October 6 another insurrectionary mob broke into the Römischer Kaiser to besiege the nearby Arsenal. S. M. took flight to Germany and never came back, even after order was restored.

Yet the devil could fetch him only as a person, not as a Rothschild. First and last Salomon incarnated the clan, which continued the Vienna house in the resplendent incarnation of Anselm, his son. Great families are not nearly so perishable as great men. The absolute chancellor, too, had descendants. Each year the present Prince Metternich sends a case of his Schloss Johannisberg wine, the Rhineland's greatest vintage, to Baron Elie de Rothschild of Paris. Each year Elie reciprocates with a choice shipment of his Château Lafite, one of the great Bordeaux labels. Each year the two families visit each other's palaces.

So far, at least, the nobs have outlasted the mobs.

(d) Carl, the Mezzuzah Baron

"Rothschild has just kissed the Pope's hand," wrote a nasty pen in 1832, "and at his departure expressed his satisfaction with the successor of St. Peter in the most gracious terms. . . . Others must bend down to the Holy Father's toe, but Rothschild is given the finger."

The most interesting feature of the event in question was not the fact that Rothschild kissed something better and more expensive than common mortals could, but that the Rothschild so honored was called Carl—a name hitherto not prominent among the stars of The Family.

Carl (known as Kalmann in the early phases of his career) was slow to develop the worldly fluency, the incisiveness and dispatch of Nathan, James or Salomon. Quiet in manner, almost awkward in speech, paunchier even than the Rothschild norm, he clung most strictly to Jewish observance. Before the ceremonial kiss at the Vatican, Carl's Family nickname was "mezzuzah boy"—mezzuzahs being the miniature Torah scrolls affixed to doorways. The faithful Jew kisses them at the start of a journey, and Carl's early life consisted of traveling. He acted as the clan's chief courier. Until March, 1821, he remained without portfolio. Then, when The Family had too many satrapies and not enough satraps, the brothers resorted to him.

It all began with the Congress of Laibach, a political festival characteristic of the period, attended by Europe's greatest sovereigns. At Laibach it was decided to restore the absolutist, therefore "legitimate," Bourbon kingdom in Naples. The assembled monarchs authorized the intervention of an Austrian army for that purpose. Naturally the Rothschilds were asked to handle the military subsidies.

But which Rothschild? Nathan of London showed little gusto for an antiliberal venture; besides, he was deeply involved in negotiating several million-pound issues. James of Paris happened to be busy propping up the French Bourbons with mountains of francs. Amschel of Frankfurt could not get away from financing postwar reconstruction in German lands. As for Salomon of Vienna, he was up to his neck in his lottery loans, which gave him as much work and publicity as he could handle.

"I feel it my duty to avoid anything which could attract attention," he begged off to Metternich. "A journey to Laibach at this time would arouse such attention."

Only one brother was left, about whom nobody much knew or cared. Un petit frère Rothschild, the Austrian finance minister called him, though he was actually four years older than James. Did The Family, on delegating him, realize that it was creating the financial overlord of the Italian peninsula? For that is precisely what he became. As soon as the mezzuzah boy was given a challenge of Rothschild proportions, he unleashed a Rothschild performance. At Laibach he quickly worked out the main features of the subsidy: Vienna was to advance a loan to Naples, which would defray with it the costs of the Austrian occupation.

Rothschild, in brief, went about its usual task of converting crises into bonds. But this time Carl was to man the controls. He began to lay the groundwork and did a neat extra chore on the side. Before their parting, the King of Naples borrowed a few thousand gulden from the Emperor of Austria. Carl expedited the fancy transaction. No less than his brothers, he was now a banker to monarchs.

No less astonishing than his brothers' was his agility. Right after Laibach, a semi-Jacobite uprising broke out in a northern Italian state. Carl flew to his Neapolitan Majesty, who was jittering in Florence. Carl had always been fast for a man of his heavy contours, but now the heat of the job was rapidly thawing a heretofore dull tongue. All eloquence, he predicted that Austrian dragoons would soon trample this sedition underfoot. They did.

All firmness, he pushed his uncertain Bourbon southward.

He was all strength when he reached Naples. He had to be. An Italian money syndicate claimed it could bring off the military-loan operation at a smaller expense to the kingdom. Carl had prompt recourse to the commanding Austrian general—and emerged as sole floater of the loan.

By 1827 Carl's new-founded bank had become a Neapolitan institution that paid the troops that kept the king in power. Carl spoke with a powerful voice to, and for, the local court. Earlier, he had been Austria's monetary arm in Naples. Now he turned into Naples' most important advocate with Vienna. After the royal position had been fortified, it was Carl's argument which moved Metternich to evacuate the kingdom.

Inevitably, Carl's counting house became the greatest in the land. He affixed his mezzuzahs to the finest palace on the Vesuvian shore. The native aristocracy repaired here for his lavish entertainments. The Duke of Lucca, Leopold of Saxe-Coburg (afterward the first king of Belgium), and every visiting grand seigneur drank and feasted with the newest Rothschild: the Italian one. His money flowed through the treasuries of most Italian states. It helped the Grand Duke of Tuscany drain the Tuscan marshlands. It went to the Kingdom of Sardinia in a series of thirteen state loans amounting to over twenty-two million pounds. And it fertilized the Pope's domains.

To be sure, Carl insisted on the official promise that the Vatican's anti-Jewish attitude would be reformed. And even in some contractual documents he could bring himself to speak of the Holy See only as "the Roman State." Nonetheless, his unbaptized ducats were not disdained. On January 10, 1832, the event came to pass with which his story started here. Pope Gregory XVI received Carl von Rothschild, gave him his hand rather than the customary toe to kiss, and pinned the order of St. George on the lapel of the Kosher Baron.

(e) Amschel of the Flowers

The four brothers discussed so far shared certain characteristics: a steaming commercial libido; a leaping, grasping vibrancy. Until their death they possessed—or rather, were possessed by—relentless youthfulness. Amschel was different, and not only because he was a thin man. His image comes down to us redolent with the musky air of an old high priest's chamber.

When patriarch Mayer died, Amschel, as his eldest son, inherited the bank in Frankfurt, the position as head of the family and his father's curious ways. To each of these legacies he did justice.

He remained in the native city though it was soon overshadowed by his brothers' great capitals, though "Hepp! Hepp!"—immemorial cry of the German pogrom—kept crashing through the streets. With a snap of his finger Amschel could have raised palaces in more genteel lands. But he stayed and patiently picked up the stones which shattered his windowpanes.

Once an anti-Semitic mob gathered before his great house, now far from Jew Street. Amschel appeared on a balcony to face them. "My dear friends," he said, "you want money from the rich Jew. There are forty million Germans. I have about as many florins. As a start, I'll drop a florin to each of you." The mob cupped hands, caught and went.

In some ways, Amschel spent the rest of his life telling the mob to go home. He became the grand almoner and grand protector to the German Jews; he helped sweep away the chains of Jew Street; he pressed, in the end successfully, for the Jews' enfranchisement as free citizens of Frankfurt.

Amschel was the first of the Rothschilds. It was his chore to apply for honors and consulships on his brothers' behalf; to condole or congratulate emperors and kings; to be spokesman for the Great Five. There is a poetic fitness in the fact that the formal head of the family should be the most ancestral of them all. In Amschel (he would not tolerate the compromise which changed Jacob to James and Kalmann to Carl) the medieval vein of the ghetto ran strongest.

Long after he had under his command a whole battery of literate clerks, he insisted on composing letters laced with archaic figures and Yiddish misspellings. His habit of addressing the British Commissary General as "the most High Herr Comishair" amused his brothers and the Comishair as well. It was, underneath all courtesies, his way of being himself. Later, as Rothschild communications reached the imperial level, he had to filter this self of his through scribes and calligraphers. Nevertheless, congratulating Chancellor Metternich on the recovery of Emperor Francis from illness, he ended, ". . . and may it ever be my fortune in deepest reverence to call myself your Highness' most humble and obedient servant . . ." —which recalls his father's flourishes and also, perhaps, old Mayer's secret grin.

Amschel continued still another tradition of Mayer's: the bond with the House of Hesse. Once the connection had consisted of the fortune entrusted by Landgrave William to Mayer. Now the money streamed the other way. Mayer's son financed William's son. Often Amschel would walk the streets in his ghetto dress—his favorite form of exercise—and suddenly drop in at his Serenity's palace for lunch. His Highness and family were always prepared, with special kosher dishes. "They would," an astonished city chronicler states, "take their midday meal quite en famille with their business friend."

Other German princes also held out their hands to Amschel, palm upward. He became treasurer of the German Confederation meeting in Frankfurt, and thus in a sense the first finance minister of the Prussian Empire ultimately born of the Confederation. As the giant among German bankers, he had his finger in every investment pie east of the Rhine and north of the Danube. Hundreds of German factories, railways, highways began with a ledger calculation in his offices at Frankfurt's Fahrgasse.

He lived, as it behooved him, on a princely scale. He had a number of titles and decorations, though as a rule he wore only the ribbon of the Court of Hesse and liked to be addressed simply as "Herr Baron." All foreign visitors to Frankfurt, including the diplomats accredited there, treated him with great distinction. They flocked to the great dinners he gave, honored him at banquets in return. But Amschel ate only kosher food, and he had no flair for social enjoyment.

"A strange man," said one of his acquaintances, "a person of thoroughly Oriental physiognomy, with old Hebrew manners and habits. His hat is usually pushed back onto his neck, his coat is open and falls negligently over his shoulders. . . . Like a chief dervish he sits on a raised platform among his clerks, his secretaries at his feet, and his agents bustling about him. . . . No one is ever allowed to speak privately to him about business; everything is discussed openly in the office, as in the old Rhine courts."

Amschel's business hours were as long as his clerks', his leisure time less. Even when he went to the theater, he was often called away to hear the report of a courier freshly arrived in Frankfurt. At night he would be wakened in his bed to read and answer dispatches from Vienna, Paris, London, Naples; he had a bedside desk for the purpose. Being a business genius of the first rank, he could decide instantly on any offer, oral or written, giving his opinion in a few words. When once he had uttered his brief decision, nothing ever induced him to say another word on the matter.

Unlike his brothers, Amschel wore his wealth and power in a crotchety, joyless, somehow monkish way. "I have never seen any man so distressed," commented a contemporary, "beat his breast so much and implore the mercy of heaven, as Baron Rothschild on the long day [Day of Atonement] in the synagogue. He often faints from the strain of interminable prayer, and strong-smelling plants from his gardens are then brought and put under his nose to bring him around. In earlier years he inflicted severe mortification on himself in order to prevail upon heaven to grant him a child, but it turned out to be in vain."

There was the rub; there throbbed the pain. A love-parched, child-parched marriage weighed Amschel down. Of the five Rothschild branches, the central house in Frankfurt would not continue in the direct line.

Amschel beat his head against his sonlessness. He tried prayer, he tried endless good works. His official charities—over 20,000 gulden yearly—amounted to nine times the total annual income of Goethe's very well-to-do family. The Jewish Hospital in Frankfurt lived on his contributions, and so did most of the poorer families in Jew Street.

But apart from his regular largesse, he gave away unnumbered small sums at all hours of the day, particularly when walking or riding through the city. His benefactions continued even while he ate. More than one guest reported how a begging letter would sail in through the window and land on the table; how the Baron would, almost automatically, wrap a gold piece in it and throw it back with a practiced curve; and how a footman had to report whether the missive had reached its recipient.

None of these good deeds kindled his wife's womb. To distract himself, Amschel tried to learn the foreign languages his brothers spoke. But all that would stick in his mind were prayers and figures. He even tackled horseback-riding. People, though, always seemed to hold their hands to their mouths when they saw the Baron astride a thoroughbred in his caftan. He gave that up, too. Only the synagogue remained—and the gardens. Those gardens were his greatest worldly joy. He filled them with the rarest, finest blooms and with graceful animals. Here, at least, he could make young things grow. And here he received a young Prussian who was to become the legendary Iron Chancellor of Germany—Otto von Bismarck.

In 1851 Prussia appointed Bismarck its representative at the German Confederation meeting in Frankfurt. Old Amschel, with his sharp eyes, was not long in picking out a comer. The young man seemed about the same age as his phantom son might be, and soon Prussia's new delegate received a card asking him to Rothschild's house. As usual, the Baron had a very crowded schedule, and so the invitation was for a considerable time later. Bismarck replied that he would come if he were still alive. A letter to his wife shows, inadvertently, how pleased he was with the famous Jew's reaction.

"My answer," he wrote, "affected Baron Rothschild so strongly that he has told everybody about it, and goes about saying, 'Why shouldn't he be alive? Why should he die? The man is young and strong!'. . . I like the Baron, though, because he's a real old Jew peddler and does not pretend to be anything else; he is strictly orthodox and refuses to touch anything but kosher food at his dinners. 'Take thome bread for the deer,' he said to his servant as he went out to show me his garden, in which he keeps tame deer. 'Thith plant,' he said to me, 'cotht me two thouthand gulden—on my honor it cotht me two thouthand gulden cash. You can have it for a thouthand; or if you like it ath a prethent, the thervant will bring it to your houthe. God knowth I like you, you're a fine handthome fellow.' He is such a short little thin person . . . childless, a poor man in his palace."

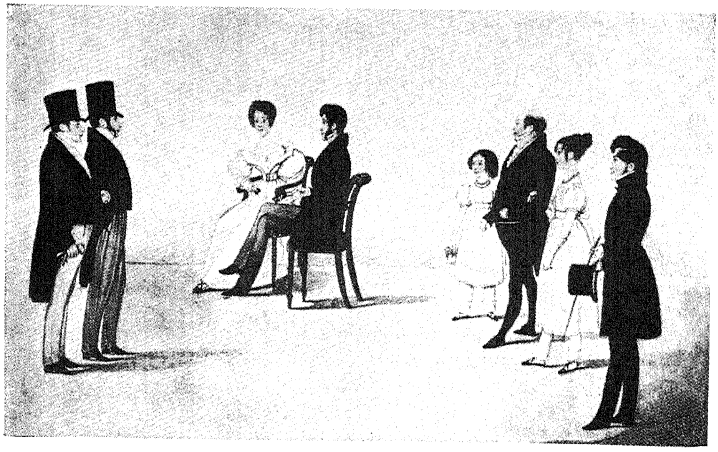
Yet Bismarck was proud of his friendship with the piteous Jewish oddity. In the same letter he enclosed two leaves from Baron Rothschild's garden and instructed his wife to save them with care.



There were other youths to whom Amschel paid even greater attention. He cast an envious but loving eye on the offspring of his brothers. The young Rothschilds interested him most at the crucial point of the dynastic process—their marriages. He supervised The Family's mating policy: boys must choose other Rothschilds, or at least other Jews, for their brides; the girls were sometimes allowed Christian aristocrats. (Nathan's daughter Hannah accepted, against some rather temporary family resistance, a son of the Baron Southampton, the Hon. Henry Fitzroy. Of Hannah's nieces, her namesake, Hannah Rothschild, wed the Earl of Rosebery, later prime minister of the Empire; Annie Rothschild became daughter-in-law to Lord Hardwicke; Constance Rothschild, the wife of Lord Battersea. On the Continent, one of Carl's grandchildren became the Duchess de Gramont, while her sister married the Prince de Wagram.)

To the end of his eighty-one years Amschel insisted that all nuptials be celebrated at Frankfurt. He did not always succeed, but he did compel all new Rothschild spouses—including the gentile bluebloods—to submit to a peculiar ritual. Even if the wedding were not held in Frankfurt, they must immediately proceed there in full retinue. They stopped briefly at Amschel's mansion. In his best caftan he emerged and headed the stately procession moving toward the ghetto. It reached a street too narrow for the splendid carriages. One had to disembark and make one's way across cobbles to a cramped, weathered house. The ladies, in their grand toilettes, could barely squeeze through the small doorway.

In this ghetto cavern Gutele Rothschild, the dowager empress of world finance, lived on—forever, it seemed.* No newcomer, no matter how noble, received full admission to The Family before being introduced, appraised and approved at Gutele's. Here, at the Green Shield, one did her homage.

Here, as a young coin merchant's wife, she had once boiled beef, scrubbed walls, washed shirts, while her husband and five sons attained legend. From here she would not move. And since there was hardly a palace west of the Urals that would not gladly claim her as guest, the palaces came to her. Here, in medieval dusk, the duchesses curtsied. Here the mighty, peacocked with decorations, bent over the rough old hand. They admired obediently Gutele's bridal wreath, which had been withering under glass for much more than half a century.

The ancient woman, covered in stiff lace, moved little. Her face under the sheitel (the wig worn by an orthodox Jewish wife) hardly smiled. But her tongue was humorous, sharp, alive. When a grandee observed that Frau Rothschild would probably outlive all her guests, she answered, in arch imitation of her sons' stock-market language, "Why should God take me at a hundred when he can have me at ninety-four?" When another Highness offered her his personal physician, a wizard guaranteed to make his patients twenty years younger, Frau Rothschild said, "People always think I want to grow younger. I don't. I want to grow older."

At Amschel's signal, the state visit departed. Later Frau Rothschild's words would be retold in the best drawing rooms. But her most famous phrase was spoken just after one of those splendiferous assemblies had vanished into its equipages. A ghetto neighbor ran into the house, worried about her sons who had just come of military age. She asked Frau Rothschild if there had been any news from the great personages? Would there be peace or war?

"War?" Gutele said simply. "Nonsense. My boys won't let them."

As usual she was right. "My boys won't let them" summed up much of the invisible politics of the nineteenth century.

VI

RUNNING EUROPE

1. The Peacemongers

GUTELE'S sons had soared during Napoleon's wars. But now that they had so superbly ridden a tiger, they proscribed tigers. Upheavals are exhilarating for ambitious youths, not for established men. Rothschild was now banker to empires and continents—to all the principal European countries, to Eurasian Russia, to the Americas, to the Indies. It has been estimated that the London house alone placed 6,500 million dollars' worth of foreign loans during the first ninety years of its existence. In Paris, in Vienna, in Frankfurt and Naples, the titanic brother branches were just as busy. Upon Rothschild vaults converged the credit of the Western World.

Quite naturally, the investments of Gutele's boys depended on the stability of nations. "We have a holding of 900,000 rentes [18 million francs nominal]," wrote James to Salomon in 1830. "If peace is preserved they will be worth 75 per cent, while in case of war they will drop to 45. . . ."

Thus the brothers became the most militant pacifists ever. Of course, it takes a great deal more power, ingenuity and statesmanship to promote peace than to preach war. The Family needed all the strength it had. While the ladies glittered in manse and park, while their sons rode to hounds with the finest lordlings in the land, the men worked as hard as ever, intercepting lightning bolts from the chancelleries.

They were helped by their astounding, unshakable solidarity. The Yiddish-German code they had used as five striplings working under father Mayer was the code that now flitted back and forth between the five great national institutions. (Just as Landgrave William of Hesse had once been called "Herr Goldstein," so the Chancellor, Prince Metternich, was now termed "Uncle.") The common-courier system carrying their messages had grown into a mighty continental network operating by land, sea and air. Waterloo was not the last, but the first, of the system's big scoops.

On February 13, 1820, the Duke de Berry, heir presumptive to Louis XVIII, was assassinated outside the Paris opera. Instantly James triggered messengers to London, Vienna, Frankfurt. Long before their governments or their stock-exchange rivals got wind of it, the Houses Rothschild knew that the Bourbon hope was dead. In 1830 James's carrier pigeons outraced any other newsbearers of the July Revolution. And Nathan appears to have been the first man in London to know of King Louis Philippe's ascent to power.

If the breeze didn't carry Rothschild pigeons, it pushed Rothschild sails. "The English ministry," wrote Talleyrand to Louis Philippe's sister, "is always informed of everything by Rothschild ten to twelve hours before the dispatches of the British ambassador arrive. This is necessarily so because the vessels used by the Rothschild couriers belong to that house; they take no passengers and sail in all weathers."

The Family developed a dispatch organization even more reliable than that of other great powers. Various countries began to use its international postmen. A rather piquant situation developed. In the nineteenth century, as in our own, the mails were not only an instrument for carrying letters but also for inspecting them. The Austrian postal service showed a special inquisitiveness. A detective postmaster wrote to Vienna: "I have often noticed that the Rothschild couriers who travel from Naples to Paris . . . take with them all the dispatches of the French, English and Spanish ministers accredited in Naples, Rome and Florence. In addition, they also deal with the communications passing between the courts of Naples and Rome and their legations throughout Europe. . . . These Rothschild couriers travel via Piacenza. As we have an Austrian garrison there . . . it might be possible to induce one or another of these clerks to hand over their dispatches for our perusal. . . ."

The matter was deemed important enough to be brought to the Chancellor's attention. A most delicate dilemma confronted Metternich. On the one hand, it would be delicious to read not only foreign diplomatic mail, but, particularly, the confidential exchanges of his dear, inscrutable friends the Rothschilds. On the other hand, the Chancellor himself often used The Family's blue-and-yellow-capped supermessengers. His own high secrets might be revealed to a subordinate postal official.

Metternich was not for nothing Europe's most intricate diplomat. He issued the following order:

"The couriers of the House of Rothschild passing through Lombardy between Naples and Paris are to > be regarded and treated as official Austrian couriers when carrying dispatches with the [Austrian] Imperial and Royal seal. . . . If, however, they should be found carrying letters which have nothing to indicate that they are of an official [Austrian] nature, such letters shall be subject to the usual regulations in force."

But The Family outfoxed the fox. It knew that some of its mail was being tapped. It also realized that Metternich would believe some otherwise unconvincing statements if he thought he was not meant to read them. The brothers, of course, had a vested interest in peace, especially between Austria and France. And so there would travel from Paris to the Vienna house an intrafamily letter of supposedly "strictest secrecy" which went on and on about the flattering remarks the French King had made about the Austrian Chancellor: The Family had certain messengers who were excellent at being intercepted.

The Family also had a marvelously changeable shape. Its couriers bound it tightly together; but when it received an awkward request—say, for armament funds—it could sprawl on the instant into five widely separated and quite disorganized brothers. "Your Excellency," the reply of spokesman Amschel would read, ". . . your Excellency will be graciously aware that I can act in this matter only in consultation with my absent brothers . . . and will therefore attempt to inform them of your request." Unfortunately, it would develop that Salomon was deep in the toils of a health cure; that communications to Carl had been cut off by an Italian mutiny; that James was traveling, and Nathan bedded by the grippe.

The five could play infinite tricks with their fivefoldedness. Bismarck discovered that his gardening friend

Amschel had the nerve to support Austria financially against Prussia. He protested. Amschel became unwell—that is, inaccessible. Bismarck remonstrated with the other Rothschilds, and the other Rothschilds declared themselves ever so astonished, perplexed, puzzled by misguided, senile old Amschel.

Then there was the case of Nathan, who backed the liberal, and therefore anti-Metternich, party in the Spanish civil war. Metternich fumed. Thereupon James complained to Salomon, in a neatly intercepted letter, that Nathan had been led astray by his radical wife and father-in-law, and how such transgressions must be prevented in future. Metternich forgave.

No maneuver was too devious for The Family to force the peace. During the tension between quasi-liberal France and ultraconservative Austria, it hatched pacifist plots in most of the government palaces in Europe. Its pipelines reached everywhere. Nathan in London was very close to the Duke of Wellington and to the innermost British circles. Salomon had the eye, ear and purse of Metternich. James saw the French King every few days. Carl kept check on the masters of Italy, from Naples to Sardinia. Quite often it happened that the chief executive of an important power wanted to convey some crucial thoughts to his counterparts elsewhere without committing himself officially. The five brothers were perfect vehicles—if such transmission suited their purpose. After talking to friends in Downing Street, Nathan would send off certain observations, which James produced at St. Cloud, Salomon cited in Vienna's Hofburg. . . . Ostensibly, these were scribblings from Rothschild to Rothschild. Actually, they had the force of privy communications between governments.

At one point Nathan opined that "if France takes action against the Austrian side, we in England shall join the Austrians. If the Austrians take action, we shall join France." That little Family chat made an enormous impression by the Seine and by the Danube. It helped leash the two empires for the time being.

The brothers knew that sometimes it was not diplomacy they must wield, but unvarnished power. In 1831 Louis Philippe, the semirevolutionary King of France, persisted in abetting the semirevolutionary new Italian states against the Habsburg Empire. Austria talked about defending legitimacy to the last drop of blood. France swore to die for freedom. James in Paris seized on the one chance for peace: Casimir Périer, a prudent financier like himself, must be premier. "I informed his Majesty," James wrote to Salomon, "that if he took Périer into his ministry, his credit would rise."

Périer received his appointment. Austrian troops, however, marched into Bologna. The French government, under strong popular pressure, was about to express itself in perilous language. The credit of France now intervened directly. "Yesterday," James wrote Salomon, "the note was drafted which France is about to send. It contained the phrase: 'évacuez immédiatement Bologne.' . . . I shall see that this is left out."

It was. France made do with Platonic indignation, and war was staved off.

On other occasions the brothers Rothschild waxed blunter still. In 1839 King Leopold of new-born Belgium wanted to wrest by force the provinces of Luxembourg and Limburg from the Netherlands. Gutele's boys would not let him.

"The Belgian government," Salomon declared openly, "will not get a half-penny from us, although they have been begging for money for months. Difficult though I found it to keep refusing, I shall feel compensated if Belgium yields and peace is restored."

Belgium yielded. Rothschild loaned.

"It is in the nature of things," Bismarck advised an aide who was trying to get Prussian armaments financed, "that the House should do everything possible to prevent war from breaking out. This fact shows how delicate one must be in dealing with Rothschild."

2. Short-Term and Long

Bismarck, not ordinarily a delicate type, did at last get some wars in against Austria and France. But in the end, as another chapter will show, the Rothschilds gave him their own brand of comeuppance.

Just the same, Bismarck had his way. The Family's international veto power waned in the second half of the nineteenth century. In part this must be ascribed to The Family's own success. It had helped to stimulate the economy of the various countries so briskly that they were now beyond dependence on any one group of financiers, however powerful.

The boys' ultimate historical performance proved what any stock-exchange connoisseur knows: short-term consequences of a Rothschild move are usually the very opposite of its long-term effect. The immediate impact of those five brothers was neither sweet nor happy, nor anything but ruinous to competitors. The quintet was not the kind to bother about the social good. They were called Jews of the Bourbons, Coffers of the Reaction, Usurers of Metternich. Some of those epithets seemed hard to refute. And yet all that unprecedented ruthlessness and craft had an eventual positive result.

The efficiency which powered Mayer's sons brought on enormous economic spring cleaning; a sweeping away of fiscal dead wood; a renovation of old credit structures and an invention of new ones; a formation—implicit in the sheer existence of five different Rothschild banks in five different countries—of fresh money channels via clearing-houses; a method of replacing the old unwieldy shipping of gold bullion by a worldwide system of debits and credits.

One of the greatest contributions was Nathan's new technique for floating international loans. Before, the English investor had been hesitant about foreign projects. He didn't much care to receive dividends in all sorts of strange and cumbersome currencies. Now Nathan attracted him—the most powerful investment source of the nineteenth century—by making foreign bonds payable in pounds sterling.

Altogether, the Rothschild work and the Rothschild name (with Napoleon's, the greatest self-made image) served to supplant the era of title and pedigree with the era of money and ability. In one of his more dined-and-wined moments at rue Laffitte, Heine would think of the five brothers as great revolutionaries: Hadn't they usurped the last pretensions of feudalism? Hadn't they abolished the stiff, stagnant pre-eminence of land ownership? Hadn't they created instead the investor's domain of money, capital and state bonds which anyone could possess at any time? Weren't these the most flexible, equitable, productive ruling instruments yet invented? And weren't the Rothschilds the archdemons of progress?

We needn't be so carried away as Heine to concede a fact: Mayer's boys helped abolish the very absolutism which had at first used them for its tool. However unwittingly, the Rothschilds supplied more soil for the flowering of bourgeois democracy than any other five individuals in Europe.

Railroads were a case in point. The Family, more than any other group, brought the locomotive to Europe. As usual, what they saw was the income promised by those shining rails. At the same time, the iron tracks were to become the lifeline of commerce. Hitherto travel had been the privilege of aristocrats and soldiers; now worker and peasant gained a mobility they had not known before.

Yet the Rothschilds practically had to force railroads on a suspicious continent. It was to be the most hotly contested venture in Family history.

3. The Railway Madness

(a) Austria

The railways were born in England, as George Stephenson's "steam-coaches," right under Nathan's nose. But by the time he began to smell the lucre in their soot, they were no longer buyable. Other bankers had gotten there first. Nathan, of course, would not touch what he could not own or control. He contented himself with alerting his brothers on the Continent.

In Vienna, Salomon picked up the idea. It was a brave move. Austria, the most dashingly backward empire of its time, thought that horseless carriages were almost as weird as socialism. To prepare a more hospitable climate, Salomon dispatched a fact-finding committee to England; it was composed of von Wertheimstein, his general manager, and Professor Franz Riepel of the Vienna Polytechnic Institute, an early advocate of the horseless madness.

The two returned a report full of technical and financial enthusiasm. Nevertheless, they could not very well overlook the resistance to the chimneyed freaks even in liberal Britain. In some English counties a postillion had to ride fifty yards ahead of the locomotives to warn local inhabitants, with cries and trumpet blasts, of the approaching abomination. The gentry, who were fond of their horses, thought it was all a horrid bore. One of Nathan's best friends, the Duke of Wellington, remarked that "railroads will only encourage the lower classes to move about needlessly."

Salomon read the report and paused. In 1830 the July Revolution in Paris produced business vagaries which needed all his attention. But in his mind the conviction grew that enormous profits could be made with a North Austrian railway transporting Galician salt and Silesian coal to Vienna.

Business settled down in 1832. Salomon struck formidably and quietly, as was his wont. For a closer introduction to the transport business he bought the horse-tramway network (operated by Emile Zola's father, of all people) in the Austrian provinces. He also hired a battalion of expert engineers who surveyed, foot by foot, the whole route of the projected line.

Soon afterward (in April, 1835) a great poetic and public-minded document reached the desk of Ferdinand II of Austria. It began with "Most Excellent and Most Puissant Emperor! Most Gracious Emperor and Lord!" and sang ardently the "benefits to the state and to the public weal" a railroad between Vienna and Galicia would bring, begged his Majesty's most gracious sanction and ended, "your Majesty's most true and humble servant, S. M. v. Rothschild."

Prince Metternich favored the application. And since his Most Puissant Majesty was a signature-writing device operated by the Chancellor, the application received All-Highest approval. On November 11, 1835, Rothschild pocketed the concession to build the European Continent's first sizable railway—sixty miles of track from Vienna to Bochnia in Galicia. (The Imperial Postal Service exacted a clause from Baron Rothschild insuring reimbursement if his iron beasts ate up too much mail business.)

The project was estimated at twelve million gulden, and Salomon immediately proceeded to provide it. He issued 12,000 shares at 1,000 gulden each—retaining 8,000 for himself, offering 4,000 on a first-come, first-served basis. Attracted by the confluence of two myths, Rothschild and railroad, the investing public came in droves.

But a general public existed, too. If the railways caused resistance in top-hatted England, they provoked revulsion in shako'd Austria. Salomon was broadly damned for foisting twentieth-century fiendishness on a peaceful eighteenth-century state. The Vienna press began to seethe with terrors and prophecies. Experts proved the madness of Rothschild's scheme. The human respiratory system, they said, could not stand a speed exceeding fifteen miles an hour. The lungs were likely to collapse, and the organs of circulation jolted out of place. Blood would spurt from the travelers' noses, eyes, ears and mouths. Any tunnel more than sixty yards long would suffocate all the riders in all the carriages; the train would rush out at the other end, a driverless berserk hearse. Certainly no passenger should take a steamcoach trip without being attended by his personal doctor who could intercede with the engineer at the throttle.

And all sorts of doctors did come to the fore—of the front page, that is. So-called neurological experts sounded the alarm. According to their articles, the human psyche, already overburdened by newfangled stimuli, would completely run amok once subjected to the stress of railroad travel. The speed of the machine might drive men to suicide, women might lapse into sexual orgies. There were reports from England that innocent passers-by had been driven jabberingly insane by the mere sight of one of these zooming, smoking serpents. And Rothschild was now given license to finance such savagery in gay Vienna?

There were other reports from England, financial ones, issued by the early railway companies. These were not at all gruesome. Salomon's rivals, particularly the banking house Sina, found them positively mouth-watering. Sina let Rothschild bear the brunt as disturber of North Austria's peace. Meanwhile it unobtrusively applied for, and finally got, a license to build a southern track from Vienna to the Adriatic Sea.

Thus Salomon saw himself attacked on two fronts. Usually he could count on some very well-greased connections with the Vienna press, but his journalist friends were impotent at the height of the outcry. Through Chancellor Metternich he enjoyed the loftiest possible support within the government, but Sina was a power, too, and there was no way of invalidating a rival license once the administrative machinery had ground it out. In fact, when he proposed a concession for a northeastern branch line to his own railway, he was reduced to a competitive basis on a par with Sina.

A Rothschild, however, has not only more money but also more ideas than the next fellow. To handle the impasse, Salomon arranged for another patriotic prose poem to float onto Kaiser Ferdinand's desk. It was a preliminary but resounding progress report on "the great national work, namely the Vienna-Bochnia railway." It culminated in a masterful paragraph:

> The most obedient and loyal servant of your Majesty feels that he may venture in all humility most respectfully to request your Majesty that you may be graciously pleased to permit that the Vienna-Bochnia railway shall be allowed to bear the auspicious name of "Kaiser Ferdinand Nordbahn."

Simultaneously, Prince Metternich received a letter which proposed that his Excellency the Finance Minister and his Excellency the Lord President of the Council "place themselves at the head of this national undertaking" by becoming its patrons, to be so handed down to posterity on all the railway's plaques, scrolls and documents. His Princely Highness, Chancellor Metternich himself, was asked to accept the office of the railway's official High Protector.

As always, Metternich came through. He and his several Excellencies agreed to endorse the Rothschild railway with their names. Indeed, the finance minister advised the Emperor in the warmest terms to do the same.

"This undertaking is on a colossal scale," he wrote, "such as has never been contemplated in Europe before . . . and will remain as an everlasting monument to your Majesty's reign."

On April 9, 1836, an imperial decree promulgated his Majesty's gracious decision to let Rothschild's track be known henceforward as the "Kaiser Ferdinand Nordbahn" (Emperor Ferdinand Northern Railway). With one stone, Salomon had killed two great birds: the Austrian government had identified itself with the fate and prosperity of his project, not Sina's; and the renown of the House of Habsburg now sanctified the railway madness. In the face of such overwhelming auspices, the protests died away. Apparently it was all over but the building.

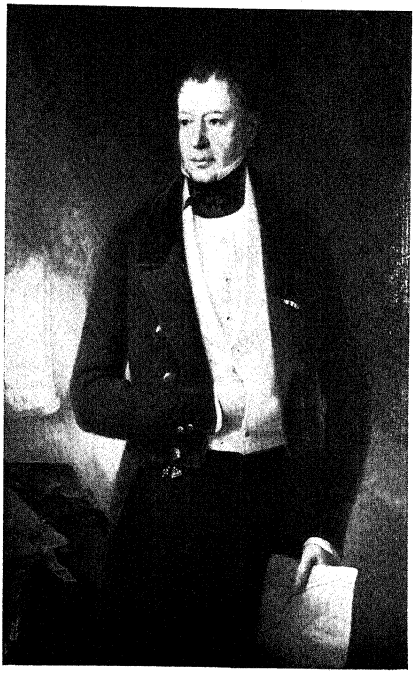
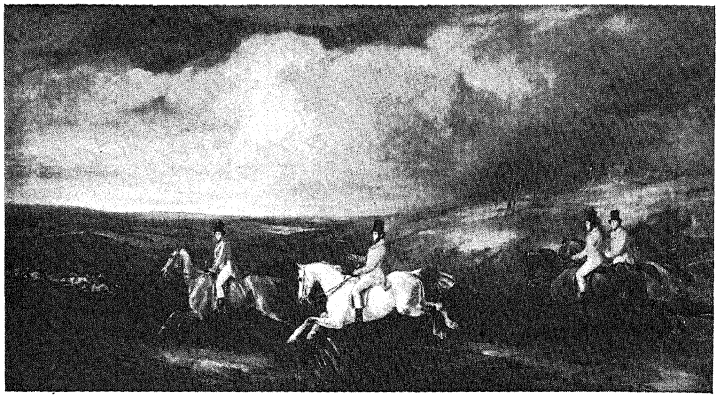
To that task Salomon now applied himself. Two weeks after the Emperor's grant of the name, he called the first of a series of shareholders' meetings. He transferred his building concession, hitherto held personally, to the company. He saw to the appointment of a provisional board of directors, submitted estimates, blueprints, proposals—and was told he was a cheat and a fake.



Suddenly, within the company and without, a different kind of opposition flared. Secretly sponsored by Sina, a memorandum went from hand to hand. The railroad idea as such was not attacked (after all, Sina had one on the fire), but the arrant misuse of august names was implied. All planners of the Nordbahn stood accused of the grossest scientific blunders. The memorandum set forth its charges in impressive scientific language. It went on about gradients and the relationship of rail curvatures to steam traction, and about the scandalous inability of the Rothschild people to meet any such problems. Last, not least, figures were cited that made the financial future of a northern railroad look disastrous.

The memorandum caused so much talk that the court began to prick up its ears. The Emperor forsook his usual existence as a signing machine. "Dear Prince Metternich," he fretted. ". . . Numerous unfavorable rumors are abroad about the railroad which I have permitted to be associated with my name. . . . You will report to me whether difficulties have arisen in the further progress of the work on this railway, and, in that case, what these difficulties are."



Salomon was still Salomon. Again his parry hit home better than the enemy's thrust. He instantly commissioned the authoritative Professor Riepel of the Polytechnic to compose a polemic which met "this insult with the contempt it deserves" and demolished the technical details of the opposition memorandum point by point. Then he summoned the shareholders to a dramatic showdown forecasting the proxy battles of our day. He offered to repurchase all certificates not held by himself, and thus to repossess the building franchise he had transferred to the company. He would proceed as the project's sole owner and director if the shareholders did not give him their full confidence as well as authority to commence construction forthwith.

He got their authorization. He received their full confidence. A landslide vote removed his enemies from the board. Not content with that, Salomon turned the Emperor's note to Metternich from a liability into an asset. He publicly interpreted it as a sign of warm solicitude. In an official letter the House of Rothschild expressed appreciation of this "further proof of his Majesty's gracious concern for the prosperity of the Kaiser Ferdinand Nordbahn."

Thus S. M. reversed public opinion into the Nordbahn's favor. The greatest engineers in the state service were given leave to work on the construction, which started at last. Salomon even managed to borrow the Crown surveyor. The track grew with comparative speed, even though the original cost estimate proved, as original cost estimates will, too low. On July 7, 1839, Austria scooped the rest of the European mainland by opening the first section of the first major railway line. And on the following day it became the first Continental nation to have anything as modern as a train collision, happily a trifling one.

The passengers did not run amok—but the shares, after some initial vagaries, rose madly.

(b) France

The Austrian Rothschild had made a great contribution to the general progress and to his own wealth. The French one did not want to lag behind. James Rothschild opened his Paris–St. Germain railroad in 1837 and the Paris-Versailles line in 1839. After these two successful experiments, he began to create the Chemin de Fer du Nord—for those days, a gigantic project, which connected the capital with the industrial regions of the north.

But his first tracks, too, were not exactly strewn with roses. France also had transport experts who produced headlines dripping with doom. They saw forests and crops set afire by sparks from the trains; inhabitants driven from the countryside by the shrieks and the clangors; cattle stampeding; grass, flowers, bushes withered by soot. France would be streaked with deserts.

In Austria the government had stood up against such rantings. Not here. In 1835 the French Parliament had been presented with the idea of a state-owned steamcoach system and had thrown out the idea as utopian and ridiculous. Now Rothschild's pressure for a private license became irresistible. Thiers, the King's first minister, yielded. But he was no Metternich. "We must give the Parisians this as a toy," he said. "But it will never carry a passenger or a parcel."

There were less highly placed but equally dangerous forces to contend with—a certain Jules Mires, for example, a man of peculiar brilliance. He had begun his career in Bordeaux, where he had published a boulevard paper featuring an exhaustive list of obituaries. With each death he printed the name of the doctor who had failed to save the deceased. The physicians of Bordeaux saw reason. Mires stopped publication, and went to Paris a rich man.

Here he started another paper along similar lines, but focusing on a different subject. The Journal des Chemins de Fer vividly pictured rail mishaps, rail frauds, rail atrocities. Its voice grew louder and louder, and Mires grew richer and richer, selling his selected silences.

Over all these stings and yawps Beau James rode in customary grandeur. He floated his Chemin de Fer du Nord with a stock issue worth 150 million francs. Fully seven and a half millions' worth of shares were distributed free of charge (or of noise) to ministers, deputies and journalists. Suddenly the guardians of the public weal began to see the benefits of the Rothschild railroad. Construction proceeded apace. On June 15, 1846, representatives of the Crown, of Parliament and of the press joined to hail Baron James on the opening of his northern railway.

He was not yet out of the woods. Locomotive engineers, in the infancy of their profession, had much to learn about curves. Three weeks after the opening, a train rounded a bend too quickly and killed thirty-seven people. The accident stunned France. A virulent anti-Semitic storm broke out against the president of the line. It vented itself primarily in the form of pamphlets, of which "The History of Rothschild I, King of the Jews" became most famous. Afterwards there appeared a counterpamphlet, "Reply by Rothschild the First, King of the Jews, to Satan the Last, King of the Slanderers."

The interesting point about the latter publication is that it was written on speculation. James had not commissioned it, and when he was approached, he did not pay the author. To get a thing done he would bribe, befitting his status, on a munificent scale. Petty graft disgusted him. Besides, the track was completed. The kinks were being worked out. The Northern Railway could stand and succeed on its own merits.

It did. Le Chemin de Fer du Nord became as great a national asset as the Kaiser Ferdinand Nordbahn. No less than the Austrian Rothschild, the French one had captured for himself a great new source of income and given the industrial revolution a big push forward.

A fly—or rather, a vulture—remained in the ointment. After all, non-northern rail lines were possible, too. There were three other directions, and several other men who thought their brains and mercilessness a match for The Family's. Out of the railway competition arose a rival syndicate which overflowed all national borders and challenged almost every department of every Family bank. This enemy severely tested the Rothschilds' invincibility. Another, moving still faster, had already proved them mortal: when the international onslaught was unleashed, the biggest brother was no longer there to meet it.

4. Il est Mort

In the middle of June, 1836, the city of Frankfurt witnessed an unparalleled assembly. Its greatest family was celebrating its greatest wedding. Lionel Rothschild, Nathan's eldest son, espoused Charlotte Rothschild, Carl's eldest daughter.

From London and from Naples, carriage after carriage thundered into the town, bringing not only parents but also dowries and gifts. From Paris, James arrived in almost imperial pomp, with Rossini among others in his retinue. From Vienna came Salomon in a castlelike coach. Amschel presided, and Gutele, the eighty-five-year-old matriarch (and far from the end of her tether), left her ghetto house to crown the occasion with her presence. It is doubtful that any emperor or chancellor could have matched the total power congregating here.

Yet even The Family must in turn bow to a superior force. Right into the middle of the celebration it reached, and it plucked the most formidable Rothschild of them all.

It began with a carbuncle on Nathan's skin. On the very day of the wedding the inflammation grew oppressive. Nathan refused all entreaties and insisted on standing beside his son while the rabbi pronounced the nuptial blessing. At the feast the bridegroom saw his father shiver with high fever. He was taken to bed. The next day he became delirious. German doctors were consulted; couriers sped to England for Nathan's personal physician, the famous Benjamin Travers. Travers arrived at last—too late. The poison had spread through Nathan's system.

Towards the end his mind cleared. He called his children around him and dealt with death in all his usual shrewd, powerful confidence. Salomon reported to Metternich:

> He told his sons that the world would now try to make money out of us, so that it behooved them to be all the more careful. And he remarked that whether any son had 50,000 pounds more or less was not important to him. All that mattered was that they should all hold together in unity. . . . As he received the last consolations of our religion he said, "It is not necessary that I should pray so much, for believe me, according to my convictions I have not sinned." To my daughter Betty, as she took leave of him, he said in the truly British manner, "Good night forever."

On the afternoon of July 28, 1836, Nathan Rothschild died, not quite sixty years old. At midnight pigeons were released that flew to Rothschild offices and agents all over Europe. They carried a brief message:

Il est mort.

Those three words stirred the world. The London Times gathered itself up for one of its rare superlatives. "The death of Nathan Mayer Rothschild," an editorial said, "is one of the most important events for the city and perhaps for Europe in a long time. . . . No operations, comparable to his, have existed in Europe to this time. . . . Mr. Rothschild, like the rest of his brothers, held a patent of nobility with the title of Baron, but he never assumed it and was more justly proud of that name under which he had acquired a distinction which no title could convey. . . ."

London produced a funeral worthy of a royal dying. The body was brought up the Thames by special steamboat. Then it was conveyed, not to his house but—significantly—to his business palace at New Court, where it lay in state. The procession from the Orthodox synagogue to the East End Cemetery blackened the streets. Never had such numbers and such dignities followed a private individual. A group of Jewish orphans whose institution the dead man had subsidized led the cortege, chanting psalms. Behind the coffin walked his sons and brothers (strict Jewish ritual bade the women remain behind in the darkened house), the top echelons of the City, the Lord Mayor of London and sheriffs, a large contingent of the nobility, and the ambassadors of Austria, Prussia, Russia, Naples and virtually every other accredited power.

And yet his tombstone says nothing of his wealth, his honors or his titles. It reads: "Nathan Mayer Rothschild: born at Frankfurt on the Main 7th September 5537 [the Jewish year for A.D. 1777] third son of Mayer Amschel Rothschild, a man known and venerated throughout Europe, whose virtuous example he followed."

In life as in death, this greatest single Rothschild was only a fragment of The Family. In life as in death, he remained an instrument of the dynastic principle laid down by his father, the patriarch. As in old Mayer's last will, so in his own, Nathan charged his sons to remain partners and to preserve at all costs and by every means the unity of the house. As in Mayer's last will, so here the sons were sole inheritors of the firm; the daughters and their husbands would have no part or say whatsoever in their brothers' affairs. (The four girls did receive, in addition to the dowries and huge sums given to them during Nathan's lifetime, a lump sum of 100,000 pounds—over a million dollars—each.)

Like Mayer's will, so Nathan's pointedly avoided any concrete mention of his endless assets. Not only the continuity but the privacy of the fortune must be maintained.

"I would request," said Nathan's last document, "that the executors of the Will as well as any relations in Frankfurt or London unnamed, confine their efforts simply and solely to the due execution of this my Testament and, since it does not pertain to their office at all, not to ask for any further information, or for the production of any books or accounts."

In a letter, Salomon reported how Nathan's sons had pledged to keep the example of solidarity and mutual affection which their father and uncles had set. ". . . there will be no change of any kind."

Inevitably, there was some. The clan closed ranks even more tightly as it moved toward its goals; only the goals grew a little different. For the first four decades of the nineteenth century the Rothschilds had been great conquerors. Afterwards, and into our time, they became great lords. Three of Nathan's brothers belonged to the older school. They were better at swooping than at possessing or savoring. James, the fourth and youngest brother—only ten years older than his eldest nephew—combined both phases and was conqueror and lord in one. Tacitly, but not accidentally, Family leadership now fell to him.

As it happened, shortly before Nathan's death James had built himself a palace befitting the doge of the golden clan. On March 1, 1836, Heine wrote:

> For the beau monde of Paris, yesterday was a remarkable day; we had the first performance of Meyerbeer's long-awaited "Huguenots" at the Opera, followed by Rothschild's first ball in his new house. As I did not leave until four o'clock this morning, and have not been asleep yet, I am too tired to give you an account of the scene of this festival, and of the magnificent new palace built entirely in the style of the Renaissance in which the guests wander, expressing their admiration and astonishment. The palace unites everything which the spirit of the sixteenth century could conceive and the money of the nineteenth century could pay for. Two years have been spent in constant work on its decorations. It is the Versailles of the financial absolute monarch. . . . As at all Rothschild receptions, the guests were chosen strictly for their social rank, the men distinguished for their great aristocratic names or positions, while the women were distinguished for their beauty and elegance. . . .

If amid all this select splendor the Baron ever forgot his Jew Street scrabblings, the world was there to remind him. The rough, rabid urgencies that had shaped his rise remained—in other men. From James's own realm, forces emerged which proved that even for Rothschilds life was not a ball but a jungle.

5. The Grandest Larceny Ever

A saying claims that great champions breed great contenders. James, improving the wisdom, didn't stop at breeding them; he employed them. The French founder, as Heine remarked, had a rare gift for taking a lease on the talents of other people. But like other first-rate users of people, Rothschild failed to recognize that the human means he hired were, as far as they were concerned, ends in themselves; that a man's ability is more easily put on the payroll than his ego—that, in fact, ego may subvert ability, to result not in talented loyalty but in accomplished revolt. Within a decade James found himself ambushed by two topnotch mutineers.

The first posed the lesser threat, but he struck the lower blow. Among James's protégés a slender young man named Carpentier ranked high. He had a lightning mind for figures and a pleasant, humorous, yet efficient manner which earned him the chief-accountancy of the Chemin de Fer du Nord. Soon he managed to become part of the Baron's personal entourage, or at least the lower fringes thereof. James took the bright youngster along on some of his travels and even invited him to the less exclusive receptions at the Palais Rothschild. In front of ledgers, across the table, during a dull journey, in fact everywhere, Carpentier performed well and looked lively. He could write a balance sheet or crack a joke with equal finesse.

One afternoon in September, 1856, he applied for a four days' leave. James granted it readily. The two had an agreeable chat which has come down to us because the occasion became historic all too soon.

In an expansive mood James remarked that he had just succeeded in clearing the rights for an additional branch line to his railway. When the news became public on the following day, he said, everybody would no doubt assume that Rothschild was now another hundred million richer.

"Monsieur le Baron, a proposal," said Carpentier with his special blend of respectfulness and banter. "Of that mythical hundred million, let me have just thirty real ones."

The Baron laughed, and on the pleasant impulse of the moment gave Carpentier his heavy golden watch chain as a memento of the day. The young man thanked him profusely and went on his leave.

He did not return. At first his absence was not taken too seriously. Then pay day came. Company employees queued up for their wages—and Carpentier had the keys to the safes. The executive in charge sent a messenger to the chief accountant's lodgings. The messenger reported that they were empty. A swift inquiry at Carpentier's brother's brought out that he, too, was puzzled by the sudden disappearance—and by something else. In the mail the brother had received the baronial watch chain, as though it were Carpentier's farewell present.

Now the Baron was notified. He alone had a duplicate set of safe keys. James arrived. With grim foreknowledge he opened the strong boxes. Gone were the entire cash assets of the company, some six million francs.

The Baron, his aides said later, turned pale. But his sangfroid did not leave him for one second. He turned around, issued a two-sentence public statement that a robbery had occurred, then placed a complete embargo on all further details to the press.

The details had only just begun. James ordered a roll-call, and found that five other members of the bookkeeping staff seemed to be missing, too. So were a great many documents. The Baron sensed that this was a conspiracy too big for even six million francs. It took days of concentrated searching to track down all its aspects. Carpentier had been a flawless embezzler. But finally James discovered that his protégé had made the major killing in stock certificates, his own favorite medium. Except that Carpentier's approach was a little different: he didn't bull or bear; he stole.

The company's shares were kept in bundles of a thousand each. Carpentier & Accomplices had removed two to three hundred shares from the middle of each packet, leaving the top and bottom politely undisturbed. After the dainty despoilment of all bundles, the gang sold the stocks in small quantities over a long period of time. This, in the best Rothschild fashion, avoided attention or price fluctuation.

The stock-certificate aspect of the larceny amounted to some twenty-five million francs. If we add the cash booty of six million, we arrive at more than the thirty million Carpentier had asked—not so jocularly, after all—of James. The pleasant young man towered over the greatest robbers of his time. His total haul came to over fifteen million dollars.

James struck back in the only way he could. An unlimited credit was opened for the private detectives who joined the national police forces in the big hunt. But Carpentier had prepared his flight as scrupulously as his crime. A whole year before he struck, he had already started investing in it—with the company's money, of course. The gang had bought an ocean-going steamer for two million francs. Next, under assumed names they had obtained a house somewhere in the United States. When the time came, in September, 1856, Carpentier applied for his four-day leave. He lifted the cash and traveled from Paris to Liverpool. There the get-away ship waited in the harbor. His accomplices had the engines running. His mistress, a certain Mlle. Georgette, waited, smiling, on the gangplank. And so he recedes out of our ken in his own luxurious stateroom, champagne on his lips, Georgette on his lap—uncaught.

James personally absorbed the entire loss. No other man in the country could have survived the sudden disappearance of thirty million francs without even beginning to strain his reserves. For the Baron, the timing of the blow seemed more harmful than its size. The House of Rothschild just then was locked in a desperate struggle with the second ingrate. For the first time since its rise, The Family had to stoop to a fight for life.

6. Monsters' Duel

Antagonist number two was far more ambitious and dangerous than Carpentier. But at first he was also far more useful. Jacob Emile Pereire, a Jew of Portuguese origin, began his career as a journalist collaborating with his brother Isaac. In the early 1830's he poured out articles on advanced social ideas, on new engineering fields like railroads, and on financial matters. Beau James's first railroad project was running into heavy reactionary weather. He bought up every prorailroad force in sight, including M. Pereire, that fountainhead of progressive energies. The man proved himself powerfully competent during the building of the Paris–St. Germain line.

When James went on to lay a track between Paris and Versailles, he put his find in charge of the entire construction. This line, running along the right bank of the Seine, was also successful. But, alas, it no longer had a monopoly on cattle scaring. Achille Fould, another big financial gun, built his own railway to Versailles on the left bank. As a result, Heine began to speak of Rothschild as the Chief Rabbi of Rive Droite, and of M. Fould as Chief Rabbi of Rive Gauche. The rivalry between the two financiers created irreverent thoughts in another mind as well. Emile Pereire, who was now acting as James's proconsul in the creation of the gigantic Northern Railway, always found time to cast glances across the Seine.

There was much to look at in that direction, especially if you had your eyes on the main chance. The 1830's had gone. The 1840's were waning, and so was King Louis Philippe, whom Rothschild owned. Louis Napoleon was waxing, and after the old king's flight he became President in 1848. Rothschild didn't own Napoleon. Achille Fould did. James's rival had lent the new ruler money during his adventuring and playboying years; now Fould was Napoleon's closest financial adviser. On October 31, 1849, the President appointed M. Fould finance minister of the Republic.

Not much later, Louis Napoleon, James Rothschild and Emile Pereire sat in a flower-wreathed steamcoach. The occasion was the opening of the Northern Railway extension line to St. Quentin. "Vive l'Empereur!" shouted the people, anticipating the coronation of the President, which was indeed soon to come. "Vive Rothschild!" they cried, hailing the enlargement of the financier's empire. And yet, as everyone remarked, only Napoleon and Pereire smiled. James remained grave. By then he knew that his chief executive, beaming so sweetly at the populace, was filled with treason. Pereire had deserted to the enemy.

To be more exact, he was about to become the enemy—the most vicious, the most determined, the most powerful one The Family would have to face until Hitler's advent. Pereire was no glorified pickpocket, like Carpentier. Nor did he simply switch from a master called Rothschild to a master called Fould. He became a full-fledged partner of Fould's, and soon more than that. The two founded a huge new company, whose specific aim was the slaying of the so-far indestructible giant Rothschild.

Fould supplied his wealth and his status as finance minister. Pereire, assisted by his brother, furnished the fury that drove the thing. He was a veritable whirlwind of schemes and angles that used everything in his experience, from the progressive politicking of his early journalism to the high-powered gimmicks he had learned under James.

His main idea was a marvelous synthesis of socialist sentiment and financial piracy. Why, Fould's propaganda asked, should the credit of the nation be the playground of just a few? Why not democratize it? Didn't a butcher have as good a right to loan a thousand francs to the fatherland as Rothschild with his thousand million? Why not create a people's bank, gathering a myriad tiny trickles into a huge reservoir which would use its power in the common interest and not in favor of one bloated individual?

On December 2, 1852, Louis Napoleon became Emperor. Almost at the same time Pereire's people's bank electrified the national scene. Called Crédit Mobilier, it issued 120,000 shares at five hundred francs each, so that not only the butcher but even his thrifty delivery boy could become a financier. That was the democratic feature of the enterprise. For aristocratic decoration, the names of the Princess von Leuchtenberg and the Duke of Galliera embellished the founders' list. Because of his official position, Finance Minister Fould could not participate in name, but he backed the issue fully. And Pereire sat at the controls. He had created France's most politically lovable profit institution.

The value of a Crédit Mobilier share stayed at 500 francs for only half an hour. At the end of the first day it was quoted at 1,100. Within a week it rose to 1,600. There had been nothing as sensational on the Paris money horizon since the advent of James Rothschild himself. The nation showered its savings on the new bank, and Napoleon III his patronage.

Beau James became Quick James. He appeared in Vienna, where brother Salomon rushed him into an audience with Francis Joseph. The Austrian monarch gave James, his consul general in Paris, a very pleasant courtesy message to Louis Napoleon. It was conveyed, together with the implication that, in contrast to Pereire, Rothschild was a Continental power of the first order; a house through which flowed the good will of the greatest legitimate sovereigns; and that this had better be kept in mind by anyone setting himself up as authentic Emperor.

The hint, while pointed, did not have any real effect. More and more of the state's financial business went to the Crédit Mobilier. Meanwhile the Baron had been trying another maneuver, by way of his salon. The drawing rooms of Paris became a theater of war.

A young Andalusian woman named Eugénie de Montijo began to be a frequent guest at James's and Betty's best parties. At first nobody quite understood why. True, she was beautiful. And society gossip knew that Napoleon had tried, unsuccessfully, to invade her bed. But her antecedents were mixed. Her mother, loser in a Madrid palace intrigue, had been forced to resign as lady-in-waiting to the Spanish queen. Eugénie herself had arrived in Paris only in 1850, with few important social credentials. Why, then, did the Baron insist on making her the belle of his receptions?

The answer began to emerge on December 31, 1852. At a secret cabinet council Napoleon III confided his intention of marrying Eugénie de Montijo. He complained of being treated like a parvenu emperor—the great legitimate houses prevented him from bringing home a princess worthy of his eminence.

"If I can't contract a political marriage," he said, "I shall at any rate have the comfort of being able to contract a mariage d'inclination."

A number of French ministers considered this pronouncement only a maneuver against the foreign diplomats who had thwarted Napoleon's dynastic wedding plans. This Eugénie What's-Her-Name, this upstart hussy, to be empress? How ridicule! And how typical that Rothschild, the upstart of upstarts, should be her sponsor! No, Tout-Paris thought it was a decoy. Why else did his Majesty refrain so carefully from any public display of his so-called intentions?

An anti-Eugénie movement crystallized among the older upper crust. Pereire abetted and financed it. James led the pro-Eugénie forces. The war between Rothschild and the Crédit Mobilier now had a front line running through the finest Empire furniture and the lushest carpets of France. At the Tuileries Ball on January 12, 1853, battle was joined.

Scene: the marshal's room, which only the most privileged were allowed to enter. As usual, Baron James escorted Mlle de Montijo, while her mother leaned on the arm of one of his sons. The younger Rothschild thought he could find room for the two ladies on some settees. Whereupon Eugénie and the wife of an "enemy" minister headed for the same upholstery.

To the tune of a waltz, brief intense hostilities commenced. Eugénie, a tiny bit faster, was gathering up her skirts to sit down when Mme. la Ministre announced, loudly and curtly, that these settees were reserved for ministerial families only. The Spanish lady stood painfully suspended while the ministerial matron took her seat. Even the Rothschilds shifted, pale, from one leg to another.

And then something historic came to pass. The skirmish had been observed from the corner of an imperial eye. Napoleon suddenly interrupted the small reception of which he was the object twenty yards away. In a spectacular breach of protocol he hurried to the embattled settee, offered Eugénie and her mother his arms, and led them to the taborets meant exclusively for the All-Highest family. The waltz kept on playing, but a hush fell over the ball. When the talk resumed a moment later, the whole world knew who had won the palace war.

Eleven days afterwards, the Emperor in a message to the people of France declared that in Eugénie he had "chosen the woman I love and honor."

For once a Rothschild victory was Pyrrhic. James thought he had countered the Crédit Mobilier's fury at the bourse with an attack through the imperial boudoir. But though January 30 marked the Emperor's formal engagement to Eugénie, the ceremony brought an entirely unexpected humiliation for Baron James.

Again the masterful chicanery of the enemy was at work. Pereire had kept his eyes not only on the stock market but on the subtlest nuances of the Paris haute volée. For a while now he had watched, and nurtured, a small drama enacted between James Rothschild and Graf Hübner, the new Austrian envoy to France. Hübner did not possess the means of his predecessor. James, still Austria's consul general in Paris, lived on a far more ambassadorial scale than any ambassador. Hübner made futile attempts to treat Rothschild as his subordinate. James sniffed—audibly—that an ambassadorship was meant for a grand seigneur, not a puffed-up little man. This set Hübner seething, and Pereire encouraged him to seethe effectively. When Napoleon's betrothal celebration at Notre Dame was planned, Baron Rothschild naturally figured in the guest list. His invitation was sent in care of the Austrian Embassy. It was not forwarded. Every dignitary in France, including the entire diplomatic corps, appeared at the ceremony, with the blatant exception of Baron James de Rothschild.

Pereire's work was lightning-swift, using one triumph as a steppingstone for another. He already came close to being the financial czar of France. From the Rhine to the Pyrenees he swept everything before him. Yet he well knew the difference between thwarting James and destroying him. Rothschild was a titan straddling five countries. If he was to be annihilated, he would have to be annihilated internationally.

James's failure at Notre Dame did have some international echoes. The ambassadors, ministers and consuls assembled in the cathedral could observe an ugly gap in the hitherto unfailing armor of the house. Pereire considered this a good climate in which to make his first move beyond the border.

And so that very January of 1853, the Crédit Mobilier, barely two months old, wound a tentacle around The Family's Italian fief. The rising Kingdom of Sardinia had concluded one loan with James and was about to contract a second. Pereire distributed some insidiously phrased hints about the clan's decline (vide the debacle at Notre Dame). His Crédit Mobilier made a subterranean offer. Possibly he could have clinched the deal—if Fould, in a personal encounter with James, had not boasted of a great Mediterranean coup about to break.

James instantly smelled the correct rat and dispatched his son Alphonse to Italy. The fight for the loan now went on in broad daylight. Young Alphonse Rothschild won it, at a great cost. "You will appreciate," wrote the Sardinian minister Cavour to a friend, "that this competition has been worth some millions to us."

But Sardinia was just a minor prize. All the Italian states together, as a matter of fact, were chicken feed compared to the stakes for which Pereire and Rothschild were now jockeying. The next assault of the Crédit Mobilier focused on nothing less than the Austrian Empire itself.

Again Pereire's timing was ferociously precise. With Metternich's downfall in 1848, The Family had lost its most powerful advocate. Salomon was entering his seventy-ninth year; his grip grew uncertain. Queasy about returning to Vienna, he governed the bank by remote control from Frankfurt and Paris. And because of a new affront, the Austrian ambassador in Paris had reached a serviceable boiling point regarding the Rothschilds.

James still lacked real influence at court, but he had a kind of voluptuous complaint box affixed to the Emperor in the form of Eugénie. Through her, Baron Rothschild stated his grief about the treachery at Notre Dame. In the course of the next court ball, held on March 3, his Majesty went up to James and expressed regret at not having seen the Baron during the betrothal. Napoleon engaged him in warm conversation, all the while ignoring, and thus publicly mortifying, his Excellency, Graf Hübner. Which was exactly grist for Pereire's mill. He knew that the Ambassador, who had more genealogy than money, disliked credit virtuosos like himself. Until now their association had been limited to isolated anti-Rothschild forays. But after this new outrage, the Ambassador was ready for bigger things. Why not form a really important alliance to demolish those archbankers of all time, the Rothschilds?

Pereire and Hübner had a long talk. Both came away edified. Pereire learned what he had vaguely suspected: a huge railroad opportunity was brewing in Vienna. Austria now had an extensive network of tracks, all of which were state-owned except for Salomon Rothschild's line in the north and the Sina road in the south. But the government was again in financial trouble, and one solution lay in the sale of its railroads. The buyer of such assets might well come to dominate transportation and possibly all commerce in Central Europe. Hübner also learned something. Pereire's Crédit Mobilier wanted to help the Sina group purchase the Austrian railways.

A great many negotiations began to sneak and simmer between Pereire in Paris and Sina in Vienna. Conscious of the threat, the Rothschilds tried to counter with purchase offers of their own. They protested that it was they, after all, who had made the first Austrian steam track possible. They argued in a void. Their Metternich had returned to Vienna but not to power, and he was no longer allowed to operate the All-Highest signing machine. The Pereire-Hübner-Sina team forged ahead smoothly. Guided by Ambassador Hübner, a key representative of the Sina interests began to work in the French capital so secretly that not even James knew of his presence, so efficiently that even the imperial family was drawn into the Pereire-Sina net. On the board of the organization which made the railway bid there now appeared not only the two Pereires, Fould and Sina—but also the Duke of Morny, Napoleon's half-brother.

On New Year's Day, 1855, Pereire struck. His outfit bought a great chunk of the Austrian State Railways for a huge but comparatively advantageous price. The Crédit Mobilier, which supplied the money, had won a most powerful stronghold in Austria.

Pereire did not waste one second before trying to convert stronghold into stranglehold. He started negotiations for the two remaining tracks under government control—the Southern Railway, leading from Vienna to Trieste, and the Lombard-Venetian line. At the stock exchange he loosed a series of destructive maneuvers against the Rothschild rail company. His agents separately bought quantities of the enemy stock, then unloaded them together, in a concentrated action to depress the price. Actually it added up to an old trick of The Family's. But now all the cunning and ferocity seemed to be on the anti-Family side.

The black year of 1855 found the Rothschilds as fragile as ordinary human beings, and just as mortal. During that crucial twelve months, three of the four remaining brothers followed Nathan into the grave. Carl of Naples died; then Salomon, head of the beleaguered house in Vienna, and Amschel in Frankfurt. The brothers who had worked and fought together now died almost as one. The cantors wailed burial rites, the women hooded mirrors, during the very months when the mishpoche's strongest foe stalked them in board room and bourse.

Only James, the Parisian, was left—James, and a phalanx of heirs. The year 1855 constitutes a number both funereal and evergreen in The Family's history. It proved what the world had nearly forgotten: that brilliance was the smaller part of Rothschild power; that their greatest talent was (and therefore is) iron continuity; and that the dread weapon used by patriarch Mayer would also be handed down to the brothers, to become most potent after their deaths—the weapon called sons.

Pereire was a great expert on, and copyist of, the Rothschild arsenal. But he had forgotten the sons. In particular he had overlooked Anselm, Salomon's boy. Almost by way of camouflage, Anselm presented no very striking figure. By the time he assumed the reins of the Vienna house, he was past fifty. For decades he had led the life of a financial Prince of Wales, with a playboy's escapades in Vienna, Paris, Copenhagen and Berlin, and finally Frankfurt where he had his old orthodox Uncle Amschel for a duenna and the dignity of the Austrian consulship to keep him off the streets at night. What threat could he be to Pereire in full career?

Pereire's Crédit Mobilier now ruled as the financial arm of the French Empire, in the 1850's the first power on the Continent. He had stalemated James, had grabbed the concession for building Russia's railways, had captured most of the Austrian ones and would probably conquer all of them. To cap it all, Pereire was about to launch his own bank in Vienna, based on the triumphant example of the Crédit Mobilier.

Or was he?

Here he received his first shock. When the project reached the pertinent Habsburg ministers, they revealed that an Austrian company of that kind was already being called into existence. It, too, was a "people's bank." It, too, boasted a princely array of names, such as Fürstenberg, Schwarzenberg and Auersperg. It had even had the nerve to borrow the very name of the Crédit Mobilier: it was called the Creditanstalt. And it was organized, led, and primarily financed by—Anselm von Rothschild.

Overnight the spoiled princeling emerged a beast of prey, as shrewd, as swift and hard as any of his forefathers. His company issued no less than a half million shares (compared with Pereire's 120,000). And though the Creditanstalt throve as mightily on the bourse as the Mobilier, it was managed more sharply and yet more circumspectly. It would never, like its rival, hang on the tender mercies of the speculators.

But for the moment Pereire was less concerned with stocks than with rails. Suddenly, Rothschild triggered a counteroffensive in this department too. And "Rothschild" did not mean just Anselm. Lionel had succeeded Nathan in London; Alphonse, James's eldest, was coming to the fore in France. The three cousins constituted the same indivisible crew the five brothers had once been; all three had a hand in the Creditanstalt. Early in 1856 the new trinity made so stunning an offer to the Habsburg government that the finance minister could not turn them down. In return for a hundred million lire (almost fifty million dollars), they received, lock, stock and barrel, Austria's Lombard-Venetian railway tracks.

With one stroke they had outpaced Pereire's gains. At the same time their men began to attack the Crédit Mobilier in all the principal bourses of Europe. While Pereire was kept busy countering dagger thrusts at the stock exchange, the three abruptly came down on him with yet another horde of locomotives: Anselm, Lionel and Alphonse bought the concession for the Austrian Southern Railway and united it with their Venetian-Lombard lines into one formidable system.

Pereire had not yet reached the end of his tether. The Crédit Mobilier could still command large reserves of money. In international credit operations it kept undercutting The Family. During 1859 the Rothschilds were on the verge of a loan to Sardinia, but the Crédit Mobilier smothered the negotiations with its offers and campaigns. The Sardinian prime minister, Cavour, made a famous statement: "If after divorcing the Rothschilds we marry Messrs. Pereire, I think we shall get on very well together." As it turned out, the loan was floated by the Sardinians themselves. The Crédit Mobilier had foiled the Rothschilds in Italy.

But Pereire was running out of ammunition. Those damnable Rothschild sons spearheaded a dozen varieties of assault against him. They kept their big guns booming on the financial and industrial fronts. They also sniped in the diplomatic field. Anselm developed into an insidious puller of Habsburg wires; in 1859 Hübner was replaced as Austrian ambassador in Paris by Prince Richard Metternich, son of The Family's great friend.

The Crédit Mobilier had to fall back from its Austrian and Italian outposts to France alone. Even here the Rothschilds presecuted Pereire without let-up. They pushed him onto slippery ground by a diabolic tactic: on sound investments they leveled a murderous competition of low bids; but when it came to more dubious loans, The Family, after whetting the rival's appetite with a show of fight, always contrived to be nosed out. The financing of Maximilian's doomed empire in Mexico was only one such poisonous plum, gently dropped into the enemy's mouth. Pereire choked, cursed, had to swallow it.

By 1860 the Crédit Mobilier was quoted at 800, a sad descent from the peak of 1,600, yet above the price of original issue. To maintain confidence, it paid large dividends, which came out of capital, not from current earnings.

The Rothschilds kept moving in.

In 1861 the harbingers of Pereire's final doom began to run through Paris. Jules Mires, his indirect ally, fell. This highly gifted charlatan (we have met him before) had gone beyond the wholesale blackmail of doctors or railways. Now he was a member of Louis Napoleon's councils and, by his daughter's adroit marriage, father-in-law to Prince de Polignac. He enjoyed a business alliance with the Duke of Morny, Napoleon's half-brother, and through him with the Crédit Mobilier. The Rothschilds decided to pick off Mires first. Paris' yellow press, with which Mires still worked, could not save his tinselly stock holdings when a billion francs worth of pressure was turned on against him at the exchange. In 1861 the police arrested him for fraud.

The Mires scandal corroded still further the credit health of the French Empire, which had been at a low ebb for years—one might almost say since Baron James had been eased out of the heart of the picture. Napoleon III took a cold look at the money men in his palace. When he had finished looking, Achille Fould, his finance minister and the governmental cornerstone of the Crédit Mobilier, resigned.

A year later Fould regained the ministry. Pereire thought the tide had turned, rushed to his friend and asked for a monopoly on the state credit business. He found that Fould was a friend no more. M. le Ministre seemed very cool and negative and busy. At the same time French government bonds, which had been cutting a sorry picture at the exchange, perked up somewhat through huge anonymous purchases. But France possessed only one force capable of bringing life into so depressed an issue: the Rothschilds.

The Rothschilds helping—that is, conspiring with—Fould? Was it possible? A dozen years ago Pereire had deserted The Family for Fould. Would Fould now desert Pereire for The Family? And could the Emperor, for so long on the Pereire side of the financial front—could he be going over?

He went over indeed, with fanfares, flags and footmen. On February 17, 1862, Napoleon III paid a state visit to Rothschild I, King of the Jews. The spectacle unrolled at Ferrières, James's stupendous new estate.

At the Emperor's entry, the imperial banners were hoisted together with the Family colors on all four towers of the château. Surrounded by a liveried army of lackeys, pedestaled on a thick green-velvet carpet embroidered with gold bees, old James de Rothschild greeted the monarch. He led his Majesty through Renaissance pavilions hung with Van Dycks, Velasquezes, Giorgiones, Rubenses; studded with treasures gathered around the world.

According to Family custom, all visiting crowned heads were asked to plant a young cedar in the gardens. After doing his duty, Napoleon ate off Sèvres porcelain painted by Boucher, listened to music specially composed for the occasion by maestro Rossini, and then went off to hunt in the immense shoots of the Rothschild park—the total score of the party being 1,231 head of game killed on the grounds in one afternoon. When the guests returned to the château, the choir of the Paris opera vocalized a hunting song while a buffet of rarest delicacies was served. And when the Emperor left at night, his coach rode through an espalier of Rothschild torches lighting up the sky to the very edge of the estate.

The British and Austrian ambassadors participated in the festival; so did the Emperor's ministers of the interior and foreign affairs; and so did Achille Fould, in charge of France's finances.

As for Pereire, he sojourned not at the imperial table, but before a judge. The thousand-franc butchers, for whose sake he had launched his bank, had begun to sue him. The full consequences of the Mexican loan disaster were hitting home. Yet a last resort was still open. Pereire and his brother made a desperate appeal to their former friend and protector, Louis Napoleon.

"I shall do everything," the Emperor said, "to support them, because the Empire is deeply indebted to them; but I cannot afford to impede the course of justice or to come into conflict with it."

This was very frigid comfort. By December, 1866, the shares of the Crédit Mobilier stood at 600. In April, 1867, the company had to report a loss of eight million francs. The shares dropped to 350. In October they tumbled to the incredible low of 140. The Crédit Mobilier collapsed.

Emile Pereire, the great financial star, sputtered out into obscurity. As ruthless as the clan, and as well-connected, he had not had their endless solvency nor their instinct for distinguishing between finely calculated risk and florid overspeculation. Achille Fould, despite all recantations, had to resign again, irrevocably this time.

As for Napoleon III— Another Tuileries Ball came along, late in the 1860's. "Entendez vous," said James while the orchestra played still another fateful waltz, "pas de paix, pas d'Empire" (No peace, no Empire).

It became a famous prophecy. James died in 1868 at seventy-six, too soon to see it come true. Two years later Louis Napoleon launched his disastrous war against Prussia. The Germans captured him at Sedan. The French deposed him in Paris. Ironically enough, he was held prisoner of war in Wilhelmshöhe, the very castle which had catapulted Mayer and sons into their enduring power.

Throughout all upheavals, the peacocks, Giorgiones and royal cedars went on multiplying at Ferrières, the Rothschild château. The Third Empire was just one phase in the progress of The Family.

VII

THE MISHPOCHE JUNIOR

1. Inside Society

(a) Anselm

THE long-drawn-out vendetta with the Crédit Mobilier obscured another important Family development. Most Rothschilds were getting to be truly at home in palaces. The founders had been, as founders often are, pirates. The founders' sons could, if provoked, let loose some lethal swordplay. But that was a faculty incidental to the fact of being a gentleman. Each Rothschild generation pursued its vocation uncompromisingly. The Mishpoche Junior and the Mishpoche III gained ultimate chic with the same élan that had gained the dynasts ultimate wealth.

In Austria, where society was most difficult for Jews, the social breakthrough was most significant. Salomon's son Anselm began his reign over the local branch in 1855, not long after Francis Joseph started his over the Habsburg realm. The young Emperor—a strong, aloof personality—was nobody's signing machine. His Majesty brooked no absolute chancellor like Metternich and certainly no absolute banker like old Salomon Rothschild.

Anselm's office, therefore, could no longer use all the bellpulls which had once set off such effective ringing in the Kaiser's Hofburg. But Anselm devised his own forms of power—less direct, more velvety, and as useful in the end. His father had been a court Jew. He was a courtly Jew. When Francis Joseph returned after a long journey, Anselm made a gracious gesture, almost, one might say, from one great nobleman to another.

"My dear minister," he wrote to the minister of the interior, ". . . our hearts go out to meet the Father of our country. As some satisfaction to my feelings, I would like to make a small contribution to ease the sufferings of the needy in Vienna, to the amount of the enclosed five thousand florins . . . of which you will make such use as may seem best to you."

We note a significant difference of tone between father Salomon's febrile servilities and this rather elegantly tossed-off largesse. Old Salomon, despite all his colossal wealth and power, had to intrigue for his Viennese citizenship. Anselm, wealthier still, was inscribed in the golden book of the capital and in 1861 became a member of the Imperial House of Lords. He had a perfect, pungent command of the ghetto tongue, but his natural language was Schönbrunner Deutsch—the soft, musical drawl native to Austrian nobility, and by far the silkiest form of spoken German.

Anselm's residences, like his charities, were overwhelming; his vengefulness, on at least one occasion, fragrantly awesome. A casino club near Vienna blackballed him for the usual anti-Semitic reason. By way of reply, Anselm bought a modern sewage-disposal unit for the adjoining village and installed it within sight and smell of the overly impeccable casino. He was quickly sent a membership card. Sanitary construction went right on, however. And the card came back by return mail, scented with the most expensive perfume.

(b) Lionel and Brothers

The most vivid and varied conquest of Vanity Fair took place in England. It was not an instant affair. Nathan had died so suddenly, and comparatively so early in the clan's total rise, that the London heirs had to reconfirm their business eminence before essaying society.

Lionel, as the eldest of Nathan's three sons, assumed his father's place in New Court. But the stock exchange saw his agents rather than young Rothschild in the flesh. The "Rothschild pillar" remained untenanted. Rivals took optimistic note of this and of the fact that, like most upper-class Englishmen, Lionel indulged in a certain amount of education (at the University of Göttingen), in patriotism, and in noblesse oblige. Redoubtable Nathan hadn't been handicapped by such distractions. The monster tribe, London division, seemed to be declining into mere virtue. Would it be outpaced by its rivals?

The question soon received conclusive answers. One of Lionel's legacies had been an uncompleted twenty-million-pound government loan reimbursing slave owners in the British dominions after the abolition of slavery. The young man in New Court managed the transaction with the smoothest skill. He was instrumental in raising the eight million pounds with which the British government relieved the Irish famine in 1847. And in 1854 he floated the sixteen million pounds that enabled Great Britain to prosecute the Crimean War.

All these operations still had certain political overtones, masterfully modulated by Nathan's successor. The first item underscored the "sensibly liberal" antislavery stand of the House. The Irish deal constituted a form of very illuminated good works, further spotlighted by the fact that Lionel waived his commission. The Crimean loan deliberately broke with the antiwar policy of the House; to fight the Czar's anti-Semitic government, the Rothschilds shed their pacifist scruples.

Other business was done more strictly for the money. Many of the eighteen government loans brought out during Lionel's career—totaling the vertiginous sum of 1,600 million pounds sterling (almost 25,000 million dollars)—were in this category. New Court played a key part in consolidating the mishpoche's control of Europe's mercury mines. It reached down to South Africa, where Cecil Rhodes was beginning to build a kingdom made of diamonds. It financed vast copper and nitrate enterprises overseas.

The new generation began to play down the habit of clawing wealth directly out of the political arena. The trend was toward more purely economic and therefore less exposed endeavors. In the best circles one does not make history by the sweat of one's own brow. One hires the makers. And meanwhile one rides to hounds.

Lionel knew that well. He tempered supremacy with dignity, a nuance New Court had not stressed before. His younger brother Anthony sat smashingly on horseback and was knighted by the Queen. Mayer, the youngest, bred fine horses, cut a figure at the Jockey Club, and became the first Rothschild to win the Derby. The three—patrician banker, baronet, and sportsman—needed one more elegance to complete the aristocratic gamut. This the fourth brother, Nathaniel, provided. He was an esthetic invalid, living in Paris. Despite a partial paralysis (the result of a hunting accident) he collected masterpieces, kept a brilliant salon, and, since it pleased him to have his own wine label, bought the renowned Mouton vineyards near Bordeaux.

Each of the three brothers resident in England headed a part in the Victorian pageant. To begin with Lionel, we must begin with Gunnersbury Park. In 1835, shortly before his death, Nathan Rothschild had bought the domain as a suburban pleasance. Once Princess Amelia, daughter of George II, had lived there. But the estate did not come into its own until Lionel inherited it and, in the course of years, decked it with such splendors as were unknown in England outside her Majesty's own grounds.

Gunnersbury encompassed, besides the obligatory lakes and swans, a resplendent Italian villa, exquisitely illuminated walks, huge flowerbeds landscaped in the form of baskets and rimmed with heliotropes, climbing rose trees, pergolas and latticed benches. It had an enormous Japanese garden, complete with giant cane, rivulets, stone bridges, palms and temples. "Marvelous," said the Mikado's ambassador on his first visit. "We have nothing like it in Japan."

Lionel's parties were worthy of such backdrops. "The banquet," Disraeli wrote of one, "could not be surpassed in splendor or recherche even at Windsor or Buckingham Palace."

A fête champêtre held in July, 1845, in honor of the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and the Duchess of Gloucester became the social event of the season. Dukes royal and nonroyal, princes, diplomats and the sachems of the City, as well as five hundred other selected guests, sat down to dinner in tents laid out in the huge parks; strolled under the lights of thousands of multicolored lamps; listened to virtuosos, prima donnas and artistes proffering the best music from five capitals.

After the Revolution of 1848, the most rarefied French aristocracy—such as the Duchess of Orleans, the Duke of Chartres and the Comte de Paris—would sweeten their exile here. (Everything and nothing changes. Five months previous to this writing, the present Comtesse de Paris attended a great garden fete given by Baroness Edouard de Rothschild.) Cardinal Wiseman readily accepted an invitation by way of protesting, it was rumored, the law in the Papal States that still confined Jews to the ghetto. The Cardinal, innocently enough, created the one crass outburst of religious prejudice in this Jewish palace: a Protestant refused to share the table with his Catholic Eminence.

In 1857 Gunnersbury saw the nuptials of Lionel's eldest daughter, Leonora. She had, as one commentator put it, "lovely . . . liquid, almond-shaped eyes, the sweet complexion of a tea-rose," and ranked among classic English beauties of all time, like the Duchess of Manchester, Lady Constance Grosvenor and Mrs. Bulkeley. Her bridegroom was, in Family terms, the one young man in the universe worthy to raise her bridal veil: Alphonse, her cousin and future head of the French house. The band of the First Life Guards serenaded the two at their wedding breakfast. All the great world flocked to the ceremony where, under a chupah held by her brothers, Leonora de Rothschild became Baroness Alphonse de Rothschild. The French ambassador lifted his glass and his voice in honor of the bride. One past and one future prime minister of the Empire (Lord John Russell and Benjamin Disraeli) followed with toasts.

"Under this roof," said Dizzy, overdoing things with his usual felicity, "are the heads of the name and family of Rothschild—a name famous in every capital of Europe and every division of the globe—a family not more regarded for its riches than esteemed for its honor, integrity and public spirit."

Eight years later Lionel married off his other daughter, Evelina, to the one young man in the universe worthy of the prize: Ferdinand de Rothschild, her cousin and son of the head of the Austrian house. Among the fourteen bridesmaids were included such lofty names as Montgomery, Lennox and Beauclerk. The First Lord of the Admiralty proposed the health of the Rothschild family, and Dizzy, toasting the bride, again overdid things with his usual felicity.

Some piquant overtones distinguished this wedding from the first one. Ferdinand's mother, a British Rothschild (Nathan's eldest daughter), was back in England for good. She had left Anselm because the Austrian chief-of-clan kept collecting railroad networks and mistresses with equal zest. The marital rift failed to diminish the dynastic solidarity, as was shown by the presence of the Austrian ambassador and the Austrian branch.

A second example of Family insouciance materialized in an incident much relished by Jews all over England. Benjamin Disraeli, later Lord Beaconsfield, was a baptized Jew. The father of the bride could not help joshing his friend a bit as the cantor was about to pronounce his benedictions.

"Ben," Lionel called out before the great assembly, "there are so many of you Christians present that our chazan [Yiddish for cantor] wants to know whether he should just read the prayers or sing them as in the synagogue?"

"Oh, please let them sing it," Dizzy said. "I like to hear old-fashioned tunes."

What made the second wedding most different from the first, however, was its scene: not Gunnersbury Park, but Lionel's new-built town mansion at 148 Piccadilly. It stood next to Apsley House, the Duke of Wellington's residence, and soon rivaled its neighbor in fame. Six stories tall, this Victorian monster had a tidal wave of a white marble staircase; a ballroom as big as the royal yacht; lusciously embroidered satin curtains the size of mainsails; whole coral reefs of salons and drawing rooms glistening with marble, gold and scarlet. Each chair offered, to quote a contemporary wit, gilt-edged security. The furnishings included, among a host of ineffabilities, a silver table service by Garrard weighing nearly ten thousand ounces; and the famous apple-green service of Sèvres china partly painted by le Bel, a counterpart of which The Family gave to the present Queen Elizabeth for her wedding. The top of the mansion commanded a majestic view of Hyde Park and Green Park—and of the Duke of Wellington's iron chair, placed on the roof of his house so that he could sit there and watch the troops march by without being himself observed.

At Lionel's house, Disraeli ate what he gladly admitted to be "the best dinner in London." And it was Lionel's hospitality that brought this high-colored genius some of the greatest private and professional moments of his life.

"Mr. Disraeli," said Baroness Lionel one evening, "will you take Mrs. Wyndham Lewis in to dinner?"

"Oh, anything rather than that insufferable woman!" muttered Diz, and did take in Mrs. Lewis, and repeated the sacrifice during subsequent Rothschild soirees, and married her when she became free, and found in her the indispensable support on which to rest a high career.

A memorable climax of that career also began by way of a Rothschild meal. It was eaten, to be precise, on Sunday, November 14, 1875. Disraeli, Prime Minister by then, was supping with Lionel at 148 Piccadilly, as was his week-end wont. During the main course the butler approached with the telegram salver. The instant Lionel reached for the slip of paper, an episode unfolded which, for concentrated drama, approaches the Waterloo chapter in The Family's history.

The message was from one of the Baron's Paris informants. Rothschild paused for a moment after he had read it, then summed it up aloud: Egypt's debt-ridden Khedive had offered his Suez Canal shares to the French government but had become impatient with France's terms.

Rothschild and Disraeli looked at each other with the same thought. The Suez Canal was one of the world's great commercial and strategic assets. Britain had long wanted to lay hands on it, without being able to pin the Khedive down to a negotiating position. Apparently he was now in such desperate money straits that he would sell his 177,000 Suez shares to anyone who could pay a big enough price fast enough.

At last the Prime Minister said a two-word sentence: "How much?"

Lionel instantly sent a telegraphic query to Paris. The meat grew cold, but neither guest nor host had much of an appetite. Dessert came and went untouched, though Lionel was ordinarily a great lover of sweet fruit. By the time the brandy arrived, the telegram salver made another appearance. The answer was: one hundred million francs, or four million pounds, or forty-four million current American dollars.

"We will take them," said the Prime Minister.

"Ah . . ." said Baron Lionel. For him the suspense was over, though for the world it was about to begin.

At Downing Street the following Monday morning,

Rothschild's information was confirmed by other sources. Both the Prime Minister and his aides agreed that England must strike while the iron was hot. She had to realize her chance before other countries learned of its existence. Speed was as essential as secrecy. Parliament happened to be in recess and therefore could not appropriate the sum. Nor could Disraeli rush off to the Bank of England; a law forbade it to loan money to the government while the House of Commons was not in session. In any case, the Old Lady of Threadneedle Street could not have gathered so many millions so quickly without upsetting the money market. As for the joint-stock banks, their chairmen were empowered to dispose of such a giant amount only after a laborious summoning of the board of directors.

"We have scarcely time to breathe!" Disraeli exclaimed in a note to Queen Victoria.

All this, of course, added up to one inevitability, already implicit in Baron Lionel's "Ah . . ." Disraeli called his ministers together, received their authorization, then stuck his head outside the Cabinet chamber to speak a single prearranged word: "Yes." His secretary leaped into a waiting coach, to be ushered shortly afterward into the Partners' Room at New Court.

There, at the very desk where Edmund de Rothschild sits today, his great-grandfather Lionel reclined, eating muscatel grapes. He went right on nibbling as he was told that the British government would very much like to have four million pounds sterling by tomorrow, please.

For two seconds Lionel chewed a grape. "I shall give them to you," he said, and daintily spat out the seed.

Within forty-eight hours the London Times announced that N. M. Rothschild & Sons had credited to the account of the Khedive the sum of four million pounds, and that all the latter's shares in the Suez Canal Company had passed into possession of Her Majesty's Government. These, together with a small lot of stocks already under British ownership, gave England a majority voice. Now she controlled the globe's new lifeline.

"It is just settled!" Disraeli wrote on November 24, 1875, in a jubilant letter to the Queen. "You have it, Madam. The French Government has been out-generalled. . . . Four millions sterling! and almost immediately. There was only one firm that could do it—Rothschilds."

In 1935 the holdings acquired at that price figured in the national assets at more than ninety-three million pounds. And the dividends England received, almost from the start, more than matched the low 3 per cent interest charged by Lionel. In 1936–1937 alone the Canal earned England 2,248,437 pounds, a rate of 56½ per cent on the original purchase money.

Disraeli's evening meal, then, included a uniquely nutritious bite. Even before the occasion, though, Dizzy had thanked the clan for this and other entertainments with a bread-and-butter letter such as only he could write. In Coningsby, his most successful novel, the "Sidonias" figure prominently as a rich, powerful, admirable, intelligent, and easily identifiable Jewish family. In fact, they contain—and this always constitutes supreme tribute—some elements of the author's own personality.

(c) Country Squires

Lionel's house at 148 Piccadilly was not the only Rothschild residence in the neighborhood where a prime minister could get a good dinner. At 143 Piccadilly, Ferdinand Rothschild had his Louis XVI palais with an exquisite white ballroom. His sister lived magnificently at 142. At 107 Mayer moved into the pioneer West End mansion that Nathan, the founder, had taken. Nearby, Nathan's middle son, Anthony, maintained a ducal household at Grosvenor Place. Not much more than a diamond's throw away, at Seamore Place and Hamilton Place, Lionel's boys began to erect their great establishments. Before long the region was tagged "Rothschild Row"—a fairy-tale re-creation of Frankfurt's Jew Street.

But a Rothschild Grove also came into being as an enclave in greenest Buckinghamshire. It was started by Mrs. Nathan. Like a good Jewish mother, she thought her boys were overworking themselves in the soot of the city. Consequently, she bought some hunting country in the Vale of Aylesbury. Mayer, the youngest, soon caught the bucolic spirit and hired the same Joseph Paxton who had created Prince Albert's Crystal Palace at the London Exhibition. Paxton built for Mayer an Anglo-Norman supervilla called Mentmore Towers, which he filled with several museums' worth of inlaid furniture, tapestries, vases, carpets and objets; surrounded it with gardens, parks, pastures, racing stables and a stud farm; and caused Lady Eastlake to exclaim that "the Medicis were never lodged so in the height of their glory."

Thus Mayer, out of devotion to a worried mother, became not a pale pavement-bound clerk but the huntingest, shootingest, ridingest, merriest baron in England. One of the most hospitable, as well. At Mentmore Towers, Delane, the editor of the London Times, would volley brilliant dialectics at the above-quoted Lady Eastlake, a famous bluestocking who would volley right back. Prime Minister Gladstone would moderate, Matthew Arnold make measured interjections, and William Makepeace Thackeray sit by silently and politely, as writers will, and occasionally venture a mot juste. One of these was so juste that it entered public domain and became associated with Talleyrand, who is supposed to have delivered it at a French Rothschild dinner. But it was Thackeray's utterance, and it occurred during one of Lady Eastlake's tirades on fashion.

"Female dress," said Thackeray, "is often like a winter's day. It begins too late and ends too soon."

Another Rothschild country house filled Thackeray with a more tender inspiration. Mayer's elder brother, Baron Anthony, had developed an estate at Aston Clinton (just outside Aylesbury), as lush and more tasteful than Mayer's. Its long house parties would attract Robert Browning, Lord Tennyson, Gladstone and Disraeli (the two prime ministers who kept succeeding each other), as well as Matthew Arnold and Thackeray. Baron Anthony's little daughters could take a survey course in nineteenth-century English political and literary history by just walking through their father's drawing room.

To return to the tender inspiration. Heine's infatuation with Baroness James de Rothschild in Paris was no stronger than Thackeray's with Baroness Anthony at Aston Clinton. He sketched this touching portrait of her in Pendennis:

> I saw a Jewish lady only yesterday with a child at her knee, and from whose face toward the child there shone a sweetness so angelical that it seemed to form a sort of halo round them both. I protest I could have knelt before her too, and adored in her the Divine beneficence.

Being immortalized is delightful, but when you're in your teens getting gifts is nicer still. And what kind of gift does a Rothschild daughter get? Constance, Sir Anthony's older one, had a passion for teaching. Quite naturally, Daddy gave her—a school. Constance was approaching sweet sixteen when, as she wrote in her journal, ". . . my father asked me what I should like to have for a birthday present. I boldly answered 'an infants' school.' My request was granted and I was allowed to lay the first stone of the new building."

All these splendors were outdone in the end by Baron Lionel's rusticities. Since he already had No. 148 and suburban Gunnersbury Park, he took to the country late in life. But when he made his move, it was on a scale behooving Nathan's eldest and his chief heir. As a start he bought Tring Estate in Hertfordshire, adjacent to the Buckinghamshire properties of his kin. Exclusive of furniture and pictures, the deal cost him a neat quarter of a million pounds (three and a half million dollars), for good reason. Over 3,500 acres surrounded Tring Manor, a lovely seventeenth-century mansion. Sir Christopher Wren, the architect of St. Paul's Cathedral, had designed it, and Charles II had presented it to Nell Gwynn. At Tring, the former orange-seller of Drury Lane, latterly risen to be Britain's Madame Pompadour, had sat and danced and drunk in state.

Here Lionel Rothschild now held his country fetes, with the initials N. G. still blazing from cornices and ceilings. It is reported that the new owner was not always pleased with these curlicued grimaces of England's raffish past. Quite addicted to dignity, Lionel had assumed—and had made his brothers assume—the title of Baron which Nathan had so gruffly ignored. He also converted the Teutonic von Rothschild into the more soigné French de Rothschild. Old Nathan, as we have seen, had had himself buried without nobiliary adornment, but his son found a way of ennobling him after death. On the tombstone of the founder's wife Lionel put, "Baroness Hannah de Rothschild, relict of the late Baron Nathan Mayer de Rothschild."

It is quite natural that such a man would gather around his fireplace fewer of the esthetic types often found at his brothers', and more of Disraeli and Gladstone in their official moods, as well as the greatest magnates, financiers and politicians of the age. And yet those Nell Gwynn initials seemed to sow, now and then, Restoration gremlins in the Victorian grandeur. A story has it that at one Tring stag dinner two cabinet ministers sat next to each other, one bald, one blessed with a full though artificial head of hair. While serving, a footman caught his sleeve button in the toupee and saw it drop to the ground. With more speed than discernment, he picked it up at once to replace it —on the wrong pate. The bald Excellency had suddenly become hairy, the hairy Excellency bald, and the entire dinner company a good deal merrier.

In addition to Tring, the Baron acquired great seats at Halton and at Ascott Wing. All these Rothschild settlements shed on Buckinghamshire a great anecdotal renown. Under the Family touch the livestock of the region throve as never before. Venery flowered: Anthony's partridge shoots and the princely stag hunt at Mentmore became proverbial.

Still, one thing bothered the local gentry at first. Weren't those Rothschilds de-Christianizing Buckinghamshire? Would a velvet Judea displace the Anglican arcadia? Our rich infidels soon dispelled this doubt by restoring churches, installing organs, endowing vicarages more opulently than preceding owners had. When the Bishop of Oxford went confirming in the neighboring countryside, he and his entire retinue were put up at Sir Anthony's Aston Clinton.

Yet what would perfect and confirm Rothschild supremacy in the end was not their gestures to the majority faith. In a rather fascinating way, the opposite process turned the trick. An Israelite family clinched pre-eminence in a Christian world by becoming more Jewish than most Jews.

2. Kings of the Jews

The same Lionel who had so carefully rebaronized his family branch lost all interest in Anglo-Saxon hauteur when it came to his religion. At the Feast of Tabernacles he personally hammered palm branches onto the very gentile architecture of New Court. Let any rabbi marry in London, and a Rothschild wedding gift arrived, usually by truck. At the Jewish New Year great baskets of flowers and fruit were delivered to synagogues "With the compliments of N. M. Rothschild & Sons." New Court, of course, remained closed on Saturdays and often used Yiddish dialect as a kind of code in its cables. (Once one of Baron Lionel's agents, having gotten wind of an impending truce in a South American war, sent a telegram reading, "Mr. Sholem is expected soon"—sholem being Hebrew for peace.) Baroness Lionel edited and collected a volume of Prayers and Meditations.

The Baron himself went much further. We will soon see him fighting a dogged and seemingly hopeless battle for Jewish privilege in Parliament. And having wrested, against all odds, a decisive bit of Jewish emancipation out of the Commons, in 1869 he limped, already half crippled by gout, onto the dais of the new Jewish Synagogue, exclaiming, "We are emancipated, but if our emancipation should damage our faith, it would be a curse instead of a blessing!"

He was only following dynastic precedent. His Viennese Uncle Salomon of the founding generation, for example, was an expert lobbyist who knew exactly how much pressure to apply at what governmental level. But on the point of aiding his coreligionists he became almost irrational with solicitude. On one occasion a fellow Jew named Roquirol had brought a fine flock of Merino sheep to Vienna and had asked Rothschild to help him in their sale. Salomon deemed the matter too urgent for mere livestock jobbers, and instantly dashed off a letter to the Chancellor of the Empire.

"I humbly request your Highness," he wrote to Prince Metternich, "to put in a word for Herr Moses Roquirol when there should be an opportunity for doing so, as there is sure to be in the salons of your Highness, which are the meeting place of brilliance and fashion."

It is a little difficult to visualize the Prince promoting a herd of sheep through a drawing room thronged with brilliance and fashion. But it is not easy, either, to imagine Nathan, a tycoon in full career, suspending his conquest of foreign markets to announce that he would honor no bills drawn on any German city which denied Jews their treaty rights. This is just what N. M. did in 1820. Two decades later James Rothschild was embroiled in his great railway duel with Achille Fould. Yet he even interrupted this fight to campaign against sudden anti-Semitic persecution in Syria.

"M. Fould, the chief rabbi of Rive Gauche," wrote Heine, referring to Fould's Left Bank railway, "delivered with the calm of a sage an excellent speech in the Chamber of Deputies while his coreligionists were being tortured in Syria. We must give the chief rabbi of Rive Droit [Rothschild] credit for showing a nobler spirit in his sympathies for the House of Israel. . . ."

Carl von Rothschild would not conclude a loan to the Pope without badgering his Holiness about the abolition of the Roman ghetto in 1850. In 1853 Austria imposed a new restriction on the Jews that kept them from buying real estate. The law didn't touch privileged exceptions like the Rothschilds, yet The Family instantly formed a coalition on the bourses of Paris and London (with the tacit connivance of the Vienna branch) in order to punish Austrian credit. James, in person, tore into the Austrian embassy with such ferociousness that the ambassador (then the not particularly Jew-loving Graf Hübner) advised Vienna "to soothe the children of Israel."

"He is, in a word, beside himself," the ambassador reported of James.

That same year Bismarck, still a Prussian career diplomat in Frankfurt, reported on the same subject to Berlin. "The efforts . . . which Austria made . . . to secure the emancipation of the Jews seems attributable to the Rothschilds. . . . The attitude a government brings to bear upon the Jewish problem . . . profoundly affects the house. . . . There are occasions when other than purely business considerations determine the policy of this family. . . ."

Bismarck did not realize how right he was. Soon after his memorandum, Berlin decided to honor Mayer Carl Rothschild, Amschel's nephew and his successor-elect as head of the Frankfurt house. The Prussian king appointed Mayer Court Banker and awarded him the Order of the Red Eagle, Third Class. It was, however, a Jewish Red Eagle. The normal form of the medal, a cross, had been redesigned especially for Baron Mayer into an oval badge. Evidently Prussia did not think a Jew fit to wear a cruciform emblem, even if it was of honorific and not religious significance.

The Baron hinted his feelings to Bismarck: wasn't it strange to honor a man and at the same time to discriminate against him? The thought did not get through to Berlin. In 1857 the Prussian government imposed on Mayer another segregated Red Eagle, this time of the Second Class, in the form of a second oval. It was like being awarded the Order of the Yellow Star. Obviously Berlin considered Rothschild a very important but not particularly equal person.

Now the Baron's feeling about those ovals was made plain. Pointedly he acted as if he didn't have them. He found flagrantly bad excuses to escape occasions when he would have to wear them and made rather free with his irritation.

At last Berlin woke up. The Prince of Prussia ordered Bismarck, who had other things to do, to compile a detailed report on Baron Rothschild's behavior with his individualized medals.

Bismarck's answer read in part:

> In accordance with the Royal Command of the 27th instant, I have the honor dutifully to inform you that I have not seen Court Banker Mayer Carl von Rothschild wearing such a decoration, since he does not go to big functions, and when he does wear orders, prefers to wear the Greek Order of the Redeemer or the Spanish Order of Isabella the Catholic. On the occasion of the official reception which I myself gave . . . which he would have to attend in uniform, he excused himself on the ground of ill health, it being painful to him to wear the Red Eagle decoration for non-Christians, as he would have to do on that occasion. I draw similar inference from the fact that whenever he comes to dine with me, he merely wears the ribbon of the Order in his buttonhole. . . .

Prussia never desegregated its Red Eagles, and the Rothschilds never forgave—a fact which may have played a part later on, when the Kaiser asked them in vain to establish a Berlin branch of The Family. Nor did they stop expressing and defending their faith in ways Jewry had not known since the Book of Kings.

Ferrières, the French Family's great country palace, featured a private synagogue. The principal Rothschild town mansion in London, Lionel's 148 Piccadilly, had an unfinished cornice to commemorate the destruction of Jerusalem. In imperial Austria the social fall season was marked by the Rothschild stag hunts, which, however, always suffered abrupt interruption on one afternoon. The sundry high-born Christian guests were reduced to chess-playing while the hosts left for the Vienna synagogue. There they fasted and prayed through the Day of Atonement before resuming horse and hound again.

All over Europe the greatest chefs began to learn, if not a downright kosher, at least a baconless cuisine. And a curious new custom began to spread from the Family fetes to great soirees in a dozen countries: after dinner the gentlemen did not adjourn from the smoking room to join the ladies in the salon; instead, the ladies had to come to the gentlemen. Rothschild practices were often followed before they were understood, and many people failed to grasp that this arrangement was the elegant outcome of a male-centered patriarchal philosophy.

And of course the clan took great care to implant Judaism in the young, often through full-time religious tutors. The result was more than a formalistic respect for Hebrew tradition. A child's diary has preserved how aristocratic English diction, naïve misspellings, a Talmudic delight in soul-searching, leaping high spirits and grave religious devotion were spontaneously intermingled in a Rothschild girlhood. Annie, Sir Anthony's younger daughter, wrote in her journal:

> How I should like to paint like a genius. . . . To have an innate genius, to be selftaught, to see masterly drawing developed under my own pencil. Yes, I should like it, but it is good that I have not been thus favored, that I have only a little natural talent, for it does not give rise to the love of superioty [sic] characteristic of me. I like to show my superioty in playing some pieces of brilliancy, my superioty in my little knowledge of Hebrew, my superioty of reasoning powers in geometry. It is a very difficult fault, this, to cut out, so difficult do I find it not to exult in the little I know. . . . But with all my faults I have an innate respect for love for religion and enthusiastic adoration for the holy creed of Judaism. May God forgive me, but even in this I did not wish to be inferior to anyone. I heard with envy of Clemmie's [her cousin, the daughter of Mayer Carl Rothschild] sudden [religious] zeal. Is that the way to show my reverence to him who hath said Love Thy Neighbor Like Thyself? Oh Almighty God, hear my prayer, make my heart soft and charitable to all those around me, then I may be worthy of being one of those chosen ones, for Thou hast said through thy prophet Moses that we shall love our fellow creatures. . . .

The little enthusiast grew up to write, with her sister Constance, a stately tome called The History and Literature of Israelites. At twenty-nine she became the wife of the Honourable Eliot Yorke, M.P., son of Lord Hardwicke and prominent member of the Church of England. A generation earlier, her Aunt Hannah had also married a high-born Anglican. But whereas Hannah's union had once pained Jews, Annie's now scandalized Christians. For the first time a British aristocrat took as his wife a girl who remained after the wedding exactly what she had been before—a practicing and pious Jew. Quite contrary to the usual process, the Rothschilds embraced their faith more firmly with each generation.

Lionel himself set all old and new members of The Family an example with the single most dramatic adventure in his life.

3. Storming Parliament

By the middle of the nineteenth century most of the restrictions on British Jews had been done away with. One remained: they were permitted to obey the law, to practice it, but not to make it. They were not admitted to Parliament. The vanguard of English Jewry, including the Rothschilds, had long chafed under this disability. Petitions were submitted, the sympathy of leading journals enlisted, press and pamphlet campaigns conducted. Parliament would not be moved.

The head of the English Family then took prejudice by the horns, a decision that could not have come easily to a man of his rather prim and sedentary bent. Since he did not have the legal qualifications to run for Parliament, he began to storm it. In August, 1847, Lionel de Rothschild mounted the hustings as Liberal candidate for the City of London. The City, being the capital's financial district, had long stood for freedom of trade, a principle to which Rothschild astutely added freedom of religion.

"My opponents say that I cannot take my seat," he told the voters. "That is rather my affair than theirs. I have taken the best advice. I feel assured that as your representative, as the representative of the most wealthy, the most important, the most intelligent constituency in the world, I shall not be refused admission to Parliament on account of any form of words whatsoever."

The "form of words" became critical before long. Lionel was elected. Prodded by this fait accompli, the Commons passed a bill permitting the seating of a Jew. But the House of Lords rose in revolt. Many of the usually absent peers rushed to London. From the remotest demesnes of Cornwall and Wales, viscounts and earls hurried to vote down Hebrew insolence. Lionel, accompanied by his brother Anthony, stood in the august chamber, listened grimly to the wrathful speeches, would not withdraw even while the division was taken—and saw himself defeated.

But his grandfather, the patriarch Mayer, had been no more stubborn in stalking the Hessian court than Lionel was in besieging the Mother of Parliaments. He formally vacated his seat, thereby forcing another election in his constituency. In 1849 Rothschild's renewed candidacy was broadcast in handbills and advertisements.

"I do not hesitate again to solicit your suffrage," he said, "because in my person a principle can be vindicated and because I believe that you are prepared to maintain the great constitutional struggle that is before you with the same vigour and earnestness that you have heretofore evinced. . . ."

Once more he was elected. Once more the Upper House cast him out. Lionel determined that the time had come for a direct and personal assault. He would take physical possession of the seat for which his constituents had chosen him, and to which he had every moral right.

On July 26, 1850, his wife leaned forward in the gallery of the Commons and watched the House simmer with excitement. The Sergeant-at-Arms announced that a new member wished to take the oath. Lionel advanced to the Table of the House. The clerk rose to administer the Oath of Admission in the usual form and with the usual book, the Holy Bible.

"I desire to be sworn on the Old Testament," Baron Lionel said in a loud, clear voice.

The House exploded. "Sir," thundered Robert Inglis, leader of the opposing faction, "from the time that this has been a Christian nation and that this house has been a Christian legislature, no man—if I may use the word without offence—has ever presumed to take his seat here unless prepared to take it under the solemn sanction of an oath in the name of our common Redeemer. I for one will never give my sanction to his admission."

After a long heated debate, an adjournment and three divisions, the Commons at last permitted Lionel to be sworn on the Old Testament. The following day he stood again before the Table. Now the battle of the "form of words" was properly joined. Among the admission ceremonies was the so-called Oath of Abjuration, with which the new M.P. must renounce all allegiance to the long defunct Stuart dynasty. A historical leftover, the Oath constituted the chief instrument of the anti-Jewish party because it ended with ". . . upon the true faith of a Christian."

From gallery to front bench a hush fell over the House as Lionel repeated the formula after the clerk. Everybody waited for the last phrase. Here Lionel said, "I omit these words as not binding upon my conscience," and concluded the Oath in the Jewish fashion, using the Hebrew formula and covering his head. He was about to sign his name on the members' roll when, pen in hand, he was arrested by a voice from the dais.

"Baron Lionel de Rothschild, you may withdraw," the Speaker said, and a moment later Lionel had to leave the House amid an uproar.

But the Baron was only warming up. At the next general election, in 1853, the City of London doggedly returned him as its member. Again the House, after violent controversy, passed a bill to remove the oath difficulty, and again the Lords threw it out. The argument engulfed the nation.

"If you destroy the groundwork of Christianity upon which this legislature is based," inveighed the Bishop of London, "in order to gratify for a time a handful of ambitious men, you will destroy Christian England."

An Anglican M.P., on the other hand, said that "he should be sorry to have so indifferent an opinion of his religion as to suppose that the introduction of a Jew into Parliament would weaken or affect the principles of Christianity."

Henry Drummond, a famous sectarian leader, railed against the election of a Jew "by the rabble of London, acting partly out of love of mischief, partly from contempt of the House of Commons, and partly from a desire to give a slap to Christianity."

It was whispered that Rothschild money had paid for the election of Lord John Russell, the Prime Minister, to win him as a friend. The Bishop of Oxford and other ecclesiastics dignified the rumor with their names, whereas a number of eloquent voices within the Church championed the Rothschild party nobly.

"We may guess," said one of these, ". . . how many of the clergy will spend Christmas . . . the sacred time petitioning against Jews. Two courses will be served before the mince pies: the roasted heretic and the disenfranchised Jew. We shall be told of angels singing peace on earth by those who would prolong the reign of discord and persecution. Whose birth is it that the church commemorates? Is it not the birth of a Jew?"

And the London Times declared in a leader: "If the qualities of any single candidate must, perforce, be associated with the merit of the principle he maintains, we think that those of Baron Rothschild will bear the comparison as well as any that are now before the public. . . ."

The peers of the realm did not see it that way. Altogether Lionel was elected six times by his stalwart constituency. Six times he marched up to the Table, demanding to be sworn according to the tenets of his faith. Ten times the Liberals introduced a bill revising the Oath of Abjuration. Ten times Disraeli crossed his own party, the Conservatives, and unsheathed his oratory in the revision's favor. Ten times it was passed in the Commons, and ten times the Upper Chamber tore it up.

The eleventh time the Lords had to relent. In 1858 they consented to a bill allowing each house to modify the oath for its own members. On July 26, 1858, Lionel went through the old dramatic scene with a new ending. He stood before the Table and took the oath with his head covered according to Jewish tradition, then signed his name to the rolls and proceeded to his seat unhindered.

For eleven years this pampered nabob had chosen to live outside the palatial seclusion to which he was born. For eleven years he had made himself the butt of national argument, of caricature, scurrility and abuse, and possessed no martyr's nature with which to absorb it all—only the gouty, crotchety temper of a multibillionaire. "For eleven years," the Baroness is reported to have said, "we've had the M.P. question screaming in every corner of the house."

For eleven years he had fought the good fight, disarrayed his emotions, snapped at his butlers, spent huge sums on electioneering, stirred up England to the far corners of her Empire. And after he had finally, painfully, moved the mountains that barred his way to parliamentary privilege, he gained it—to do nothing. Not a single speech or overt action was recorded during his entire tenure of over a decade and a half. It seems, in his case, a logical paradox. He was no more a simple politician than a mere capitalist. He was a Rothschild, ergo a living principle. The principle had wanted vindication, as he had said in his early election appeals. Vindication had been achieved. That seemed enough. The main thing was that he had thrust the gate open to others of his creed.

Inevitably, however, the door of the Commons must lead to the portal of the Lords. If a Jew was good enough for the Lower House, was he not fit for the Upper? Gladstone thought so in 1869, and the Jew he had in mind was the same Baron Lionel, M.P. But now only one elector figured: the Queen. In this matter, as in several others, she chose to be more Victorian than her age. To Lord Granville, her Lord-in-Waiting, she wrote a letter bristling with italics.

"To make a Jew a peer," she said, "is a step she could not consent to. It would be ill taken and would do the government great harm."

At the Prime Minister's suggestion, Lord Granville prepared another brief. "The notion of a Jew peer is startling," he conceded to her Majesty, ". . . but he represents a class whose influence is great by their wealth, their intelligence, their literary connections." He then went on to the real reasoning behind the suggestion: the government felt that Rothschild's appointment would check republican sentiment, which seemed to be developing in some powerful financial circles.

Her Majesty, though, thought the monarchy could survive without help from the grandson of a Jew Street peddler. Thereupon Gladstone made a personal attempt to disarm those royal emphases:

10, Downing Street
October 28th, 1869

> . . . As the head of the great European house of the Rothschilds, even more than by his vast possessions, and his very prominent political position . . . Baron L. de Rothschild enjoys exactly the exceptional position, which disarms jealousy, and which is so difficult to find. . . . It would not be possible, in this view, to find any satisfactory substitute for his name. And if his religion were to operate permanently as a bar, it appears that this would be to revive by [the implication is, royal] prerogative, the disability which formerly existed by statute, and which the Crown and Parliament thought proper to abolish.
>
> Mr. Gladstone has now troubled Your Majesty to the full extent incumbent upon him, and will not think of pressing Your Majesty beyond what Your Majesty's impartial judgement may approve.

Victoria sat tight. It was not until Suez had become British through Jewish money; not until Disraeli, baptized in faith but very unbaptized in sympathies and passions, had won her heart; not until Lionel had died in 1879; that she yielded to Lionel's weapon, that same old Rothschild weapon, his son.

On July 9, 1885, Nathaniel Mayer de Rothschild walked into the great house in Westminster and did in the Upper Chamber what it had once forbidden his father to do even in the Lower. The new Lord donned the Jewish ceremonial headgear, the three-cornered hat, and on a Hebrew bible swore his holy Jewish oath.

"It was the first time," an awed historian noted, "that the Peers of the Realm had looked on while one of their number took the oath covered, or on another book than that which Christian practice and English tradition prescribed."

But there was a second unique feature attending the ritual, which pertains to the uniqueness of the new Lord's generation, the next one.

4. Three Suns at Noon

Of Nathaniel, Lionel's eldest, the story goes that he once met at the stock exchange a fellow banker puffed up with pride. The man had just received a patent of nobility from the Italian king, in return for a favor, presumably financial. Natty listened to him go on and on about his new distinction, took a good look at the lire exchange rate—which had been especially favorable to the pound that week—and then, as usual, spoke his mind. "Congratulations, Baron," he said. "I knew you wouldn't fail to pick up a bargain."

It is interesting that in the second half of the nineteenth century a Rothschild was already in a position to jest at the nouveaux riches of somebody else. It is even more significant that Lionel's three sons ignored their own baronial distinction and chose to become misters. The very title from which their grandfather had so warily kept his distance, and which their father had been so careful to use, they let lapse out of indifference. It became immaterial in the face of their prestige.

The three brilliantly illustrated an old truth. Wealth or honors may be achieved in a lifetime, but, due to some perverseness in human nature, social position cannot be conquered by one man. It must be inherited several times over before it truly begins to exist. Society, like virginity, may be lost at any moment but will be gained only at birth.

Natty, Alfred and Leo had the right kind of birth. In the case of another family the question might be asked: was it right enough? They were, after all, only two generations removed from the ghetto. In their case, no doubt ever arose, not only because of their incomparable fortunes, but also because of their superb casualness. It was this last flair which exempted The Family from the awkward stage of the arrivé.

An arrivé is a clumsy imitation of the long-arrived. There is nothing more vulgar than trying not to be. But the Rothschilds, with their Yiddish jests framed in Cantabrigian flawlessness, with their proud observation of Sabbath on Buckinghamshire lawns, with their pictures of old Poppa Jews plastered across manor walls—the Rothschilds were always strictly themselves. They conformed to no earl, duke or marquis. They sported the kind of free-swinging eccentricity, the self-indulgent truthfulness unto their basic fiber which comes to another family only after five butler-born generations—assuming the basic fiber hasn't been refined away by then.

In the instance of the Rothschilds, the basic fiber was (indeed, still is) remarkably sturdy. But some special factors set apart the trio of scions who made up the third generation in England. Of Lionel's brothers, only Nathaniel, the Parisian invalid, had sons, and they chose to become French Rothschilds, a somewhat different regal tribe. Lionel's three boys were, therefore, in complete possession not only of the London bank but of all the vast Family domains in Great Britain.

In terms of time, they occupied a double zenith: no one before them had been as rich as they; no one after them who was as rich could escape the egalitarian fervor or strangling taxes of the leveler known as the twentieth century (in which, as a matter of fact, they had to spend their last years). In terms of place, the three scintillated among English nobility—an élite which has survived into the space-age culture more intact than its counterparts on the Continent. Natty's, Leo's and Alfred's universe, while exotic in its lushness, has come down to us with many of its trappings and meanings still present.

(a) Natty

When good Queen Victoria raised Lionel's eldest to the dignity of a Baron of the United Kingdom and thus to a peerage in 1885, she came up against something of a surprise. It was an almost invariable custom that all men so honored abandon their names for a different, more lordly and, of course, Anglo-Saxon style. Benjamin Disraeli became Lord Beaconsfield. Marcus Samuel became Lord Bearsted. But Nathaniel Mayer Rothschild elected to be Nathaniel Mayer Lord Rothschild in the simplest, haughtiest fashion of all.

His choice is a clue to his whole life. He inherited not only limitless wealth but also the accumulated supremacies of three generations. Plain old-fashioned loftiness was so much his natural element that it strikes us today almost as an endearing quality, the way noble savagery does in The Last of the Mohicans. Lord Rothschild wore his top hat and boutonniere no less convincingly than Chingachgook once did his feathered headdress and tomahawk.

Victoria did not initiate "Natty" into public life. That began in 1865, when he ran for Parliament. But he refused to electioneer in a business district after the manner of his father. No, he picked the countryside, the very best gentlemen's pleasance—namely, Aylesbury in Buckinghamshire, whose importance was certified by the fact that The Family owned most of it.

Needless to say, he carried the district. Needless to add, he was victorious in contest after contest, the voters offering him their ballots as yeomen had once offered fealty to their suzerain. Later, of course, he relinquished the Commons for the Lords. But no matter what his title, he was Parliament's most qualified, most impressive, most ornamental spokesman of reaction. He sniffed at social services, suffragism, old-age pensions, and everything else malodorous with progress. His speeches on the subject were not only immaculately phrased but well fortified with reason and example, proving that there was an inordinate amount of mind under the top hat.

"Whenever I want to know a historical fact I always ask Natty," confessed Disraeli, himself one of England's most retentive brains.

But Natty could do more than speak. He put up formidable opposition to politically forward legislation.

"I ask you," cried Lloyd George in 1909. "Are we to have all the ways of reform, financial and social, blocked simply by a notice board: 'No thoroughfare. By order of Nathaniel Rothschild'?"

His grandfather, Nathan, had favored the liberal wing of the Liberal party. Lord Rothschild, though nominally Liberal in party affiliation, was actually the showpiece and often the moving force of the Right. The same evolution took place at the Rothschild bank. Under its founder New Court had been the boldest organization in the City. Under Natty it became, and could easily afford to be, the most conservative, exclusive and selective. His one innovation was aristocratic. He began the practice of stationing the visitors of the day in various anterooms. He would enter the first one, watch in hand, announcing the number of minutes at the interviewer's disposal. He listened and replied courteously enough for the stated time, but not a second longer; then he moved on to the next audience in the next chamber. His own office was reserved for the highest personages in the land. As a result, the Partners' Room in New Court retains the incensed air of an inner sanctum even today.

He was truly the King of the Jews. There is the anecdote of the emigrant from Poland who, shortly after his arrival in London, spent the Day of Atonement in the East End synagogue. Suddenly he heard all prayer stop, and an unearthly hush fell over the congregation. "The Lord has come!" whispered a neighbor to the Pole, who prostrated himself instantly before the Messiah. But then he saw a famous top hat and realized it was human divinity in the form of Lord Rothschild, awing the flock with his appearance.

On June 23, 1897, Cardinal Vaughan congratulated Queen Victoria on her Diamond Jubilee in the name of all the Catholics in her Empire. It was Natty, naturally, who did the same on behalf of the Jews. And when he came through Baghdad on one of his great tours, the Jews there received him with the same honors their forefathers had once accorded the Exilarch, that legendary, long-extinct sovereign over all the Israelites of the Diaspora.

Indeed, Natty watched over his people the whole world 'round. No persecution or pogrom occurred anywhere without thunder from New Court against the oppressors, without aid to the victims. To cite only the most impressive example: Because of Russia's cruel attitude toward her Jews, she was usually turned away from New Court's doors when she came asking for money. In 1891 a special financial mission from St. Petersburg did sit down with a New Court delegation for some serious negotiating. But at a new outburst of government anti-Semitism, Natty dispatched a runner, and the Rothschild people, who had warned the Russians of just such an eventuality, walked out without so much as a word.

Virtue is its own reward. In 1917, when the Czarist treasury defaulted because of the Revolution, the Rothschilds were not as hard hit as other banks. And virtue is not always its own reward. When the short-lived democratic government floated a "Liberty Loan" in St. Petersburg, New Court immediately telegraphed one million rubles, and naturally was never repaid a single one from Lenin, whose government followed.

Natty was buried by then, but had he lived he would have written off that million as intended good works. His charitable donations were of nothing less than imperial dimensions. To handle them, he developed a special, amply staffed department at New Court. He was the chairman of three London hospitals, the treasurer of a fourth and, for good measure, the chairman of the British Red Cross. His specifically Jewish charities were legion. A single one of them, the upkeep of the Jews' Free School, cost him a reputed hundred thousand dollars a year.

Natty's manner, even in the very act of benefaction, was consistently gruff. His grandfather, we recall, used to make beggars run by giving them a guinea. Natty never refused beggars, either, but was sometimes noticed to run himself, for fear he'd have to hear their thanks or form his lips into a smile.

With larger philanthropies he could be proportionately more acrid. At the turn of the century many thousands of Russian Jews came to England, where their coreligionists facilitated further emigration to the United States. Natty and other money men took care of these displaced masses. But one day there was such a desperate overflow from the docks that all communal resources of the East End seemed exhausted. Hermann Landau, a philanthropist specializing in the problem, found the streets filled with homeless families. They would need instant help on a scale generous beyond his own means. Landau drove straight to New Court. The Partners' Room, taboo to many business people, opened readily to him, as it did to others on charitable errands. Landau explained that 25,000 pounds were needed immediately for the construction of temporary shelters. Before he could finish his plea, Natty pushed toward him an order he had just written. It placed 30,000 pounds at his credit.

"You didn't understand me," Landau said. "I only need twenty-five thousand."

"Listen to him, Leo," Lord Rothschild said wrathfully to his youngest brother. "Landau is having rachmones on us!" (Rachmones is Yiddish for "pity," something Lord Rothschild was accustomed to give, not receive.)

But Landau got better treatment than some of Natty's social equals. There was one duchess whom the Baron heartily disliked and whom he persecuted by inviting all her friends but not herself to his best parties. When that couldn't reduce the enemy to tears, he conceived a strategem diabolical enough to be worthy of his demon grandfather. He held a banquet in his mansion at 148 Piccadilly and seemingly honored her Grace by seating her on Gladstone's right and his own left. These were the sides on which the respective men were deaf. The lady had to spend hours between two table companions who would not respond to a word she said.

Natty seldom bothered to be so wily. At Tring Park, his country estate, another distinguished person, Lady Fingall, dared to pick one of her host's famous muskroses without asking his permission. Before the entire company of guests, Lord Rothschild gave her hell. Later he apologized indirectly by placing an enormous bouquet in her carriage. Yet the saying remained in force that Lord Churchill and Lord Rothschild were the two rudest men in England.

(b) Sweet Leo

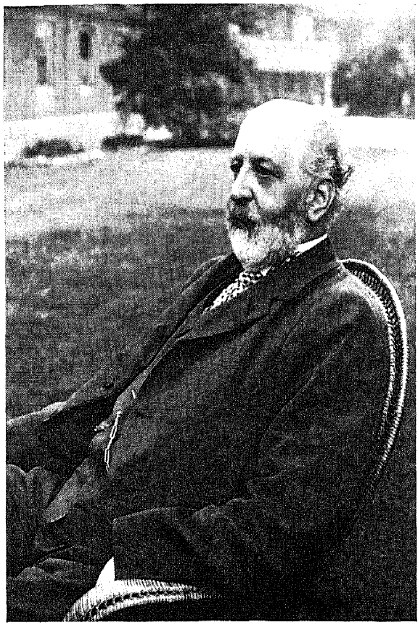
The youngest brother balanced the eldest beautifully. Natty was a haughty lord; Leo was a kind sport. Not that he forgot the implications of his name. He maintained no less than four palatial residences. At 5 Hamilton Place—back of Rothschild Row at Hyde Park Corner—he built himself a town house with the following conveniences: a hydraulic lift which was so expensive to operate that it cost more to go from the first to the second floor than to travel by horsecab through all of London; for those who wanted to save money, a serpentine staircase completely hand-carved and perhaps the finest of its kind in all of England; a huge library, also entirely hand-carved, in maple and mahogany, on which forty imported Italian artisans worked for two years; a kitchen that could roast a whole ox on a spit; conduits under every windowsill and table surface to keep the food warm; and a great number of barely credible etceteras. The whole marvel survives intact as the plushiest private club in London.



Another Leo household was many-splendored Gunnersbury Park, inherited from his father. In addition, he bought Palace House near the racing course at Newmarket, where the King of England and similar types were glad to be his guests. Finally, he owned an estate at Ascott Wing, a lovely country manor with miles of gardens and views. This, by far the most tasteful and probably the most pleasant of all Rothschild realms in Buckinghamshire, is the only one inhabited by The Family to this day.

Ascott abutted on South Court, his stud farm and dearest passion Racing was handed down to him as a legacy from his Uncle Mayer. Leo bred horses ingeniously, without regard to expense, and cheered them on without regard to English reserve Sometimes it was hard to choose between spectacles: Mr. Leo's blurring thoroughbreds on the track, or his Oriental exuberance in his box. Uncle Mayer had won the Derby once, Leo won it twice, in 1879 and in 1904. In between, he led into the paddock literally hundreds of champions.

That he did not win the Derby three times may be laid to rachmones of a very rarefied kind. The Prince of Wales, Leo's good friend, entered the Derby of 1896 with a virtually unknown animal named Persimmon. The blue-and-yellow Rothschild silks were represented by St Frusquin, possibly the greatest four-legged celebrity of the fin de siècle. Leo had once been offered sixty thousand pounds for this horse, which had walked away with almost every important turf event in England. But in 1896 His Royal Highness happened to have rather more mistress trouble than usual. He stood in need of cheer. Somehow it happened that Persimmon came in first Leo's compassion, if it was a factor here, extended to the humblest citizens as well. It was said of him that the more races he won, the more money he lost. To celebrate, he gave away not only the winner's purse but its multiples. Often he would gain a cup—and some hospital an entire wing.

Off the track his benevolence was no less active. Petitioners who did not dare come near Natty, or were fazed by Alfred's peculiarities, sidled up readily to Mr. Leo. He became the welfare minister of New Court. A cold day would, for some reason, give his openhandedness a special impetus, and he was especially touched by children One winter Sunday, when he took a somewhat absent-minded stroll on Natty's lawns at Trıng, he notıced a lıttle shape before him. Instantly, automatıcally, he reached into his pocket. Only the frantic intervention of a butler saved him from a transcendental faux pas: he had been about to press a half crown on one of the royal dukes of England.

Mr. Leo became a byword of spontaneity and goodnature. In a clan that, for all its remarkable qualities, has never been notorious for sweetness, he stands out as a kind of darling mutation.

(c) The Incomparable Alfred

In the manor of Edmund de Rothschild's great estate at Exbury today there are hundreds of family heirlooms Visitıng Famıly members, though generally quite inured to that sort of thing, never tire of asking for one specific item—"Alfred's baton." This is a staff of pure white ivory banded with a circlet of diamonds. The instrument had a very solid, practical use. Alfred needed ıt to conduct the symphony orchestra he kept as a private hobby.

* A quatrain taken from Cecil Roth's account of the three brothers.

The baton is symbolic of a way of life unique even among Rothschilds Alfred, in age the second of the triumvirate, never married, and by his bachelorhood alone he departed from clan tradition. (Natty had wedded Emma Louisa, a Frankfurt Rothschild, Leo, an Italian-Jewish beauty named Marie Perugia) Alfred's physical appearance was even more radically different In the English mishpoche, Jewish genes carefully interbred, and an ancestral sense solicitously nourished, produced generation after generation of the same portly, generously nosed, Frankfurt Semitic type. Alfred, however, was a slim, blond Ariel, of a dainty countenance delicately shrubbed with sideburns.

His brothers' indulgences were properly luxurious. His were dizzily sybaritic. Often he had a personal train standing by for him in full steam. He maintained the private Philharmonic mentioned above, whose concert master submitted each morning the selections to be rehearsed for dinner music that night. He also had a private circus to which—beautifully accoutered in blue frock coat, whip and lavender kid gloves—he would play ringmaster, to his friends' amusement. And he simply adored driving his zebra four-in-hand.

Small wonder that he rusticated not like a squire but like an emperor. His Halton House was a vast pile of the most expensive ornamentation hundreds of thousands of pounds sterling could buy It clashed luridly with the simple glory of the Buckinghamshire beeches around it, exciting outrage and, just possibly, envy, among various sensibilities. One spoke of "an exaggerated nightmare of gorgeousness and senseless and ill-applied magnificence." "A combination of French château and gambling house!" cried another.

Notwithstanding such towering excess, Alfred had flair.

In the country, where an exquisite would feel out of his depth anyway, he didn't bother with esthetic harmonies and let the zebras caper. In the city his connoisseurship came into its own At 1 Seamore Place, a renowned (now razed) London address, he built a suitable roof over his head. It, too, constituted an immense grotto matted and jungled with treasures A single mantel would hold 300,000 dollars' worth of objects. And yet there was rhyme, reason and rhythm to it all, if a number of stunned witnesses are to be trusted. Seamore Place confirmed Lady Dorothy Neville's edict that Alfred was "the finest amateur judge in England of eighteenth-century French art."

Lord Beaconsfield thought so, too. A widowed ex-premier, he moved out of 10 Downing Street into Seamore Place in 1880. "The most charming house in London," Dizzy said, "the magnificence of its decorations and furniture equalled by their good taste."

Alfred's taste was most dextrously exercised in his favors and hospitalities To his very good friend, Lord Kitchener of Khartoum, he presented two items, both masterpieces of resourceful giving. The first was a replica of Reynolds' "Lady Bampfylde" (one of Alfred's most cherished possessions) executed so well that it could hardly be told from the original, the second, a parade set of ornate saddle steels made for Philip III of Spain.

He was not only the most lavish giver, but the most cunning impresario of parties. Friends often wondered why he bothered to subscribe to his great box at Covent Garden, when all the stars appearing there also performed for his private soirees. Rubinstein, Liszt, Melba (whose financial affairs he managed), and Mischa Elman (whom he discovered) enchanted his music rooms The moment they entered his house they were talented friends, not professional artists—a convivial impression he could create with the utmost deftness. He never seemed to realize that the jeweled trifle with which he thanked them for their courtesy was worth far more than the highest concert fee.

This was his forte and made him the greatest host of the era: unparalelled attention to the visitor's well-being. Cecil Roth recounts the breakfast ritual, which began with an infinitely capacious dumbwaiter standing at the ready in the guest's bedroom, and the footman announcing the menu: "Tea, coffee, or a peach off the wall, sir?"

Let us assume that the guest, unprepared for such unprecedented matitutinal variety, chooses tea.

"China tea, Indian tea or Ceylon tea, sir?"

"China, if you please," decides the stranger.

It is poured out. The litany continues "Lemon, milk or cream, sir?"

The guest indicates that he will take milk.

But the inquisition is not yet over "Jersey, Hereford or Shorthorn, sir?"

The day passed in this fashion. When the company repaired to their dressing rooms toward evening, they found baskets filled with a rainbow of sprays from which to select boutonnieres or corsages for dinner. If the burden of choice engendered a headache, a delightful remedy was at hand; throughout the night broughams and drivers waited to soothe insomniacs with a moonlit ride. If the chill of dawn gave them a cold, they could resort to a medicine chest as magnificently stocked as the wine cellar. And when they had to go home at last, their luggage would be larded with little mementoes of their stay. The men would find boxes of the host's famous guinea cigars (that is, fifteen-dollar cheroots, which became so renowned among gourmet smokers that at least one manufacturer tried to exploit the cachet with a brand called Alfred de Rothschild cigars). The ladies came away with such perishable treasures as chocolates, exotic fruits and hothouse blooms.

A specialty of Alfred's was the "adoration dinner." This was a miniature banquet, attended by only one woman—the lady in whose honor the affair was given—and three or four men "she might like to meet." A beautiful actress of turn-of-the-century London—Lily Langtry, for example—would be "adored" in the lushest possible circumstances by, say, the current Prime Minister, the world's foremost tenor, and a legendary general like Lord Kitchener. This function, too, culminated in a "little" present which the gentlemen joined in laying at her feet (the choreography here must have been interesting). The male guests were consulted on the gift beforehand, but its purchase was the host's monopolistic privilege.

Alfred, the most urbane and delightful of men among inhabitants of his own stratosphere, always acted a little awkward before the lower classes. He seldom mixed with his beneficiaries (as Leo liked to) or with the common ruck of tycoons (as Natty did). Aloofness only added to his aureole. Inevitably he became one of the favorite targets of Max Beerbohm's pencil. And yet, dandy, fop, dilettante though he was, he remained a Rothschild. He was not an idler. With all his many silken divertissements, he still found time for the three Family vocations: business, Jewry and charity.

Of course, he interpreted all three his own way. Even Natty, the despot of the City, could not get him to show up at New Court on time. He came late and stayed late, and instituted a whole "Bohemian shift" of clerks to be his staff. At twenty-six he was elected the first Jewish Director of the Bank of England. The job is not a sinecure. Even a Rothschild needed both ability and application to keep on being re-elected for twenty-one years. When he resigned in 1889, a bit precipitously, it wasn't lack of financial gifts that had tripped him up, but excessive curiosity as a collector. He had paid a great deal of money for a picture he had long wanted. The dealer in question banked at Threadneedle Street, and the profit he had made could be gleaned from his account. Alfred gleaned. Alfred cried out, a bit too loudly. The dealer lost a client, and Alfred his directorship, but London gained another first-rate Rothschild story.

No such mishap occurred when he performed his Jewish duties. He attended synagogue as punctiliously as his brothers, though Natty often had to make sure his boutonniere was properly subdued And despite his strong inclination toward the decorative splendors of Renaissance paintings, he disciplined himself not to buy them, because of their religious content (another proof of how hard it is to be a Jew)

Also in a Judaic context, Alfred is associated with a deathbed mystery about Disraeli The great statesman had been baptized at the age of twelve but never hid his racial pride He claimed descent from the Marranos, or secret Israelites of Spain, whom fifteenth-century terror had forced into an artificial Christianity but who redeclared their faith at the final hour. Now, Disraeli's dying words, according to some biographers, resembled the phrase "shema Yisroel," the Jewish deathbed confession of faith. And Alfred de Rothschild was among those in charge of the last rites over the body. It all added up to a rumor which has been neither proved nor stopped.

To the public, Alfred's name blazed most brightly in connection with philanthropic fetes. Here he was an endlessly industrious and accomplished impresario. No other man could have masterminded the unique gala night in Covent Garden on behalf of the Boer War charities For his sake alone, the great Patti abandoned her iron prejudice against performing at benefits, and with Alvarez —imported especially from New York—she sang the great duet from Gounod's Romeo and Juliet. Only Alfred could have managed to book the massed bands of the Queen's Household Cavalry and the Brigade of the Guards. Only at his bidding would the haut monde of London pay such exorbitant prices: 250 pounds (or four thousand dollars) per box, fifteen pounds (or 230 dollars) per seat. And this particular affair aside, it is probable that mainly he, the most magnificent of the three magnificos, animated the august friendship on which the triumvirate based much of its eminence and to which we will turn now

5. At Marlborough House

The greatest social triumph of The Family came to pass—by now a traditional irony—through their stubborn Jewishness. During a good part of the nineteenth century the two major British universities did not care for foreign faiths. They required that every academic candidate declare allegiance to the Church of England. At Oxford one had to do so before matriculation, at Cambridge not until the awarding of a degree. Therefore Natty, Leo and Alfred attended Trinity College, Cambridge, to study though not to graduate. Even today, long after the removal of religious restrictions, the Rothschilds read at Trinity as a result. In the 1850's this circumstance brought them together with a chubby, merry Cambridge boy named Bertie. He was also known as the Prince of Wales.

The friendship between the future King of England and the grandsons of a ghetto apprentice was instant and intimate. It remained permanent and astounding. Bertie's chumminess with Natty, Leo and Alf—and, before long, with Ferdy (the Austrian Rothschild, Ferdinand)—was unheard but not untalked of. It produced newspaper headlines, upset court chamberlains, and roiled protocol. Some of her Majesty's ministers worried lest the heir apparent pass on state secrets to a commercial firm. As it turned out, his Highness, primed by the Rothschild information service, often knew more than the fretting ministers. But generally the friendship intrigued every walk of life and thrilled Jews all over the world.

Day after day the court circular announced that the Prince of Wales had stayed with Lord Rothschild at Tring Manor, joined Mr. Leopold at the Rothschild shoot in Leighton Buzzard or yachted with Mr. Ferdinand at Ramsgate. It was the Rothschilds, more often than the oldest ducal clans, who could send out cards with the magic phrase, ". . . to have the honor of meeting Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales." On a darker occasion, after Bertie's appearance in the witness box of a divorce court, it was Alf's piano that beguiled the Prince through a sleepless night at the Amphytrion Club

More usually the friends sojourned at Marlborough House, where Bertie held his un-Victorian court; where one toasted, waltzed, placed bets together, occasionally lent one another money, and made the silkiest whoopee in the Empire. The "Marlborough Boys," of whom the Rothschilds were a vital part, became the set in Europe. A motley galaxy, the set was not without a certain historical impact. It did something about Lytton Strachey's complaint that royalty had been unfashionable in England since Charles II. The Hanover line had put a beery vein into Majesty. Victoria—respected, revered though she was—could not be admired as the quintessence of chic.

But long before he became Edward VII, her son managed even his naughtiness with an Edwardian flair. At Marlborough House Bertie reigned more smartly and practiced a much more democratic snobbery than Mrs. Astor did on Fifth Avenue. Society went through a healthier house cleaning than anywhere else on either continent.

Let the courtiers raise their eyebrows sky-high—joviality began to outrank genealogy in London, wit took precedence over etiquette, the colorful over the emptily decorous. The Rothschilds scored on every count. In addition, they were always ready to help a chap out with a few thousand pounds, even if his Mater's name was Victoria. Natty, Leo and Alfred played their part in running the wax figures out of Mayfair, in revitalizing the élite and thus adding to the viability of the country, in glamorizing the Crown.

The Queen herself came to recognize this, despite her rather ingrained earlier thoughts about the place of Jews. However, it took more than the combined luster of the three brothers to sway her Majesty at last. It was a fourth Family personage who induced her to make the initial public move.

Ferdy, the Austrian, turned the trick. We must go into his history a little to understand how. He had married Evelina, a sister of the three brothers, in the 1865 wedding described earlier. Eighteen months later she died in childbed. Ferdy decided to remain in England. He became an English Rothschild in residence, maintaining at Rothschild Row that town house with the famous white ballroom; English in political allegiance, becoming a subject of the Queen and, when Natty left the Commons for the Lords, taking over The Family's parliamentary fief by becoming the new M.P. for Aylesbury; English in his charities—he founded the Evelina de Rothschild Hospital for Sick Children in London and the Evelina de Rothschild School in Jerusalem. At Christmas he sent a brace of pheasants to every busman in London; as acknowledgment, the drivers ribboned their whips in yellow and blue, the Rothschild racing colors. And Ferdy was English in his eccentric willfulness. He would give a ball at such short notice that his female guests would not have time to prepare their dresses, whereupon the hasty host made amends by ordering them new couturier creations at his own cost for the next function.

A typical Ferdy whim produced one of the greatest sights of southern England. In 1874 magic began to transpire at Lodge Hill, as desolate and deserted a spot as could be found in Buckinghamshire. Ferdy had bought it and 2,700 acres of environs from the Duke of Marlborough for some 200,000 pounds. Ferdy happened to like the view. To make the vantage point habitable, the entire top of the hill was sliced off. Water must be hauled from fourteen miles away. A special steam tramway with a track fourteen miles long had to be built to transport materials from the nearest rail station. Numerous driveways with a manageable gradient were hewn into the slopes Teams of Percheron mares, imported for the purpose from Normandy, toiled up the rise with building stuff.

A wilderness was coerced into a park through topographical surgery, drainage, irrigation, and the wholesale planting of shrubberies. Acres of flowerbeds were sown. Since Ferdinand placed his woods as conveniently as other people place their ashtrays, he had hundreds of trees transplanted. Since he liked large chestnuts, sixteen horses were needed to move each one, the telegraph wires by the roadside must be lowered for their passage. The whole thing was rounded out with the customary terraces, aviaries, rookeries, fountains, and groups of seventeenth-century statuary by Girardon, an important Versailles sculptor.

What house could fit such an estate? Ferdy decreed a select anthology of his favorite French castles Into his mansion of mansions he incorporated the two towers of the Château de Maintenon, the dormer windows of Anet, the chimneys of Chambord, two versions of the staircase of Blois (slightly smaller, and glazed to fight off the English climate)—all "suitably combined, edited and improved," one expert thought.

As to interior decor, Ferdinand sometimes had the paneling specially carved to accommodate outsize paintings like Guardi's two vast views of Venice. More usually he contented himself with ready-made wares—that is, with the finest boiseries (decorative paneling), extracted from the most luxurious Louis XV and Louis XVI Hôtels in Paris, brought across the Channel, and integrated artfully into the various apartments. The furniture consisted largely of peacock pieces made for the royal family in France. The carpeting constituted the world's largest collection of Savonneries, so named after the workshop of their origin, whose products went exclusively to the Bourbons. The ceilings, Beauvais tapestries, Sèvres porcelain, and objets (including a big musical elephant) matched the foregoing and each other. Canvases by Reynolds, Gainsborough, Cuyp, Pater, Van der Heyden—not to speak of those by Watteau and Rubens later added by heirs—were almost legion.

After more than a decade of creation there rose above the English countryside an immense French Renaissance mirage, glistening in white marble, resplendent with 222 rooms Ferdy rested, and thought it good. He called it Waddesdon Manor. To this day it remains an absolutely stunning circumvention of coziness.

All the world came to see and to gasp. At his Saturday-to-Monday parties (the week end was practiced but not yet invented in the fin de siècle) the host would entertain the Shah of Persia, the German Emperor, Henry James, Robert Browning, Guy de Maupassant. (The Agha Khan and a series of prime ministers from Balfour to Winston Churchill are also found in the guest book.) Bertie honored one of the Blois staircases by breaking a royal ankle on it.

Rumors of the phenomenon reached Victoria's ear. On May 14, 1890, Her Majesty did a nearly unprecedented thing She called on a private individual. She had to see for herself what this Rothschild had wrought out of a bare hill. A small incident marred her reception. Lord Hartington, later Duke of Devonshire, committed the inexplicable gaffe of shaking Madam's hand instead of kissing it. As a result she kept it to herself during the rest of the introductions. But after a pony had driven her about the grounds in a Bath chair, after she had strolled through the galleries, vestibules, drawing rooms, she couldn't help agreeing with all other visitors. "The host was delightful," she said, "as the place was beautiful"

The day warmed her heart toward the Rothschilds. When on the Continent, she began to drop in familiarly at the French estate of Alice, Ferdy's sister. She even used Rothschild couriers for some of her private mail, finding it a more discreet channel than the diplomatic pouches. (The extent of Family discretion became evident after her death, when Natty, appointed trustee of the Disraeli estate, discovered a number of "very private" letters from the Queen to the very dearest of her prime ministers. Natty took one look at them and sent them to King Edward, who for once expurgated his mother and not vice versa: he had the letters burned)

Even this supernal fellowship the Rothschilds conducted without damage to their Jewishness. On the contrary, sometimes the Church of England seemed in greater danger. On January 19, 1881, the Prince of Wales drove through a horrendous blizzard to appear at the Central Synagogue in Great Portland Street for Leo's wedding He loved the kosher food served at the reception. He roared at the Jewish jokes. These gradually became his passion. Since Natty shared the weakness, the House of Rothschild became a great international center not only of finance but also of stories about Moe and Ike.

"At least one foreign diplomat, Baron von Eckardstein," reports a biographer, "had standing orders from the Rothschilds to collect and report all good Jewish jokes he heard abroad—especially stock-exchange puns from Berlin. On more than one occasion . . . he even dispatched bon mots by wire to New Court whence they would find their way before long to Marlborough House."

The archivists at the London bank today, who guard so many secrets, also guard a treasury of Jewish jokes relayed in telegram language by a Prussian nobleman.

Later the Jewish theme would emerge more seriously on a more august level. By 1908 Bertie had become His Britannic Majesty. The Rothschilds had long fought for the betterment of their coreligionists in Russia. And now that the King was to meet the Czar in Reval, there ensued a correspondence between the members of the Marlborough set on what exactly could be done about Russian intolerance.

Something was done. Jewish persecution became an important item on the Reval agenda. "From my report," the British ambassador in Petrograd wrote to Natty shortly afterward, "you will see that the Russian Prime Minister contemplates amelioration for the lot of the Jews in Russia."

It was about this time that a London rabbi is supposed to have said that the Jews, unlike the Christians, did not yet know a Messiah—but they did have a holy family.

They had, if his simile be accepted, more than one. There were other Rothschilds in the world just as Rothschildian as the English ones. It is the only rich clan without poor relations. To round out the splendors of the mishpoche's fin de siècle, we must travel to France and Austria.

6. Naughty Bismarck

In France the clan's social eminence was perhaps most easily established Eighty years of intermittent revolution had demolished the Bourbons, dethroned the Orleanists, discredited the Bonapartists Only the Rothschilds kept their scepter. After the smoke of the Paris Commune cleared in 1871, Baron Alphonse emerged as the head of the family with the most unbroken ruling record.

Genealogically, the French branch was the closest of all to the ghetto. It skipped a generation. James, the dynast, was the youngest of the five founding brothers and did not have offspring until comparatively late in life. His children were the contemporaries of his brothers' grandchildren The four sons—Alphonse, Gustave, Salomon and Edmond—cut as luminous a track through the social history of their country as did their counterparts across the Channel. But of the Paris quartet, the first- and the last-born left the strongest impress.

Alphonse, as small and stout and cannily relentless as père James, was even more suave and comme il faut. It was said of him that he owned the best pair of mustaches in Europe Altogether he made an awesome, handsome standard-bearer of the name.

A railroad journey with a fabulous mishap conveys something of the aura of that name in France. One of Alphonse's clients, the King of Belgium, had asked him to a strictly private dinner at the Belgian capital. To avoid publicity, Alphonse took a simple first-class train ticket to Brussels. But a few miles from the border the express stopped and rolled to a siding. Inquiries revealed that the main track had to be cleared for a private train.

Now, the Baron was not accustomed to being on the short end of someone else's priority. Furthermore, he arrived in Brussels too late for the royal soiree. The telegraph wires between France and Belgium quivered with his wrath. Finally, sheepishly, they disclosed the root of the trouble. Alphonse's valet, having forgotten to pack the baronial dinner clothes, had used the master's name to send them after him via private train. His own dinner jacket had shunted the Baron to a side track.

On more important occasions Alphonse managed to be in the right spot at the right time. His career intertwined with a great French cataclysm—the destruction of Louis Napoleon and the violent birth of the Third Republic. Through it all, Alphonse manned the traditional Rothschild station: right behind the scenes.

On July 5, 1870, an imperial adjutant summoned the Baron hastily and brought him to the palace at St. Cloud The Emperor was deeply disturbed. He explained that Prussia had overdone it at last. She had made one long sore out of the Franco-German border, and now she was foisting a Hohenzollern onto the throne of Spain, to get at France from the back. Her persistence must mean war. Only England might be able to restrain Bismarck, and England must be asked to act immediately But since the English happened to be without a foreign minister—the incumbent Lord Clarendon having just died, and a new one (it was to be Lord Granville) not yet appointed—Napoleon wished to make use of Rothschild channels.

Alphonse read between his Majesty's words. An official French request for British mediation might smack of French weakness. In this case, a discreet Rothschild hint would be more diplomatic than a diplomatic move.

The Family, of course, was an old hand at this sort of thing On the same afternoon a cipher telegram flew from rue Laffitte to New Court. The same night Natty decoded Alphonse's message. The next morning he reached the Prime Minister's residence just as the P.M. was about to leave for Windsor Castle and an audience with the Queen. The two drove together to the station, and Natty conveyed the message from Napoleon. Gladstone listened, pondered. Finally he said he did not think his government was in a position to influence Prussia.

With that brief conversation Napoleon's empire began to fall. Again the wires buzzed between New Court and rue Laffitte. Hours later the Emperor knew that his bid to save both face and peace had failed. Bismarck had his way. Twelve days afterwards, on July 19, France unmuzzled her feeble cannon against Prussia. On September 1, Napoleon capitulated at Sedan.

Within a week the monarchy was erased, the German armies ringed Paris, and the House of Rothschild prepared for the next round with history. The Family was about to play a particularly neat trick. It had failed in its intervention on behalf of the victim. But it was to best, rather entertainingly, the victor.

By the middle of September the siege of Paris began in earnest. On September 19, Wilhelm I, General Moltke and mighty Bismarck established their high headquarters at Ferrières, the principal mishpoche country seat. The Prussian monarch wandered through the Renaissance vasts of the château, admired the thoroughbreds teeming in the stables, smelled a lake of orchids in the hothouses, tasted the Goshen-sized fruit, surveyed a whole private landscape of parks and gardens—and was frank enough to be thrilled.

"Kings couldn't afford this," he said to his staff. "It could only belong to a Rothschild"

Bismarck did not feel quite so exhilarated. It was his misfortune that King Wilhelm regarded Ferrières' owner as a very powerful colleague. His Majesty therefore refrained from commandeering Baron Alphonse's munificent bedroom, using a modest chamber instead. Wilhelm issued, besides, a strict edict to the General Staff, who were billeted with him: even touching the various art treasures was verboten. And Bismarck—Bismarck himself!—received orders not to indulge his hunter's passion in the gorgeous shoot.

Baron Alphonse's chief steward, as the enforcer of these nasty prohibitions, was the bane of the Iron Chancellor at the hour of his triumph. Today, in the château's blue drawing room, Baron Guy still keeps a copy of the steward's report. The stout fellow refused to serve Bismarck, who wanted to mitigate his annoyance with a few good drops, any bottles from the famous Rothschild cellar. When Bismarck, enraged, forced the steward to sell him a case for good payment, the latter lodged a complaint with his master in Paris.

Baron Alphonse was amused by the German bogyman who must fight for his wine at Ferrières while the rest of Europe cowered before him. The Rothschild amusement became the property of the haut monde in besieged Paris. In December the Prussians shot down a balloon containing a letter to the Countess de Moustier with the following words: "Rothschild told me yesterday that Bismarck was not satisfied with his pheasants at Ferrières, but had threatened to beat his steward, because the pheasants did not fly about filled with truffles."

These lines, relayed to Prussian headquarters, upset the Iron Man no end. He saw in them a hint that he had breached the King's proscription. And, to be petty about it, he had sneaked a tiny bit of pheasant shooting on the sly.

"What will they do to me?" he is quoted in his collected works. "They won't arrest me, for then they won't have anybody to arrange peace."

They did have him to arrange the peace. They also had, on the French side, the eldest Rothschild brother, who would not stop trying the Chancellor's nerves. For one thing, Alphonse consistently scooped German news services on the armistice by sending pigeon post from rue Laffitte to New Court; thus the Rothschild system overcame even the rupture of telegraph connections. When it came to actual negotiations, he was not easy to deal with, either. The little Jew squared up very calmly to the huge Prussian. He even insisted on speaking French, though Bismarck reminded him angrily of the German origin of The Family and harped on his own friendship with old Amschel of Frankfurt.

Alphonse, adamant, stuck to his guns, his language, and his indispensability. No one but Rothschild could guarantee a food supply to starved, beaten Paris (in London Alfred, Leo and Natty headed the French relief efforts). No one but Rothschild could underwrite the five-billion-franc indemnity to Prussia. No one but Rothschild, aided by his foreign cousins and the bankers in his group, could have paid off this monstrous sum so much less ruinously than Bismarck expected—and two years ahead of schedule.

It was this performance, above others, which assured the continued eminence of the Paris house throughout the newest French republic. Bismarck ruled and thundered, receded and departed. Rothschild ruled and whispered—and remained. Ferrières still stands as the mightiest Family château.

7. The Plushiest Pilgrim

The youngest sons of great European families often resort to the army, where they make do with colonelcies, or to a church career sans true vocation, or to an untalented expatriatism. The Rothschilds know no such case in all their ranks. Their youngest sons get so much more to start with, and, as Edmond's example shows, they can make so much more of what they get.

This baby brother of Alphonse (he died only in 1934, at the age of ninety) engaged in the customary activities on the Family program. He sat behind his desk in the Partners' Room at rue Laffitte (his specialty was dividing the world's oil with Shell and Standard Oil); he built a great town house, he married another Rothschild, Adelheid of the German branch, in a round of festivities which were both religiously orthodox and religiously splendid. He had powerful cultural interests. If his brother Alphonse gathered rare goldsmith work of the Renaissance, if his cousin Willy in Frankfurt became a celebrated bibliophile and cousin Nathaniel in Vienna specialized in late eighteenth-century bijoux—he, Edmond, assembled a sumptuous collection of engravings and left no less than twenty thousand of them to the Louvre

But Edmond also turned to an interest that gradually consumed his long and characteristically energetic life. It began as charity and ended, in our time, as history. It can be summed up in one word: Palestine.

The story starts on September 28, 1882, with an incongruous interview in Edmond's office. Behind his desk sat the Baron with his manicured imperial, his velvet bow tie and fragrant buttonhole. A strange apparition faced him, wreathed in wild prophetic whiskers. The Grand Rabbi of France, who acted as the Baron's appointment secretary in such matters, introduced the man as Reb (Rabbi) Samuel Mohilever, and endorsed his mission: to raise money for the support of new Jewish colonies in Palestine. Reb Mohilever did not look like a fund raiser, though, he certainly didn't act like one.

The conversation began with an inquiry. Would the Baron mind if he, Reb Mohilever, did not discourse in the modern manner, but employed the tone of voice used by a rabbi in front of the congregation? All right, to the first main point. Why was Moses, who was tongue-tied and stuttered—why was he picked to be the leader of the Jews and to take them from Egypt to the land of Israel?

After discussing the pros and cons in the Talmudic manner, the Reb disclosed to the astonished Baron that the reason lay in this: God deliberately avoided a smooth talker for the revelation of His word. He chose a stutterer to show that what was so compellingly convincing in Moses' mouth was not a clever tongue but the Voice of the Lord.

A series of similar sing-song reasonings led Reb Mohilever to the conclusion that he, too, was a poor speaker; but that perhaps his smallness had been chosen to demonstrate the greatness of his cause: to show that the soil of Zion was the one haven for his persecuted brethren in Eastern Europe He had come to Paris hoping to commit to Palestine the innermost fiber of Baron Rothschild's soul.

Edmond answered that he was prepared to contribute the necessary sum—which his visitor had not even mentioned. But Mohilever's Talmudic dialectics steered the interview straight back to the soul again. The Baron, not prepared for a spiritual set-to, kept stressing his willingness to give money, the Rabbi would not let go of the innermost fiber. At last the deep black eyes of the old man won out. Edmond promised ". . . to consult myself and make a trial to see what will result from it."

Grand Rabbi Kahn, who played interpreter whenever the Baron's Yiddish gave out, has handed down the phrase. It turned out to be no mere politesse. For the remaining fifty years of his life Edmond made a trial of the question, and it made a trial of him.

He became the greatest activating force in Jewish colonization prior to Zionism. He began by financing the settlement of exactly one hundred and one Russian Jews not far from Jaffa. Gradually he went on to subsidize needy Jewish colonies and to create others. His funds drained swamps, dug wells, ploughed land, built houses, surveyed terrains. Of the seven new Jewish agricultural communities existing in Palestine in the middle 1880's, three escaped bankruptcy only through Rothschild. A fourth was altogether of his own making. The rest benefited vitally, if more indirectly, from his help. The initial colony of Rothschild-propelled emigrants was soon followed by many hundreds and later thousands of such settlers.

All that constituted Edmond's outward involvement. It didn't really harmonize with a rather fastidious, saturated, retiring inner nature. Gladly he would have let just his checks speak for him. In fact his first contribution was signed "Nadev Hayeduha," the Hebrew term for "anonymous benefactor."

A contradiction developed in the man. Chaim Weizmann noted it the first time he met him. "Everything about him was in exquisite taste," Weizmann recalled later, ". . . his clothes, his home—or rather his homes, his furniture and paintings. . . ." And yet there he was—this aloof, immaculate dandy—hip-deep in the economics of irrigation, manure and soil rehabilitation.

Apparently the eyes of Reb Mohilever remained fixed on him, demanding the innermost fiber of his soul. Some force always pulled him out of the drawing room into the heat of the Jewish battle. His princely reserve, fostered by secretaries and assistants, always lost to the Rothschild drive that must conquer definitely whatever it casually touches

Before long Edmond found himself intervening with the Turkish government, at that time in control of Palestine, in favor of Jewish colonization. He did diplomatic backstage work. And he was sucked into the internecine strife among the settlers. The distant donor changed into the querulously loving father and finally into the fond, familiar tyrant.

When a deputation of Russian Zionists called on him to discuss the need for reform in some of his settlements, he grew purple like David mortified by Absalom's treason: "These are my colonies, and I shall do with them as I like!"

Few of his friends in the Jockey Club would have recognized M. le Baron.

It was an awful spectacle, this combination of paternal ire and Rothschild autocracy. Often he threatened to withdraw his immense subsidies and thus to wither all Jewish Palestine with one stroke. How seriously he meant such threats became plain later on, when some other Rothschilds began to show a tentative interest in Palestine.

"What!" he said furiously to Weizmann. "After I've spent tens of millions on the project, while they made fun of me, they want to come in now with a beggarly few hundred thousand francs and share the glory? If you need money, you come to me!"

The degree of his embroilment reached touching and tragicomic heights in 1889, a so-called Sabbatical Year. (Orthodox Jewish law, based on certain passages in Leviticus and Deuteronomy, forbids the tilling of Jewish land during every seventh year.) Edmond thought that idleness for so long a period would ruin most of the young settlements. He remonstrated with the rabbis of Jerusalem, who remonstrated right back. Edmond flew into a fatherly Jewish fit, the worst fatherly fit there is. He forsook racing, banking, collecting and all his other superb leisures. To combat one fanaticism, he had to assume another.

For months on end he plunged into ferocious theological maneuvers. He convoked a series of secret conferences of rabbis friendly to his position. It was decided that the Sabbatical Year must be worked through, but without breaking orthodox tradition Edmond's counselors devised a method to have this kosher cake and eat it too: all the Jewish land in Palestine had to be sold, for that one year only, to people of another faith. In the eyes of God the settlers would then be working for non-Jews—which was permissible—and not for themselves.

The rabbis of Jerusalem cried out at this as a blasphemous fraud upon the Eternal. They threatened to excommunicate anyone caught working. They promised to take up collections to support all those who abstained.

They were dealing with a Rothschild. Edmond laid a powerfully worded brief of his argument before Rabbi Isaac Elchanan of Kovno, Lithuania, famed throughout the world as the greatest orthodox authority. After considerable coaxing on the Baron's part and deep study on the part of the savant, Reb Elchanan issued his verdict: under such safeguards as Edmond's rabbis proposed, the soil of Zion could be tilled during the Sabbatical Year.

Thus Edmond won another victory. But the innermost fiber of his soul was sore. The very man who had first sensitized it, Reb Mohilever, had not spoken up for Rothschild's side of the controversy.

A remarkable document survives from that time. It is a letter written by Edmond to the Grand Rabbi of France but meant for Reb Mohilever. The Baron, too hurt to address the Reb directly, asked the Grand Rabbi to bring the letter before the true object of his emotions. Edmond's indignation was such, in fact, that he even abstained from French. He wanted to berate Mohilever in Mohilever's own idiom. And so this outburst is innocent of the polished perfections of the secretariat usually in charge of the Baron's correspondence Composed by Edmond himself, it consists of Jew Street jargon, a sort of Yiddish. And Edmond's halting Yiddish seems a good deal more pathetic than the primitive German once used by his ghetto-dwelling grandfather. With his poor German old Mayer Amschel pursued the success he fully achieved; while with his beginner's Yiddish the baronial grandson reached for a folk identity he could never quite attain. The missive, scrawled painfully in Hebrew letters, is an explosion of fond disappointment, overflowing with fury and love, and culminating tremulously: ". . . Herr Oberrabiner, do you know what I think? I will tell you the truth. . . . These colonists want to take the land and the houses away from me and then scoff at me. . . . Let Rabbi Mohilever know that I will send the colonists . . . and all their families back to him and then we will see what he will do with them. And besides traveling expenses, I will not give them a cent."

Needless to say, the threat was never carried out. Reb Mohilever could conclusively prove that he had worked undercover for Edmond against the hostile rabbis; had, in fact, clinched the supertheologian's favorable decision He and Edmond resumed their curious friendship. The colonists did work through the Sabbatical Year and, for all their spasmodic rebelliousness, came to regard Edmond as their protector-king His name merged with the designation "Nadev Hayeduha" under which he had first given money for their cause. At the end of the nineteenth century, Jewish Palestine knew him as Baron Rothschild, the Anonymous Benefactor.

This particular wound healed. But there was another Palestinian problem Edmond could never quite resolve. The Rothschilds, in all their branches, kept their distance from Zionism. Official Family policy held that they and their coreligionists were European citizens of the Jewish faith, who must refrain from anything that might jeopardize emancipation. Most of the mishpoche looked at Edmond's Palestinian obsession with what was at best astonishment.

Theodor Herzl, the political founder of the Zionist movement, sensed an opening. He considered The Family "the most effective force our people have possessed since the dispersion." If only it were a force sympathetic to his aims! Albert von Rothschild, head of the house in Herzl's native Vienna, had not even deigned to answer a request for an interview. But perhaps this Paris Rothschild, this Palestine-prone Baron . . .

Herzl pulled a hundred wires to achieve an appointment with so great a prize. But Edmond closed his doors. His activities in Palestine were a matter of philanthropy, not of nationalist politics. Thereupon Herzl, in a letter to the Grand Rabbi of France, declared that he would resign Zionist leadership in favor of the Baron the moment he turned Zionist. Edmond agreed to a meeting It took place on July 18, 1896, and ended fruitlessly. For the Baron, Palestine was a refuge for oppressed brethren, period.

When Herzl met Lord Rothschild and his brothers later on, the encounter turned out even less happily. Natty, Leo and Alfred liked the man (they even helped to support his family after Herzl's death), but they were impervious to most of his ideas. "How is one to negotiate with this collection of idiots!" Herzl exclaims in his diaries.

New Court, in fact, launched the bitterly anti-Zionist League of British Jews. Nothing seems odder, therefore, than the following letter by the British foreign minister, a letter known to the world as the Balfour Declaration.

Foreign Office
November 2nd, 1917

Dear Lord Rothschild,

I have much pleasure in conveying to you, on behalf of his Majesty's government, the following declaration of sympathy with Jewish Zionist aspirations which has been submitted to, and approved by, the Cabinet:

"His Majesty's government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people and will use their best endeavours to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country "

I should be grateful if you would bring this declaration to the knowledge of the Zionist Federation.

Yours sincerely,
Arthur James Balfour

The Lord Rothschild apostrophized here is, of course, no longer Natty but Lionel Walter, his heir, in The Family's eyes a dangerous maverick because of his weakness for Herzl's dream. Yet not even he approached one tenth of Edmond's ostensibly non-Zionist efforts toward the realization of Israel. Thus the historic strangeness of the Balfour Declaration and the paradox of Edmond's own position.

In his memoirs Chaim Weizmann, Israel's first president, recalls a remark by the "Nadev Hayeduha": "Without me, Zionism wouldn't have succeeded, but without Zionism my work would have been struck to death." A pregnant statement, it contains both the implied separation between Edmond's "work" and Zionism and his crucial connection to a cause he could never quite bring himself to espouse formally. (To Edmond is ascribed the saying that a Zionist is an American Jew who gives an English Jew money to get a Polish Jew to Palestine) He considered Palestinian Jewry not as a polity but as his own obstreperous yet passionately loved family, whose duty it was to love him, its father, in return. But Zionism?

The national goals, the propaganda apparatus, the official trappings of a political organization? That sort of thing dismayed him. After all, he, Edmond de Rothschild, was there, ready to take care of it all benevolently and privately.

"Why must you people go around making speeches and attracting attention?" he once asked Menachem Ussishkin, a Russian Zionist leader

"Baron Edmond," the man answered, "give us the key to your safe, and we promise not to make any more speeches."

Actually the Zionists had it both ways. They went on making speeches. And they did get the key to the Baron's safe, at least to one of his larger ones. The money went on flowing throughout the Baron's long life.

In 1931, at the height of the depression, Zionism was out of funds. Dr. Weizmann was dispatched to the Baron. As soon as the Jewish leader reached Paris, the grippe struck him down. This most chronic of Zionist speech-makers was flat on his back when, surrounded by a panic of bellhops and concierges, the eighty-six-year-old Baron came in. In his hand he carried a check for forty thousand pounds.

"This should help bring your temperature down," Edmond growled, put the piece of paper in Weizmann's hand and stalked out again.

Never has an ideological shirker been more generous to the cause he shirked Palestine flourished in a hundred places under his touch. His money helped start new soil cultures in the Holy Land: almond trees, mulberry bushes, jasmine, mint, tobacco He not only pressed the introduction of viticulture, but guaranteed its financial survival by purchasing the entire grape crop of all Jewish settlements year after year—and at a higher price than the quotation on the world market.

He also sparked the industrial development of Israel-to-be. His funds facilitated the formation of the Palestine Electric Corporation Ltd., the Portland Cement Company's "Nesher Ltd.," the Palestine Salt Company and the Samaria Water Company.

And still this was not the end. He even made sure that the colonies he bought clustered strategically across Judea, Samaria and Galilea, to serve as strongholds in time of need. The time of need came, four decades later.

At one point it puzzled Weizmann why Edmond spent such huge sums of money on excavating and exploring the Mount of Zion. The Baron claimed he was interested in finding the Ark of the Covenant.

"I asked very seriously," Weizmann says, "what he hoped to achieve with the Ark. He answered, 'Les fouilles, je m'en fiche: c'est la possession.' Excavations be damned, it's the possession that counts"

The Arab armies can deem themselves lucky that there weren't more such non-Zionists as he.

Following Edmond's money came Edmond himself. The Baron and Baroness began to visit Palestine, perhaps the plushiest pilgrims the Holy Land had ever seen. The couple liked to travel in their own yacht, weighing anchor in Marseilles and docking at Jaffa.

It was on May 5, 1887, that the "Nadev Hayeduha" first walked on Zion's soil. That day marked, in an observer's phrase, "the historical meeting between a prince and his people." Trailed by a great following, he prayed at the Wailing Wall and—he was, after all, a Rothschild—quickly undertook to buy it from the Arabs. Not only that, he aimed at the conversion of the surrounding neighborhood into one huge Jewish shrine. To meet Moslem objections, he made a second commitment: he would purchase another, equivalent plot of land; here he would accommodate, in much more comfortable houses than they had near the Wall, all the Mohammedans who must be evacuated.

Edmond appropriated three quarters of a million francs. The Pasha of Jerusalem had already given his approval. Yet the whole scheme died mysteriously of the opposition from Jerusalem's Chief Rabbi.

Nevertheless, this and subsequent baronial visits were splendid occasions. The velvet bow tie was seen everywhere—in hospitals, schools, farms, industrial installations, workshops. Naturally Edmond took a cognoscente's interest in things familiar to him—the wine cellars, for example, or the perfume factories, or the display of horsemanship by young colonists. (Today his grandson, the present Baron Edmond, and England's Lord Rothschild jointly continue the administration of his huge Israeli interests. They also continue the tradition of pet luxuries: their special hobby is the development of Caesarea into a fashionable golfing resort.)

No matter how occupied, Edmond did not forget the innermost fiber Once, at Tel Aviv, he said publicly and bitterly, "Never before did I regret so much as now that I cannot speak Hebrew."

Another time—it seemed the eyes of Reb Mohilever, now dead, would never release him—he called out his conviction "that if you abandon Judaism, all our people will suffer shipwreck . . . for you are the pride and hope of Jewry . . ."

Two days after this speech, settlement leaders were invited to dinner on the Rothschild yacht. They found great wonders there. The ship had a complete, specially fitted kosher kitchen, and a kosher Escoffier who created meals such as Solomon must have served Sheba. The satin-lined cabin used as a prayer room was in the stablest part of the ship. And all the doors of all the sumptuous staterooms had mezzuzahs

The story goes that one of the settlement elders, greatly taken with the prodigies of the vessel, kept walking its decks and almost missed the tender that took his colleagues back to shore.

"Don't you want to return to Zion?" one of them twitted him

"You go to the Promised Land," he is supposed to have answered. "I'll stay on the Promised Yacht."

8. Hoffahig

In Austria, Salomon's grandchildren had come of age and helped to spangle the evening of the Habsburg Empire Of this fin-de-siècle generation we already know Ferdinand, the Anglicized lord of the palazzo at Waddesdon and member of the Marlborough House gang. Ferdy's two brothers administered the Family fortunes along the Danube. Both covered Vienna with their philanthropies. They founded, among many other things, a General Hospital, an orphanage, an Institute for the Blind, an Institute for the Deaf Mute, a neurological clinic and hospital, and a botanical garden.

Both brothers raised Rothschildian palaces. Albert, the youngest (chosen by his father to take over the bank), conjured up an enormous Louis XVI mansion on Prinz Eugenstrasse. Inside, the "Albert Memorial," as some of the English Family dubbed it, teemed with magnificences; we will mention only the silver dining room and the gold ballroom, with their heroic chandeliers of over half a thousand candles each.

As for Nathaniel's palais in the Theresianumgasse, it ran the gamut from four Van Loo paintings commissioned by Madame Pompadour to a unique porphyry table of Marie Antoinette's, and held the clan's most extensive collection of Louis XIV, XV and XVI treasures anywhere. When this building was demolished after World War II, both principal art museums in Vienna had to rearrange their collections thoroughly in order to absorb the massed gorgeousness given them by Baroness Clarice.

The care of such treasures demanded regiments of servants. Among the endless personnel of the Rothschild households were the hereditary positions of silver-polisher and marble-polisher. These functionaries consecrated their entire lives to caressing Rothschild cutlery and stroking Rothschild stone and jealously handed on the privilege to their sons Baron Albert savored the rugged side of life as well. A dedicated mountaineer, he was the seventh man to climb the Matterhorn, and neither he nor his brother neglected the chief bucolic pleasure of the aristocrat. At Schloss Langau, at Enzesfeld, and particularly at the castles in Schillersdorf and Beneschau, the great Rothschild hunts were staged. Here the poorer of the major nobility would sometimes arrive with suitcases full of dirty laundry. Two good reasons accounted for this habit: 1. It increased the bulk and weight of one's luggage, bringing it in line with that of other guests, 2. One unpacked one's clothes and left them casually about one's room, as though they had just been soiled. The maids picked them up automatically and brought them to the Rothschild laundry, 130 men strong, which washed thousands of garments without asking a single question. In the end, alas, Baron Albert stopped the practice. Instead, boxes of brown soap were put in the luggage of his unlaundered friends on their departure.

In Vienna, the height of the spring season was the Derby held on the first Sunday in June (here, as in England, the mishpoche won it three times), the social highlight of the day being the Rothschild tea given after the race But the greatest show was the Family progress along the Hauptallee, the long tree-lined avenue connecting city and race course A mechanical wonder figured in the procession: the Rothschild electric auto. All of Austria-Hungary hardly knew its like. Gliding along silently in the Family colors of blue and yellow, it was a final landmark of Alt Wien But on the Hauptallee it always suffered a jovial indignity. Frank, one of the most famous Fiakers (horsecabbies) in town, would overtake it; youthful Rothschilds leaned out of the galloping cab, hooting at the slow galvanic monster.

Fiaker Frank rates an explanation. He was the living badge of nabobery. Old Vienna's other immortal horsecabbie, Fiaker Bratfisch, was Crown Prince Rudolf's. Both the Habsburg and Rothschild families had fleets of their own vehicles, but, in addition, each hired a special independent taxi for its exclusive use and for the whole season. The Crown Prince always had Bratfisch ready to take him to tender appointments best concealed from the regular servants manning Habsburg carriages.* The mishpoche, acting with less amatory enterprise but with equal lavishness, engaged Frank because of his celebrated speed.

In Fiakers and in some other respects Rothschild and Habsburg ran parallel. But to many it seemed impossible that the two should ever meet. Rothschild doing business with a cabinet minister, or even Rothschild entertaining a duke—well, all right, it couldn't be helped. But Rothschild breaking bread with Habsburg, Europe's greatest imperial symbol—Himmel!

* It was Bratfisch who discovered the bodies of Rudolf and his mistress after they killed themselves at Mayerling.

In 1887 Himmel! happened. Emperor Francis Joseph "by a special act of grace" forgave the Rothschilds for not being descended from four lines of high-grade nobility and for being unbaptized They were declared Hoffahig, or courtworthy. The dispensation admitted them to levees, receptions and private gatherings attended or given by the imperial family. Henceforth the mishpoche moved among a circle boasting a longer continuity of rule, and a far haughtier inaccessibility, than the courtier society surrounding Queen Victoria or the Prussian Kaiser.

Francis Joseph himself was correct—no more, no less—to the people he had just appointed his friends Every Rothschild funeral or wedding received an All-Highest personal telegram To one Family party the Emperor lent the Court Opera ballet and permitted it to dance through the torchlit Rothschild gardens in the Theresianumgasse—a singular imperial favor Yet the sovereign's private exchanges with Rothschilds seldom went beyond comment on the weather or common health problems.

A story, perhaps apocryphal, suggests reasons for this attitude. Once, when his Majesty had involved Baron Albert in longer conversation than usual, the haut monde swiftly teemed with the rumor that the monarchy was in need of a new loan Perhaps his Majesty felt that such intimacies were too damaging to Habsburg credit.

His wife Elizabeth, Austria's strangest, loveliest and most intellectual empress, didn't have to bother with such considerations. She liked the female members of the clan, with their many esthetic interests. A close friendship began between her and Albert's sister Julie, a cosmopolitan Rothschild, sumptuously typical of the fin-de-siècle mishpoche. Born of the Austrian house, married into the Naples one (Adolph von Rothschild was her husband), living in Paris and a frequent visitor to her brother Ferdy's English splendors, Julie had her favorite residence in Switzerland—a fairytale villa in Pregny on the shores of Lake Geneva. On September 9, 1898, she and the villa became linked with a dark hallmark in Habsburg history.

That day the Empress of Austria came to visit, not in an Austrian vessel of state, not in the Rothschild yacht Julie had offered, but by ordinary steamer. She arrived in her customary deeply veiled, discreetly hatted, strictly incognito fashion (she traveled as Countess Hohenembs), attended by a single lady-in-waiting.

As so often, Julie managed to cheer her high guest The magnificent dinner was served with subtle regard for the dietary laws of both ladies: Julie ate kosher, while Elizabeth was the first low-calorie Empress, with Vogue cheekbones and, despite her sixty years, an infinitesimal waistline. The concealed orchestra played a sweet Italian air. The hostess steered the conversation to Heine, her guest's favorite poet, and before long the All-Highest lady proposed a champagne toast, a levity rare in her melancholy later years

Afterwards the ladies adjourned to the gardens and then to Julie's hothouses. Arranged by countries and climates, the plants constituted the finest private conservatory in Switzerland. As an exquisite bouquet of petals and aromas enveloped the Empress, she brightened still further. All was smiles until the time of departure Then Elizabeth signed the visitors' book and, still in her pleasant mood, turned it a few pages back. She stopped, pale. There was the signature of Crown Prince Rudolf. Her son, too, had been a guest at Pregny, shortly before his suicide at Mayerling

When the Empress left, Julie noticed tears in her eyes.

And later the lady-in-waiting recalled that on the way back, again by ordinary steamer, Elizabeth had talked about nothing but death. The subject was apt. Less than fifteen hours afterward, in front of her Geneva hotel, she died of an anarchist's dagger The Empress of Austria had spent her last full day in Julie von Rothschild's home

Happily, most fraternizings between royalty and the Austrian mishpoche were not ominous Other sisters of Albert and Ferdy had other friends with scepters. Mathilde, who had married Wilhelm von Rothschild of Naples, is one example One day her husband's namesake, Wilhelm II (grandson of the admirer of Ferrières, and Kaiser Bill of World War I), invited Mathilde to dinner. The occasion almost induced apoplexy in the court chamberlains at Potsdam and inflicted a historic Schrecklichkeit on Prussian protocol. For Mathilde von Rothschild refused to touch a morsel on his Majesty's table. The Kaiser had forgotten to cook kosher.

Last, not least, there was Alice, youngest of Albert's sisters, who lived until 1922. She and Lord Natty were beyond doubt the most formidable individuals yet produced by the House of Rothschild. Alice never married (an even greater rarity among Family females than among the males), perhaps because a lady so overwhelmingly independent in income and mind wasn't fit for mere wifehood. Who was man enough for the woman who cowed Victoria, Queen of England?

By way of introduction to this feat it should be said that Alice inherited miscellaneous Austrian fortunes, including Ferdy's Waddesdon Hall. But the apple of her eye was her great estate at Grasse in the South of France. Here she, too, kept elaborate gardens. In contrast to Julie, however, she wielded one of the gruffest green thumbs in horticultural history.

Victoria, after her first taste of Rothschild hospitality at Waddesdon, became a frequent, often daily guest at Grasse during every royal stay in southern France. These visits put Alice into her fiercest fettle. The memoirs of Lady Battersea (née Rothschild) vividly described Cousin Alice ". . . walking miles up and down hill, giving orders to the Inspector of Police, the royal coachmen, the foremen and workmen, with the manner of Napoleon As a surprise to the Queen she ordered a mountain road to be levelled and widened, and this had to be done in three days which means building small walls, picking out huge stones, covering small ones with macadam, turning a stream. . . ."

Alice never failed to welcome Victoria with courtesies such as custom-made landscapes. She even beguiled her august friend into throwing flowers from a hidden villa window at passers-by, and almost changed the venerable monarch back into the tomboy princess she had been three quarters of a century before. But when the Hanover heel trod on a Rothschild petal, all bets were off. A dread moment saw Victoria trespass on a newly planted flower bed.

"Come off at once!" Baroness Rothschild thundered at the Queen of England and Empress of India.

The Queen came off. After that she referred to Alice, perhaps only half in jest, as "The All-Powerful One." Their friendship endured. So did the epithet. "The All-Powerful One" became Alice's nickname to her kin.

But weren't they really all all-powerful, all-enduring? The Family colors fluttered from the finest towers in Europe. It seemed impossible that they should ever be hauled down.

VIII

NO MORE PLUMED HATS

1. Two Kingdoms Resign

THE mathematically inclined reader may have noticed that recent chapters spoke only of three Rothschild banks—in London, Paris and Vienna. But the five founders established five houses; which leaves us, at the beginning of the twentieth century, with a deficit of two.

The disappearance was not accompanied by convulsive changes In fact, the two casualties managed to dismantle themselves with the same stately savoir-faire with which the other branches flourished. In 1861 Garibaldi's Red Shirts stormed southern Italy. What had been the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies became part of unified Italy. The Rothschild bank at Naples closed its portals because there was no longer a Neapolitan monarch to loan to. Adolph, son of the founder, Carl, did not care to do business with lesser principals and followed the royal family into France. A nice difference obtained between the two expatriates. In Paris the king became an ex-king, but Rothschild was not an ex-Rothschild. His exile proved no less noble than his former native household. The Empress of Austria (who became so intimate with his wife Julie) was only one of many illustrious guests in his several residences.

But Adolph had no children. His brother Wilhelm had three; brother Mayer, seven. All ten were—supreme frustration—girls. In this unrelieved femininity lay the demise of the Italian branch and, as a matter of fact, of the German as well.

Strictly speaking, the Frankfurt house had stopped with the death of Amschel, who was not blessed with offspring. After him the excess boys of the Naples branch, Wilhelm and Mayer, assumed the Frankfurt reins. Yet the river Main, by whose shore the original patriarch had sired those five titan scions, seemed to have bedeviled the newer Rothschilds They had daughters, daughters, daughters only! The lack of sons soured and withered Mayer and Wilhelm, just as it had once withered and soured Uncle Amschel. Like Amschel, they buried themselves in orthodoxy (Wilhelm wouldn't shake a man's hand unless assured his fingers had not touched pork that day) and in collecting (Mayer's silver collection and Willy's library represented Frankfurt's greatest private treasures). To business the two didn't pay much more than mechanical attention. Why should they, with no young men to carry it on?

In Berlin the government tried to provide incentives. The Kaiser's newly constituted Reich wanted to benefit, as had the other great European powers, from a thriving Rothschild House. Mayer was appointed to the German House of Lords. Bismarck forgot the confounded cheek of Ferrières' wine steward and attempted several times to lure spare Rothschild sons from other capitals. The mishpoche, however, was, and is, a hard family to beguile. One cannot promise the moon to people who own the moon. The Frankfurt Rothschilds stayed sonless. The foreign Rothschilds stayed put. The inevitable came to pass.

In 1886 Mayer was found dead, his head sunk across a column of figures. In January, 1901, Wilhelm was buried. Three months later Edmond (son-in-law of Wilhelm) and Natty (son-in-law of Mayer) sent out a historic announcement to all friends and business acquaintances of the original House in Frankfurt:

> It is our sad duty to inform you that in consequence of the decease of Baron Wilhelm Karl von Rothschild, the Banking House of M. A. von Rothschild und Sohne will go into liquidation. The liquidators are 1) The Right Hon. Nathan Mayer, Lord Rothschild, London, 2) Baron Edmond de Rothschild, Paris.

There are two postscripts to this ending. Until the advent of Hitler, the Family name survived in Frankfurt in hyphenated form. Minna, Wilhelm's youngest daughter, married the banker Maximilian von Goldschmidt and for a dowry brought him not only a fortune but the ten magic letters. After his wedding and until his death her husband was known as Maximilian von Rothschild-Goldschmidt.

The second postscript concerns an interesting nautical vignette. According to the diary of the then French ambassador to Berlin, it occurred on the blue Mediterranean in April, 1908. Two luxury vessels happened to be anchored in the harbor of Palermo. One was the Hohenzollern, Kaiser Wilhelm's great seagoing limousine; the other, the yacht of "a young French Rothschild" (possibly Edouard, Alphonse's son). The imperial ship signaled an invitation, and soon afterwards the young Baron was piped onto the Emperor's deck. His Majesty greeted his guest with warmth and almost instantly launched into the argument for a Rothschild return to the Vaterland. The Kaiser praised the greatness and fruitfulness of The Family; asserted that he had no racial or religious prejudices, nor would he tolerate any in his court, and pledged that a revived German house would enjoy a position actually superior to the London, Paris or Vienna branches.

Though it provided a pleasant occasion, the Kaiser's cordiality was no more successful than Bismarck's. The Paris, London and Vienna branches were too busy being their refulgent selves, too occupied with enjoying and radiating the ultimate splendors of an age that died of shellshock in 1914.

2. The Golden Momentum

All the balls and soirees did not stifle a fundamental Rothschild instinct. Bismarck had called it "the absurd desire to leave to each of their (often numerous) children as much as they themselves inherited."

Business was business, and business continued to be prosecuted by the three remaining houses. In England, N. M. Rothschild & Sons invested hugely in Indian mines; it financed Cecil Rhodes' diamond dominion in South Africa (a burly uncut diamond still lies on the mantel of the Partners' Room in New Court, and the house is still connected with de Beers); its banking and loan operations covered most of South America. In France, de Rothschild Frères went into electrical industries, developed the Mediterranean Railway, branched out to North Africa and exerted such control over the Baku oil fields in Russia that the French Family was for a number of years a principal competitor of the Rockefeller trust. In Austria, S. M. Rothschild und Sohne extended its scope into Hungary through the famous 6 per cent Gold Loan of 1881; the Creditanstalt, invented as weapon against the Crédit Mobilier, grew to be a species of giant subsidiary of the Family bank and became a financial force in every corner of the Habsburg realm.

Thus the mishpoche maintained a good deal of the octopus tradition. It also retained, and much more painstakingly, a much more fundamental habit. Take Anselm's testament, written in 1874 by a sophisticated, cosmopolitan Viennese grand seigneur In its instructions and emotions it is still an exact echo of the first patriarch's will composed under a ghetto roof nearly three quarters of a century before. Anselm wrote.

> I charge all my dear children to live constantly in perfect harmony, not to allow family ties to loosen, to avoid all disputes and unpleasantness and legal actions, to exercise forbearance and tolerance to one another and not to let themselves be carried away by angry passions; . . . let my children follow the example of their splendid grandparents, for these qualities have always insured the happiness and prosperity of the whole Rothschild family, and may my dear children never become unmindful of this family spirit. In accordance with the exhortations of my father, the grandfather who so sincerely loved them . . . may they and their descendants remain constantly true to their . . . Jewish faith

Then follows a refrain common to so many Rothschild testaments, from Frankfurt Jew Street onward:

> I forbid my children most explicitly in any circumstances whatsoever to have any public inventory made by the courts, or otherwise, of my estate. . . . Also I > forbid any legal action, and any publication of the value of the inheritance. . . Anyone who disregards these provisions and takes any kind of action which conflicts with them shall immediately be regarded as having disputed my will, and shall suffer the penalties for so doing.

In London, Natty went his father one better and resurrected his grandfather's custom of leaning against the "Rothschild pillar" at the 'Change. It was purely an ancestral ritual.

Not that Rothschild had stopped being the great specter of Europe's bourses. But now The Family usually bulled or beared by messenger and telegraph. Its name was still a thunderclap. In 1873 the Vienna stock market ran wild with shares issued by imitations of the successful Creditanstalt. Prices rose with speculative passion—then fell with dangerous speed. Finally a Rothschild agent appeared on the floor. A broker, anxious to sell, made a beeline for him and asked whether he was interested in acquiring half a million's worth of bank securities.

"Half a million!" the Rothschild man said within hearing of a crowd. "All your banks together aren't worth that much today!"

This single remark, uttered with Family authority, massacred prices, mowed down a dozen pseudo-banks, and helped set off the crisis of 1873.

But the name could enchant as well as terrify. In 1889 the London house made available for public subscription shares of its Burma Ruby Mines operation. The day after the announcement, Lord Natty's carriage could not enter St. Swithin's Lane. This rather narrow street leading to New Court was choked, wall to wall, end to end, with people. It was the first time the bank had offered subscriptions to a mining enterprise, and from all over London investors had rushed to sink their savings into a Rothschild project.

Natty's driver and footman formed a prow through this veritable overflow of confidence. His Lordship followed, swearing into his buttonhole. Matters got worse at the bank building proper. The crush blocked access to every door. Finally a ladder was lowered from the first floor, and Lord Rothschild—top hat, beard, watch chain, morning coat, carnation and all—clambered up the wall and through the window, like a thief in the night.

Natty's dislike of ladders stopped him from getting into many more such public share offerings. The Rothschilds were (still are) big individualistic operators, who would rather do business with their own kind. Kings do not as a rule clog St. Swithin's Lane, and the mishpoche preferred one monarch to a hundred thousand grocers. (The classically favorite money customer in Family history remains Leopold I of Belgium. In 1848 he entrusted the French house with a nest egg of five million francs When he died in 1865, they had parlayed his worth—for appropriate commissions—into over twenty million)

Alas, the nineteenth century grayed into the twentieth. The kings dwindled, while the shopkeepers multiplied. On this increasingly important clientele the joint-stock banks battened. And while The Family controlled at least one important grocer-conscious institution in the Creditanstalt, neither their hearts nor the core of their business went out to the idea.

And so gradually, and in full panoply, they seemed to retire toward the sidelines After all, they could afford everything even a Rothschild could want. Their fortunes grew automatically even while they slept or danced or missed chances. They were bored by risk. Not long after his climbing tour at New Court Natty confessed his philosophy on all kinds of speculation: "When I say 'no' to every scheme and enterprise submitted to me, I return home at night carefree and contented."

On another occasion a royal duke asked him if there was a certain technique for making money on the 'Change. "There certainly is," Natty answered. "It consists of selling too soon."

In Vienna, Albert kept quoting the advice of his grandfather, the founder Salomon: "One must go into the market as into a cold shower—quick in and quick out."

The showers, it appeared, had become a lot colder lately. The next generation showed signs of not wanting to get their feet wet at all. They had other interests, such as animals Lord Natty's eldest, Lionel Walter, established the great Tring Zoological Museum on the Family estate. Eventually the museum held—mounted, arrayed and captioned in exemplary fashion—more than a quarter of a million birds and over two million insects, including specimens not found in any other collection. Walter, a Cambridge-trained natural historian of the first rank, financed a number of expeditions, he published several important scientific papers as well as Novitates Zoologicae, a periodical highly regarded in the field.

The flea collection at Tring was particularly famous and intrigued not only scientists. A wag claimed that the most precious specimen in the collection had cost the owner ten thousand pounds but, on nearer examination, turned out to have escaped from the Family bank.

Another, more authenticated, development made the incongruity between bugs and business painfully clear. Walter, of course, had his bank duties to perform. But the museum began to engulf his energies, his time, and finally his pocketbook. The allowance he received from his father was fittingly generous Still, it did not quite cover the stuffing of several hundred thousand animals Hopefully he speculated on the market But he did not know how to sell too soon The money vanished. After that he knew only one resort—to borrow a large sum and secure it with a life-insurance policy for 200,000 pounds made out, secretly, on his father. Unfortunately his scientific ardor outran his commercial circumspection He had forgotten that insurance companies often divide their large risks with other firms. In this case the other firm happened to be the Alliance Insurance Corporation, founded by N. M. Rothschild, with Lord Rothschild as chairman of the board.

One day milord looked at recent accounts of the corporation, and discovered the munificent policy on his life, contracted by his own son. From that moment on, Walter was excused from all further work at New Court. Yet in the end The Family had reason to be proud of Walter's taxidermist career; he became the first of several important Rothschild scientists.

Other members of his generation ended tragically, however. Walter's brother, Nathaniel Charles, died by his own hand, as did his Viennese cousin Oscar; while Oscar's brother, Georg Anselm, spent his final years in a private asylum. Family rivals wondered whether the fiber of the mishpoche was weakening. Some thought that Rothschild, the erstwhile lion, had become a dozing decadent. They began taking liberties with him—and reeled back, bloodied. The lion could leap from his cushions to kill as competently as ever.

In France a former right-wing Deputy named Bontoux was the first to rediscover the Family claws In 1876 he invented the Union Général, a shrewd combination of bank and anti-Semitic crusade. The incorporation prospectus announced the intention "of grouping and transforming into a powerful lever the capital of Catholics. . . ." Wasn't it time to make an end of the republican finance system sucked dry by Hebrews? All the moneyed Christians who detested the palatial Jewry in their midst were attracted to the concept. Each reactionary element paid Bontoux its dues. Soon he had coined four million francs out of prejudice—sufficient initial capital. The Union Général allied itself with the powerful Banque de Lyons et de la Loire, floated shares which rose from 500 to 2,000 to a great deal more, and promptly spread the holy war on Rothschild to Austria.

Here Bontoux closed ranks with the Landerbank, a rival of the Creditanstalt. And here he followed the ominous precedent set by Pereire's Crédit Mobilier. As with Pereire, the Rothschilds gave way to Bontoux for months, even years. Grimly the clan watched him overextend himself.

In 1881 all Rothschild banks began to strike back in their orthodox, irresistible fashion. They acquired scattered piles of enemy shares, then rid themselves of everything at once, with one single price-depressing blow. The first big slash of the Rothschild paw brought down the Banque de Lyons Bontoux cried out. He invoked the mercy and the money of all Catholics against the enemy—to no avail. Between January 5 and January 20, 1882, the Union Général fell 2,090 points from a high of 3,050 to 950. On the so-called Black Sunday at the Vienna bourse, Bontoux and most of the banking houses allied with him were wiped out.

The panic that ensued on Europe's money markets could be stopped only by the force that had started it: Rothschild. And Rothschild was the first to buy again. Bontoux perished, but the mishpoche and Christendom survived together.

Eight years later this Continental spectacle repeated itself, with some modifications, in the British Isles. The rival in London was the House of Baring, not a fly-by-night like Bontoux, but the oldest and—next to the Family house itself—the biggest merchant bank. Lord Revelstoke, head of the firm, had long wanted to show those New Court parvenus where to get off.

The great Argentinian boom of 1886 seemed to be an excellent opportunity. He excluded the Rothschilds from this bonanza by summoning all Baring reserves, or, rather, oversummoning them There was, for instance, a port-construction project billed at ten million pounds, underwritten by Baring but despite all efforts unsubscribed by the investing public.

This time The Family didn't have to slash. It just bided its time. In the autumn of 1890 the Bank of England received news that Baring had accumulated liabilities to the tune of twenty-one million pounds sterling and saw no way of covering them.

The importance of the firm was such that its fall would drag with it much of the credit of London. Something had to be done. The merchants and financiers of the City began to raise a guarantee fund for Baring creditors. No less a sponsor than the Bank of England provided the auspices for the scheme. And yet it was doomed without the help of the biggest private money power in the Empire.

All eyes turned to the Partners' Room in New Court. Would The Family come through to help its own worst competitor?

The Family came through, not only on one but on two vital levels. It added the name of Rothschild, plus a Rothschildian sum, to the guarantee (The exact amount of the various private contributions was never revealed in this ticklish affair.) It also exercised its incomparable foreign connections in favor of the failing rival. Through Natty's intervention, Alphonse in Paris was alerted; and through Alphonse, the guarantee fund picked up an additional three million pounds, in gold, from the Bank of France.

London's credit remained unblemished. On November 15, 1890, the Governor of the Bank of England could announce that Baring would be in a position to liquidate all its commitments.

"When you thank the Bank of England," he said, "it is very important to bear in mind the willing and cheerful aid we have received from others, in the first place from Lord Rothschild, whose influence with the Bank of France was of such assistance without which . . . we could not have rendered the aid we were enabled to give."

In brief, the clan continued as a paramount presence not only in the drawing rooms but also on the money markets of the world. Until the shots of Sarajevo, it remained almost majestically unchanged.

3. The Great House and the Great War

(a) Peacemongers Again

There is a difference between stately old-fashionedness and utter ossification. The house took powerful pains to stay itself, but it was not insensitive to the drifts of history. From 1850 on it had recognized the awakening new national identities in Europe and made gradual, probably unconscious adjustments. Once upon a time the mishpoche had stationed members in England, Austria and France. Over the decades these turned into very English Roth-schilds, very Austrian Rothschilds, very French Rothschilds.

In France, Baron Edouard (Alphonse's son) built a typical Frenchman's daydream. As companion piece to his Versailles at Ferrières, he thought he'd like a Petit Trianon, a small and playful country palace His Manoir Sans Souci at Chantilly (today still one of the residences of his widow) therefore has a mere ten guest rooms and requires a gardening staff of only three. There is no mistaking its Gallic quintessence, from the chaises percées in the powder rooms to the Picasso drawings along the corridors to objets de frivolité, such as ostriches made of downright feathery porcelain and fluffy tortoise-shell bureaus with twinkling rubies for drawer pulls. The squat concrete swimming pool scooped out by Goring during the occupation only points up the manor's Frenchness by contrast.

As for the Vienna house, it has loved music with a profligacy distinguishing Austria even today (The budget slice spent in another country on missiles is spent here on Mozart.) The most lavish entertainments by the Danubian part of The Family were the musical soirees Footmen in knee breeches and powdered wigs ministered to these affairs into the teens of the twentieth century. And, as we have noted, through the Rothschild garden there would dance the Vienna Opera ballet.

And in England? Constance Rothschild perfected in her butler the reflexes of immaculate Anglo-Saxon understatement. During the bombings of World War I he would enter after the first detonations and say boredly, as though announcing the arrival of a tedious ducal couple:

"The Zeppelins, my lady."

Well before 1900 the Rothschilds had divided into three separate groups that never for a moment forgot their common connection, yet whose first allegiance went to the countries of their birth. Such allegiance became more urgent. While the several houses lived more nationally, Europe smoldered more nationalistically.

Of course, The Family tried as hard as ever to preserve or at least to finance peace. Each year this became a harder task. A great state no longer need rely on some few big financiers—a war minister could simply tax an army into existence. But when Prussia and Austria went to war in 1866, the mishpoche applied every form of pressure. At one point the Paris house even descended to returning the Austrian ambassador's check for a mere five thousand francs, on the grounds that his Excellency did not have sufficient funds to his credit. The haut monde gasped. Wasn't the ambassador a Metternich and therefore perforce an old Family friend? Rothschild's slap at Habsburg diplomacy became the talk of Central Europe. Nevertheless, the war went off on schedule.

It was a comparatively brief and small clash. But the mishpoche, into whose very nerves was bred a dynastic hatred of cannon, smelled a much larger conflagration far ahead, long before the smoke began to bother other nostrils.

That same year, on September 12, 1866, Anthony de Rothschild (Lionel's brother) expressed a heavy premonition. The jockeying among the powers over colonial aggrandizement weighed on his mind. "The sooner we are rid of all our colonies," he said, rather remarkably for a man with a bankful of overseas investments, "the better for England. We want peace at any price. . . . What do we care about Germany or Austria or Belgium?"

The key word here is Germany. After its triumph over Napoleon III, it had become a burgeoning bullying empire of Prussians. Each year the sabers of Berlin were heard more loudly in the capitals of Europe.

In 1911—four and a half decades after Anthony's warning—his daughters, Constance (Lady Battersea) and Annie (Mrs. Yorke), cruised together in the latter's yacht, The Garland. Sailing through the Baltic, whom should they run into—it's a peculiarly small world if you are a Rothschild—but the Kaiser in his yacht, the Hohenzollern? As in the harbor of Palermo, so here Wilhelm made a great show of hospitality. Constance's journal describes, with a wary and prophetic eye, the lunch his Majesty served them.

"He sits on a raised seat in the officers' mess," she observes. "We listened to his band of forty strong he had on the yacht with him. . . . He spoke quite respectfully of Grandmamma *. . . He said: 'We should remain friends, but don't like our toes trodden on.' . . . I hope we see him again, but not as our conqueror."

The threat was plain—and The Family was not the kind to just sit and sigh. Random yachting encounters would not avert a global conflict. Bald pressure could not be used as in the old days. But perhaps one could catalyze preventive negotiations?

It was only logical that England, the inveterate intermediary, should have had the Rothschild house most keenly sensitive to the handwriting on the wall. The surprise lies in the particular Family member who was most actively and ingeniously pacifist. Not until it was all over and the memoirs, often the secrets, of statesmen and politicians saw print, did the public discover the identity of the Rothschild who made such remarkable attempts to arbitrate among the powers.

Who would have suspected that Alfred, the most eccentric of sybarites, the driver of zebras, ringmaster of his private circus—that just he, the hothouse flower of the mauve decade, would turn out to be a very quiet, subtle, efficient diplomat on the sly?

He was, let it be remembered, Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian consul general in London (The dignity, like so many others embellishing the mishpoche, was an heirloom handed down through three generations. Nathan Mayer had been the first to receive it. From him it had descended to his son Lionel, from Lionel, after his conquest of Parliament, to his brother Anthony; and from Anthony, who had no sons, to his nephew Alfred) But Alfred's consulship was almost as purely honorary as his knighthood of the French Legion of Honor It served only as the vaguest framework for the efforts he began in the 1890's Possibly he deployed his Austrian office as counterweight to the fact that his first loyalty went to the English Crown. For Alfred made a soundless art out of being impartial and yet solicitously agile, out of being a private individual who commanded resources and connections matching a prime minister's.

His base of operations was his great town house at Seamore Place. Here, at cunningly composed dinners, German dignitaries and British statesmen mingled without the encumbrances of protocol or official implications. Here, under the influence of the rarest vintages, the best cigars, the choicest food, they could warm to each other's jokes, each other's wives—and, just possibly, each other's viewpoints.

It was on the nap of Alfred's sumptuous carpets that an early English-German crisis subsided. In 1898 Berlin and London were at loggerheads over the ownership of Samoa in the South Pacific. Alfred, a good friend of Count Hatzfeld, the German ambassador, received word that the Kaiser wanted to thrust a very bluntly phrased note at Whitehall. The public effect of such truculence was incalculable. Rothschild undertook to furnish a more civil channel. At Seamore Place shortly afterwards Ambassador Hatzfeld and Joseph Chamberlain, Her Majesty's Secretary for the Colonies, sat next to each other in great soft leather armchairs. They drank demitasses and clicked crystal cognac glasses. Then the German informed the Englishman, in terms as pleasant and elegant as the setting, of the gist of the complaint. Later Chamberlain conveyed it, in similarly courteous form, to Lord Salisbury, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. Salisbury could then respond, without losing an ounce of British dignity, to the Kaiser's satisfaction.

Alfred was equally adept when it came to sweetening London's tone toward Berlin. In 1900, after the outbreak of the Boer War, the German steamer Bundesrat was detained by British naval craft and thoroughly searched A violent German protest followed. It evoked a no less violent reaction from British newspapers, particularly the anti-Teutonic Times. Berlin flew into an uproar. The situation bordered on the critical until Seamore Place resumed its sumptuous arbitration. Over some five-star bottles, Alfred found a way of letting the Germans know, discreetly, that the prime minister neither shared nor necessarily approved of newspaper passions in London. Her Majesty's Government was unable to strong-arm a free press, but conveyed its position through the good offices of Alfred.

"Baron Rothschild," reported the acting German ambassador, "has confidentially informed me that this journalistic attack has displeased the Foreign Office. . . . A Cabinet minister has urged him to make every effort to bring pressure to bear on the Times in this affair. Baron Rothschild was shortly to meet Mr. Buckle, the editor-in-chief of the Times, and he told me he would speak to Mr. Buckle very strongly on the matter."

Victoria died shortly thereafter, which made Alfred's ticklish task somewhat easier. Now his good-fellowship with the new king could be enlisted. He would get

Edward VII to agree with his desire for a less irascible press, then have the Times chaps to dinner and impress on them the viewpoint "of an august person."

About this time the Boxer Rebellion broke out in China against Shanghai's European settlements. An international expeditionary force was dispatched to suppress it Alfred, in shrewd estimation of the Kaiser's military pride, moved every lever at his disposal to give Germany the ceremonial honor of the top command.

It seems strange that the Rothschild who lived most glitteringly distant from the world's daily cares was also the Rothschild most concerned about war, the greatest daily care of all One of his letters sums up the constancy, the tact and the doggedness of his conciliations. It was written by him to the German diplomat von Eckardstein for transmission to Count Bulow, the Kaiser's chancellor. Essential extracts read as follows:

> Your friends (my dear Eckardstein) know from experience that I have had the interests of the two countries at heart for many many years, although during this period various subjects of discussion have arisen between the two Governments . . . great good will has subsisted with regard to Germany in the highest circles, in the Ministry and in the country itself. . . . I can prove personally that this is the case, for I have always been more or less behind the scenes, and I have always done my best to produce satisfactory results. When Prince Bismarck was Chancellor he wanted to have representatives on the Egyptian Caisse de la Dette, and this was immediately agreed to; later he embarked upon a colonial policy which was also approved by the British government (on the Samoa question an agreement was reached in accordance with Germany's wishes, and quite recently . . . British troops in China were placed under the supreme command of Count Waldersee). In a word, as far as I can recollect, the British government has always done everything possible to meet the wishes of the German government.

What is the position now? For some months, it might indeed be said for some years, the German press has constantly written against England, indeed, to such an extent that authoritative circles are beginning to wonder what is the aim of this aggressive policy, and whether Count Bulow or the German government cannot do something to prevent it. I am well aware that the Press in Germany is free, as it is in England, and that it will not have its policy prescribed . . . but when the Press of a country spreads rumors about a friendly Power that are absolutely false, the Government could well have taken the first convenient opportunity of stating how much it regrets that such false statements have been given such currency

. . . Such allegations have not merely made the Germans resident in this country indignant. . . . People here would have been glad to hear that the caricatures of our royal Family, which were sold in the streets of Germany, had been confiscated by the police. In a word, of recent years Germany's policy toward England has been a kind of "pinprick" policy, and, although a pin is not a very impressive instrument, repeated pricks may cause a wound, and, since I hope and pray with my whole heart that no serious wound may result, I am venturing to address these lines to you in the hope that you will clearly explain to Count Bulow how difficult my position in this matter has become with regard to the British government, since I have done everything possible over such a long period of years, and that I feel now that you do not fully appreciate the great advantage of a genuine understanding with England. Possibly Count Bulow does not know that various German Ambassadors have often met famous English statesmen at my house, and it is not very long since the deceased Count Hatzfeld frequently met Mr. Chamberlain at my house, and they both shared absolutely identical views regarding the general policy of the two countries, in their mutual interests.

In referring to these details in a very private way, my dear Eckardstein, I do so in order to show that I am not speaking sans connaissance de cause, and I should be infinitely sorry if the small refroidissement which at present obtains and has absolutely no raison d'être should continue and possibly increase. . . .

Possibly you can prevail upon his Excellency to send me a few lines in reply to my observations; I would naturally show these only in the highest circles, and make the most discreet use of them; I am convinced that a friendly éclaircissement would produce the most satisfactory result—and immediately. If you should have the opportunity, my dear Eckardstein, assure the Emperor of my complete devotion; you know how greatly I esteem His Majesty.

Yours,
Alfred von Rothschild

This sensitively worded, delicate reproach was reinforced by more open displeasure from Alfred's brother, Lord Natty. How important Rothschild sentiments were to the Wilhelmstrasse, how close The Family may have come —during one phase of the early crisis, at least—to avoiding the great catastrophe, may be gauged from a subsequent communication between Chancellor Bulow and the Kaiser.

"I venture most submissively to suggest for your Majesty's consideration," Bulow wrote to Wilhelm, "whether your Majesty's Ambassador in London should be specifically asked about any possible action to be taken with a view to dissipating any ill feeling that the Rothschilds may have, or about any other points arising out of the Eckardstein report"

And yet in the end it all came to nothing The velvet suasions of Seamore Place, Alfred's soigné French diplomatic locutions, his expert soothings—even his tiny ingenuity of changing the Family particle from "de" to "von" in his signature on the letter to Eckardstein—they were all blasted by the explosion at Sarajevo in July, 1914. The Kaiser moved from yacht to battleship. It would have been better for him, for the Rothschilds and for the world if Alfred's noblest pursuit had not been a lost cause.

(b) The War

The holocaust spread from the Austro-Serbian border across the world. Not since the Napoleonic campaigns had the world found itself in so great a war This time the Rothschilds were the losers, not the gainers. For one thing, the front line split the Austrian branch from the English and the French; theoretically a Vienna Rothschild in uniform was obliged to shoot his poilu or Tommy cousins.

This possibility, though chilling, was small. Another factor grew more important. A century before, during the forging of their greatness, the Rothschilds had been a tough, hard-fisted, fireproof band who waded in and out of the heaviest odds. Now success had smoothed the calluses away. For many decades The Family's favorite arena had been the board room or the salon conference. There its means and its mettle found few peers. But at a time when nations ripped and starved one another to death, it was the machine gun in the trench that did the most effective negotiating. A few pages—and a whole world—ago Alfred was still writing his suave peacetime prose to Eckardstein. The difference between that communication and a wartime letter of his two years later dramatizes the clan's alienation from the raw new realities.

The supply of pit-props for dugouts had become desperately short. Alfred, now seventy-five, tethered to his fireside at Seamore Place, thought of the glorious beeches on his country estate and, a little confusedly, tried to help. His message really belonged on some assistant's desk in the War Ministry. But Alfred had no connections on such a level, and therefore addressed himself to his Majesty's first minister.

"I am not an expert," he wrote Mr. Asquith on February 28, 1917, "as regards what sort of timber would be suitable for 'pit-props,' but I cannot help thinking that, as there are so many fine trees in my woods at Halton, some of them at least would be suitable for the purpose May I ask you very kindly to send down your expert who would very easily be able to report fully on the subject, and I should indeed be proud if my offer should lead to any practical result."

The Family of a hundred years before had stormed through Armageddon in great forays of self-aggrandizement. Now they were encumbered not only with wealth but with scruples. War had become more a matter of service than of profit. Each Rothschild gave his flag whatever the flag demanded of him.

Alfred donated all his most beautiful trees. Natty sacrificed some treasured animosities. An old political enemy, David Lloyd George, was chancellor of the exchequer at the outbreak of the war. Among his key duties figured the prevention of a financial panic, and without advice and help from Lord Rothschild he would not easily succeed. Accordingly, his Lordship was asked to come to the treasury. Lloyd George looked forward with some twinges to the meeting. After all, he had once publicly included Natty "among Philistines, not all of whom are uncircumcised" He had called him still other words which were, as he himself later admitted, "not of the kind to which the head of the great House of Rothschild had hitherto been subjected." That Jewish peer would not be an easy visitor.

"Lord Rothschild," said the Chancellor of the Exchequer as they shook hands, "we have had some political unpleasantness . . ."

The other man brushed that aside with his celebrated curtness. "No time to bring up such things. What can I do to help?"

"I told him," the statesman recalls. "He undertook to do it at once. It was done."

But Natty did still more He let many of his staunch prejudices go up in smoke. Natty, in his middle seventies, the rudest, deafest opponent of social service, of suffragism and of every other kind of progressive flim-flam, Natty the most gorgeous avatar of reaction—Natty instantly suppressed every impulse which might obstruct England's victory. How could His Majesty's Government best raise money for the war effort? "Tax the rich!" snapped milord. "And tax them heavily!"

To the end Leo remained the most charitable of the three brothers. He contributed his son. On November 17, 1917, Major Evelyn Achille de Rothschild fell fighting the Turkish army in Palestine Leo himself died the same year; and before the war ended, Natty and Alfred lay buried in the Jewish cemetery at Willesden.

In France, the Paris clan's loyalty to the cause produced an unexpected result. After spending some intensive months nursing the wounded in a hospital carrying her name, Baroness Maurice de Rothschild took a few days' leave She called one of her favorite hotels, the Palace at St Moritz, to ask if there were any Germans there. The manager swore that nothing Teutonic would offend her eyes. Yet the first sight that greeted the Baroness was a well-known German champagne manufacturer. Mme. la Baronne turned on her heel.

When the Rothschilds are disappointed with a resort, they do not simply patronize another; they create their own Baroness Maurice embraced a cause with a determination recalling her father-in-law, Edmond, in Palestine Single-handedly she developed the village of Megève into the most chic French winter playground. (Today her son, Edmond de Rothschild, is the principal owner and controlling power in the resort; it admits very rich champagne manufacturers of any nationality.)

Megève notwithstanding, the great war was a grim affair for the Rothschilds too. Everywhere the Family branches enlisted their great fortunes and their young men Major Evelyn de Rothschild did not remain the only casualty. On the Austrian side of the front, his cousin Eugene had his leg shattered by a Russian bullet. When the last gun ceased in 1918, nothing was the same, not even the Rothschilds.

4. Aftermath

It is reported that in the bad fall days of 1917 an English Rothschild chatelaine approached her chief gardener, whose staff had been decimated by the draft boards. She asked him, with an innocence no less sublime than sincere, how he had managed to scatter so many fine-colored leaves all over the walks this year?

In postwar autumns the exotic litter reappeared and remained in many Rothschild bowers Now their budget kept the chief gardeners short of help; here and there the gardens themselves began to fray away. Suddenly the world turned into a meaner place. How simple being rich had been! Suddenly it was complex and so expensive. Taxes rose, rocketed, became murderous in the mishpoche's bracket. Revenue officers assaulted the Family safes far more successfully than the most vicious rivals. It became increasingly difficult to live like a Rothschild.

"I've got to keep on breathing," Natty is supposed to have said in his last year "It'll be my worst business mistake if I don't " One of his characteristically rough jokes, characteristically true Being completely Family-owned, the Rothschild banks rested not on the money of a hundred thousand stockholders, but on the private fortunes of the partners These became subject to immense death duties. Natty did make the mistake of dying. Within two years, as we know, both brothers repeated it. Thus the state tore three consecutive, titanic chunks out of the clan's assets.

The loss was compounded further by Alfred's testament. As a bachelor without commitments to wife or children, he had left a fortune still larger than his brothers'. Even after taxes a great estate remained, but the major part of it—Alfred steadfastly non-conformed, down to his last will—did not go to other Rothschilds. It was left to Almina, Countess of Carnavaron. With part of the money, his heiress financed a great archeological venture in the Nile Valley; at Thebes this expedition made the momentous discovery of the grave and the treasures of Tutankhamen. Alfred's testament upset two dynasties. It disturbed the sleep of the Pharaohs and, even more, the reserves of the Family bank at New Court.

Ultimately, though, it was not exterior inclemencies which made the 1920's and 1930's the feeblest phase of the house; it was a matter of internal poise. The Rothschilds had played so triumphant a part in the fin-de-siécle idyll that they could not quite adjust to the new backdrop which history had slammed so boorishly over the old Some of their best friends had lost crowns, courts and kingdoms. Some of their best servants seemed to have socialist afterthoughts. Some of their best balls began to be haunted by a horrid cacophony called jazz. And of course much of their best income fell to the government.

For a while they stood uncertain amid the shambles of a world they had helped create. Quite a few among them turned inward. Particularly in England, they seemed to use their hobbies as hiding places. Two pairs of brothers replaced the three British magnificos, and with one exception they did not possess the hardy business energies of their forefathers. Lord Lionel Walter, Natty's first son and successor, became immured in the Zoological Museum at Tring. It developed, at a cost of more than half a million pounds, into one of the finest of its kind in the world. Walter's brother Nathaniel was also a gifted natural historian. Conscientiously but unhappily, he performed his duties at the bank until his suicide in 1923.

Leo's elder boy, Lionel, surrounded himself with the vast rhododendron and orchid pavilions at Exbury, "a gardener by profession, a banker by hobby" His younger brother Anthony, excellent scholar though he was (he took a Double First at Trinity, Cambridge), stood out as the most practical and forceful of the current Rothschilds. For him attendance at the Partners' Room in New Court was neither perfunctory nor painful. But he was the youngest, and for a long time his voice remained small.

The aggressiveness of the tax, and the passivity of the taxed, brought about a great dying of palaces Founder Nathan's West End mansion at 107 Piccadilly succumbed to the demolition squad. The huge estate at Gunnersbury turned into a public park. Alfred's famous manse at 1 Seamore Place died literally of the twentieth century: to ease Mayfair traffic congestion, it was razed so that Curzon Street could have direct access to Hyde Park.

The magnificence of these mortalities is best dramatized by the demise of 148 Piccadilly, where Baron Lionel and Disraeli had once plotted the purchase of the Suez Canal over dinner. In 1937 the great town house expired, with a lush art book of an auction catalogue whose 250 pages included sixty-four plates and gatefolds. A single item of furniture—a tulipwood secretaire with Sèvres porcelain panels, made especially for Louis XIV—fetched fifty thousand dollars.

And the revenue department reached out to the Family demesnes in Buckinghamshire. In 1932 the second Lord Rothschild had to sell his collection of over a quarter of a million birds to the New York Museum of Natural History; on his death Tring Park became empty and the museum public property. Aston Clinton lapsed into a hotel. In Alfred's gorgeous manor at Halton a great training center for the Royal Air Force was installed.

The important French Rothschilds had sense enough not to die in the years after World War I, and thus postponed the fiscal penalty for being flesh. But if their substance didn't shrink, their manner stiffened. Baron Edouard had been in charge of the house since the demise of his father Alphonse in 1905. Under his aegis the family fortunes were phlegmatically administered rather than actively deployed.

The same stasis appeared to apply to the clan's social life. It was a time when the Jazz Age jangled down on the world's drawing rooms, when wealth began to shimmy and shake off inhibition, when the upper class in one sleek swoop jumped out of the landau into the sports car. "The very rich are very different from you and me," Scott Fitzgerald wrote, tremulous with glamor. But for a while the Rothschilds seemed very different from the very rich. They had become "old money" at a moment which did not value age of any kind. This dazed them still further, and further removed them from the new diversions of their peers. They looked quite rigid, odd, venerable.

Then a few among them remembered that being modern was one of the Family traditions. Suddenly some of the younger Rothschilds became expertly wild. Henri (the invalid Nathaniel's grandson) began to cruise through the 1920's in his yacht Eros, whose passengers often did honor to her name; wrote smart plays under the pseudonym André Pascal; built the Theatre Pigalle; and gave some of the most glittering and curfew-defying parties on the Côte d'Azur.

James Armand popped up—a top-hatted, monocled cross between Fred Astaire and Charlie Chaplin, almost as intriguing a dissonance as jazz itself. To begin with his national disparateness: "Jimmy," as the son of Baron Edmond, was French by birth; as the principal heir of his eccentric Viennese Aunt Alice, largely Austrian by fortune and by monocle; by citizenship and membership in the House of Commons, English. He was also a frail man. His left eye had been knocked out by a golf shot of the Duke de Gramont. He went through so many abdominal operations that The Family came to believe he grew a new gall bladder as soon as the old one was removed. And as he was not an especially fortunate rider, the saying developed that "whenever Jimmy has time between surgery, he sneaks in a quick fall." Yet he practiced sports, politics, philanthropy and art collecting up to the age of seventy-eight with great vigor.

And with a contradictory élan. His frock coat, stiff collar, sideburns, Tout-Paris inflections combined with Oxford accent, made him the almost clownish epitome of Anglo-French elegance. At the same time he had an accomplished career as a Liberal in the Commons, was often seen with labor leaders like Aneuran Bevan, and talked fluent Hebrew to workers in Palestine, where he carried forward the colonization projects of his father.

At the racetrack he resembled a Damon Runyon caricature dolled up in spats and monocle. And he had priceless hunches. A typically incredible Jimmy performance took place at the Cambridgeshire Handicap in 1921. Minutes before post time he began to rage up and down the line, putting bets on a 100-to-7 shot called Milenko until the bookies refused to accept any more. The grandstands laughed. Milenko won by a length and a half. Jimmy made some 200,000 pounds that afternoon.

With women, too, Jimmy had a bizarre but felicitous way. At thirty-five he suddenly decided to marry and inquired about a suitable bride at—where else?—the secretary's office of one of his golf clubs. The secretary glanced over the golf scores of various members. What about young Miss Dorothy Pinto, who had been making such good progress on the links? Soon afterwards a rabbi solemnized a union which lasted forty-three happy years, through all the many-faceted phases of Jimmy's career, until his death in 1956. Today Mrs. Jimmy administers capably her late husband's philanthropies in Israel.

Jimmy's brother Maurice was a wild Rothschild in a somewhat different way. Apparently Maurice realized that The Family, great as it was, had not yet produced a single decent black sheep. To the filling of this gap he dedicated himself with huge and by no means untalented energies. In his spare time he played banker. It also pleased him to be a senator in the French parliament. But mainly he excelled in being a black sheep. His bite, it might be added, was just as bad as his bleat. Some people went so far as to claim that, to count in the haut monde of the 1920's and 1930's, one had to be seduced or at least pinched by Baron Maurice if one was a woman, or affronted by Baron Maurice, if a man. No other personage surpassed him in enriching the delicious scandal of his times.

Among the more mentionable highpoints of his career figures an interlude at the Hotel de Paris in Monte Carlo. The hotel quite justifiably considers its cuisine one of the finest in the world. The day came, however, when a dish displeased M. le Baron. He promptly rented an apartment with a huge kitchen, summoned his chef from Paris and installed him there. Maurice himself kept his suite in the hotel, but repaired demonstratively to his "eating apartment" in town during mealtimes.

He could behave quite differently when seriously crossed. In Cannes a haberdasher sold him a pair of bathing trunks which, on their first immersion, turned out to be most scratchy. M. le Baron stopped swimming and abandoned them to the fish. He walked on shore exactly as God made him. In the immense uproar that ensued, he told press, police and anyone else who cared to listen the name and address of the culprit haberdasher and the quality of the trunks which had led him to expose his grief in so natural a fashion.

Of course he was best (or worst) known as Don Juan de Rothschild. His favorite fields of operation, apart from the dressing rooms of Paris theaters, were Deauville and Biarritz during their respective seasons in August and September. It was in Biarritz that a particularly illustrative event transpired.

One of the great femmes fatales began to hold court there in the middle 1920's. Every man who enjoyed her favors she subsequently either survived or divorced, or at any rate relieved of most of his worldly goods. A number of people thought her to be quite worthy of Maurice. They arranged an introduction. The lady was achingly beautiful and glitteringly poised. The Baron appeared to be agog and quickly undone. He lost all his proverbial rudeness. Smitten, he danced with her all evening at the Hotel du Palais. He drenched her in roses. Again and again he declared in the presence of the whole table that he must bring together the most beautiful neck in France—he bowed before the minx's decolletage—and the most beautiful necklace in Biarritz. Everyone, including the neck's owner, considered this an adorably phrased pledge.

Against her usual C.O.D. practice, the lady became Maurice's that night. On the morrow he ushered her into his most impressive car and drove straight to the resort's leading jeweler. In the window hung a necklace worth 300,000 dollars. Maurice escorted her up to the plate glass.

"Voilà, ma chère," he said, kissed her hand and, having brought neck and necklace quite close together, turned on his heel to drive away, alone.

While the Family banks receded into the background,

Henri, Jimmy and Maurice kept impressing on society the continued presence of the clan. The three showed that the old dynamism, however oddly expressed at the moment, was still there. Perhaps they were an intimation that the clan would survive in style even what was to come. For the House of Rothschild, which had started as epic and continued as extravaganza, was approaching tragedy.

IX

HITLER VERSUS ROTHSCHILD

1. The Depression and Baron Louis

SHORTLY after the turn of the century, a story goes, two hoboes went walking through Vienna's Stadtpark. There was a click-clack of hooves, and one asked the other who that tiny tot was, being driven about in a huge carriage all his own?

"Look at the livery," the second hobo said. "That's little Baron Louis taking the air."

"So young!" the first hobo said admiringly. "So young—and already a Rothschild!"

Neither he nor anyone else knew it, but that golden coach drove toward the depression, toward the Anschluss, toward a Gestapo prison and World War II.

Little Baron Louis grew up. He was twenty-nine when his father Albert died, shortly before World War I. Now, it is a peculiarity of the Austrian house to invest all business authority not in partners (the usage at New Court or rue Laffitte), but in a single person. Alphonse and Eugene, Louis' brothers, dedicated themselves to their high leisures. Louis assumed the helm of all Rothschild affairs in Central Europe. And so a rather poetic appositeness came about, the kind in which Family history abounds. The Austrian branch, more than any other, was to be battered by the vicissitudes of the new century. Louis, more than anyone else in the whole mishpoche, was the classically polished foil to all the brute newfangledness.

The mettle of the man became apparent quite early, through an incident with, curiously, a Manhattan background. It seems that the New York agents of The Family participated in the financing of the New York Interborough Rapid Transit Company. Young Louis, who had been sent over to soak up America, had a hand in the project and helped inaugurate it by going on one of the earliest subway rides. This particular journey ended with a breakdown of motor and ventilation systems. When the sweating, choking passengers were finally helped out into the fresh air, there was one odd bird who had kept on not only his jacket but his overcoat. In fact, rescuers swore that he emerged with not a bead on his brow: the Baron.

Others who came up against Louis' inviolable composure often didn't know what to make of him. Icy insouciance or simply cold fish? At any rate, the young head of the Vienna house matured into the silkiest, most stoic, most smoothly and untouchably finished grand seigneur yet sired by The Family. There had never been a Rothschild quite like this one before; circumstance made sure there would never be one in his image again. He himself apparently refused to marry, and neither of his married brothers produced surviving sons. He was the last head of the Austrian Rothschilds.

This helped cast an extra glow over a life all the more romantic because of the reticence of the man who lived it. The Manhattan accident—that strange confrontation between a last Rothschild and a first subway crush—contained prophecy. Other distempers of modernity were in store for him, much more vicious ones, and he would face them with the same spectacular tranquility.

Nature had equipped Louis well for his role. Slim, blond, handsome, the image of the Anglo-Saxon aristocrat for all his synagogue-going, he could give his spareness of speech a disarmingly simple or forbiddingly aloof nuance. Despite a minor heart ailment (what's a thoroughbred without a small, piquant complaint?) he had extraordinary energies, extraordinarily if frigidly groomed. A fierce polo player, a formidable huntsman, a rider of the famous white Lipizzaners of Austria's "Spanish" State Riding School (even under the Republic, a privilege granted only to the best horsemen of the best circles), he was also an acute scholar in anatomy, botany and the graphic arts.

Last, not least, he was a lover accomplished and discriminate. To his great bachelor palais in the Prinz Eugenstrasse, or to his Renngasse office, wallpapered in dark red silk, Vienna's loveliest women came calling. It may be a measure of the man's discretion that this private office had three entrances, one camouflaged so well that only he, his secretary and selected visitors knew its location.

But it wasn't only luscious ladies that came toward Baron Louis. Often it was black news. He steered his house through an increasingly ugly era. Before 1914 the Vienna bank had been the chief financier of a great imperial realm, prime mover in the financial nerve center of Southeast Europe. After 1918 Austria dwindled to a pauperized fraction of its former self. Inevitably, the Austrian Rothschild firm diminished as well.

As the leading, almost "official" private banking institution, S. M. Rothschild und Söhne was tied to the fortunes of the faltering little fatherland. Loyally it had bought state securities by the million and saw inflation devour its investment. In the mid-1920's it could not, like its great Viennese rival Castiglione, undermine the government by speculating on the fall of the Austrian Krone. The Krone fell, of course. Castiglione towered and threatened to overshadow Rothschild.

Castiglione went on to speculate on the fall of the franc. His allies dumped and dumped French currency on the market. Down plummeted the franc, up zoomed pound and dollar. And Rothschild? Experts began to write off The Family's Central European pre-eminence. It had grown very quiet in the silken study at the Renngasse. Then, all at once, the franc backed up startlingly, began to rise, in fits at first, then with an absolute fury that put Castiglione out of business. The financial world was stunned. Baron Louis, with a cool smile, went to Italy for a bit of polo.

What had happened? Actually an old, old Rothschild story which unrolled once more in 1925. The various mishpoche banks in England, France and Austria had secretly realigned their tentacles. With the French house in the lead (Baron Edouard was a director of the Bank of France), they had organized a noiseless international syndicate that reached from J. P. Morgan in New York to the Baron Louis-controlled Creditanstalt in Vienna. Everywhere, at a prearranged signal, the Rothschild syndicate began to depress pounds and push up francs. As in the past, nobody could withstand such wealth juggled with such split-second skill. Baron Louis returned from his Italian polo tanned and barely smiling.

There were further trials in store for him. The 1920's had been tricky. The 1930's were treacherous before they turned tragic. In 1929 the depression broke out. The fragile young republic was least equipped to deal with it. It toppled Austria's business. It undermined Austria's banking. And it began to move toward the Family palace.

In 1930 the Bodenkreditanstalt—the country's key agricultural credit institution—was in desperate straits. Louis, panicproof as usual, demonstrated calmness by hunting deer at one of his game preserves. The government was much more excitable. The federal chancellor entrained personally to the Rothschild estate. As he himself later put it, "I aimed a gun at the Baron's chest." He forced Louis to bail out the failing bank. "I'll do it," Herr Baron said, "but you'll regret it."

The Creditanstalt, Austria's greatest public bank (Louis von Rothschild, President), took over the liabilities of the agricultural credit institution. Austria regretted it. As a result of this overextension, the Creditanstalt, too, had to suspend payment one year later. Now the financial structure of the entire country tottered. It was the government itself which must come to the rescue, with funds drawn from the state treasury. And the House of Rothschild contributed thirty million gold schillings to help the Creditanstalt back on its feet.

Mitigated though it was by considerable subterranean help from the French Rothschilds, this was a cruel drain on the Family reserves. The Baron sold some of his country places and moved from the huge mansion in the Prinz Eugenstrasse to a somewhat smaller residence nearby.

He was still the richest man in Austria. His own bank, S. M. Rothschild und Söhne, stayed intact, a giant in Austrian terms. He remained one of the large landed proprietors in Central Europe, retained control over immense investments in textile factories, mining industries and chemical companies.

To the north the storm troopers began to beat their drums, but he kept dictating in his red-silk office, into the teeth of fate.

2. Windsor at Enzesfeld

So came Louis von Rothschild's final years as the last great gentleman of Central Europe. Between 1931 and 1938 the Baron's life unrolled like the final act of a sumptuously produced suspense play. The initial shock had been shaken off. The dark climax lay still veiled. A brief calm reigned, ornamented with butlers and enlivened by a glamorous intermezzo.

In 1936 Edward VIII abdicated for Mrs. Simpson. On the day before his momentous act the King talked on the long-distance wire to the world's most favous divorcee. The British government had arranged a haven for him at a Zurich hotel, but Wallis strongly opposed the choice. A hotel was much too fragile a shelter against incursions of the insatiable press. And so was, for that matter, the telephone connection between his London and her Cannes.

"David," Mrs. Simpson said, wary of eavesdroppers, "why don't you go to the place where you had that cold last year?"

"The place" was Schloss Enzesfeld near Vienna, a castle belonging to Eugene von Rothschild, Louis' brother and a good friend to the two parties involved. Here David could enjoy complete seclusion; here he could play his beloved golf on the Baron's private links; here he could speak

Austrian German, his favorite foreign dialect; here, where he had gotten rid of a minor cold the previous year, he might best survive the major crisis of his life.

"Indeed I will," said the King.

The next day, December 11, he was king no more. Less than forty-eight hours later the gates of Rothschild's estate parted to admit, in a black limousine, the man who had just renounced the crown of the greatest monarchy for the most romantic possible reason. The curiosity of five continents converged on Eugene's house. Enzesfeld became as famous a word as Mayerling.

A garland of fables was quickly woven around it, some of them quite amusing. For example, one claimed that the newly created Duke of Windsor tossed incredibly luxurious parties behind those castle walls; that the bills for all such entertainments were sent to the host; that the Barons Eugene and Louis, tired of the elongation in their accountants' faces, had resorted to a typically ingenious Rothschild device: that through the village council they had the Duke elected "Master of Enzesfeld" and then instructed all tradesmen to direct their bills to the personage so honored.

Actually the Duke lived—and golfed—very quietly on the estate. The day was organized around six thirty P.M., when Eugene had the telephone room ready and all local lines cleared so that David could call Wallis long distance at Cannes.

Nonetheless, the stay of so mythic a personage had its effect on the Central European landscape of manners. When the Duke joined the Rothschilds and their other guests for dinner, it was discovered that he wore his black tie with a soft, not a starched collar—a fact which fomented something of a sartorial Putsch in Austrian society. David was also responsible for another innovation. In the words of Baron Eugene, "he invented brunch." That is, the Duke favored a late and rather heavy breakfast, which often led to the omission of the midday table. This meal, too, found its place in the repertoire of inside sophisticates.

For the last time Austria enjoyed something of the imperial glow it had once radiated. And for the last time ever, an Austrian Rothschild exercised a hospitality commensurate with his name.

3. The Ides of March

The Enzesfeld interlude was a loud contribution to The Family's social éclat. Meanwhile Louis' career continued to embody the quietly seignorial. In 1937, not long after the Duke's departure from Enzesfeld, the Baron attended a dinner party at a friend's home. A mewing was heard outside the window, and before anybody could stop him, Rothschild had opened the window, stepped out onto the sill, edged along a crevice of the wall, retrieved the kitten and jumped back into the room.

This sort of thing had happened before. Louis always had a remarkable physical as well as emotional sense of balance. Like his father Albert (the Matterhorn pioneer), he had climbed many peaks and, if no peaks were at hand, even buildings. But in 1937 he was fifty-five years old; the night was dark, and the apartment five stories high.

"Baron!" said one of the guests. "This is a job for the fire brigade. Why risk your life?"

The Baron replied with one of his cool smiles. "I suppose it's become a habit," he said.

Everyone knew what he meant. The German armies were massing at the border. Most people in his position found travel attractive. His brother Eugene had moved to his Paris residence. Alphonse, the eldest, went back and forth over the Swiss border. But Louis stayed put in the Austrian capital.

Calmly, almost dashingly he draped the cape of doom about him. His secretaries still worked away in the silken suite at the Renngasse. In fact there was, rather inexplicably, more activity in the bank than ever. Each Wednesday the curator of Vienna's Kunsthistorisches Museum still came for breakfast at the Baron's house and held with him a sort of two-man art seminar. Each Friday morning a professor from the Botanical Gardens still appeared to bring and discuss interesting new specimens. Each Sunday the head of the Anatomical Institute dropped in with charts and books. Twice a week Herr Baron still rode the great Lipizzaners. Life went on as usual though friends at the Jockey Club shook their heads. As the chief of the Austrian house, as the epitome of the Jewish capitalist, Rothschild was the Führer's favorite abomination. Why must just he remain? Why provide so inviting a target in such a parlous area?

Two good reasons accounted for his obstinacy. Both were dynastic. One remained secret, revolved around the muffled hubbub in Louis' office and would not emerge until many months later. The other reason was public and obvious. As head of The Family, Louis moved in the Austrian limelight. Any motion smacking of flight would upset still further an already wobbly ship of state. The head of a Rothschild house (we have encountered instances of this before) is a human being second, a principle first.

In the cool perfectionism of the Baron's mind, principle congealed to dogma. He did not go near the border. When the Austrian chancellor was summoned before Hitler in Berchtesgarden, Louis left Vienna—for a bit of skiing in the Austrian Alps. And when on March 1, 1938, a courier from the French house knocked at his door in Kitzbühel with an urgent warning, he did not hurry away to Zurich. He put away his skis—and returned to Vienna.

On Thursday, March 10, a last alarm was telegraphed from Switzerland. The following morning German troops flooded across the border. The ship of state had sunk. The presence of principles could no longer save it. On Saturday afternoon Louis had himself driven to Vienna's airport along with his valet Edouard, their ostensible destination being Louis' polo team in Italy. At the barrier, a short distance from the plane, an SS officer recognized the Baron and confiscated his passport.

"After that," recalls the valet, "we went home and waited."

It did not take long. In the evening there appeared before the Rothschild palais, as before hundreds of other Jewish homes, two men with swastika arm bands.

The butler, however, would not tolerate the unmannerliness of an arrest. He first had to see whether the Herr Baron was at home. No, he told the callers two minutes later, the Herr Baron was not. The two bravos, stunned by this ambush of etiquette, retreated first into a stutter and then into the night.

But on Sunday they were back with six steel-helmeted daredevils, all drawing pistols against further high-society tricks. This time Herr Baron received the senior henchmen. He accepted an invitation to come along—after lunch, which was about to be served. A confused consultation ensued among the steel helmets. The upshot was: Well, eat.

The Baron ate, for the last time in full baronial splendor. While the gang dandled their pistols two yards from the table, the butlers bowed and the dishes filled the room with the scent of sauces. The Baron finished in leisure; used, as always, the finger bowl after fruit; dried, as always, his hands on the fresh damask napkin held out for him; enjoyed his after-dinner cigarette; took his heart medicine; approved the next day's menus; then nodded to the pistols and departed.

Very late that night it became plain that he would not return. And so, in the small hours of the morning, the good valet Edouard packed his master's special bed sheets, his toilet kit, a careful selection of outdoor and indoor clothing, some books on art history and botanical lore—in fine, the customary assortment for the more tiresome sort of week-end invitation. Soon afterwards he presented all these items at police headquarters enclosed in a crested pigskin case. He was sent away amid furious laughter.

But the valet's performance made the Nazi police commissioner become even more intrigued with his prisoner. Louis' first interrogations were designed to satisfy perfectly understandable curiosities.

"Well, so you're Rothschild. Just exactly how rich are you?"

Louis answered that if the entire staff of his accountants were summoned, and provided with up-to-date reports on the world's commodity and stock markets, they might come up with a reasonable answer after a few days' work.

"All right, all right. How much is your palace worth?"

Rothschild gave the inquisitive gentleman an ever so slightly amused glance. "How much is the Vienna cathedral worth?" he replied, quite accurately.

"Impertinence!" roared the commissioner. From his viewpoint, he was perhaps not wrong.

Guards pushed the Baron down into the cellar. There Louis carried sand sacks beside the Communist party chiefs who happened to be fellow inmates. "We got on rather well," Louis recalled later. "We agreed that this was the world's most classless cellar."

Other unusual things occurred. Odd letters reached a Rothschild executive in Switzerland. The authors were three of Central Europe's foremost whores, who enjoyed excellent rapport with the Nazi police in Vienna. The ladies offered themselves as middlemen in ransom discussions. The Rothschild houses—traditionally adept in extraordinary negotiations—might have come to terms even with these partners, if not for a sudden but actually inevitable turn of events.

4. Hermann Göring Says Hello

At the end of April Berlin began to pay attention to the importance of the prisoner. Overnight Louis was separated from the Communists and the sand sacks and found himself at the Vienna Gestapo headquarters in a cell next to the deposed Austrian chancellor. His case had been lifted from the local police level to the highest and most conspiratorial circles of the Reich. Now he had twenty-four guards—a booted, belted horde, "my grenadiers"—whose familiarities he quashed by teaching them, like a bored professor, geology and botany.

As successor to the foremost whores, a new emissary appeared in Switzerland: A man named Otto Weber identified himself as an "associate" of a Dr. Gritzbach, who in turn was personal advisor to Hermann Göring. Slowly it became evident who was calling the tune now. Slowly, after many shadowy precautions, the terms emerged. Herr Baron would go free if Marschall Göring were given 200,000 dollars for his trouble and the German Reich got every remaining asset of the Austrian house, particularly Vitkovitz, the largest iron-and-coal works in Central Europe, located in Czechoslovakia.

This was stern news. It involved the highest ransom in the history of the world. But Eugene and Alphonse, who did the negotiating in Zurich and Paris, had a trump of their own. And it was a beauty: Vitkovitz, though owned by Austrian Rothschilds, had by some queer magic become English property. In the prewar days of 1938 that meant it was immune to Göring's claws.

All the tiptoe hurly-burly in Louis' office during 1936 and 1937—just before it was too late—had centered around this transformation. Together with a canny old banking executive named Leonard Keesing, Louis had sneaked the Union Jack around some twenty-one million dollars. It was financial cloak-and-dagger in the best Rothschild tradition.

How had Louis Rothschild done it? His underground work had started with one paramount fact: plants of such enormous size could not change citizenship without consent on the highest governmental level. Therefore the Czech prime minister was persuaded very discreetly, in 1936, that continued Austrian control of Vitkovitz would constitute a danger to Czechoslovakia in the event that Vienna fell under German domination. Simultaneously, and under separate secrecy, the Austrian chancellor received intimations that the anti-Austrian and anti-German bent of the Czech authorities might lead to a seizure of Vitkovitz as long as it was Austrian-owned. Thus both Vienna and Prague, for opposite reasons, assented to the change.

Next came the transfer itself—an intricate, accomplished exercise in fiscal and legal craft. It made expert use of the fact that the Rothschilds were not the exclusive but only the majority stockholders in Vitkovitz. The minority owners, another great Austro-Jewish family named von Gut-mann, had recently become depression-ridden. To pay their debts, the Gutmanns must sell their shares; and to do that, a revision of Vitkovitz' corporate structure had become necessary. Under cover of this reorganization the nationality of the multimillion-dollar enterprise was incidentally transmuted.

All that sleight-of-hand, however, would have been useless without an additional precaution. If Louis had consigned the Rothschild shares directly to an English holding company, the advent of war might well have made the German-tainted property forfeit to Britain's trading-with-the-enemy act. Louis, foreseeing this even during the peacetime years of the 1930's, had first done some shunting onto Swiss and Dutch financial grounds. From these countries—which were to be neutral or Allied soil in World War II—the final transfer was effected.

Vitkovitz became a subsidiary of Alliance Insurance. But Alliance was, and is, a prominent London corporation, registered under British law, protected by His Majesty's Government, yet largely owned—and this, of course, is the point and joke of the whole matter—by the very Rothschilds who had sold it Vitkovitz.

Napoleon and Bismarck had come up in vain against The Family. Göring, though not the greatest, was certainly the clan's heaviest antagonist. He did not do any better. The Reichsmarschall had to retreat, not only before Jewish guile, but before an Aryan comrade. Heinrich Himmler began to muscle in.

5. Heinrich Himmler Says Hello

Early in 1939 Otto Weber, Göring's man, was arrested. Apparently the Nazis were settling an internecine conflict over Rothschild loot. Berlin shifted commands. German ransom negotiations now seemed to receive their impetus from Himmler rather than Göring. The Family, unmoved by the change of venue, stuck to their terms: all ordinary Rothschild assets in Austria to be exchanged for the safety of Louis' person, but control of Vitkovitz to be surrendered only after Louis' release—and for three million pounds.

Berlin stormed. Berlin threatened. In fact, after the rape of Czechoslovakia, German troops occupied Vitkovitz. But German lawyers knew that the British flag and international law still stood between them and legal ownership.

And so a new tone was tried. While Nazi newspapers fumed against Rothschild as the scourge of mankind, a curious event transpired in Louis' cell. The door opened. Heinrich Himmler appeared and wished the Herr Baron good morning; offered the Herr Baron a cigarette; asked whether the Herr Baron had any wishes or complaints; and, as celebrity to celebrity, tried to settle whatever trifling differences might be between them.

However the Herr Baron, a lifelong smoker, did not feel like a cigarette just then. His briefness of speech grew particularly acute. He appraised the dread face coldly. "The fellow," he said later, "had a stye in his eye and was trying to hide it." When Herr Himmler had bowed himself out, the Rothschild position on Vitkovitz had not altered by a particle.

Whereupon new blandishments spilled into Louis' bare little cubicle. One hour after the chief's departure a detail of "grenadiers" staggered in under an enormous, blowsy Louis XIV clock; returned with a vast, nonmatching, Louis XV vase; covered the prison cot with a thick orange-velvet curtain upon which they scattered multicolored cushions. Finally came a radio, around whose base a silk skirt had been sewn.

It was a Himmler attempt to make a Rothschild feel at home. It produced results. For many weeks Louis had remained stoic in the face of ugly things. Now he lost his temper. "The place looked like a Cracow bordello!" That recollection, often repeated in the years to come, carried one of Louis' rare exclamation marks.

All the garishness (with the exception of the radio, which the Baron defrocked himself) was removed at the prisoner's insistence. Quite possibly the fiasco made the SS give up. A few nights later, around eleven P.M. Louis' chief guard announced that the Rothschilds' terms had been accepted and the Baron was free to leave.

As thanks, Louis visited upon his jailers a farewell confusion. The hour was too late, the Baron said, to expect any of his friends to put him up. After all, servants were in bed by now. He would much rather leave in the morning. Since in all the Gestapo dossiers there was no precedent of an application for a night's lodging, Berlin had to be consulted by long distance. Louis' last night at headquarters was on the house.

A few days later he landed in Switzerland. And two months after that, in July, 1939, the Reich undertook to buy Vitkovitz for 2,900,000 pounds sterling.

Since the war broke out almost immediately, the contract was never consummated. But the technically English ownership of Vitkovitz remains pertinent to this day. After assuming power, the Czech Communists nationalized Vitkovitz. In 1953, however, London signed a trade agreement with Prague. One clause stated that the seized-property claims of British nationals, among which Vitkovitz figured most prominently, were to be satisfied. Prague followed through. Thereupon Parliament passed a law enabling an English corporate agent (like Alliance Insurance) to collect compensation on behalf of non-English owners (like the ex-Austrian Rothschilds, now of American citizenship).

Today The Family, still the world's greatest capitalist name, receives from a Communist government restitution that will finally amount to one million pounds.

Louis lived out the life of a storybook prince after the dragon has been slain. He settled in America. The Viennese Baron became a Yankee nob (no more subway rides); the silken bachelor, a belated but happy husband. In 1946 he married the Countess Hilda von Auersperg, one of the most attractive women of the Austrian aristocracy.

The couple visited Austria during the hungry years following the Nazi collapse. Word of the Baron's return quickly spread. A crowd formed outside his hotel, begging Rothschild for bread. With a lavish gesture Louis gave it to them: he turned over to the Austrian government all his Austrian properties. The government, accepting the condition that accompanied the gift, created a special law. It converted the Rothschild assets into a giant, state-administered pension fund. This provides for each of Louis' former domestic and business employees the same security and income as that enjoyed by retired civil servants.

Then Louis returned to his spacious farm in East Barnard, Vermont. The New England highlands evoked the Alps. The tart reserve of the Vermonters matched his own temper well. Professors of art and botany came to visit from Dartmouth. His brother, Baron Eugene (surviving today and the husband of the English stage star Jeanne Stuart), often came to visit from his Long Island estate. Baroness Hilda created a beautiful garden on the grounds, as well as something Louis had never been sure he would like: a family home. He liked it. In the last years of his life the Rothschild folks even gave open-air barn dances, and the Baron do-si-do'd with the same cool grace with which he had once waltzed on Vienna parquets. He died, in his seventies, the way a grand seigneur should—swimming in Montego Bay, under a blue and perfect Caribbean sky.

6. A Dynasty Enlists

World War II, of course, greatly affected The Family in England and France as well. When German tanks rolled into Paris in 1940, the French Rothschilds were in grave peril. The older ones, Edouard, Robert and Maurice (all grandsons of founder James), managed to escape. They ended up, by sundry paths and stops, in the United States or England.

Maurice showed himself as good a businessman as he had been an efficient scamp. On his flight to Britain he had salvaged a satchel of jewelry worth, it is said, about a million dollars. A good part of it he sold; then he began to phone his investment broker, steadily, for a few years. When he returned to France after the war, he had parlayed his satchel into a new fortune, impressive even by Rothschild standards.

The old clan members got the best of the war. The young ones, who helped wage it, saw the raw side like soldiers everywhere. Robert's sons Elie and Alain were among those manning the Maginot Line, and both became prisoners of war in Germany. Possibly because of Louis' awesome career as a hostage, no special pressure was applied to them. During the Fall of France, Edouard's son Guy was caught in the Dunkirk trap. He escaped; managed to reach New York in 1941; went to England when the Free French formed, was torpedoed while crossing the Atlantic, swam for three hours, and was rescued by a British destroyer; executed a number of confidential missions for de Gaulle (and ever since has had close ties with the General); participated in two months of front-line fighting after D-day; and finished the war as adjutant to de Gaulle's military governor of Paris.

Not much less picturesque, but more indicative of the Family temper, were the war adventures of other Rothschilds. "We know how to run things," Baron Philippe* of Mouton Rothschild says when on the subject. "We run things all our lives, and we use unconventional short cuts—boom!—which upset the military bureaucrats."

Philippe takes his text from life. When he recovered from a severe skiing injury in 1940, Paris was swarming with Germans. He fled to Morocco, where the Vichy government arrested him at the request of the German armistice commission. In prison he began to manage things by organizing language schools and gymnastic sessions; among the fellow inmates he put through knee bends was one named Pierre Mendès-France. Brought back to France, he was released; fled to Spain by way of a forty-two-hour walking tour across the Pyrenees with smugglers (incidentally suggesting some improvements in smuggling technique); survived, and helped run several Spanish jails; sneaked into Portugal, and thence by ship into England. There he joined de Gaulle and was quartered at the Free French Officers' Club at 107 Piccadilly. This, of course, was his Grandaunt Hannah's mansion. Familiar with every nook of the place—boom!—he set about reforming the entire billeting set-up in the house. He didn't bother to inform the CO. The French brass were not pleased by such chronic enterprise. On D-day Phillippe found himself shunted to a dull job in the rear. The British, however, had their eye on the managerial Baron and shunted him right out again. He was put in charge of civil affairs in the critical Le Havre area during the early months of the invasion. Today he has the Croix de Guerre and is an officier of the Legion of Honor.

Among the English Rothschilds, Edmund (sweet Leo's grandson) and Lord Victor (Natty's grandson) were of military age. Each had inherited a handsome portion of the Family willfulness. Edmund, today head of the English bank, took part in the Italian and North African campaigns as an artillery major. The most characteristic account of a Rothschild embroiled in military hierarchy revolves around him. "Eddy," recalls a wartime pal, "made one of our keenest officers. But he never got the hang of going through channels. Anytime any of our men had an emergency—say their mother died and they needed a furlough and money—they wouldn't go about it the regular way. No, it was straight to Eddy, even if they were from a different outfit. They knew he'd pull that Rothschild checkbook out of his pocket, or he'd be on the phone—about any old hardship case—he'd be on the phone to Buckingham Palace. 'Eddy,' I used to say, 'Eddy, you can't do that. You've got to fill out a form about the bloke, and send it on with your recommendation to the CO.' 'What's the CO got to do with it?' he used to ask. The moment he did something civilian, he just couldn't understand what a superior was."

"On the command level they are superb," said another wartime observer of The Family's warriors. "Below that they can be nuisances. They are born and brought up as field marshals, you know, and it's a real problem for them to be just majors. We'd save ourselves a lot of trouble if a high enough rank would come automatically with that name."

At one point this tribe of obstinate field marshals got a dose of its own obstinacy. The scene was Robert de Rothschild's resplendent residence at 23, Avenue de Marigny in Paris, today inhabited by his elder son Alain. In contrast to all other Family palaces by the Seine, it survived the occupation virtually intact. Göring was always eager to have his boys crash the Rothschilds', and he put into the mansion the commander of the Luftwaffe in France. Surprisingly, the Kommandant left the house more or less as he had found it. Göring himself, as a rule a fond looter of Rothschild palazzos, often visited but never despoiled 23, Avenue de Marigny. It was even spared during the skirmishes accompanying the liberation.

The trouble began afterwards. A young English lieutenant-colonel moved in, bringing with him a perilous laboratory. In the immediate neighborhood of rare furniture and priceless paintings began a series of experiments with high explosives. Baron Robert had not yet returned. His servants trembled through their tasks, helpless before the flare and boom of the colonel's apparatus. The man was no idle prankster, and he was hard to dislodge. One of Britain's most successful and audacious bomb-removal experts, his work had earned him the George Medal (a very high English decoration) as well as the U.S. Bronze Star and the U.S. Legion of Merit. But what intimidated Baron Robert's retinue most was the fact that the colonel went by the name of—Victor Lord Rothschild.

The billeting authorities had thought it a charming idea to accommodate the colonel in his cousin's home; they had not considered the zeal with which Family members pursue their objectives. It took the combined efforts of the British High Command and the Monuments, Fine Arts and Archives Section of the American Army to move his Lordship's endeavors into a more suitable milieu.

7. The Palace as Souvenir

Lord Rothschild's tenancy at Avenue de Marigny was a postlude to an unprecedented situation in the art world. Like many Jews on the run after the fall of France, the Rothschilds had to leave behind most of their material possessions. Principal among these were their immense art collections, worth many millions of dollars. How could they be defended against the Nazi looters?

Actually, the defense of Family treasures had begun, with typical Rothschild far-sightedness, generations earlier. Back in 1873, after the Paris Commune, Baron Alphonse decided that his immense art properties needed fitting protection. For each painting, sculpture or objet a custom-tailored, specially upholstered and easily portable case was made. Since every new acquisition received its proper sheath, the private Rothschild museums vanished smoothly during World War I and during the Front Populaire crises in the 1930's.

But these early alarms were only dry runs. When the German tanks came down on Paris in the summer of 1940, a systematically rapacious enemy began to grasp at Rothschild canvases and Rothschild marble.

Occasionally he was fooled. A number of paintings were quickly spirited into foreign embassies, such as the Spanish and the Argentinian, and faithfully preserved there for the duration. A few very valuable pieces spent the war in a secret room at 23, Avenue de Marigny. The servants who knew about the room never breathed a word, and the Germans never got wind of it. Göring himself often walked right past the bookcase which stood between him and the portraits for which his agents were combing all of France.

But for the majority of Rothschild treasures, all precautions did not suffice. A whole list of important items, for example, was turned over to the Louvre, to receive protection as French national property. A useless ruse. The Family possessions were so well known, and the German dictator so art-loving, that Hitler issued a special directive bearing on "nationalized" Rothschild art. In a document later captured, the chief of the German High Command, Keitel, instructed the Nazi Military Government in Occupied France as follows:

> In supplement to the order of the Führer to search . . . the occupied territories for material valuable to Germany (and to safeguard the latter through the Gestapo), the Führer has decided:
>
> Ownership transfers to the French State or similar transfers completed after September 1, 1939, are irrelevant and invalid (. . . for example possessions of the Palais Rothschild *). Alfred Rosenberg, Hitler's specially deputized pillager-in-chief, did his work well. Baron Edouard concealed most of his art works on the grounds of his stud farm at Haras de Meautry in Normandy. Baron Robert hid many treasures, particularly from his Château Laversine near Chantilly, at Marmande in the southwest of France. Rosenberg discovered both caches, as well as a number of others. Soon whole trains filled with precious Rothschild stuff rolled toward Germany.

After the liberation of France the Rothschild châteaux and town mansions, with the exception of Avenue de Marigny, were found to have been thoroughly emptied. The process of recuperation which began instantly and lasted years makes one long detective story.

The Sherlock Holmes of the operation was James J. Rorimer, then Fine Arts Officer attached to the American Seventh Army, now Director of the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. He arrived in Paris soon after the liberation and immediately interrogated a great many people on the whereabouts of looted art. From a horde of self-styled insiders, each of whom claimed to have the key to a hundred secreted Goyas, he picked out a girl named Rose Valland. A young art scholar, she had helped the Germans classify their booty. But as a member of the underground, she had also kept a sharp eye out for the destinations of the loot. It was her opinion that the Castle Neuschwanstein, near Füssen in Bavaria, was Hitler's main collection point for Aryanized masterworks.

Some nine months later Bavaria fell, and Rorimer drove in a jeep up to the castle. Neuschwanstein, built by Mad Ludwig of Bavaria in pseudo-Gothic style and perched like an evil phantasm on top of a crag, furnished a picturesque backdrop to what he was about to find. Rorimer traversed two courtyards connected by an intricate flight of steps, negotiated a spiral staircase ideal for tumbling masked conspirators. Finally he reached the room he wanted. Here was the nerve center of the entire Hitler looting project.

The Germans had lived up to their fine reputation for being methodical. Row upon row of filing cabinets filled the office. The Nazis had carefully kept, and used, the catalogues of each of the 203 private collections they had abducted. It took Rorimer, one of the great experts in the field, a whole day to take in the rough scope of what was recorded there: 8,000 negatives and individual catalogue cards for nearly 22,000 itemized major confiscations. The Rothschilds, with nearly 4,000 major items, towered far over every other name on the list.

Another crucial discovery was made in the same room. Rorimer sifted some objects out of the soot in a coal stove: the remains of a Nazi uniform, a half-consumed document with Hitler's signature, and some rubber stamps. These charred stamps proved to be the key to the world's greatest organized art theft; Rorimer noticed that they bore ciphers indicating the location of all other hiding places. A small chamber in an Alpine castle held the secret to countless and immeasurable treasures. To prevent the entry of unauthorized persons, Rorimer sealed the door with an antique Rothschild seal saying "Semper Fidelis."

Now a concerted search was on. Behind the stove of the castle kitchen Rorimer found Rubens' "Three Graces" from the Maurice de Rothschild collection and other chef-d'oeuvres. But not all Family items were so deviously concealed. In one hall at Neuschwanstein stood rows of the rarest tapestried fire screens, taken from Rothschild homes. Elsewhere Rothschild furniture, usually Louis XV and XVI, was stacked to the ceilings in specially constructed racks. There was box after box of Renaissance jewelry and eighteenth-century snuffboxes from Maurice's collection.

At other places there were other treasures. In the Carthusian monastery of Buxheim the chapel was inundated knee-deep with rugs, tapestries and textiles largely of Rothschild origin. In a salt mine near Alt Aussee in Austria investigators came upon huge accumulations kept in the name of the Führer, and containing, among others, sculptures, libraries and paintings owned by the Rothschilds.

Some of the caches, of course, had been shifted just before the collapse. Specific searches often turned into protracted, difficult or altogether futile affairs. But by and large, the great Family collections began the trek back from all corners of Germany into France. They converged on a central station for recovered art works in Paris. Here a coordinating committee of Rothschild butlers sat for weeks, identifying this Watteau as Baron Guy's, that Picasso as Baron Elie's—and was that Tiepolo Baron Philippe's or Baron Alain's?

It seems a reassuringly esthetic note on which to end the Rothschild side of World War II.

A DYNASTY TURNS JET

1. Decline and Rise

THINGS were getting back to normal in 1945. But what, in Family terms, was normalcy? Would it be the grandiose decay that had set in during the 1920's and 1930's? Would the Rothschilds, like the Habsburgs, begin living purely in, and on, the past?

For a while it almost looked that way. The Austrian branch had emigrated and would live, sonless, on estates in Long Island (Baron and Baroness Eugene) and Vermont (Baroness Louis). The English branch was in the throes of the austerity program. The French house, partly liquidated by the Nazi occupation, had its hands full with its own convalescence. Taxes waxed more cruel than ever. And more great Rothschild mansions succumbed.

The house at Hamilton Place, built by Leo, became one of London's most luxurious clubs (Grandees of the Expense Account now lean against the hand-carved balustrade down which Edward VII used to slide). Another Rothschild residence, in Kensington Gardens, now constitutes —O tempora! O mores!—the Soviet Russian Embassy. Buckinghamshire's Waddesdon Hall, inherited by colorful Jimmy de Rothschild, was rendered even more palatial by the additional French masterworks he showered on it. But when he died childless in 1957, death duties took more than twenty million dollars out of his fortune. No one inside The Family or out could provide fitting upkeep for so luscious a palazzo. Jimmy left it to the National Trust, together with 750,000 pounds (two million dollars) to defray at least part of the maintenance cost. Now sightseers aim cameras at the staircase on which Edward VII broke his leg. Mrs. Anthony de Rothschild still lives at Ascott Wing, bought by her father-in-law Leo; but this house, too, with its masses of Dutch masters and the world's greatest collection of Oriental pottery (and a parrot that announces with great majesty, "I-am-Jack-O'Rothschild!") has been made over to the National Trust.

And in France? The titanic manse at 2, rue Florentin on the Place de la Concorde has gone the way of all titanic manses. Talleyrand had lived there before Edouard de Rothschild moved in. When Edouard put it on the market, only one customer could afford the price—Uncle Sam. It became the European headquarters of the Marshall Plan and today is tenanted by the United States Mission to NATO and to European regional organizations. Henri de Rothschild's huge place at 33, rue du Faubourg St. Honoré now houses the Cercle Interallié, a fancy international diplomatic club. On the same street the United States Embassy has taken over No. 41, built by the first Baron Edmond. The Rothschild monograms still crown the great portals of both houses.

Last, not least, Ferrières, the crown jewel among Rothschild possessions: no one was rich enough to buy it, nor did the French branch want to part with such a symbol. The fifty-nine cases of rare books which the Germans had taken away came back again, as did the trainloads of looted Italian faïences and master paintings. They remained in their crates. The château was kept shut and uninhabited; it was less of a drain that way. In 1949 an American visitor walked through the dismantled palace. At first he found himself in a golden thicket of clocks. He thought he had stumbled into a clock museum until the caretaker explained that this was merely the room where the château's timepieces were stored. Next the visitor came upon a huge, glorious array of Louis XIV and XV chairs. In still another chamber there was a dazzle of tables. Finally he saw a number of objects adorably wrought out of rosewood and flowered antique Chinese porcelain. He puzzled, looked again—and understood the caretaker's smile. Here stood scores of the world's most exquisite bidets.

Year after year Ferrières signified luxury in mothballs. The existentialist era apparently did not encourage the functioning of fairytale castles. In fact, the existentialist era seemed on the point of equalizing and taxing The Family to pieces, as if it were just another collection of fustian has-beens.

But the Rothschilds did it again. Astonishingly, they became themselves once more. An old, cunning indestructibility began to reassert itself. In 1949 it became visible in traditional fashion at a traditional place: the stock exchange.

On June 30, 1949, strange things were happening on the Paris bourse. As soon as the bell signaled the start of business, Royal Dutch, the global oil company, began to fall. A great metal combine, Rio Tinto, declined steeply. There was absolutely no reason for such misbehavior; both companies were in excellent shape. Still they kept weakening. Sell orders swamped other issues as well. Le Nickel, a giant mining corporation, melted with each twitch of the ticker tape; so did the diamond trust of de Beers. Bewilderment spread, nervousness outran it, panic flooded all. Most investors joined the rush to sell. Prices reached their deepest low in months.

Few people isolated the factor common to all four slipping issues: The Family was a heavy stockholder in every one. Only other important holders of these same shares knew of Edouard de Rothschild's death that day, at the age of eighty-one. They realized that the enormous death duties would decrease the Baron's estate and thus the potential of the companies he backed. The minimization of the death levy was the call of the hour.

Next morning, of course, everyone read the Baron's obituary on the front page. Financial columns, discussing the death duties involved, stated that the tax on the dead man's stock holdings would be based on the closing price of his securities on the day of decease. And while funeral arrangements were being completed, brokers received buy orders from the same sources which twenty-four hours ago had instructed them to sell. The so-called Rothschild papers rose as punctually as they had fallen.

Suddenly there occurred without warning, though with ample precedent in Rothschild history, one of those leaps which lifted the clan off the downhill side and placed it back on the accustomed position at the top. In 1855 it had risen to crush its tormentor, the Crédit Mobilier. Some hundred years later it woke up, to turn twentieth-century with a vengeance. Almost overnight it caught on to the smallest gray practicality of our times. One day in that same year, 1949, the head of the London bank sent his butler out to buy a map of the London Underground. This plebeian item became as integral a part of Anthony de Rothschild's belongings as his checkbook. Within the city he dispensed with chauffeur and limousine, thereby avoiding the delays of midcentury traffic and contributing to subway revenues. By tube he often managed to arrive on the spot long before banking rivals who had themselves driven all the way.

It was this recrudescent ability to move in fast on the newest that got Anthony the exploitation rights to 50,000 square miles in Canada. Through a string of holding companies, New Court could now tap monumental lumber, power, mineral (particularly uranium) resources. Newfoundland's Prime Minister Smallwood called the transaction "the biggest real estate deal on this continent in this century"; and Winston Churchill, appreciative of the scale of the thing, termed it "a grand imperial concept."

After Anthony's death his two nephews, Edmund and Leopold, took over together with Anthony's son Evelyn. Under these young triumvirs the pace has increased still more; their new Canadian empire (bigger than England and Wales) is rapidly being developed. Edmund, the senior partner, struck out in still other directions. Recently he has taken a hand in the future of British pay-television. At the same time he is consolidating still further New Court's position as a key bullion broker in the English Commonwealth, as owner and operator of the Royal Mint Refinery, as gold agent to the Bank of England and as merchant banker extraordinary.

But the French Rothschilds are richer still. And they have become richer faster since Baron Guy assumed the reins at the death of his father Edouard. Guy, too, wields the accelerated energies of the present-day clan, even when it comes to his horses. He brought to an end a humiliation —and price depreciation—they had suffered for years. During the occupation the Germans had crossed Rothschild mares with the stallions of Marcel Boussac, France's textile king and Rothschild's greatest rival at Longchamps. Afterwards, Monsieur Boussac pronounced these unions unauthorized and irregular. Old Baron Edouard de Rothschild could not get his colts registered in the Stud Book, the equine Almanach de Gotha. But when Guy took over the stables, he applied a pressure so relentless that the French Stud Book did a very rare thing: it changed its mind. Today all Rothschild horses have been fully legitimized.

With similar aggressiveness Guy has fortified the position of de Rothschild Frères as the largest private bank in France. His main instrument here is the Compagnie du Nord, the railroad network which became Family property after the dynast James financed it into existence. Like all French lines, the Compagnie du Nord was nationalized in 1938. In return, Rothschild received 270,000 shares of the French State Railways and a seat on the board. But the government took over only physical assets, such as track and rolling stock. Subsidiary and affiliated firms of the Compagnie du Nord, as well as the corporate apparatus, remained in Rothschild hands. Through it The Family controlled—and, after the Nazi nightmare, controls again—great interests in metal, mining and chemical industries.

And yet it was not until Guy took over that these powerful levers began to show their full potency. Since 1950 the Paris house has performed brilliantly in the forefront of the European boom.

"He has started a new concept here," said a high aide at the bank. "Formerly Rothschild used to be the sole investor in a new enterprise, developed it alone, and then sold some shares of it while keeping control. Today we are a bigger bank than ever, but the funds required to start a major new company are so much bigger still that no single private outfit can finance all of it. That's why Rothschild's used to stay aloof from some new developments after the first big war. Now they are in the thick of it. Guy uses the concept of participation; he accepts other people's money from the very start; he acts as initiator and packager—and as guarantor. Apart from his share, he invests the unique moral capital of his name. And of course he keeps strictly in control."

Then there is Guy's cousin Edmond. His father Maurice, that black sheep par excellence, handed down to Edmond all his money, initiative, informality and none of his naughtiness. Edmond inherited tremendously and tremendously expanded his inheritance. Unaffiliated with the Family bank, he is faithful enough to Family discretion to keep the portals of No. 45, rue du Faubourg St. Honoré signless and anonymous. Here the young, shirt-sleeved Baron directs a staff of 150 executives and assistants, "my main business den." From this headquarters he runs the Compagnie Financière, a worldwide organization which builds villas, hotels, pipelines in Israel; throws up giant housing projects in Paris (over one thousand apartments so far); backs Continent, the international European news weekly; finances banks and car factories in Brazil.

It was Edmond who led The Family into fields hitherto seldom associated with its name. If Rothschild could cope with the tax-oppressed, traffic-ridden, television-happy and radioactive aspects of the midcentury, why not also deal with the new travel mania? It will be remembered that Baroness Maurice's pet project had been the development of Megève into France's most elegant Alpine resort. Her properties here included the Mont d'Arbois, a hotel of Rothschildian sumptuousness. In the 1950's her son Edmond decided to turn hobby into industry. He greatly enlarged the Family holdings on the slopes of Mont Blanc, and is now building an ultrachic new pleasure landscape complete with ski lifts, swimming pools, tennis courts and night clubs. He also underwrites and develops not merely hotels but entire new tourist regions in Martinique and Guadalupe in the French Caribbean. With Lord Rothschild as partner, he is responsible for the flowering of Israel's luxury golf resort at Caesarea.

To put it crassly, Edmond is the richest Rothschild and probably the most multiple millionaire in Europe. This amiable young carrot-top (remember his redheaded great-grandfather James?), who can choose to rusticate in either of two fairytale châteaux—one in Switzerland and one in France—and who numbers among his town residences Rubirosa's former house in Paris, is creating still another splendid roof for himself at rue Elysée.

There is more evidence that today the mishpoche is not selling but acquiring mansions. In the rue de Courcelles Edmond's cousin Guy has just remodeled an eighteenth-century house into a new Rothschild palace. Lord Rothschild will shortly move into a new house at Cambridge. London's N. M. Rothschild & Sons has grown too big for the big old edifice at New Court; just recently the firm has taken over a floor in a new office building to accommodate the dividend department.

And the rosewood-and-flowered-porcelain bidets of Ferrières have come into their own again. Guy has done more than reconnect the plumbing, though. After six years of renovation, he has restored this foremost tower of the clan to its full anachronistic glory. The dimensions of the demesne are as exorbitant as ever. It still covers nearly 9,000 prime suburban acres, with a farming population of 600. Twelve highly motorized gardeners supervise a horizonful of parks and pleasure lakes. Five full-time foresters patrol the shoots. The private zoo is gone because the Germans kidnaped the animals. Gone, too, is the train which brought food from the kitchen building to the château through an underground tunnel; our spoilsport century moved the chefs into the main building.

But otherwise this incredible pleasure dome is once more itself. Even the cloakroom by the entrance has recovered its frivolity: cartoons of the current mishpoche paper its walls. Other lampoons, mainly familial (with notable exceptions, such as a ruthlessly faithful portrait of Elsa Maxwell), decorate the adjoining silk-lined lavatory where, as a Family member put it, "they can be perused in comfort and leisure."

Inside the château itself the age of Watteau reigns unstinted. The landscaped succession of imperial salons; the chandeliers, hanging gardens made of crystal and fretted gold; the panoramic expanses of jeweled guest suite after guest suite; the profusion of precious textures: Gobelin, gold inlay, ivory, tortoise shell; the luster of the walls alternated by the idyll beyond the windows—swans rippling fountained lakes; the bathroom faucets of solid silver. . . . Did Robespierre ever live? Was the Bastille really stormed?

2. The Mishpoche of the 1960's

In June, 1959, as the premier event of the premier summer social week the French call "la grande semaine," Guy de Rothschild reopened the clan's principal rustic palace. All of the Paris Family attended the palace-warming at Ferrières. An observer would have noticed that not only the château but also its owner possessed the qualities of the French branch to a heightened degree. The chef de famille —just a bit more than his cousins Elie, Alain and Edmond— is slim, swift in movement, marked by the handsome bold-nosed profile frequent among the descendants of James. At fifty-two the eldest, Guy is also boyish, urbane, inscrutable, impeccable, baronial and sloe-eyed all at once. Though a bit cool, after his Viennese cousin Louis' manner, he conveys a piquancy recently enriched by a sensation.

It was, of course, a well-bred sensation. He divorced his first wife, Alix, to marry a divorcee, Countess Marie-Hélène van Zuylen Nicolai, herself the descendant of a controversial Rothschild union a few generations ago. In both cases the controversy centered around the Catholicism of the Rothschild's spouse. Guy had to resign the presidency of the Jewish Community in France. And Countess Nicolai needed a papal dispensation—a privilege always reserved for the most exalted mismatings—to annul the bond that stood between her and marriage to a Jew. For the first time in French Rothschild history, the head of a house married a woman outside the faith. From the viewpoint of orthodoxy, however, there are some extenuating factors. Edouard, the son of this second marriage, receives a Jewish upbringing, and Guy's own religious identity remains unscathed. He still occupies such posts as the chairmanship of the United Jewish Appeal in France (Fonds Social Juif Unifié).

He and his cousins divide between them the labors and leisures of aristocracy. Guy, a highly polished Family delegate to all state occasions, keeps up the racing tradition with his stud farm in Normandy and stables at Chantilly. As head of the French house, he is in natural rapport with the head of the state. General de Gaulle has used Georges Pompidou, Guy's right-hand man, as one of the republic's key financial advisers. And there are strong personal ties between France's greatest general and her most influential banker. In Guy's photograph album one hunt tally card records that not long ago Baron Rothschild bagged forty-nine pheasants at Marly de Roi, de Gaulle's personal shoot.

Guy's partner and cousin, Elie, is probably the fiercest, most imperious mishpoche member since the first Lord Rothschild. "Oh, he is a Berber!" one of the belles of his bachelor days once said admiringly, and the epithet seems apt, if only because he has skillfully supervised the bank's Sahara oil ventures. On the private side he represents la vie sportive with his almost weekly polo forays to England and Spain, his shoots in France, Austria and Africa.

His brother Alain is the current Family's yachtsman. A quiet, very baronial baron, Alain is at the same time the president of the Jewish Community in Paris and très St. Germain—a phrase connoting the most muffled, conservative, impenetrable sector of French society. The combination of two such roles is uniquely Rothschild.

The English house, being English, makes a point of being pale. While the Parisians personify the glamorous, athletic haut monde, the London branch seems to feel that perhaps that sort of thing would not quite do for them. Even their chromosomes appear a great deal more tradition-minded. The Parisian Rothschilds look as slender and dashing as any drawing-room-comedy marquis; but the Londoners tend to be a stoutish Savile-Row-tailored, Cambridge-accented version of the German rabbi old Mayer wanted to become.

They like their sports, of course. Of the three running the London bank, Edmund (the senior partner) has fished in the best waters of four continents. His brother Leopold sails. Cousin Evelyn has a polo team, "The Centaurs," whose puissance is known to the teams of both Prince Philip and Cousin Elie.

But their athletics and sociabilities have a very quiet, almost introspective note. For someone of his eminence as the head of the house, Edmund lists few clubs (White's and St. James's) and is not a conspicuous member in either. He, his brother and cousin have the same right to the baronial title as the French but choose to be Mister. Their cars are very carefully medium-priced, quietly driven by the best chauffeurs in London. All the "bank" Rothschilds in England are part of a finely turned understatement. They may know the board chairman of Britain's greatest tabloid, but they are not aware that the thing also has reporters. In brief, they take their Society without Café. The result is a prominence felt all the more because it cannot be seen or heard. And the fact remains that on Mr. Edmund's piano at Exbury there stand, among snapshots of other visitors, pictures of Elizabeth and Philip.

At the same time—and this is just as distinguished—the English branch provides a whole dynasty's worth of eccentricity. It is from the London house that the so-called "nonbank" Rothschilds issue, with their astounding array of vocations.

The ranking member among them is the present Lord Rothschild (Victor), the first of his title to forsake finance altogether. A Labor peer, a swing disciple of pianist Teddy Wilson, and last not least a biologist, he has gathered pioneer insights into the sex life of the bedbug, the love technique of the spider and procreation among leeches. His elder sister Miriam is coauthor of Fleas, Flukes and Cuckoos, an important book on parasitology. And Miriam's twelve-year-old son recently arrived at the house of a friend in Austria accompanied by an intricate apparatus topped with a blue lamp. It was his own invention and, he explained, the most efficient instrument yet devised for the trapping of young female moths.

His aunt, Kathleen Nica Rothschild de Koenigswarter—Lord Rothschild's youngest sister—has different though just as unlikely interests. She lives in Weehawken, New Jersey, had the Nica Blues named after her by a grateful composer, and was recently convicted of possessing ten dollars' worth of marijuana.

Also of the English branch, though born and domiciled in France, there is Philippe de Rothschild.* For his Mouton Rothschild wines Picasso, Braque and Dali have created some of the wildest bottle labels ever. He owns a planet named Philippa, sold to him by the hungry astronomer who discovered it. His mongrel dog answers to "Bicouille," an unmentionable name in French, but sups out of a silver dish served by a white-gloved butler.

Yet with the possible exception of the late Maurice, the Family character has not permitted a single genuine playboy. Even among the above outré personalities there runs a strong streak of purposefulness. Lord Rothschild, for example, has the record of a war hero (see Chapter IX). He is now Assistant Director of Research in the Department of Zoology at Cambridge and one of Britain's most eminent scientists. When it comes to Jewish matters, this Family maverick turns tribally orthodox. In 1938 he composed a letter in Latin to the Pope, fiercely urging him to protest against the Nazi persecution of the Jews. He received an answer, also in Latin, as well as the satisfaction of the Pope's compliance. In recent years he has administered, together with Jimmy de Rothschild's widow and young Baron Edmond, the unpronounceable EJRMG (Edmond James Rothschild Memorial Group) Foundation. EJRMG contributed one million dollars to the Weizmann Scientific

* See footnote page 266.

Institute in Tel Aviv, gave three million dollars toward the construction of the Knesseth and foots the bill for many of Israel's archeological expeditions.

His Lordship's sister, the jazz baroness, has been thumbs up—financially and morally—to many good musicians to whom the commercial world was thumbs down. She is the Rothschild foundation for the needy cool. Thelonius Monk has figured among her beneficiaries; Charlie "Bird" Parker, perhaps the greatest genius of the New Sound, died in her apartment.

As for Baron Philippe, his preposterous little Bicouille has witnessed some momentous meetings. The Baron is a Grey Eminence of professional skill. Late at night, when the servants have been sent away and weighty heads bend over old brandy, Philippe's Paris dining salon at Avenue d'Iéna becomes a political crossroads of the nation. It was here that a French foreign minister changed Henry Luce's mind on Algeria, here that the head of the Socialist party patched up a quarrel with a key commentator. At Mouton, Philippe ripens his famous wines in cousinly rivalry with Baron Elie's adjoining and equally famous Lafite Rothschild. And at Mouton he and his American wife Pauline have created France's greatest wine museum.

Philippe has three huge, specially constructed beds—one in his Paris duplex, one in the castle he rents every summer at Hesselager, Denmark, and one in the château among the vineyards. His dynamism is huge—and horizontal. He not only sleeps but eats, presides, instructs, phones, telegraphs, and above all writes, propped against his pillows.

Christopher Fry asked him to render his plays, and therefore an enormously difficult style, into French. With typical Rothschild chutzpah the Baron went, or rather lay down, to work. After five years of labor the first volume appeared in 1960, to extraordinary critical approbation. A second volume is on the way. It is not the Baron's only connection with the theater. A few years ago he published a book-length fairytale called Aile d'Argent. It was dedicated to his daughter Philippine, now a prominent young actress in the Comédie Française, who married her director in the celebration that started our story.

Which brings us to the distaff side.

3. The Ladies

All the literally and figuratively rich energies of the average clan member demand equally diversified kinds of élan from his wife. To keep her husband, a Rothschild wife must often keep half a dozen households and be at home in ten different fields.

"Philippe always says that women and jail [during the Nazi era] taught him most. Well, I am the woman. But I also know that I am the jail. It's my job to make the cell comfortable." This is one of Baroness Philippe's recent reflections. As a matter of fact, most Rothschilds find their "cells" remarkably snug. On the whole the clan has married well, though not necessarily the first time around.

Philippe himself makes an appropriate example. His first, not particularly felicitous, union ended with his wife's death during the war. His second marriage is something of a triumph. In her pre-Rothschild career the Baroness, known then as Pauline Potter, was Hattie Carnegie's top designer and a New York society hostess of the first water. The formidable talents she developed are used to constant full capacity now. When the couple resides in Paris, she supervises two ménages—her garden apartment at rue Méchain, his immense duplex at Avenue d'Iéna. (Philippe feels that in the absence of a full-blown town house there isn't enough room to accommodate them both.) When summering in Denmark, she renders a huge sixteenth-century castle habitable. (Philippe's standard of minimum habitability may be roughly defined as the Garden of Eden.) When living at Château Mouton, as she and her husband do for most of the year, she runs the two manors Petit Mouton and Grand Mouton.

Of course, there is more. There is the wine museum, a joint creation of Philippe and herself, that is still growing toward Louvre proportions. There is the comprehensive translation of Elizabethan lyric poetry into French, an unprecedented arduous undertaking which has engaged the two for years. There is an enormous amount of esthetic spadework done by her on behalf of his "Christopher Fry madness." There are charity stints, particularly those connected with running the Mathilde et Henri de Rothschild Hospital (named after Philippe's parents, who founded it). There is her social work, which in this context can mean up to twenty highly spoiled house guests.

In the course of a single day the Baroness may be called upon to decide the placement of a Picasso in the museum; wrestle with the translation of a John Donne sonnet; plan the next ten five-course dinners with her two chefs; whip her house servants, including four butlers, into line; thumb through two sample books—one containing swatches of her sixty tablecloths; the other, photographs of some seventy different sets of her table services—to select the absolutely right plate matched to the absolutely right cloth pattern and to the absolutely right centerpiece; plot the table seating so as to alternate male with female, art with politics; attend to her own simply spectacular as well as spectacularly simple Balenciaga or Dior toilette; and then sweep down the staircase as if she had only been lolling on the sofa all day—a delicious blend of Madame Pompadour and Madame de Staël.

The precious vines of Mouton Rothschild abut on those of Lafite Rothschild. Château Lafite is owned jointly by the entire French branch, but its management is the province of Baron Elie. The copper-encrusted mahogany table—once at Ferrières, where Bismarck wrangled with Elie's grandfather Alphonse across its expanse—stands in one of the drawing rooms, surrounded by similar showpieces. Lafite is a standard Rothschild castle, complete with the inevitable baroque splendors and fin-de-siècle bibelots. Yet it is lived in just one week out of every twelve months, when the Elies and their three children visit it at Eastertime.

To keep this château "alive" the year round without running into expenses ridiculous even by Rothschild standards is one of the chores of Liliane, the Baroness Elie. She is also chief executive of two other households: 1. their huge Paris town house at 11, rue Masseran, formerly the Comte de Beaumont's Hôtel, with its historic ballroom, sumptuous furnishings, and whole galleries of Rembrandts, Watteaus, Ingres, Fragonards, Picassos; 2. the Elie country seat at Royaumont near Paris.

In addition, Liliane exercises another function. She takes a vital part in Elie's office as the French Family's chief patron of contemporary art. On an upper floor of rue Masseran lies the big "modern room," filled with Klees and Ernsts, with oddly magnificent "abstract furniture," with tables, chairs and even fire dogs created by leading contemporary sculptors on commission. Elie plays Medici to new Cellinis of sufficient talent, and Liliane edits and harmonizes their inspirations—a delicate job. Liliane serves as a calmly balanced counterpoise to her super-charged husband. The vans keep driving up to the gates of rue Masseran with the fruits of the Baron's swoops on art auctions and studios. The Baroness takes charge from here on, absorbing new acquisitions into one of the finer contemporary collections in Paris. Some pieces she absorbs so well that, rumor goes, they are never seen again.

Elie's wife is also one of the archsoothers and goodfriendship genies within The Family. The Rothschilds, after all, number several dozen supremely rich and superbly willful absolutists. If they mesh, even today, into a single consolidated clan, their consolidation is due to an instinct most obviously embodied by Baroness Elie. She displayed it only a few months ago in one of her own backyards, Château Lafite.

Elie's Lafite and Philippe's Mouton, as two equally famous Bordeaux clarets, are perforce in commercial competition. The rivalry is accentuated by the official classification of Bordeaux wines, made over a hundred years ago; it lists Lafite as premier cru, or first-category, and Mouton only as second. Yet today both the opinions of wine experts and the prices of wine merchants place Mouton Rothschild in fully as exceptional a class as Lafite Rothschild. Baron Philippe has launched a complicated and characteristically volcanic campaign to have the old classification officially rewritten. That kind of revisionism cannot delight premier cru vintners like Baron Elie. Inevitably commercial problems will have private reverberations. Yet when Philippine married, Baroness Elie did the Rothschild thing. She staged the Mouton girl's wedding feast in the vaulted cellars of Lafite. Here all lifted glasses to bride, to groom, to both Rothschild vineyards, and to Liliane, the hostess and mishpoche-mender.

Liliane shares two characteristics with Elisabeth, the wife of Edmund de Rothschild, senior partner of the London bank. Both women were born in Vienna, of distinguished Jewish families. (Liliane's maiden name was Baroness Fould-Springer, which conveys a pedigree second only to Rothschild's.) And both Liliane and Elisabeth have a strong taste for the graphic arts.

Elisabeth, a textile designer before her marriage, occasionally must put this faculty to semiofficial use. Edmund's main residence at Exbury near Southampton is no longer a pure pleasure haunt, but an agricultural and horticultural paying proposition. Yet not a square foot is rented out to tenants, which makes it an exception among large English estates today. All of its 2,600 acres are held "in hand." That is, Mr. Edmund owns directly not only the sea of hothouses, the endless flower beds with their more than a million blooms, and the farming areas—but also the inn, the general store, the schoolhouse, and every brick in the village of Exbury. To be Mrs. Edmund at Exbury is to be queen consort of a small kingdom. Vicar, schoolmaster, innkeeper may bring their sundry problems to the manor threshold and expect to take them away solved. At the annual harvest supper on the great manor lawn, yeomen and overlord feast together in the merriest medieval manner, modernity manifesting itself only in the movie show of the current year's Rothschild travels. Mr. Edmund always excels at calling hundreds of Exburyites by their first names. Mrs. Edmund does well by an equally difficult job: arranging the décor, the viands and the ambiance of the whole fete.

Like any wife carrying the Name, Elisabeth thus administers the domestic and esthetic aspects of a principality. Often this involves humanizing outsize proportions. At Elisabeth's initiative, the Rothschild household at Exbury lives not in Exbury House with its fifty bedrooms, but in Inchmery, the smaller mansion, where the Cuyps, the Romneys, Reynolds and Cellinis can be enjoyed within cozier perspectives. She even insisted on placing a fine bronze cast of St. Amant, the Derby winner owned by her grandfather-in-law Leo, in the cathedral augustness of the partners' waiting room at New Court. For months old New Court retainers trembled inwardly at the daring of this act. It seemed like planting a tree in the middle of Westminster Abbey.

The greatest task for any Rothschild wife is simply to be a Rothschild first and last, to be instantly responsive to every dynastic need and impulse. Item: a small incident at Mouton last year. A big, heavy piece of wrapped cement arrived at the Bordeaux customs office, sent by the London bank and addressed to Baron Philippe. The customs people were puzzled by such peculiar traffic among Rothschilds. Philippe happened to be away; his secretaries could recall no correspondence with London on the subject of cement. The shipment was on the point of being returned to London when word of it reached Baroness Pauline. And she was Rothschild enough to remember. Two months before, during one of Edmund's visits at Mouton, he had admired the many snow-white doves ornamenting the park and the air of the estate. But Pauline had complained that, for lack of the grit necessary to their gizzards, the birds pecked little holes into the manor walls. Edmund had mentioned a specially manufactured grit, and this cementlike material—a hunk big enough to serve a whole château—was exactly what the odd parcel contained. Pauline had been a clan member for less than six years: sufficiently long to know that the paramount Rothschild instinct is to preserve and defend the Family substance in every way, even against tiny beaks.

4. The Hush at New Court

A concrete CARE package traveling from New Court to Mouton is not without symbolic overtones. It seems only fitting that the most sophisticated of Family châteaus should still receive incidental protection from the oldest Family bank.

Such protection, in moral form, is constantly forthcoming to the most scattered corners of the mishpoche. The solid, pragmatic pulse of the counting house still beats in every Rothschild, steadies his feet on the ground and, no matter what his calling, sets his shoulder to the wheel. This is the source which gives The Family a hard cutting edge, an evergreen drive—rare assets among multibillionaires who could flirt their lives away on Riviera balconies and still leave their children and their children's children enough to do the same.

In the "bank" Rothschilds the drive to work can amount to obsession. Week ends and holidays are devoted to divertissements exquisite and exclusive. Baron Guy's Sunday problem, for instance, has to do with the tactics of pleasure commuting: Ferrières lies in the east of Paris, while Longchamps is inconveniently placed in the west. The twain are to meet in a private helicopter, if landing permission at the racetrack can be worked out. Frivolity, too, has its efficiencies. And yet—

"We are bankers by trade," Guy said recently. "We work at our trade sixty hours a week. Some time ago I went to watch one of my horses on a Thursday. I won't do it again soon. I can't seem to enjoy it weekdays."

The chronic industriousness of the Rothschilds derives in part from the peculiar structure of their business. Through its railroad-turned-investment trust, the French house controls mining corporations, metal plants, oil interests, chemical industries and many others. Upon the daily staff meeting, held at de Rothschild Frères at 10:20 A.M. sharp, there converge myriad data which must be understood, absorbed, and processed into decisions at the desks of Barons Guy, Elie and Alain.

This "must" can be taken literally. At Rothschild the concentration of authority is as total as the breadth of scope. In the secretarial departments of 21, rue Laffitte, IBM machines whir and electric typewriters whisper. But the front office, paneled with stern old Rothschild portraits, is redolent of a venerable autocracy. The hierarchy of butlers and carpets which culminate in the Empire leather armchairs of Baron Guy's suite are no hollow trappings. An old-fashioned prerogative still lives beneath the old-fashioned pageantry. Most other business giants are run by hired managers on behalf of absentee owners. But here the bosses aren't chairmen by the grace of a board, nor presidents dependent on shareholders' proxies, nor corporate servitors obliged to publish a yearly balance sheet. The three cousins possess outright, and command directly, one of the world's most powerful banks.

Their responsibility, as private partners, is just as great as their power. "If I pick up the phone now," said one of their executives, "and order Detroit to make us half a million five-wheeled Cadillacs, I may be fired. But the partners would be answerable for this stupidity—and for much less obvious ones too—with their private fortunes."

This sort of setup requires a feudal allegiance on the part of the employees. On the part of the employer it predicates a patriarchal solicitude that goes beyond maximum salaries and social benefits. There are whole families that have been on the Rothschild payroll for over a century. Just after the war a new clerk was welcomed by the staff with the question, "Who is your father?" It was naturally assumed that, as usual, the young man had been born into his job.

"The young chaps nowadays . . ." a Rothschild administrator mused. "At first they can't understand the atmosphere here. But after a few months they realize this is Rothschild's—and they catch on."

An inheritable but otherwise not very accessible distinction is being a Rothschild customer. Each year hundreds of people knock on the doors of the English and French banks, bringing hundreds of thousands of francs, dollars and pounds. They want their money to be invested by Rothschild or to enjoy the prestige of a Rothschild account. Many are asked, with great politeness, to carry their coffers home again. Officially, any reputable businessman can open an account at de Rothschild Frères with a minimum deposit of five thousand francs. Unofficially, a little phrase is added: "—if he is a friend." Typical depositor friends of the two houses have been Sir Winston Churchill, several royal houses, and the more stable South American governments.

"I guess," Baron Guy will say when pressed about this point, "we are a bit choosey about who is going to sign his name on our checks."

As for the checks written by the house itself, some of them are never presented for payment. Their recipients prefer to keep them as souvenirs. They are the direct dividends of legend.

The Name, creating a thrill in the Rothschild patron, inspires almost eerie respect in Rothschild personnel. "You don't just work for the partners eight hours a day, and they don't just hand you a check once a month," said a third-generation Rothschild man in London. "You exchange loyalties with them that go on to your sons and their sons."

A romantic statement. But the English house is even more romantically ancestral than the French. The long-distance wires and intercoms of the London bank may be buzzing with its newest atomic investments, but that doesn't keep the derby-hatted doorman in St. Swithin's Lane from a perfect nineteenth-century salute. Inside the courtyard one already feels a hallowed hush. It grows in the partners' waiting room: silence here, except for the occasional swish of a butler's tailcoat, the quick tread of a messenger, the lisp of three teletypes (one for stocks, one for news, one for races) all in Edwardian casings. This could be the antechamber of a fine old prince.

And it is. For the next station is the Partners' Room, an institution left over from the condottieri days of merchant banking. It is so antique that even the French house has abandoned it. Only the Messrs. Rothschild work here —Edmund, Leopold and Evelyn. Their privacy is undiluted by secretary or assistant; the atmosphere conducive to privy consultation and secret decision. This massive Victorian parlor is the throne room of London finance, and above all a genealogical shrine. Ancestors crowd the walls. Mementoes and milestones stud mantel shelves and tables: a receipt for two million pounds for paying Wellington's army; a fist-sized South African diamond next to a chunk of North American uranium ore; the founder's sample book of cotton cloth that started his English business career; some boll weevils that crept into a bullion sack and now lie, turned to gold, upon a salver.

Nobody knows who placed them here. Nobody is left to tell why a small office in the east wing is called Lord Beaconsfield's room. Nobody is sure how the ritual was developed which occurs in a chamber on the second story. Here the Rothschilds, acting on behalf of the Bank of England, meet with four other major bullion brokers. Each day they fix the price of gold for the United Kingdom by standing up or laying down miniature English flags.

Everyone does know why the top echelon of executives must never lunch out but must eat in their own oak-paneled dining room. They must be at the instant disposal of the partners, who are served a floor higher amid mahogany and Russian leather. But just why must this meal begin at one P.M., a bit later than the usual lunchtime?

At New Court, St. Swithin's Lane, one shrugs. It is a traditional mystery which has lasted generations. Not long ago an archivist claimed to have found a parallel in the eating habits once prevalent in some German ghettos. The relationship would not be surprising. An unforgotten presence directs the uranium financiers and board chairmen, the Lords and Barons and Derby winners who today make up the House of Rothschild. It is a patriarch on a makeshift ghetto terrace, explaining plants to his daughters. Somehow he is still listened to by the great Brahmins who survey their rare orchids in the hothouses at Exbury, raise precious vines in the Medoc, breed thoroughbreds in Normandy. The same man's voice, now sounding from a cramped counting house, can apparently be heard by the monarchs of New Court and rue Laffitte. It seems to remind them that all greatness begins with a dream—and that their dream began two centuries ago, with old Mayer smiling at his coins in Frankfurt's Jew Street.

FREDERIC MORTON

Born in Vienna, Austria, in 1925, Frederic Morton, with the advent of Nazi power, left his native country in 1938 and came to New York. He received his B.S. degree from City College of New York and his M.A. from the New School in New York, and has lectured at the Universities of Southern California and Utah, and the New School. In 1947 Mr. Morton received a fellowship for the Breadloaf Writers' Conference and the same year was awarded the Intercollegiate Literary Fellowship Prize by Dodd, Mead for his first novel, The Hound. He received Yaddo residence fellowships in 1949 and 1952, and a fellowship from Columbia University in 1955. Mr. Morton has written for The Nation, The Reporter, Esquire and The Atlantic and is a regular contributor to Holiday. In addition to The Hound, he has published three other novels, The Darkness Below, 1949, Asphalt and Desire, 1952, and The Witching Ship, 1960. Mr. Morton and his wife divide their time between Europe and New York City.

(contir · front flap)

the Suez Canal for his country over a bowl of grapes; Baron Louis, who faced down Heinrich Himmler in a Gestapo prison cell.

In their climb from ghetto to all-but-royal eminence, the Rothschilds became bankers to empires, creators of the modern concept of international finance, builders of the European continent's first railroads. They made social history as well. In England there was Baron Lionel's ten-year battle to enter Parliament as a Jew. In France there was the poignant story of Baron Edmond, who left the salons of Paris to pour his fortune and his passion into the colonizing of Palestine. And it was a Rothschild to whom the Balfour Declaration personally promised the formation of modern Israel. By their very existence –and by their decisive actions–the family became the great protectors of their people.

In the drawing rooms, the Rothschilds began by being snubbed and ended by dazzling the snobs. The book follows them as they turn into barons of the Austrian Empire, lords of the English nobility, confidants of kings in France and Italy. From Metternich to Balzac, from Queen Victoria to the Duke of Windsor (who retired to a Rothschild estate immediately after his abdication), the people whom the Rothschilds knew–and who were proud to know the Rothschilds–constitute a gallery of Europe's great in the last two centuries.

And through it all runs the theme of unimaginable wealth: wealth used to build palaces for themselves, to cater to the most extravagant whims, to create a way of life envied even by royalty. Today, in manors and chateaux in England and France, Mayer Amschel's descendants live on with undiminished vigor and power. Of them, too, the book catches very personal glimpses.

THE ROTHSCHILDS welds 200 years of history into one absorbing story. Frederic Morton has captured its drama, its elegance, and the humor that has always enlivened these unforgettable and vivid people.

D'EDMOND BARON DE ROTHSCHILD

CÉLÉBRÉ AU GRAND TEMPLE ISRAÉLITE DE PARIS

LE SAMEDI 24 TISCHRI 5619

(2 octobre 1858.)

Depuis les temps lointains où Dieu parlait aux hommes,
Depuis cet âge d'or — jusqu'au jour où nous sommes,
Sur tous les points du globe, au rivage africain
Comme aux confins glacés du monde américain;
Sur tous les continents, Europe, Océanie,
Partout où l'on rencontre, au foyer réunie,

La famille — partout, le dernier des enfans
De sa mère adoré, dès ses plus jeunes ans,
Voit son père lui-même, acceptant ce caprice,
D'un partage inégal consacrer l'injustice.
Pourquoi le dernier fruit des heureuses amours,
A ce doux privilége est-il admis toujours?
Autour de nous, pourquoi tout n'est-il que mystère,
Secret impénétrable, au ciel et sur la terre?
La nature le veut. Et le livre divin,
Que Moïse écrivit sur des tables d'airain,
Montre Dieu, pour fêter sa gloire souveraine,
Choisissant le dernier des jours de la semaine.

Ainsi que Benjamin, toi, le dernier enfant,
Dès ton aurore, EDMOND, cet amour triomphant,

Te fit le bien-aimé, te combla de caresses,
Et réserva pour toi les suprêmes tendresses.
GUSTAVE, ALPHONSE, et vous, SALOMON, ses aînés,
Respectez cet amour, n'en soyez point peinés.
Le cœur de vos parents est à vous sans partage,
Mais EDMOND a les droits que lui donne son âge ;
Et vous-mêmes, plus tard, vous comprendrez la loi
Qui fait du dernier-né le seigneur et le roi —
Lorsque, dans son berceau, pleins d'une joie étrange,
Vous entendrez la voix de votre dernier ange.

Voici l'aurore blonde et rose
Qui dore l'horizon lointain ;
Voici que le vent du matin
Murmure à la fenêtre close.

Aux premiers feux du jour dans ce palais brillant
Le bonheur souriant
De fleurs, à pleines mains, sème une large voie
Qu'illumine la joie.

Quelle est donc cette fête aux apprêts merveilleux,
Qui surpasse déjà les fêtes des aïeux ?
Quelle est donc cette fête à laquelle le père
Apporte le concours de son esprit sévère ?
Pour laquelle la mère, heureuse du bonheur
Autour d'elle épandu, prodigue tout son cœur ?
Dans ce moment pourquoi donne-t-elle aux prières
Plus d'amour qu'autrefois aux grands anniversaires ?
Dans l'opulent palais, pour qui donc ces festins
Splendides comme ceux des empereurs romains ?

Dans le temple paré, quelle cérémonie
Aux pieds de JÉHOVAH amène réunie
Cette noble famille, aussi riche qu'un roi,
Et dont l'or a courbé l'univers sous sa loi ?
Pourquoi tous ces amis sont-ils pleins d'allégresses,
Et ces pauvres comblés d'abondantes largesses ?
Pourquoi tous ces enfants, des cantiques sacrés
Font-ils monter au ciel les rhythmes vénérés ?

JÉHOVAH, créateur de l'immense nature,
Toi qui diriges tout par ta volonté sûre,
Et qui, maître de tout, dans tes divines mains
Tiens le bonheur, la vie, et le cœur des humains ;
C'est toi seul, Tout-Puissant, que l'illustre famille
Vient fêter en ces lieux où ton grand nom scintille.

C'est à toi, qu'aujourd'hui, de son fils dernier-né
Elle apporte l'hommage à toi seul destiné.
C'est aujourd'hui qu'EDMOND voit sa treizième année
Plus un jour s'accomplir : l'enfance est terminée !
Désormais il n'est plus exclus du nombre trois (1);
Pour prier en commun, selon tes saintes lois,
Il fera le dixième (2), et son œil pourra lire
Les décrets qu'à ta voix Moïse dut écrire :
« En signe, sur vos bras, vous porterez ma loi,
» Toujours entre vos yeux vous la mettrez pour moi.
» Ce sera le contrat d'alliance éternelle,
» De vertu, de justice et de grâce fidèle,
» Que je passe avec vous ; en tout vous m'aimerez
» Et mes commandements sans cesse observerez. »
De cette paracha, tel est le sens pratique :
Voir toujours clair et juste, avoir pour but unique

(1) Mésoumin.
(2) Minien.

Dans le cœur, dans l'esprit, la volonté de Dieu ;
Travailler à sa gloire, en tout temps, en tout lieu ;
Assister son prochain et l'aimer comme un frère :
Voilà pour obéir ce que nous devons faire.
Les THÉPHILINES saints dont va se revêtir —
Dans ce jour solennel où s'ouvre l'avenir —
EDMOND, fils de JACOB, comme tous les fidèles,
Sont le symbole clair de ces lois éternelles.
— « A partir d'aujourd'hui, tu réponds de tes fautes, »
Dit le père à son fils ; « par ton âge tu m'ôtes » Ce poids qui me chargeait depuis ton premier cri.
» Du bien que tu feras tu jouiras aussi. —
» Comme un chêne, grandis en vigueur, en sagesse,
» Sois ferme en tes propos, fidèle à ta promesse, » Obéis au devoir, et souviens-toi toujours
» Que tout sera compté par l'Auteur de tes jours. »

À ces graves conseils sortis du fond de l'âme,

Le dernier-né répond par un regard de flamme;

Doucement il s'incline, et son front vient s'offrir

Aux baisers paternels qui le font tressaillir.

Plus doucement encor devant sa tendre mère

Il vient se prosterner comme pour la prière.

« Mon cher enfant, dit-elle, objet de mes doux soins,

» Sois juste et bon, apprends à fournir aux besoins

» De chaque être souffrant; que ta main libérale

» Soulage constamment la pauvreté fatale,

» Sans demander jamais d'où vient l'infortuné,

» Quel est son nom, son Dieu, sous quels cieux il est né.

» Il souffre, c'est assez : comme nous, fais largesse :

» Donner au nom de Dieu, c'est la sainte richesse ! »

De tes nobles parents sois la joie et l'honneur;
En suivant leurs conseils tu verras le bonheur,
Cher EDMOND, couronner le cours de ta carrière
Et combler tous les vœux que fait pour toi ta mère.
C'est là notre souhait et Dieu l'accomplira
Et par nous imploré, sa main te bénira.

LÉON HOLLAÉNDERSKI.

ARRÊT.

Vu par le Tribunal de l'Opinion la Requête publiée par James Rothschild, sous le titre de Réponse de Rothschild I^er^, roi des Juifs, à Satan dernier, roi des imposteurs, tant en son nom que comme défenseur et représentant des ayant-causede la féodalité financière, et en particulier de ses grands vassaux :

Salomon Rothschild, chef de sa maison de Francfort ;

Anselme Rothschild ; chef de sa maison de Vienne ;

Lionel Rothschild, chef de sa maison de Londres ;

Charles Rothschild, chef de sa maison de Naples ;

Contenant que ledit Rothschild I^er^, roi des Juifs, cite à comparaître devant le Tribunal suprême un sieur Benoît-Louis-François Macaret, pamphlétaire de son métier, sous l'inculpation d'avoir publié un écrit mensonger et diffamatoire ayant pour titre Histoire édifiante et curieuse de Rothschild I^er^, etc., etc., et ce, dans le but de contester auxdits

Rothschild et consorts les priviléges légitimes, monopoles, et omnipotence universelle qui leur ont été concédés par toutes les royautés officielles d'Europe, du plein consentement de ces dernières, qui n'ont pas réclamé avant prescription (1) ;

Ouï le réquisitoire de JUNIUS, Rapporteur général, poursuivant d'office par le motif que le Dieu des Juifs aime mieux la miséricorde que le sacrifice, et qu'il y a lieu de présumer que Rothschild 1^er^ a lancé, ab irato, cette citation, qui pourrait lui préparer des regrets mortels dans le cas où son frère en Adam, ledit pamphlétaire Macaret, viendrait à comparaître à bref délai devant le Juge éternel ;

Considérant, en outre, que toute puissance est établie de Dieu sur la terre ; que l'œil multiple du gouvernement affecte de se fermer sur le délit de Macaret, et que tous les hommes, voire même les rois, ressortissent de notre juridiction ;

Adoptons les conclusions de JUNIUS, en ce qui touche les nécessités de la vindicte sociale, et la compétence du tribunal de l'Opinion publique ;

Et attendu, d'ailleurs, que les philosophes modernes ne sont autres que des aveugles conduisant des aveugles; que, par leurs doctrines d'égalité absolue, ils ont introduit le chaos dans la société et l'ont organisée pour se conserver en chaos ;

Qu'en effet les plus grands rois-philosophes ont confessé hautement la perversité de l'espèce sophiste, en déclarant que s'ils voulaient châtier une de leurs provinces, ils la donneraient à gouverner à des philosophes;

Qu'ils ont imaginé, (les philosophes non les rois), que l'ordre ancien étant usé, ayant fait son temps, tout ordre quelconque était incompatible avec la liberté; qu'ayant été en demeure d'expérimenter leurs théories sociales, ils ont enseigné qu'il fallait briser tous les liens sous le prétexte qu'on avait brisé toutes les chaînes ;

Attendu qu'ils en sont venus à reconnaître la folie de leurs doctrines et à renier tout leur passé révolutionnaire, témoin le philosophe-doctrinaire, Guizot, qui, se jetant imprudemment dans les extrêmes, soutient qu'il faut abrutir le peuple par un travail incessant, et se dispose à faire disparaître jusqu'aux derniers vestiges du droit d'association (2);

Qu'en vain ils s'imaginent pouvoir arrêter le mouvement progressif de la société; que la vraie sagesse politique consiste à réorganiser le corps social au moyen de combinaisons industrielles en rapport avec les besoins nouveaux ; qu'ainsi Nos Seigneurs financiers ont parfaitement compris que dans un monde privé de lien moral, et livré à l'indifférence politique, la hiérarchie sociale ne pourrait transitoirement se recomposer qu'au moyen de la grande puissance des temps modernes, l'argent, ou, si vous aimez mieux, le capital ;

Que James Rohstchild et consorts ont donc fait sagement de s'emparer de la puissance qui fait fléchir toutes les puissances, puisque d'ailleurs des symptômes significatifs attestent que leur arrière-pensée est de la faire servir au bien général des peuples (3) ;

Attendu qu'en effet, de l'aveu même des socialistes, il résulte que des banquiers, hommes d'esprit, ont déclaré hautement qu'ils ont suivi dans leurs entreprises les données du grand publiciste qui voit le salut des sociétés modernes dans le développement rationnel de la féodalité financière et la constitution régulière des grands monopoles industriels, AGRICOLES, commerciaux, etc., etc. ;

Qu'en effet, le développement méthodique de ces monopoles amènera un si prodigieux accroissement de la fortune des classes élevées, et en particulier de Nos Seigneurs de la finance, qu'ils seront les premiers à garantir aux prolétaires le minimum de nourriture et d'entretien, et la participation aux bénéfices de leurs vastes entreprises, dans la proportion du travail et du talent de chacun d'eux ; trop heureux d'arrêter à ce prix l'invasion du paupérisme et des idées communistes, qui conduisent tout droit à l'abolition du capital et de la propriété ; qu'ainsi, il est aisé de concevoir que, lorsqu'ils seront rassasiés de richesses et de gloire industrielle et financière, ils songeront à régler équitablement les rapports des maîtres et des salariés, et à prévenir ainsi ces révolutions sociales dont les menacent des alarmistes malencontreux ;

Attendu que déjà James Rothschild I^er^ l'a implicitement promis en mettant en relief les paroles formidables du grand dénonciateur des tyrans industriels (4);

Attendu que tous les hommes sont frères en Adam, et que l'exhortation de l'apôtre révolutionnaire s'adresse évidemment aux victimes de l'oppresseur de ses frères, de celui qui ne reçoit de nom qu'aux enfers ;

Que le Suzerain de la féodalité industrielle est trop avisé pour se poser comme oiseau de proie, et se séparer de ses frères en Adam, car il les exhorte à prendre exemple sur le faible passereau, sur l'hirondelle désarmée, et à le plumer et le chasser en se rassemblant au-tour de lui et le poursuivant ensemble;

Qu'il est trop absurde d'imaginer qu'un homme, si fort, si habile qu'il fût, pût afficher la prétention d'opprimer des millions d'hommes fraternellement unis, s'appuyant, s'abritant, s'éclairant mutuellement;

Que puisque la Royauté industrielle vise surtout à l'augmentation du produit net, il est d'une évidence niaise que son illustre représentant a tout intérêt à améliorer la masse de ses frères, voire même à l'engraisser, si vous voulez admettre cette supposition monstrueuse qu'il ne voit en eux qu'un troupeau de bétail humain;

Qu'en effet, nul n'a pu savoir mieux que lui, notamment par les expériences du système anglais, que mieux est entretenu le producteur, homme ou animal, plus la part du capitaliste, le produit net est copieux;

Attendu que s'il était assez aveugle pour penser autrement, il pousserait fatalement les amis du peuple à détourner les coups qui menacent incessamment la royauté officielle, et à diriger l'orage contre les puissants seigneurs de la féodalité nouvelle, qui seraient alors les véritables ennemis de la liberté;

Attendu que de pareilles absurdités ne supportent pas une minute d'examen;

Qu'il est donc déraisonnable, impolitique, inconvenant aux pamphlétaires acariâtres et autres démagogues, de taquiner, chicaner, tarabuster Nos Seigneurs de la finance, dont ils sont incapables d'embrasser les profonds desseins ;

Attendu qu'il est plus convenable, plus habile, plus avantageux aux serfs de la féodalité nouvelle, de se borner à suivre le bienveillant conseil de Rothschild Ier; de s'unir, de s'appuyer, de s'abriter sous sa fraternelle égide ; de travailler à éclairer leurs Maîtres et Seigneurs, puis de se lever avec calme comme leurs frères d'Outre-Manche(5), et de réclamer des promesses, des chartes d'affranchissement gradué, un système de garanties, qui mettent un frein aux mauvais désirs, aux tentatives d'envahissement des libertés industrielles et sociales; que le Suzerain Rothschild Ier sentira bien que les temps sont venus, et ne manquera pas d'appuyer la requête de ses frères auprès des grands vassaux récalcitrants qui croiraient pouvoir imposer des devoirs sans droits, ou exercer des droits sans devoirs;

Considérant que la royauté Rothschild ayant imposé des lois à ces royautés officielles qui prétendaient naguères ne relever que de Dieu, du peuple, ou de leur épée, il n'y aura pas de puissance au monde qui puisse résister à cette royauté individuelle, appuyée des masses de prolétaires qu'elle aura entrepris d'affranchir par des voies exclusivement pacifiques; qu'en suivant ces errements le Suzerain Rothschild marche droit à la conquête de l'amitié du penple, amitié glorieuse s'il en fût, car c'est de cela qu'on a toujours flatté les anciennes royautés;

Attendu, d'ailleurs, que Rothschild I^er^ ne saurait refuser à ses serfs ou sujets des chartes industrielles, puisque les rois féodaux, ses prédécesseurs, en ont accordé aux vilains et aux communes de tout pays; qu'il y a lieu de mettre un frein aux empiétements de ses subordonnés, qui feront retomber sur le nom de sa dynastie tout l'odieux de leurs infâmes transactions; qu'en effet, notre Rapporteur général, incité par des bruits populaires, et son ardeur peut-être indiscrète, a déjà dénoncé les attentats commis par les varlets de la nouvelle féodalité, qui,assure-t-on,préludent au rétablissement des droits du seigneur féodal de l'ancien régime, en contraignant les femmes et les filles à solliciter le travail pour leurs parents mâles dans les mines houillières, usines, manufactures et autres centres d'exploitation de la féodalité industrielle; que la notoriété de ces sales intrigues atténue considérablement l'essor de la bienveillance des masses provoquée par l'établissement des colonies agricoles, industrielles, salles d'asiles, crèches, et autres institutions de bienfaisance, que l'Aristocratie du Coffre-fort se propose, dit-on, de fonder à profusion sur tous les points du pays afin de disposer les masses à accueillir sa domination;

Qu'il est sage de se prévaloir des enseignements de l'histoire, de ne pas perdre de vue que les pouvoirs sans contre-poids sont soumis à des chances périlleuses qui ne sauraient atteindre ceux qui admettent volontairement une sage pondération des forces sociales; que notamment, pour ne parler que de l'objet qui nous occupe, les flatteurs d'une royauté universelle précipitèrent sa ruine en proposant de lui attribuer sur toutes les femmes des droits qui font frémir la pudeur; que c'est évidemment à un autre titre que Rothschild I^{er} entend être proclamé le père de la grande famille universelle, dont il revendique généreusement la fraternité, bien qu'il soit le plus illustre représentant du peuple élu de Dieu, ainsi qu'il est prouvé par la couleur dorée de sa chevelure, nuance caractéristique de la tribu royale de Juda;

En ce qui touche plus particulièrement les Français, considérant que la France est le premier peuple qui ait émancipé les Juifs de leur ilotisme séculaire et leur ait conféré les droits civils; qu'il est impossible d'admettre qu'aucune pensée d'ingratitude ou de trahison ait jamais pu germer dans le cœur royal de S. M. Rothschild I^er^ (6); que, bien au contraire, nous le voyons, dans toutes les occasions, solliciter avec ardeur le privilége de se ruiner dans la seule vue du bien public (7); que, notamment dans une circonstance récente, il a décelé toute sa magnanimité en laissant mettre en adjudication d'immenses travaux publics que la munificence ministérielle voulait lui concéder à titre gratuit; qu'il a eu la générosité de prêter à l'Etat, moyennant intérêt légal, les sommes nécessaires pour construire la partie des travaux qui lui était attribuée par acte législatif; qu'à la vérité l'Etat, sous l'impression d'une vive reconnaissance, a cru devoir reprêter à Rothschild I^er^ des sommes égales et sans aucun intérêt; mais que c'est par un échange actif de bons offices et de généreux procédés que la France établit et maintient avec les puissances cette entente cordiale qui est le gage de ses prospérités; que les FRANÇAIS ne peuvent en prolonger plus sûrement le cours qu'en se plaçant directement sous la protection du Roi des JUIFS, qui ne saurait jamais manquer de leur en tenir compte aux mêmes conditions;

Attendu qu'il se dispose à leur administrer de nouvelles marques de sa faveur spéciale en se préparant à poursuivre à outrance les oiseaux de proie dont la voracité anarchique a déshonoré le commerce français (8) aux yeux de l'étranger; que, dans cette vue d'intérêt général, il va s'emparer, à l'exclusion de tous autres commerçants, du monopole des accaparements des denrées de première nécessité, qui le rendra maître de la vie des citoyens (9), — du monopole des salines, — du monopole des tabacs, — du monopole de la fabrication du sucre de betteraves et autres produits soumis au régime de la protection;

Que, déjà, et dans un but d'intérêt humanitaire, il a étendu sa sollicitude cosmopolite sur le monopole du mercure, de l'agio universel, et de l'affinage de l'or, dont il a délégué la régie au vice-roi Poizat; — le monopole de la fabrication des monnaies françaises, qu'il a confié au vice-roi C.; — le monopole de la houille et de la fabrication des fers, qu'il a mis sous le nom du vice-roi Z.; — le monopole de l'opinion commerciale et de la publicité, si habilement conduit par le vice-roi Duveyrier; — le monopole de l'agio-boursier et des emprunts nationaux; — le monopole des dépêches et des échéances; — le monopole de la puissance administrative, qui le fera échapper à toute répression (10); — le monopole électoral; — le monopole des transports, organisé par le vice-dieu Enfantin (11); — enfin le monopole universel de la haute banque, dirigé par ses grands vassaux Anselme de Vienne, Lionel de Londres, Charles de Naples, et Salomon de Francfort;

Attendu que ces monopoles et leurs moteurs s'aideront, s'abriteront, s'appuieront merveilleusement pour plumer et chasser l'oiseau de proie de la concurrence anarchique (12); qu'en effet, par le monopole pivotal de la banque universelle et des transports, il obtiendra fatalement tous les monopoles subordonnés; qu'évidemment, par le monopole de la haute banque, il maîtrisera la puissance administrative et se mettra en possession des monopoles du crédit et des emprunts nationaux; par le monopole des emprunts, il exercera sans contrôle le monopole de l'influence dans les congrès européens, et sera le souverain arbitre de la guerre et de la paix; par le monopole du crédit, il accaparera le monopole des annonces et de l'opinion commerciale; par le monopole de la puissance administrative, il arrivera au monopole électoral qui lui livrera à discrétion le pouvoir législatif; par le monopole législatif combiné avec le monopole de l'opinion commerciale, il emportera sans coup férir le monopole des travaux publics: par le monopole des transports et des li-gnes télégraphiques, il aura sans conteste le monopole de l'agio-boursier, — le monopole des sels et des houilles, et partant de la prospérité agricole et manufacturière des localités ;— le monopole de l'accaparement des comestibles de première nécessité et des grands mouvements insurrectionnels qui en dépendent ; — le monopole des dépêches et des échéances, — le monopole de l'honneur et du crédit privé, etc.;

Attendu que l'affiliation hiérarchique de ces innombrables monopoles enlacera, enchevêtrera toutes les classes, toutes les contrées, tous les individus, toutes les positions, dans les liens inextricables d'une invisible vassalité ;

Attendu que le commerce ou la distribution des richesses est la principale fonction de l'Etat, et qu'il y a abdication réelle dans le fait du souverain qui se laisse enlever le monopole pivotal de la banque et des transports ;

Considérant que Rothschild Ier a su rallier, discipliner, organiser hiérarchiquement (13) les compagnies financières en général, et en particulier les banquiers cosmopolites qui ont la haute main dans la direction des affaires politiques de l'Europe ;

Considérant en outre que ces coalitions déguisées ont déjà accaparé le monopole du crédit public, et sont entrés forcément en partage de la puissance souveraine ;

Attendu, d'ailleurs, que la civilisation de troisième phase a fait son temps ; que cette société n'est autre chose que le jeu des dupes et des fripons ; que l'on ne peut entrer en contact avec cette odieuse agrégation sans y rencontrer des coalitions de gros voleurs ligués pour faire pendre les petits voleurs ; que l'égoïsme, la duplicité, la divergence des intérêts, n'ont cessé d'y engendrer l'indigence, la fourberie, l'oppression, le carnage, les intempéries outrées, les maladies provoquées ; que les sociétés qui s'obstineraient à y croupir seraient les premières victimes des fléaux de toute sorte qu'elle doit successivement enfanter ;

Considérant en outre qu'il est écrit « que le Dieu d'Abraham, d'Isaac et de Jacob a promis de livrer à leur postérité le globe entier avec ses habitants, afin qu'en elle soient bénies toutes les nations de la terre (14) ; »

Qu'ainsi ce serait vanité de lutter contre les décrets de l'Eternel, et qu'il n'y a plus qu'à se laisser aller tout doucement au mouvement de civilisation qui emporte la société moderne vers la féodalité industrielle et financière ; qu'en conséquence, Dieu a réservé au Suzerain Rothschid l'honneur insigne de faire entrer la société européenne en quatrième phase de civilisation ; qu'il y a donc lieu de donner les mains à la constitution de la Suzeraineté universelle, qui établira sur des bases solides et durables le système de la paix à tout prix, et fera réduire l'effectif militaire de la paix armée, qui écrase les gouvernements et les peuples européens sans compensation suffisante;

Attendu, enfin, pour ce qui touche l'inculpé, que les agents de sûreté de Rothschild Ier ont indignement fourvoyé Sa Majesté; qu'ils lui ont donné pour un libelliste stipendié un pamphlétaire indépendant, dont tout le crime a été de dire audacieusement à S. M. Rohtschild Ier, comme il a dit au Citoyen-Timon et à Lord-Guizot, comme il dira aux puissants du jour, ce qu'il croira être la vérité; que, Dieu aidant, les pamphlétaires, valets de plumes, agents de chantage, écrivassiers, arriveront à s'instruire et à comprendre que, dans le milieu civilisé, qui a la propriété de fausser les instincts natifs de l'homme, de développer les passions en essor subversif, il est fatalement impossible qu'une royauté universelle, fût-ce la royauté de César, ne s'établisse au moyen de manœuvres infâmes en rapport avec le milieu impur qui les produit; qu'en conséquence la politique de S. M. Rothschild Ier sera loyale, généreuse, débonnaire, paternelle, en un mot, véritablement édifiante, aussitôt qu'il aura conquis la puissance universelle, aussitôt que les royautés politiques auront officiellement reconnu sa Suzeraineté;

Vu le libelle intitulé : Histoire édifiante et curieuse de Rothschild Ier, roi des Juifs, signé Georges Dairnvæll, même la Seconde réponse du prince des Israélites, signée de B.; la Guerre aux Juifs, signé A. D., etc.

Ouï le Rapporteur général en ses conclusions non conformes;

Ensemble la dénonciation de Junius et consorts contre les compagnies financières en général, et en particulier contre leur Suzerain Rothschild Ier (1);

Tout considéré :

PAR CES MOTIFS :

Le TRIBUNAL DE L'OPINION, ayant égard à la requête dudit Rothschild Ier, le renvoie de l'accusation de tyrannie industrielle, usurpation et empiétement diplomatique, improbité boursière, exploitation, corruption politique, trahison, tendance anti-française, cruauté spéculative, vol aux actions, ladrerie, juiverie,

(1) Publiée textuellement dans le Corsaire Satan, la Démocratie Pacifique, etc. — Se trouve chez Albert frères, éditeurs, rue Richelieu, 67. — Prix : quinze centimes.

charlatanisme philanthropique, implicitement émise contre lui dans le libelle ci-dessus visé, rejetant sur l'influence du milieu social et la force des choses la fatalité qui condamne tous les souverains parvenus à gagner leurs épe-rons, cordons, écussons, per fas et nefas ;

Vote audit Suzerain Rothschild des remer-ciements pour les puissants services industriels, politiques, et contre-revolutionnaires qu'il a rendus, bon gré mal gré, à l'Europe civilisée, et notamment aux rois officiels, aujourd'hui ses grands vassaux ;

Par provision, l'institue Fermier-général des monopoles présents et futurs de toutes les nationalités des deux mondes, n'en exceptant les archipels y annexés ;

En particulier, enjoint aux archipels anglais, japonais, malgaches, et autres extorqueurs et accapareurs présents et futurs du commerce anarchique d'Europe, d'Asie, d'Afrique, d'Amérique, d'Océanie et autres lieux, d'avoir à livrer audit Suzerain, dans un bref délai, les détroits maritimes et monopoles insulaires dont ils sont provisoirement en possession, et de contribuer par là au prompt établissement de l'Unité administrative du globe ;

Donne les mains à l'entente cordiale déjà ébauchée entre la féodalité juive, les saint-simoniens et les fouriéristes, et les requiert de concourir au développement rapide de l'organisation du monopole universel ;

Ordonne aux corporations administratives, législatives, et autres, d'accepter les gratifications, agios, épingles, pots-de-vin, et autres bribes ou munificences qu'il leur allouera de son plein gré en pareille occasion ;

Le maintient dans la possession et jouissance paisible des monopoles de la Banque et des transports, et des innombrables monopoles qui leur sont subordonnés ;

Emet le vœu qu'il use de tous ses monopoles dans l'intérêt du consommateur et du producteur ; que notamment, il établisse des tarifs équitables, basés sur la moyenne des récoltes et des prix de revient ; qu'en particulier, il admette les classes laborieuses à jouir d'un tarif spécial en rapport avec les variations du taux des salaires ; qu'il institue un système de garanties universelles constatant l'origine, la qualité, et la quantité des objets de consommation ; qu'en un mot, il abolisse la coutume établie par les oiseaux de proie, de rançonner producteurs et consommateurs, et qu'il fasse bientôt participer le travailleur à ses bénéfices dans la proportion du travail et du talent de chacun ;

Le supplie, et au besoin le requiert, de solliciter à toujours le privilége de se ruiner par amour du bien général ;

Promet solennellement d'obliger l'Etat, de lui emprunter à intérêts usuraires (15) les sommes dont il aura besoin pour exécuter les travaux d'utilité publique; s'engageant implicitement, au moyen de certaine clause secrète, à lui faire reprêter lesdites sommes à titre gratuit;

Enjoint aux journaux monstres, revues, et autres plumes damnées du monopole, d'avoir à continuer de vendre leurs questions à la féodalité banquière, sans toutefois se laisser marchander (16);

Emet le vœu qu'il soumette l'aristocratie nouvelle à une sévère épuration; que notamment il en exclue les aigrefins, les gens tarés, les banqueroutiers de profession, les chevaliers d'industrie, les parvenus sans éducation, les détrousseurs d'actionnaires, et autres malfaiteurs du commerce anarchique, auxquels Junius a appliqué le fer rouge de sa Dénonciation (17); le conjure de préserver intactes nos glorieuses traditions nationales en n'admettant l'ancienne noblesse à faire l'article qu'après que la féodalité nouvelle aura passé au dernier creuset de ladite épuration; ose espérer que sa dynastie fera successivement l'acquisition de toutes les terres arables, en se souvenant que le Dieu de Jacob a promis de lui donner la terre sur laquelle il dort et de bénir toutes les nations en sa postérité; en revanche, et attendu que les rois ont toujours été censés les pères du peuple, lui attribue transitoirement la charge de nourrir et d'engraisser, comme les aristocraties et les riches l'ont fait jusqu'ici (18), tous les pauvres et autres espèces moutonnières dénommées, serfs, ilotes, parias, esclaves noirs ou blancs, prolétaires et autres forçats des bagnes industriels;

L'adjure d'émanciper graduellement, de faire naître sucessivement à la vie sociale et politique, toutes ces catégories de bétail humain, parce qu'il sied à la grandeur, à la future illustration du peuple élu de Dieu, que la nouvelle dynastie règne sur autre chose que sur les esclaves, les fourmilières affamées, les brutes qu'enfante à foison la civilisation de troisième phase;

Le somme transitoirement d'imposer des règles de moralité à ses subordonnés, en accordant à ses serfs et sujets des chartres d'affranchissement qui déterminent d'une manière officielle les conditions d'admission et d'avancement hiérarchiques dans ses grandes exploitations;

Lui enjoint de sauver l'institution de la famille humaine, menacée par la traite des blanches, que pratiquent d'une manière ostensible les petits vassaux, les affranchis, les parvenus de la féodalité nouvelle sur la personne des sœurs, filles, épouses des travailleurs mâles qui leur sont subordonnés;

Lui donne humblement l'avis de se remémorer les causes de la grandeur et de la ruine des royautés et des aristocraties anciennes, de s'imposer spontanément le frein salutaire d'un système de garanties générales qui protégent la dignité humaine, qui acheminent à l'équilibre des forces sociales; d'aviser à ne pas faire comme le sauteur de la fable, un fou qui croyait pouvoir mépriser le balancier qui pondérait ses mouvements, et n'eut plus qu'à se précipiter au bruit des huées de la foule attirée par ses hardies manœuvres;

Enjoint formellement auxdits Rothschild, ses grands vassaux, et autres parvenus à la souveraineté financière, d'avoir à renoncer à tout jamais aux industries infimes qui entraînent dérogeance, telles que chiffonneries en gros, habits vieux galons, etc., etc., qui, selon Satan dernier, ont été avidement pratiquées, notamment à Waterloo, sur les cadavres de nos braves soldats, et ont servi de marche-pied à l'aristocratie de la matière dont nous réclamons l'épuration dans l'intérêt des alliances et de la renommée de la dynastie israélite;

En conséquence, émet le vœu que la Maison Rothschild rachète ses membres en état de dé- rogeance en faisant un royal emploi de sa royale fortune, qui dépasse en importance toutes les listes civiles réunies ; que notamment elle établisse au centre du monde industriel un Hôtel cosmopolite des Invalides de l'Industrie, et contraigne ses vassaux de tous les degrés de la hiérarchie financière d'y entretenir confortablement, par voie de souscription permanente et proportionnelle, les serfs, prolétaires, parias, esclaves, ouvriers et autres salariés, ou non salariés, qui n'ont pas encore participé aux bénéfices des vastes entreprises de leurs maîtres, et dont le dévouement et les dangers ont servi de fondement à la puissance de l'aristocratie nouvelle ;

Et afin que la clameur populaire ne l'accuse pas de spéculer sur les catastrophes, lui donne avis de se constituer en compagnie d'assurance universelle sur la vie humaine ; notamment d'indemniser volontairement LES VICTIMES DE FAMPOUX, en prenant pour base de l'indemnité l'état de fortune des personnes, leurs charges de famille, et leurs espérances; promet de la rétablir en bonne fame et renommée si elle ne se laisse traîner par ses victimes devant les cours de justice des royautés officielles qui ont implicitement reconnu leur vassalité ;

En ce qui touche les opposants, fait injonc-tions expresses à la Réforme, la Démocratie, le National, et autres révolutionnaires incorrigibles, d'avoir à cesser leurs stériles criailleries, à sortir de l'isolement qui se fait autour de leurs doctrines négatives et de leur tableau d'abonnés; d'accepter résolument Rothschild Ier pour chef légitime du gigantesque mouvement industriel et social qui s'opère autour d'eux et emporte la société dans un avenir inconnu; de le surveiller, l'éclairer, le guider, et, au besoin, de DÉNONCER ses actes à l'Opinion et aux masses populaires; de faire enfin, par dévouement social, l'office du balancier qui pondère les oscillations du sauteur en casse-cou; sur toutes choses, les prie de considérer que lui seul possède ou possédera les ressources nécessaires pour réaliser leurs rêves dorés s'ils parviennent, par les voies de bienveillance calculée, à modifier, éclairer, influencer les conseils dont Sa Majesté reçoit l'impulsion (19); en particulier, donne acte à Considerant et consorts de leur opposition systématique aux saines doctrines et au sens commun, en ce qui touche le développement régulier de la féodalité nouvelle et de la période de transition; commet Jules Lechevalier, Enfantin, Rigal, Rodrigues, Solar, et autres socialistes, économistes, juifs et saint-simoniens éminents des Débats, de l'Epoque, de la Presse, et autres feuilles du monopole, pour mettre lesdits Considerant et consorts sur la voie de trouver la véritable interprétation des textes de Fourier sur la matière (20).

En ce qui touche l'inculpé G. Dairnvæl, se disant Satan dernier;

Ouï le Corsaire-Satan, la Réforme, le Paris industriel, et autres organes de l'Opinion, dans leurs critiques et dires contradictoires;

Sur le fond,

Le condamne à étudier sérieusement les doctrines socialistes, économiques, et autres antiquailles usées et nouveautés téméraires qui affichent la prétention d'avoir la haute main dans la direction du mouvement social; l'oblige en outre à se rendre compte, au moins approximativement, des conséquences sociales des vastes opérations industrielles conduites par la dynastie toute-puissante de Rothschild Ier; lui inflige la réprimande publique pour avoir négligé de se renseigner suffisamment à cet égard; le contraint, en conséquence, même par toutes voies coercitives et autres de droit, à supprimer les différentes éditions de l'Histoire édifiante de Rothschild Ier, voire de livrer audit roi Rothschild les trente mille exemplaires vendus au public avant la réception de la requête du plaignant, ou, à son choix, d'y insérer, toute affaire cessante, les cartons, errata, et autres moyens de rectification nécessaires pour redresser les erreurs commises par ledit Satan dernier; et quant aux formes, convenances, procédés, moyens de style et de persuasion, le renvoie, avec tous les pamphlétaires et libellistes présents et futurs, à la lecture perpétuelle de Lucien, Rabelais, Pascal, Bussy, Voltaire, Montesquieu, Beaumarchais, Byron, Junius l'ancien, Paul-Louis Courier, Claude Tillier (21), et leurs pareils s'il en fut, l'autorisant, à ces conditions, à entretenir correspondance publique avec S. M. Rothschild I^er^;

Et statuant sur les écrivailleurs, valets de plumes, monopoleurs d'annonces, et autres agents de chantage chargés de la défense du Prince des Israélites, leur fait expresses défenses et inhibitions de salir de leurs esquisses profanes les traits de cette grande figure, de cette spirituelle intelligence, et leur rappelle que le plus grand roi de l'antiquité n'accorda qu'au seul Apelles le droit de reproduire l'image auguste du conquérant des peuples civilisés;

Et attendu que la dynastie Rothschild est assez riche pour payer sa gloire, laisse à sa charge les dépens, frais de réclames, placards, mémoires, et autres publications qu'entraînera le présent procès;

Enjoint aux royautés officielles qui prétendaient naguère ne relever que de Dieu, du peuple ou de leur épée (22), de se soumettre jusqu'à nouvel ordre aux lois que cette royauté individuelle jugera bon de leur imposer (23);

Ordonne à l'Epoque, à la gendarmerie et autres agents, docteurs, et suppôts de la police de sûreté et de la morale publique, d'endoctriner les mécontents, et au besoin de prêter main-forte et de courir sus aux contrevenants, à seule fin d'assurer par toutes voies l'entière exécution du présent; et afin qu'à l'avenir il n'y soit contrevenu, nous réservons d'intervenir par toutes voies de publicité et de coercition morale, telles que drames, satires, pamphlets, histoire, etc., si le roi des Juifs manquait à ses promesses solennelles; et finalement de décerner à sa dynastie le triomphe omniarcal si elle continue de jouer dignement le rôle de bienfaisance suprême que la Providence lui a assigné pour le bien de tous ses enfants;

Et sera le présent arrêt lu et publié à Constantinople, en congrès universel, le jour de l'intronisation définitive de Rothschild I^er^.

NOTES

CAUSERIES DE LA MINORITÉ.

Le Rapporteur général, tout en protestant de son profond respect pour la chose jugée, se croit tenu de faire connaître fidèlement les avis de la minorité, qu'il adopte pour la plupart. Il ne s'en est fallu que de peu de voix que les Juifs ne fussent mis en coupe réglée, les brillantes paroles de ces Rois de l'Epoque ne pouvant suffire pour atténuer leur passé : un Socrate, à leur place, n'aurait pas eu cette chance-là, je vous le jure. Voyez, pour vous édifier là-dessus, le livre de Toussenel, un brave et spirituel africain, qui a la loi punique ou juive en abomination. Il vous apprendra, cet homme de cœur, à ne pas céder à l'engouement de l'Opinion, un léger volatile qui, au lieu de se tenir à distance dans le calme de l'observation, s'abaisse insensiblement, continûment, et finit par se laisser absorber par l'être immonde qui l'a fasciné.

Note 1.

Les monopoles et empiétements de la féodalité nouvelle ont été prophétisés avec détails par Charles Fourier, il y a de cela plus de quarante ans. Et dire que les loups-cerviers d'Israël et d'Albion, qui affectent de ridiculiser les calculs scientifiques du Maître, ont assez d'esprit pour y voir ce qui convient à leurs égoïstes intérêts... rien de plus, rien de moins. Junius.

Note 2.

Il nous est revenu que lord Guizot tient en portefeuille un petit bout de loi qu'il glissera furtivement entre deux budgets, et qui soumettra les sociétés en commandite à l'ordonnance royale, aussi bien que les sociétés anonymes. C'est donc pour dire qu'il n'y aura que les ouvriers bien pensants qui auront le droit de former des associations commerciales. Encore un moyen pour organiser la royauté juive, et lui livrer pieds et poings liés la grande masse des salariés. On aperçoit de reste que les gérants de ces sociétés formeront une nouvelle catégorie d'électeurs qui seront à la discrétion des ministres et autres vassaux de la Suzeraineté financière. Gare la Dénonciation ; si lord Guizot fait passer cette loi liberticide, qui enlèvera aux masses toute chance d'émancipation sociale et politique! C'est pourtant le pays qui a le premier émancipé ses Juifs, qui s'apprête à exploiter l'ignorance du peuple pour lui river les chaînes d'un ilotisme éternel! Et dire que des hommes qui lisent leur Bible s'avisent de faire une pareille faute, eux qui savent par l'histoire et la prophétie que les Juifs ne peuvent être qu'exploités ou persécuteurs.

DIOGÈNE.

NOTE 3.

On voit cela dans le fait de l'accession des saint-simoniens, Enfantin et Péreire, aux conseils de la féodalité, deux hommes religieux qui ont juré de consacrer leur vie à la destruction de César et à l'intronisation du Pouvoir pacifique. J.

NOTE 4.

C'est une longue tirade du Croyant, que le roi-pamphlétaire, en homme d'esprit (comme disent ses varlets), transporte de la fraternité universelle à la fraternité de la famille. On voit que le valet de plume use libéralement du droit de citation.

DÉMOCRITE.

NOTE 5.

On sait que nos frères, les prolétaires anglais, ont organisé la grève universelle, et qu'ils refusent de travailler pour le compte des Seigneurs du Capital. Voilà l'occasion belle pour Rothschild 1^er^ d'intervenir auprès de ses grands vassaux britanniques, et de montrer dans quel sens il a entendu les belles paroles du Croyant. Id.

NOTE 6.

Exténuez-vous à imprimer des myriades de volumes pour éclairer l'opinion publique, qui ne manquera jamais, en un besoin, de perdre de vue des faits comme ceux-ci : l'empereur Napoléon, — non la Convention, — est l'émancipateur des Juifs. Le peuple élu, « ..... Ce peuple obscur, imbécille et volage,

« Amateur insensé de superstitions,
« Vaincu par ses voisins, rampant dans l'esclavage, « Et l'éternel mépris des autres nations.. »

le peuple élu, disais-je, qui a toujours été ingrat envers son Dieu comme envers son prochain, n'a eu rien de plus pressé que de se mettre à la tête des accapareurs de subsistances, qui faisaient trembler l'Empereur, et qui ont fait avorter cette fameuse campagne de Russie, en retardant l'expédition de six semaines ; indè les désastres de la France et la chute du bienfaiteur des Juifs.

Satan dernier va jusqu'à dire, dans Rothschild Ier, ses valets et son peuple, que la maison Rothschild était à la tête de ces infâmes vautours mercantiles qui ont déterminé l'accaparement, et par suite la chute de Napoléon,— à qui Dieu pardonne de n'avoir pas continué ses relations avec Charles Fourier. On ne voit que des traits pareils dans l'histoire des Juifs. Et puis étonnez-vous, après cela, que la persécution politique ou religieuse les laisse dans la fange du mépris, ne soit pas pour eux un germe d'ennoblissement, comme elle l'a toujours été, par exemple, pour les Grecs modernes, les Polonais et les chrétiens. JUNIUS.

NOTE 7.

C'est le Journal des Débats qui a fait cette merveilleuse découverte, et l'a communiquée au public avec une naïveté qui n'est pas de l'Epoque, vous pouvez en être certain. J.

NOTE 8.

Voyez plutôt la Fausse industrie de Charles Fourier, qui établit que le commerce anarchique des classes moyennes et parasites extorque aux consommateurs et aux producteurs un impôt annuel de plusieurs milliards. J.

NOTE 9.

Que les classes laborieuses se tiennent pour dûment averties qu'elles paient les œufs trois sous et la viande moyenne seize sous, quand il convient aux accapareurs de la féodalité mercantile de faire la hausse sur les denrées de première nécessité. Vous verrez qu'ils seront bientôt les maîtres de l'hygiène publique, et qu'ils pourront, à leur gré, crétiniser, abougrir, voire, affamer en détail un peuple qui voudrait se remuer.—C'est à l'occasion de ces manœuvres d'accaparement que Nos Seigneurs du Trafic se permettent de retarder le service des dépêches, ce qui peut contituer le crime de lèse-crédit privé. — Oh ! si Louis-Philippe, ce prince que l'on dit perspicace, avait pu apercevoir les conséquences politiques de ce formidable pouvoir que l'on appelle le monopole des transports ! — A la première occasion des détails circonstanciés par des hommes spéciaux. J.

NOTE 10.

O Suzeraineté financière ! tu t'intronises sous de tristes auspices, si tu as besoin pour subsister de violer les lois aux dépens de la sûreté publique. Après tout, le Roi des Juifs pourra se vanter d'être le plus pacifique des conquérants, s'il se contente d'une trentaine de cadavres, par ci par là, pour marcher à la domination universelle. C'est débuter modestement en exercice du monopole de la vie humaine. Quelle est la royauté politique ou militaire qui pourrait en dire autant ! Au reste, on n'oserait penser que cet homme a pu considérer la catastrophe du chemin du Nord comme un moyen de gagner des millions, par exemple, en dissimulant l'horrible nouvelle pour vendre ses actions au pair, et en la publiant après coup pour les racheter en baisse. Au moins a-t-il dû la regarder comme inévitable; puisqn'il a violenté les ingénieurs pour obtenir livraison du chemin prématurément. Il y a plus, des hommes spéciaux, QUI SONT AUX ORDRES DE LA JUSTICE, assurent que les commissaires royaux préposés par la loi pour veiller à la sûreté publique, n'ont pas même la liberté de dresser procès-verbal du mauvais état des locomotives et des rails, quand il y a lieu. Donc la catastrophe d'hier se reproduira demain, après demain, et périodiquement, ce qui sera une source intarissable de bénéfices pour les Suzerains de la Spéculation et de désolation pour les familles, ainsi que le dit avec raison Satan dernier. Si l'enquête judiciaire vient à constater ces faits odieux, il n'y a plus qu'à courir sus aux Juifs et les traîner en cour d'assises pour crime de cruauté spéculative; ou mieux, d'interdire la circulation par voies de fer, et contraindre les pouvoirs à les faire exproprier par l'Etat pour cause de sûreté publique. — Mais les victimes sauront que Junius et consorts, ces Rapporteurs impartiaux de l'Opinion, auront leur cent yeux ouverts sur la stricte exécution de la loi.—Nous comptons bien que les journaux démocrates et socialistes, la Réforme, le National, la Démocratie, l'Alliance, la Quotidienne, la Revue indépendante, la Phalange, la Revue sociale, le Populaire, l'Atelier, la Fraternité, le Bien Public, et nombre d'autres feuilles courageuses de France et de l'étranger, joindront leurs voix à la nôtre pour donner du cœur à la magistrature chargée de l'information sur l'odieuse spéculation qui a amené la catastrophe de Fampoux. Si, par impossible, la presse non vendue reculait devant le devoir, nous aurions à gémir sur la dégradation de l'Epoque, et nous nous écrierions avec le poëte :

Hæc fierint, si testiculi vena ulla paterni viveret in nobis!

— Nous désirons, pour l'honneur de la royauté juive, qu'elle puisse se laver de l'accusation ; nous n'en déplorerions pas moins la mystérieuse fatalité qui subordonne le développement de cette colossale fortune à l'importance de nos malheurs publics. Il faut que les Français gravent dans leur cœur ces trois termes néfastes de la puissance juive : 1815, — Waterloo, — Fampoux! — Au reste, il faut bien le dire, — puisque j'ai promis d'être impartial, — c'est une grande et une très-grande question de savoir si nous faisons de notre mieux, nous autres pamphlétaires, dramaturges, satiriques, feuilletonistes, etc., en lançant les flammes de notre sainte colère sur les individualités malfaisantes qui éclosent périodiquement au souffle impur de notre fausse civilisation. J'incline à croire que nous tous tant que nous sommes et nos illustres devanciers, Timon l'Ancien, Phocion, Socrate, Félix Pyat, Toussenel, Karr, etc., nous avancerions plus vite en besogne de réformation, si nous nous en prenions plus souvent au mal, c'est-à-dire aux causes du mal, aux mauvais principes, aux fausses doctrines, aux institutions rétrogrades qui détériorent et pervertissent les individus. Vouloir chercher des types de moralité dans la société civilisée, c'est absolument comme si vous demandiez à l'Académie d'aller chercher des traits de probité parmi les forçats, ou des traits de vertu dans les mauvais lieux ; ou bien encore comme si vous demandiez au médecin du dévouement à l'hygiène publique, ou à M. l'avocat du roi des plans de réformation morale en faveur des criminels.

CHARONDAS.

NOTE 11.

Lisez la Critique, se disant journal du grand monde ; elle nous apprend que Rothschild Ier est plus que grand homme, ce qui doit signifier qu'il faudra bientôt le mettre à la place de Dieu ; d'où il suit que le père suprême Enfantin sera maintenu dans le grade de vice-dieu, qu'il n'avait abdiqué que temporairement.

DÉMOCRITE.

NOTE 12.

Il est aisé de concevoir que les trois à quatre milliards annuellement enlevés aux consommateurs et producteurs par le vautour commercial que poursuivent les hirondelles et les passereaux coalisés de la maison Rothschild ; ces trois à quatre milliards annuels rentreront, en partie, dans..... les coffres de Rothschild Ier, par le simple effet de l'organisation intelligente du monopole saint-simonien.

J.

NOTE 13.

Les choses se passent absolument comme au temps de la féodalité. A la première velléité d'une émission d'emprunt, on convoque les grands vassaux de la finance; ceux-ci en confèrent avec les comtes et les barons de la Bourse, lesquels, à leur tour, s'entendent avec les seigneurs de la spéculation, jusques et y compris les simples chevaliers de l'agiotage. Tous, couverts de pied en cap du crédit des grands vassaux, ils défont, dans une série de combats dont les agents de change sont les hérauts, les malheureux Gaulois de la Bourse, dont, nouveaux Francs, ils ont fait la conquête... La féodalité existe aujourd'hui, non-seulement dans la finance, qui est l'âme de tout, mais elle a pénétré partout, elle a soufflé son esprit hiérarchique jusque parmi les individus qui exercent la même profession.

(GRATIEN de Semur, Erreurs et Préjugés.)

NOTE 14.

Allez donc, après une pareille prophétie, dire que les gouvernements pourraient s'entendre, fût-ce au moyen d'un appel au peuple, qu'ils ont trompé, pour racheter, comme celui de Belgique, le monopole universel des transports, de la banque, des assurances, etc. Essayez de faire croire ces extravagances à MM. les rabbins talmudistes, qui voient toutes les prophéties bibliques se réaliser à la lettre depuis quelque trois mille ans, et qui savent, de science certaine, que leur Messie politique, le libérateur des rois de l'Epoque et des nationalités opprimées, sortira de l'illustre Maison Rothschild. Allez, sublimes esprits, retournez sur les bancs méditer cette parole évangélique : « Les premiers seront les derniers, et les DERNIERS seront les PREMIERS. » — Et puis enfin, que voulez-vous que fassent des pouvoirs qui ont subi la munificence de leur suzerain, en acceptant qui des 10,000, qui des 15,000, qui des 30,000 actions de chemins de fer ! ! ! J.

NOTE 15.

Et n'allez pas crier à la calomnie ! Le roi des Juifs n'est pas assez naïf, vous le savez, pour stipuler dans ses contrats un intérêt annuel de 80 pour 100 ; mais il intéressera des personnages influents à des combinaisons d'usure indirecte si ingénieuses, à des manœuvres si savantes, qu'il arrivera, en quarante ans, à faire produire un intérêt de HUIT CENTS MILLIONS (nombres ronds), à la minime somme de 60 millions qu'il a prêtés à l'Etat pour monter le matériel du chemin de fer du Nord.—C'est entendre la multiplication des espèces un peu plus habilement que les exécuteurs testamentaires du Juif errant. — Si vous en doutez, voyez les preuves détaillées dans le livre de Toussenel qui a pour titre : les Juifs, rois de l'époque, etc., et dites après cela s'il n'y a pas félonie, complicité en trahison financière, dans le fait de ceux qui osent inféoder à un juif le produit des sueurs de trente millions de Français dont le lendemain n'est pas assuré.

NOTE 19.

On assure que nous n'avons pas le dernier mot des anciens chefs saint-simoniens dont s'est prudemment entouré Rothschild Ier. Un ouvrier fouriériste, qui a suivi toutes les phases de la société saint-simonienne, assure avoir entendu un saint-simonien très-influent dire tout haut, avant de partir pour l'Egypte : Aujourd'hui il n'y a plus qu'à mettre à l'étude la théorie industrielle de Charles Fourier. Il est vrai qu'il avait promis de le faire dans les derniers numéros de son journal, que des circonstances regrettables l'ont obligé de supprimer. Aujourd'hui qu'il est entré en partage de l'influence sociale, il ne perdra pas de vue que noblesse intellectuelle oblige, aussi bien que l'autre noblesse, et que son ancien adepte, Junius l'industriel, à qui il a révélé sa verve satirique, s'attacherait, sentinelle vigilante, à tous les mouvements rétrogrades, pour les dénoncer au tribunal de l'Opinion.

NOTE 20.

Voyez surtout Fausse Industrie, 1er vol., pag. 30 et suiv.

NOTE 21.

Ajoutons à cette liste Andrieux le paysan, et Béranger l'horloger, deux éloquents pamphlétaires, deux hommes admirables, dont tout le tort est d'être vivants, et qui auront peut-être, comme Claude Tillier, l'insigne honneur d'être imprimés avec préface laudative et critique, quand ils seront in manus..... ce qui est encore une consolation. En attendant, la littérature civilisée les laisse, eux aussi, s'user à corriger des thèmes et à faire des rhabillages de montre, ou quelque chose de pis. — Je vous le répéterai, Nos Seigneurs de la presse, il est beau de rendre justice aux morts, il est plus beau de rendre justice aux vivants.

NOTE 22.

Bon mot, extrait de la biographie publiée sous les auspices de la Maison Rothschild. Pour plus de renseignements, relisez l'Histoire édifiante et curieuse de Rothschild Ier.

NOTE 23.

Réjouissez-vous, sujets du grand roi des Juifs, pleurez de joie, Anglais, Prussiens, Autrichiens, car un grand événement s'est passé dans le monde, quoique inaperçu. L'autocrate de toutes les Russies, mouche vigilante qui n'avait pas encore secoué la toile des araignées financières, a fait enfin son apparition sur l'inextricable tissu, sous le prétexte de faire incognito une visite d'amitié à S. M. Victoria, qui est, elle aussi, enchevêtrée à perpétuité dans le réseau. — On sait qu'il a été assez osé pour faire des ouvertures à des compagnies banquières de second ordre, et que les grands vassaux du suzerain de la finance ont eu le crédit de faire repousser les propositions de Nicolas. — Le féroce autocrate a reçu là une leçon sévère ; et comme on ne recule que pour mieux sauter quand on est engagé dans la voie industrielle, nous apprendrons, au premier jour, la soumission de l'empereur de toutes les Russies qui viendra mettre en gage, dans les mains du roi des rois de l'Epoque, ses soixante millions de serfs et sujets russes, polonais, valaques, caucasiens, etc., etc., etc. Ce sera alors que S. M. Röthschild Ier sera proclamée omniarque du globe à Constantinople, sous le pseudonyme de Nicolas Ier.

P. S. Au moment de mettre sous presse, nous apprenons que S. M. I. entreprend de regimber contre la suzeraineté juive, en rendant un oukase très-progressif, je vous assure, lequel condamne les quatre-vingt-dix-neuf-centièmes des israélites à embrasser des professions honorables et productives, telles que l'agriculture, la fabrique, etc. Bravo ! Nicolas ; Charles Fourier n'aurait pas fait mieux pour moraliser le peuple élu ; ce sera un temps d'arrêt pour la féodalité usurière et trafiquante. Nous souhaitons de grand cœur que S. M. I. puisse achever ses grands travaux publics sans avoir à subir les fourches caudines des traitants. Qui vivra verra. J.

NOTE 24.

On sait que les Chambres ont voté, il y a déjà deux ans, des fonds pour l'amélioration de la basse Seine. Le Ministre des travaux publics n'a pas encore osé ordonnancer cette dépense de peur de nuire à la compagnie du chemin de Rouen, laquelle se trouve en concurrence avec la voie fluviale. — Il y a huit jours que le tribunal de Versailles condamnait ladite compagnie à 192,000 francs de dommages-intérêts envers les compagnies de la Seine pour délit d'infractions aux tarifs qui lui ont été imposés. Honneur à la Magistrature, la dernière sauvegarde des libertés du pays ! J.

NOTE FINALE.

Il va sans dire, ou le conçoit de reste, que nous excepterions de l'anathème les néo-israélites d'outre-Rhin et d'outre-Manche, qui subissent la dure persécution financière du roi des Juifs et de ses grands vassaux, parce qu'ils repoussent la coutume, aujourd'hui barbare, de la circoncision. Disons bien haut, après la Démocratie, que ces néo-juifs, ces hommes de progrès, ces modèles d'urbanité, de loyauté, sont destinés à jouer un rôle important dans le mouvement intellectuel et social, qui se développe parallèlement avec le mouvement transitoire dont la féodalité juive et saint-simonienne a la haute direction. JUNIUS.

N. B. Les lettres et renseignements que le public désirerait faire tenir sur la catastrophe de Fampoux et autres opérations des rois de la banque, seront reçus franco chez M. Benjamin, rue Montesquieu, 7, à Paris.

FIVE MEN OF FRANKFORT

CHAPTER I

JEW MEYER, CURIO DEALER

ON a spring day in the year 1764 a young man was seen going up the narrow, cobble-stoned Jews'-Street of Frankfort-on-the-Main. Tradesmen and market women paused in their bargaining to glance at him, but did not recognize him. Tall and spare, with marked Semitic features, a short, pointed black beard, and a rabbinical stoop in the shoulders, he was clearly a son of the Ghetto. A certain good-humored look around the eyes and mouth suggested something familiar about him, and from the unhesitating manner in which he walked straight on before him he seemed to be at home in the teeming street. He had entered by the south end, the one nearest the center of town, and was proceeding steadily northward in the direction of the Bornheimer Gate, which was the poorer section of the Judengasse. Not far from the gate he turned right, halted before a house which had a sign with a crudely painted saucepan on it, and disappeared into the yard. Then only, the curious who had been watching him from their doorways remembered. Why, it was Meyer, "the little Bauer," the son of Amschel and Schoenche, the unfortunate couple who had died within a few months of each other now more than eight years ago, leaving five young children homeless, parentless and with barely enough means for their rearing.

The young man's unheralded turning up reminded the neighbors of the sad episode. Meyer must now be just about twenty. When his father passed away in the High Holiday season of '55 the boy, then a little over eleven, was at school in the Yeshivah of Fuerth near Nuremberg. Poor Amschel had been ambitious for his bright first-born son, and had sent him up to the Talmudical college to make a learned man of him, perhaps even a rabbi. The boy was taking hold finely when the sudden death of first one parent and then the other had forced him, child though he still was, to go out into the world to earn his bread. His two older sisters and his two younger brothers scattered among friends and kin, in Frankfort and out. Meyer was taken in by relatives in Hanover, who secured employment for him in the great Jewish mercantile and banking house of Oppenheim in that city. In Hanover he had remained all these eight years, while the two smaller boys, Moses and Kalmann, after a meager schooling in the Jewish communal school of Frankfort and an apprenticeship in a Judengasse shop, had gone back to the ancestral home, the back-yard house at the sign of the Saucepan, to set up in trade for themselves. And now their elder brother was evidently coming back to join them. Their sympathetic neighbors wished them well. It entered no one's head that this quiet return of an unknown Jewish youth to his native street was the prelude to the most spectacular chapter in the financial history of Europe.

II

Among the boys of the Ghetto before he went to Fuerth Meyer had been nicknamed "das Baeuerchen." Now he was a grown man with a beard and a shop of his own, his former playmates dropped the diminutive ending and Meyer, like his father and his grandfathers for generations came to be known as Bauer. He had no notion why his people were called that way. The word meant "peasant," and generally those who were tagged with it were ambulant traders who bought and sold among the village folk. But his father and also his grandfather had kept shops in the Judengasse and both had been money changers in a small way. Some remoter ancestor, then, had been the man with the pack. In any event "Bauer" was obviously a trade by-name, just as "Rothschild," the other designation of the family, must have come from the house with the red sign down the street. As legal names neither had any standing. Jews were not allowed the privilege and managed somehow to get on without it.

As a boy Meyer had sometimes gone with his mother to the old Jewish cemetery during the month of Elul to pay homage to the dead, and while his parent knelt and prayed at the graves he amused himself with spelling out the Hebrew names on the tombstones. A bright youngster with a taste for such things, it had not taken him long to reconstruct the family descent. At first the absence of a uniform name had stumped him a little, but the Jewish practice of giving the name of the dead man's father was helpful. Seven generations, stretching back some two hundred years, he had thus contrived to identify. Then the thread broke off, or possibly his remoter forebears had laid their bones elsewhere. The earliest of his fathers was one Elchanan, who had died in 1546. In those far-off days the family must have been much more important and prosperous than it was now; for Isak, the son of Elchanan, had built the big house with the red sign in the more fashionable southerly end of the Judengasse. But fortune did not smile on the family for long. Two generations later there was a marked decline. Isak's grandson Naftali Hirz had sold, or lost, the ancestral home, and had been obliged to move to the humble quarters in the rear of the Saucepan, where his descendants had continued ever since. Things dropped still another peg with Kalmann, in the next generation; it was he who was the first "Bauer;" and though there had been some slight upward movement since, the family had never again lifted itself to the level of old Isak.

On the whole, the Bauer-Rothschilds had been successful people. If none of them had ever amassed great wealth, neither had they quite sunk to poverty. Through all the ups and downs of two centuries they had remained independent merchants of the middle grade. Many of their neighbors, it was true, had soared away beyond them in riches and importance, but then equally as many had fallen below them. They had kept an even, if modest, tenor throughout. No scion of the Saucepan or of the Red Sign had even become a leader in the Ghetto, or intermarried with its first families, or got a foothold in the princely courts of the region; but on the other hand, none had ever fallen back into the classes that worked with their hands. Neither scholars nor rabbis nor great merchants distinguished the family. Plain, pious, substantial tradesmen, without influence or pretensions, sometimes more prosperous, sometimes less—thus they had begun and thus they seemed destined to continue. Their fortunes were perhaps as low now as they had ever been. The sudden death of poor Amschel, before he had reached his full powers or provided for his dependents, had left his estate in chaos. It was for his sons to restore it to order.

Meyer's younger brothers, Moses and Kalmann, had been apprenticed to a second-hand dealer, and naturally when they launched out for themselves they followed the trade they knew best. They were already established when Meyer came back. He took on the business with a sinking of the heart. This was not at all what he had looked forward to. A litter of retired garments and superannuated household goods, dust and disorder, noisy bargaining with the poorest and humblest of the Ghetto, he had neither taste nor training for such commerce. For eight years he had longed and prayed to be home again, to be independent, and to see his own flesh and blood. Here they were, those little brothers whom he had idealized from far away, grimy, disheveled, rough men, rummaging in junk, vociferous in the jargon of the Ghetto. The scene shocked him. What a climb-down this was even from his father's shop, as he remembered it! To be sure, the money-changing on which his parent used to pride himself so had been more decorative than real. But the shop at least was trim and clean, with its neat cloth-shelves, its pleasant odor of tea and tobacco and wine, its solid custom. Unreasonably he had expected to find things the way he had left them, as if nothing had happened since he went away.

Indeed, his homesick imagination had played tricks on him and had led him to expect much more. In the English-owned city of Hanover Jews were so much freer, business was so much less hobbled, that he had almost forgot what the Frankfort Judengasse looked like, and had come to fancy it in Hanoverian colors. The House of Oppenheim, though his own functions in it were lowly enough, was a great export and banking firm. It occupied a dignified building. Its personnel, down to the humblest clerk, were decently dressed and well-groomed. Its business was for the most part with merchants, German and English and Dutch. Very little merchandise was actually handled on the premises; nearly all the trading was done with pen and paper. Yet he had thrown up that paradise and had come back here, because Frankfort was accounted the greater center, almost the leading commercial city of the Continent. He was horribly disillusioned.

It was some time before he could adjust himself and see a way of coöperating with his brothers. No team had ever been recruited out of material so ill-assorted. Their schooling, their ideas of business, their training, their very speech, were poles apart. He had come home with a vague idea of setting up an Oppenheim's of his own in Frankfort. That firm had also started with three brothers and had come up from small beginnings. But now he took stock of his resources and was profoundly discouraged. How was he even to make a start without capital or credit or connections and, what was worst, with such hopelessly crude assistance? When he came right down to it, moreover, his own knowledge and experience were distressingly limited. He made himself no illusions on that score. Held down by his Hanover employers, he had barely got a smattering of the more vital phases of the business. He knew all but nothing of banking or the commission trade. His eight years of service had only taught him how complex the affairs of a great concern were, how involved was their technique, how vast were their capital and credit requirements. Of the general conduct of the house he had not even got a glimpse. Only toward the end he had been allowed to stand at what might be called a responsible counter, and then it had been the rare coin department, the most negligible of the firm's specialties. It had no more real bearing on his ambition than a beard and earlocks had on the rabbinate. What he had dreamed of was that his brothers would second him with at least as much training as he had. But alas! These raw old clo' men, with the speech, the manners, and the outward refinements of junk dealers!

IV

He went to work patiently to make the best of a bad situation. It was no good complaining. His brothers were not to blame: they were what circumstances had made them. Happily they and he were young men, and with energy and persistence the bad turn that fortune had played them might yet be repaired. For the moment common sense as well as necessity dictated but one course: to go along with their simple resources, work hard, not force things and keep an eye on the future. Moses and Kalmann had, after all, done the sensible thing when they had gone into a business that they knew. Meyer decided to do like them. He understood rare coins and allied trinkets—medals, curios, old jewelry, and a little of antiques generally. Very well, he would start with that. When all was said, the two trades—his brothers' and his—were not so very far apart really. Curios and antiques were in fact nothing but a sort of gilded junk. There was not much more than a step from one to the other; he would groom his brothers to bridge it. At present they bought up the contents of Ghetto homes; they must gradually take to going out into the city and do the same with burghers' villas and the mansions of the gentry. Men who could appraise pine tables and earthenware dishes would learn readily enough to judge mahogany cabinets and feather-beds. No doubt, the city clientele would find Moses and Kalmann a bit unpresentable. Well then, he, Meyer, would do the talking, not only for the pictures and heirlooms and fine pieces but for the entire collections; the younger men would be coming along merely as his experts for the plainer things.

The plan, on being tried out, worked better than Meyer had hoped. The two trades dovetailed admirably. Householders in town who wished to sell out preferred to dispose of their goods to a single buyer; and the richer class of Ghetto dwellers, hearing that the rear-shop at the Saucepan dealt in high-grade stuff, soon crowded out the humbler custom. Meyer's presentiments, also, that the noble purchasers of his rare coins and medals would mix badly with his brothers' clients, proved groundless. For as experience showed, gentlemen rarely went bargain-hunting in the shops; they expected the dealer to keep them informed thru bulletins and to bring his wares to their homes.

The brothers thus found themselves running two separate businesses. Moses and Kalmann still operated a Judengasse shop, except that the quality of both goods and custom were greatly improved. Meyer, however, was seldom about. His velvet-lined case filled with quaint jewels, old gold and silver medals, rare coins and kindred objects, he spent the better part of his time on the stage coaches between Frankfort and near-by places, following up inquiries elicited by his catalogues. The Saucepan shop with its living quarters in the back served him merely as a base and an address. A small display near the entrance, alone informed callers that the firm had interests of a nobler sort. Traveling about, too, enabled Meyer to keep abreast of sales, not only of the genteel and costly objects for his own trade but of the mundaner ones for his brothers as well. And as the younger men by degrees acquired an understanding of coins and curios, Meyer likewise learned to judge and evaluate house-contents, so that in time he became the exclusive buyer, while his brothers gave their whole attention to the inside trade.

Twice a year Frankfort had a great fair, which brought together merchants and holiday makers, Gentile as well as Jewish, from all parts of the empire. All these strangers had money to spend, and most of them had drafts or currency to exchange. For though nominally one country, Germany was at this time a riot of independent kingdoms, dukedoms, principalities, so-called free cities and every other species of petty state, vaguely held together by a common language and tradition, theoretically united under the decayed Holy Roman Empire (which was neither Holy nor Roman nor an empire) and in fact chronically at war with one another. The political confusion expressed itself in a tangle of frontiers, restrictions on travel and trade, and a chaos of monetary units. Each princeling possessed, and most of them exercised, the right to coin his own money, which his neighbor felt free to, and usually did, declare unacceptable. Thalers of half a dozen different weights and values, as many kinds of florins, ducats, carolins and what not circulated in their respective and very narrow domains; and a merchant or a traveler going half-a-day's journey from home must convert his money into the legal tender of the "foreign" land in which he had arrived before he could have his lunch. In this state of things nearly every tradesman was a money-changer on the side. The larger the business, the bigger the "Wechselstube." Virtually all the bankers of the period began as merchants in goods, developing the two businesses simultaneously, and rarely divorcing the one from the other till half a century or more later.

The Frankfort fairs and the currency chaos and German disunity were not lost on Meyer. A smattering of finance he had brought with him from Hanover, capital was accumulating in his till, and customers from out of town were being turned away by his brothers at the shop for lack of local cash. So he hung out a "Wechselstube" shingle and initiated his partners in the mysteries of exchange and note discounting. Sooner than he had hoped on the day of his return home, the business began taking on the aspect of his late father's establishment. In the curio shop back of the Saucepan was laid the first stone of the banking house of Rothschild.

On taking their first annual inventory Moses and Kalmann discovered, what they had long suspected, that their elder brother's combination was pretty largely decorative. The firm was kept going and thriving, not by the art and the antiquities, but by the lowly traffic with the inhabitants of the Ghetto. They did not complain; they were aware of the value of prestige; but they did submit the question to Meyer whether this commodity might not come a little too high. All told their balance sheet showed a net profit of some five thousand florins (about two thousand dollars) for the year, of which four-fifths had been yielded by the shop and no small fraction of the remainder by exchange operations. Considering that Meyer knew as much now as his brothers about the main business, and that the "Wechselstube" was his creation, would it not be at once more profitable and less laborious if he were to give up most of his traveling and devote his energies to the shop and the bank? What with his ability as a buyer, the connections he had established in the country around and the expansion of the exchange department, the business could easily double its earnings next year. Why not let the genteel trade go hang?

But Meyer was looking to the future, and there were aspects of the rare coin and medal business which his young partners overlooked. It was not merely immediate prestige he was thinking of; he was investing in a career for the years to come. Thus far he had made barely more than a start; the clientele he had gained was among the minor gentry only. But things were coming along nicely, and it would not be long before he planted a foot in the châteaus and palaces of the sovereign princes themselves. Within fifty miles of Frankfort lay half a dozen reigning courts, and each little monarch whiled away his boredom by collecting one thing or another. There was Hanau, just a stone's throw away, and Cassel and Darmstadt and Weimar, and a number of others. He was even now sending them his catalogues; on some of them he had already called in person; at Hanau he was in touch with a courtier or two; soon the doors were bound to open. And then,—ah, then affairs would turn a corner and no mistake.

For selling curios to princes was no more than an entering wedge. Certainly no one got rich by selling anything to the highnesses. Yet every big Jew in the southerly end of the Judengasse, in Hanover and elsewhere had got his start as a court purveyor. For one thing, the Ghetto looked up to the court Jew; it saw in him a superior and cleverer member of the tribe, a man who shone in the reflected glamour of his prince. Moreover, his entrée to the seat of power made him a privileged person. He enjoyed the rights and exemptions almost of a Gentile. Functionaries treated him with deference; he could travel freely, trade without restrictions, marry and give in marriage with little regard to the law which limited Jewish unions to a stated annual number; in short, he was hardly a Jew at all, as far as disabilities went. Not only that; there was money in the high windows. The pettiest of the sovereigns had estates to manage, taxes to farm out, forests and mines and landed properties to exploit. They might not like the Jewish religion, but they had confidence in the Jew's honesty and ability. Nearly all of them had investments abroad, and the dividends on these must be collected and converted into the coin of the realm. When they were in funds they bought luxuries at high prices; and when they were financially embarrassed, they borrowed and paid interest. A Jew with a foot in the right kind of a court had little to worry about.

In June, 1765, little more than a year since his return, it looked indeed as if the opening for which Meyer had been longing had come. A windfall in the shape of a particularly choice collection of old coins fell into his hands; he hurriedly got out a special descriptive catalogue and sent it off to a select list of personages, big nobles and sovereigns to whom he had as yet gained no access. To his boundless delight he got replies from the Duke of Weimar (the celebrated patron of the poet Goethe), from the wealthy and powerful Prince Thurn und Taxis, the postal magnate residing at Frankfort, and from a General Estorff, a former client of his department in Hanover but now in the entourage of the little court at Hanau. Meyer attached especial value to this latter inquiry; he hoped that Estorff was writing not in his own behalf but in that of his master, the reigning count of the tiny dominion. A connection at that little court was, for any number of reasons, about the most desirable thing he could think of. For one thing, and by no means an unimportant one in those days of stage-coach travel, Hanau was the nearest sovereign capital to Frankfort. The young count, moreover, was a rare specimen of the genus princeling. Wealthy in his own right, thrifty, and with a head for business, he had a goodly sum invested in English government stock (his mother being a daughter of King George II) the interest on which came to him every quarter and afforded a profitable operation for some lucky money-changer. Lastly, he was the son and heir of the aging Landgrave Frederick of Hesse-Cassel, and would one of these days govern that very considerable principality as well as possess the immense fortune his father was said to have amassed.

So Meyer packed his case with the finest specimens out of his newly-acquired collection and journeyed hopefully to Hanau, and the young Count William noted a few days later in his books: "To Jew Mayer, for medals, 38 florins, 30 kreutzers." Not as big a transaction as Meyer had looked forward to—in fact, the profit would barely pay his stage fare—but a beginning all the same. And highness must have been pleased, for he sent out word that the dealer was to call again; which Meyer did without waiting to be asked twice. Later endeavors, however, were rewarded with similarly meager purchases. William's business head was functioning much too efficiently for comfort; it knew precisely what it wanted, appraised values with the closeness of a Judengasse tradesman, and rarely let itself go. But Meyer was a man of patience, and bided his time. Presently his oft-repeated petitions to be given a chance at the English dividend-drafts were granted. His hopes whispered in Estorff's ear, he dropped a hint to one or two other courtiers whom he got to know—highness himself being invisible, of course—about his ambitions. Nothing happened; four years passed, and beyond an occasional sale and now and then a small English draft, nothing whatever happened. The gentlemen at court were friendly; they found "Jew Mayer" a likable if slightly ineffectual tradesman. But there were more hard-hitting Jews after the business, and Meyer had better not be discouraged.

VI

One rich prize he did carry off from his court dealings. The moment he got his foot inside he began begging for a bit of a title. In eighteenth-century Germany men did not modestly sit about for honors to come to them; they pulled strings, and at need asked for them outright. What was the good of being a court-Jew, however diminutive the highness and insignificant the services, unless one's friends, neighbors and competitors could be made to see the distinction on one's shop sign, catalogues and the like? Glory aside, moreover, having one's palace connections bodied forth in some visible form was equivalent to a permanent passport and spared one annoyance at the hands of frontier guards and officials. Meyer, therefore, sought the aid of the friendly courtiers at Hanau, at Weimar, at all the courts where he made a sale, and on being told that a direct application to the sovereign lord was required by etiquette, he sat down and flourished off a letter to his noble patrons. It ran thus:

"It has been my particular and high good fortune to serve your lofty princely Serenity at various times and to your most gracious satisfaction. I stand ready to exert all my energies and my entire fortune to serve your lofty princely Serenity whenever in future it shall please you to command me. An especially powerful incentive to this end would be given me if your lofty princely Serenity were to distinguish me with an appointment as one of your Highness's Court Factors. I am making bold to beg for this with the more confidence in the assurance that by so doing I am not giving any trouble; while for my part such distinction would lift up my commercial standing and be of help to me in so many other ways that I feel sure thereby to make my way and fortune here in the city of Frankfort."

It was a form letter, and went broadcast to wherever it was likely to do good. Meyer rather believed and hoped that, with his reputation for munificence, it would be the Duke of Weimar that would grant his wish. Hanau might be richer in prospects and more conveniently located, but Weimar was a bigger palace and its badge would carry more weight. But the Duke's eye noted the faulty grammar and the little Jewish touches that all Meyer's efforts could not prevent from creeping into the German, and did not reply; while the business-minded young monarch at Hanau considered that, as Meyer had naïvely blurted out, a humble title was a rather inexpensive way of buying the good will of a tradesman who might be grateful enough to shave down the note discount rate and the prices of medals in future deals. In any event, William graciously complied; and on the first day of autumn 1769, the Judengasse beheld a new sign hanging over the house at the Saucepan bearing the arms of Hesse-Hanau and underneath, in gilt letters, the German equivalent of "By Appointment." And Meyer invested in a wig and pig-tail, donned a three-cornered hat and pinned a lace-jabot under his coat-front.

It was not precisely a title of nobility, but the effect of it—on Meyer, on his brothers and on the community—was tremendous. The young men themselves saw in the portentous event so sure an earnest of greater things to come that they at once began negotiations for purchasing a fraction of the building in which their home and business was housed, and two months later actually acquired a modest quarter-share. Neighbors, friends and business associates were profoundly impressed, and came around to offer congratulations and assurances of future success. The Judengasse match-makers saw the light, and became active. Fathers (and especially mothers) with marriageable daughters, not all of them in the northerly half of the street either, took notice. Not only Meyer but his brothers also shone in the blinding halo. Matrimonial offers of an incredibly flattering nature were brought to Moses and even to the youthful Kalmann, to say nothing of their distinguished elder brother. Wolf, son of Salomon, known by the by-name Schnapper, a solid merchant with a thriving shop near the southerly gate, thinking better of Meyer's long-standing attentions to his pretty seventeen-year-old Guetele, consented to the betrothal, and the wedding was celebrated before the summer was over. Shortly after it was the turn of Moses. The good people of the Ghetto stepped along. It was not every day young men of the street became recognized court purveyors. Whatever their past, the Rothschild-Bauer boys had a future. It was as well to snap them up before they got too big.

Meyer led his bride back to the bachelor quarters behind the shop, and there Guetele kept house for her husband and her rapidly increasing family for sixteen years. Within the year their first child was born, a girl who according to the pious Jewish custom was named Schoenche after Meyer's mother (presently to be changed to Jeanette). Then followed in quick succession three sons—Amschel (the future Anselm) so named in memory of Meyer's father, Salomon (the later head and founder of the Vienna banking house) and Nathan, the genius of the family and the architect of its greatness—and two more daughters, Belche (Isabella) and Breinliche (Babette). Not till Kalmann's death, in 1782, when Meyer was left in sole possession of the shop and its adjoining living quarters—Moses having withdrawn at the time of his marriage—did the young Rothschild have enough space to breathe in. It was not only that Meyer's affairs failed to keep pace with the growth of his progeny; the housing shortage in the rigidly circumscribed Jews'-Street was chronic. For ten years, by which time the family had increased to a half dozen, they must prepare meals and consume them, work and sleep and receive guests in those three rooms (counting the shop) which constituted the ground floor of the Saucepan rear-house; and after that all that Meyer could contrive to add was but a further eighth-share. Unless a family died out or emigrated (and that did not happen often) there was no leg-room to be had. Every inch of building ground in the Ghetto had been occupied a hundred years before Meyer was born.

But Meyer's affairs had begun to stagnate. The splendid promise of the year before his marriage remained unfulfilled. For nearly nine years the firm's income continued stationary, without Meyer's share rising above twenty-four hundred florins (less than a thousand dollars) annually. The shop held its own; the exchange counter spurted forward a bit; the coin and curio business declined decidedly. Was it Moses's defection and Kalmann's death that had sapped the concern's vitality? Doubtless Meyer was hampered for lack of his brothers' competent and reliable assistance. He had neither the energy nor the interest in the shop of his juniors. Still, the stagnation had set in before the separation. It seemed as if the firm had gone as far as it could, that it was running on as satisfactorily as it did on sheer momentum but would never make any further progress.

For Meyer's first choice of a calling was the right one. At heart a scholar, he had chanced to fall in with a business that tallied with his gift for learning. Rare coins, medals, heirlooms, curious jewels and antiques interested him quite apart from their commercial possibilities. He loved and fondled them, studied their histories and vicissitudes and could talk about them so interestingly that buyers were moved to share his enthusiasm. But he lacked utterly the instinct for gain, the cupidity, the pugnacity and the flair of the salesman. A mild, kindly, rather shy man, he took No for an answer too readily, was prone to be upset by rebuffs, hated competition and ran away from a fight. He would have made an admirable rabbi, and had he but had the connections he would have been a successful court Jew. Intelligence, honesty, administrative gifts, willingness to work, and the humility demanded by princes, he possessed in ample measure. Where he fell short was in the initial driving power. The humdrum trade he had inherited from his brothers wearied him. He drifted away from it gradually, and by the time his eldest boy had grown up the place back of the Saucepan had taken on the aspect it had borne away back in the days when Meyer was himself a child. The used articles had gone entirely. In their place had come wine and coffee, tea and tobacco, cloth and ready-made garments. The Wechselstube flourished, and although the sign with the arms of Hanau still hung outside, Meyer rarely went voyaging with his velvet-lined case.

Guetele was not unhappy at the change. A warm-hearted, cheerful, affectionate young Jewish woman of the old school, she took great pride in the scholarly tastes and attainments of her husband. She loved having him near her, particularly in the long winter evenings after the shop was closed and the children were asleep. Then Meyer would take down a tome of the Talmud, and while he hummed the sacred words she would sit beside him knitting or mending. Why strive and pursue after vain ambitions? They were better off than most people in the Judengasse. Meyer had started with empty hands, and here he was the owner of a thriving establishment—not certainly a bigwig in the Ghetto, but a substantial and respected merchant of the middle rank. Their children were bright and good and strong, a credit to their parents. What had they to worry about?

And then before their seventh child was born, the miracle happened: a family did move out of the Judengasse and Meyer bought an entire house for almost twelve thousand florins. It stood on the edge of the street, too, not in a court, about half way between the two gates. Four stories, a spacious shop, an enormous cellar under all, and ample elbow room, they were as comfortable as princes. In this house "At the Green Sign" (zum gruenen Schild) four more children were born to the couple, and though Guetele lived to see her sons richer than kings and the possessors of palaces in Frankfort itself and in several of the capitals of Europe she and Meyer spent here the remainder of their days.

There were times during these quiet idyllic years when Meyer, recalling the ambitions of his young manhood, grew restless and discontented. Slowly middle age was creeping up on him; his boys were growing up in the crude, untutored environment of the Judengasse. What were they going to turn into? Plain, humdrum tradesmen like himself, without even the meager schooling he had received away back in Fuerth. Frankfort, or at least the Jewish part of it, was all business, and he had not the means to remove them to some purer, loftier, more thoughtful atmosphere: there were too many of them.

Enough Hebrew for piety, a bit of commercial calculating, hardly enough German to write a respectable letter—it was all the Talmud Torah of the Ghetto had to offer. How far would they ever get with such an equipment? And what had become of his young dream to be the father of scholars? His efforts to supplement their teachers' instruction seemed to fall on stony ground. The boys had no taste for learning. Keen and alert at the exchange counter, their attention drooped over a page of Rashi, and a fine-spun casuistical argument from the Talmud put them to sleep. It was almost too late: the Frankfort Ghetto air had got into their bones.

At such times Meyer would shake himself out of his lethargy, fill his medal case after his family had retired for the night, and arising with the sun hop on the stage-coach and go haunting the palace gates of his neglected clients. It made him feel young and fiery again, to sniff the air of courts, to spread out his rare coins and curios, and discourse learnedly on the origin, the previous ownership and the strange destinies connected with each piece. He felt transported to a higher plane, to the world he belonged in. Now and then he would make a sale, and for a moment he would feel an inner excitement and resolve to throw up his cosy, stifling shop altogether and be on his travels once more. But he would return home wearier and more resigned than he had started. He had his escapade, had taken a draught of the stimulant he craved. But alas! there was no sustenance in it, and he was the father of ten children. To live and rear a family on the beloved trinkets was unthinkable; the great courtly business to which they were to open the way was a forlorn hope; it was useless.

The one prince from whom he once expected everything he had now cut from his itinerary altogether. Young William of Hanau was much too shrewd and trying a personage to do business with for Meyer's gentle temper. What vistas had not he opened up, away back in '69, when he so readily granted the title others had refused! But almost immediately disappointment had followed. For that sly serenity meant to be forever rewarded for his munificence. He expected dealers whom he had honored to sell him their goods at a loss, and he was not above having his courtiers say so outright. For the better part of twenty long years, therefore, Meyer had given Hanau a wide berth. And then, in 1785, William had succeeded to his father's throne in the somewhat distant seat at Cassel, and the once hopeful connection seemed broken for good.

And yet, had Meyer had the gift of looking into the future, he might have seen that his early vague intuition about Hanau was well-grounded, and that the young Landgrave was some day to make the fortune of his house. He had no such gift, and it was a long time before he could bring himself to approach the imposing palace on the Wilhemshoehe at Cassel.

CHAPTER II

PORTRAIT OF A PRINCE

NOTHING could have seemed more fantastic and preposterous, say about 1800, than that history would remember Landgrave William IX (later Elector William I) of Hesse-Cassel chiefly for his affairs with "Jew Mayer" and his sons. Meyer was an unknown tradesman of the Frankfort Ghetto, without antecedents or standing or prospects, the humblest petitioner at His Serenity's court; while William was one of the outstanding half-dozen reigning Princes of Germany, a hopeful candidate for the royal crown, and the richest man in Europe. Five centuries had travailed to produce his house, his name and his fortune. His family had been rulers since the middle ages; with him it was about to reach its highest pinnacle; a future, even more brilliant than the past, seemed to await his successors. Save for the imperial house of Hapsburg, there was scarcely a prince in the whole length and breadth of Germany who could venture to compare pedigrees with him. Son of Mary of England, he was a grandson of George II and a first cousin of George III; the king of Denmark was both his uncle and his father-in-law; Gustavus III of Sweden was his brother-in-law, and his son and heir was married to a daughter of Frederick William II of Prussia. To top it all, his enormous wealth, not all of which had come to him by inheritance, had made nearly every sovereign in Europe, from Britain to Russia, his debtor.

Good fortune had begun to attend him in advance of his birth. He was actually a younger son. But an ancient curse which had been pursuing the family for generations had carried off his elder brother in infancy and had assured him the succession. When he was still a child, an estrangement over religion between his father and his grandfather had made him the independent ruler of the principality of Hanau. As the heir of the considerable and strategically placed Landgravate of Hesse-Cassel and of the reputedly vast fortune that went with it, his military talents had been flatteringly noticed by no less a personage than Frederick the Great, and the courtly match-maker of many an ancient and financially embarrassed kingdom had looked hopefully and indulgently toward an alliance with him. His choice had fallen upon the princess royal of Denmark. Educated in Copenhagen, whither his grandfather and his unhappy mother had sent him to escape the influence of his Catholic father, he had fallen desperately in love with his youthful cousin Caroline, and had married her before he was twenty-one. And then, in the prime of his youth, his father had died leaving him in possession of his millions, his throne and his unfulfilled ambitions. Shrewd to the point of sharpness, capable, autocratic, thrifty almost to avarice, he early set to work to augment his patrimony. While still Count Regnant of Hanau he had been the first to supply his English cousin with troops to combat the revolting American colonists, a transaction which had netted him several million crowns. By repeating the profitable operation whenever opportunity offered, holding his court down to an austere Spartan simplicity, and astutely reinvesting his gains in safe British government bonds, he had succeeded in amassing the largest private fortune since the time of the Fuggers. With his money, his military prowess, his family connections and what he mistakenly took to be his political capacity, he was on the point of attaining the goal toward which his predecessors had striven in vain.

But there were contradictions in his nature and cross currents in the age, which were destined to thwart his desires. He came into the world either too late or too soon. If he had been born fifty years before his autocratic conception of the state would have fitted in with the age. In the nineteenth century he would have been a great captain of industry. As it was he swung uneasily between the era just passing and the one struggling to be born, an absolute monarch in an age of revolution and a man of business before commerce had either perfected its instruments or become quite respectable. He looked upon himself as the father of his subjects, and his Hessians were unbelievably loyal to him. He took men away from their homes and kindred, sent them to die in wars in which neither they nor he had any concern, appropriated the price of their blood to his own uses, and then generously compensated their bereft families by reducing their taxes. Yet he had no qualms over the rightness of his conduct and there was no revolution in Cassel or Hanau. He lent money out at interest, like a Jew, to kings and princes, to artisans and tradesmen, but demanded the respect due a monarch, and got it, too. In the age of Voltaire and the Encyclopedia, he was a devout conventional Christian. In the halcyon days of Versailles and Sans-Souci, at the crest of the most profligate period Europe had ever known, he strove to be a self-contained model husband. He failed, and his failure destroyed his self-respect and the bases of his happiness. But worse things were in store for him. The kindling ambition of his career, the hope to wear a royal crown, which was the key to his toilsome, contradictory, pathetic and somewhat preposterous life, was never to be realized, and he died a disappointed man.

II

His marriage was his first misfortune. The moment his stormy courtship was over and he was left alone with his girl-wife, misery seized upon him and it became, as he confided to his diary, "positive torture to play the tender spouse." Poor Caroline was a cold, unmatured child of the North, who was repelled and frightened by her cousin's ardent advances. Seeing his mistake, he tried to woo her with patience and gentleness. It was too late. And then a year after he had brought her in triumph to Hanau, she was taken ill with a dreadful malady. She survived it; but when she arose from her sick-bed, her beauty was gone and she was pock-marked for life. After that for four years William faithfully kept his marriage vows. They had several children together; it was, he felt, his duty to his country, his throne and his line. Through all this time he fought bravely against temptation, but in the end he succumbed. His first liaison—with the pretty young wife of his own Master of the Horse—nearly shattered him, and he recoiled from it in utter dismay. It was not the affront to Caroline, but the sudden collapse of his ideal of himself, that hurt him. He had wanted so much to be a noble example to his subjects! The undignified slinking in the dark, the compromises, the deceptions, humiliated him. He made a clean breast of it to his wife. There were tears, mutual forgivenesses, reconciliations. But presently he slipped again. His susceptible nature craved beauty and affection, and his timid, melancholy, passionless, disfigured wife was unable to give them to him. He had four children with his new concubine—a robustious daughter of the people who had known how to "spread her net" for him. He hated her and himself; she was "common, ignorant and vulgar;" their relations were "loveless and wholly carnal;" and after repeated resolutions and backslidings, he cast her back into the obscurity whence for a period he had raised her up, and nothing more was heard of her.

He believed he was cured, but within the year he was in the toils of a new and violent passion. Rosa Wilhelmina Dorothea Ritter was educated, well-born, clever, and she demanded that her status be recognized without ambiguity. She was offering up her girlhood, her beauty, her future, and she must have something in return. He bought her an estate, he conferred a title of nobility upon her and their eight children, he gave himself wholly to her and neglected Caroline utterly. It was not enough; he must put her right in the eyes of the world. She bobbed up suddenly at an officers' ball, and made her lover acknowledge her publicly. When he did that none too graciously, she insisted on being received at court. He yielded again, and the Princess was outraged. There was open talk of a separation, the palace buzzed with rumors and alarms, a clique formed to champion the affronted wife. By this time, however, William's conscience had adjusted itself and his self-approval returned. He saw himself as no longer a sinner, but as a much-tried unloved husband who had a right to live his life and seek happiness where he could find it. Once and for all his wife must understand that it was she who was to blame for their ship-wrecked love. He came down in shining armor upon her and her defenders, scattered the clique and forced her to accept the situation. Thereupon calm was reëstablished. Caroline must take what satisfaction she could as the official consort and the mother of His Serenity's legitimate issue. And then, just as everything began going smoothly, Frau von Lindenthal (née Rosa Wilhelmina Dorothea Ritter) had the effrontery to cast lustful glances upon a young officer in her lover's employ. William's long-suffering patience snapped. He deprived the ungrateful hussy of her estate, her title and her children, and banished her forever from his sight.

Within a few months came the grand passion of his life. He was by this time a man of forty-four, while Juliane Albertine von Schlotheim was only nineteen. For a space this thought made him hesitate. "I had nothing to offer her but the heart of a married man twice her age;" but his scruples soon vanished when "my love and the dear creature for whom I felt it met in a devotion so tender, so true and so enduring as I had never known before." Enduring it certainly was, and William at least never questioned its depth and sincerity. Insofar as a woman's love could satisfy his restless, ambitious soul, he was happy with her to the end of his life. Toward no one else, surely, was he so generous and so trustful as toward her. He suspected and quarreled with his father, his wife, his son, his ministers, his financial advisers; but the radiant beauty who filled his prime and his old age with joy, who stood by him in his misfortunes and followed him into exile, had his whole heart and his unreserved confidence. Without her asking it, he established their relationship from the outset as a mariage de conscience; her own tact and modesty made it easy for the Princess to receive her; and when the first of their nine children was born he settled her in a palace of her own and gave the emperor no peace till she was made a countess.

It has been said that William did not know himself the exact number of his offspring. As a matter of record, there were four by the first liaison, eight by the second, and nine by the Countess von Schlotheim, in addition to the three legitimate children of the Princess. Each of his families had its own name and title, and for each he provided as befitted his station. An augmented tax on salt enabled him to meet the extraordinary burden, and gave his subjects the opportunity to share it with him. The daughters born without the law married almost as well as their princely sisters; of the sons many lived to be generals and ministers in the service of numerous German states. The notorious Austrian General Haynau, the suppressor of revolts in Hungary and Italy, who as the "Hyena of Brescia" narrowly escaped mobbing in London, was the most noted of them.

III

Comfort, delight, even ecstasy, his concubines and their prolific progeny gave William. They did not fill his heart. Women were the playthings of life, the rewards and relaxations of a busy man. He would have despised himself as an idler and a fribble if he let them absorb him. He was an ambitious monarch, and he wanted to be king over a greater Hesse than his predecessors had left him. Even his enormous wealth, its administration and expansion, were a secondary concern, a means to the supreme end. His late father had striven to prepare the way for him, alas! in vain, and he must begin at scratch. Before a mere landgrave could touch the regal crown he must secure the Electoral hat. Seven princes, temporal and spiritual, wore that dignity and enjoyed the privilege of choosing an emperor. William was prepared to abase himself before them, to join with them in their wars, even to lend them money, if only they would vote him into their company. For fifteen years he pulled strings and danced attendance on them. He was mistrustful and jealous of the king of Prussia; yet he hung about the court in Berlin, flattered Frederick William II and his successor, took service as a field-marshal in the Prussian army—a step which almost cost him his freedom later on—all to win that monarch's support for his ambition. His ego was lacerated whenever he must play second fiddle; yet, with the same end in view, he busied himself with the military ceremonies at Frankfort when Leopold II came to be crowned there in 1790, and again at the accession of Francis II, entertained the assembled magnificoes at lavish cost, erected a memorial arch in honor of the event, only to be rewarded for his pains with an empty letter of thanks from Imperial Majesty.

The French Revolution came, and three years later the leading German princes met in conclave to free the imprisoned Louis XVI and crush his rebellious subjects. William had no stomach for the enterprise; but if he was to participate, his vanity demanded that he be made commander in chief, and his avarice that the Hessian troops be paid for. He yielded on both points because the king of Prussia and the Emperor agreed to do their part toward winning him the coveted hat. Five years later he allowed Prussia with his eyes open to outmanœuvre him in the secularization and partition of the spiritual princes' dominions, on the same ground. Time and again the exposed position of his country and prudential regard for its interests bade him go over to the side of France, especially after the advent of the Consulate; but he dared not displease the Emperor, lest he endanger his chance for the electorship and the grand goal toward which it was the stepping-stone.

Finally in 1803 he bagged it. And then to his vast disappointment and disgust, it turned out that he had labored and intrigued in vain. One year later Napoleon proclaimed himself the successor of Charlemagne, and the Holy Roman Empire—after existing for a thousand years—was abolished. The new Elector William I of Hesse-Cassel never voted for an emperor at all.

IV

This evil turn from the master of Europe was but an earnest of future incompatibilities. Worse was to come. From the first William was outraged and scandalized by the high-handed doings in France. The Revolution burst rudely upon all his hopes and schemes, violated everything that he cherished and believed in, and encouraged everything that was obnoxious to him. At heart he still thought of himself as an old-fashioned husband and father, and the rebels flouted the sacredness of the family. He dreaded and detested the new abhorrent fashions in theology, in government, in costume and hairdressing. Nor did the monstrous business stop there. In 1792 a French army led by General Custine bombarded Frankfort and in the very shadow of his palace launched a proclamation to his subjects calling upon them to cast off the yoke of "the tyrant, the tiger who sells your blood to fill his purse," and describing his subsidy transactions with England as "this commerce in troops." The abusive phrase caught on and popular discontent rose to a high pitch, so that he was obliged to adopt counter-measures. He commanded the pastors to preach in their churches the virtues of docility and obedience and the holiness of the "good old German traditions" of absolutism. By way of ridiculing the new modes he ordered that the jail population be shorn of their pig-tails and, accoutred in pantaloons and stiff round hats, set to sweeping the streets. And when next year he again sold twelve thousand soldiers to Britain he voluntarily decreed a general reduction in taxes.

Not for a moment did he believe but that the upheaval was a passing mania, engineered by crazy agitators, without roots in history, without social significance and without a future. The advent of the Consulate only confirmed this opinion. Not that he perceived the genius of Napoleon. From first to last he saw in him nothing but a lucky adventurer. But he felt sure that "so despotic a general" could not bring the misled French people to their senses and make them wish their old rulers back. Even the long series of brilliant victories culminating in the proclamation of the empire did not sober him. Geography and the logic of events and the timid hints of his advisers impelled him into an alliance with the new powers, but he could not and would not conquer his aversion for "the usurper" and went on putting his trust in blind Prussia and bankrupt Austria.

By a curious irony Napoleon took up, shortly after his coronation, a favorite scheme of William's for a union among the Rhenish princes. In September 1804 the Emperor came in person to Mayence to preside over the assembled sovereigns. The Elector of Hesse-Cassel was invited to the conclave, but failed to put in an appearance, offering as an excuse a sudden attack of the gout. It was not only that with the Corsican's finger in the pie, the dish had lost its savor for him; he deemed it shrewd diplomacy to keep Napoleon guessing. The Emperor was hinting broadly that he was prepared to reward William for his adherence with Britain's Hanoverian possession as well as with the title of majesty. That was cruelly tempting; but England, on the other hand, was dangling fresh subsidy contracts before his nose. Too bad that he could not be friends with both parties and fulfil all his ambitions at one stroke. The moment he threw in his lot with one camp or the other, he would be obliged to give up for good some of his dreams. Temperamentally he very much disliked making up his mind anyhow. Moreover, coming out openly for France meant breaking with all his friends; it meant probably that the powers in London would confiscate his very large investments there; and it meant almost certainly that he would have to fit out an army and go to war at his own expense.

So, without positively declining either offer, he decided to steer a middle course. Neutrality had its joys as well as its dangers, and it appeared likely to be the most remunerative policy to boot. In the back of his head the notion that Napoleon was a bird of passage had taken firm root. Who knew? Perhaps by the time he had come to a decision the struggle would end and he would gain both worlds. In the meantime it was most agreeable to have the two great coalitions sitting on his doorstep and bidding against each other for his friendship. In the meantime, too, however, Napoleon's scheme for the confederation of the Rhine principalities prospered apace, the two Electors of Bavaria and Wuerttemberg became kings, and both England and the Emperor were becoming ever more irritated with William's dilatory tactics. Still he hesitated. Austria was knocked into the dust, the Napoleonic steam-roller flattened out Prussia, all Europe hurried to fling itself either at the "usurper's" feet or to join the alliance against him; but William still hoped for miracles. The wolf was at the door, and he proceeded to charm him off by tacking signs up around the frontiers of Hesse-Cassel asserting his neutrality. At last both England and France lost patience. London confiscated his investments; and Napoleon, having gobbled up bigger fry, swooped down upon his capital with fire and sword, ordered him taken prisoner as a Prussian field marshal, and occupied the country. By the sheerest piece of luck William managed to escape. For seven long years he wandered in exile, a suppliant at strangers' doors.

With one exception, nothing so auspicious had yet occurred for the future of the Rothschild family.

CHAPTER III

THE BOYS

THE exception was the sudden departure of Nathan, Meyer's third son, for England.

The family had not been long in the house with the Green Sign than Meyer was obliged to take stock of his situation. By and large, the inventory was not encouraging. The purchase of the home had made a deep hole in his capital. His responsibilities were increasing, while his affairs barely held their own. A seventh child had come, an eighth was expected, and space was once more becoming a problem. What with the shop occupying the street floor, the growing family had all it could do to keep up appearances, without so much as thinking of comfort. What he ought to do, what was sorely needed, was to separate residence and business altogether. It was not a question of luxury. Poor, tired Guetele had not a fit place to do her work in. At night, after the children had gone to bed, she must mend and darn in the shop. And that was not all. Schoenche, their eldest, was seventeen, nearly eighteen, and should marry. The match-makers of the Gasse were busy with offers; but there was not a proper sitting room in the house to receive either them or the young men they proposed bringing around. What was more, marriage meant a dowry. Where was it to come from?

Finally, there was Amschel, the eldest of the boys. Not that he was a problem exactly. The youngster was alive with energy; and he had brains. Long before he had been confirmed, he had begun turning his hand to things. At first it was helping in the shop; then he took to running out into the market on his own, buying and selling whatever came along, cotton-cloth for the most part. It was good business, too; the difficulty was capital. If he had money or credit, it might really be a big thing. As it was, he could only make commissions, middlemanning for those who had.

But the boy did have brains; or at least he kept his ears open. Out among the tradesfolk he had heard talk: to wit, that the Poritz, the Landgrave at Cassel, was handing out English drafts—interest on securities he had there—to various merchants he trusted; some of them were Jews even; and he did not want them cashed right off, for fear of depressing the exchange rate; so he left them with the merchants till Frankfort Fair time, which might be six months off, free of interest. Now this Landgrave, wasn't he the Poritz father knew, the man who gave father a title once, twenty years ago, because he had sold him some coins and trinkets? He was, indeed! Well then, it was like this: the free use of capital was one thing; but besides, there were the cloth dealers from Manchester. They had to be paid in drafts on London. Why not pay them with the Landgrave's interest checks, and save the discount both ways?

If only father would take a trip down to Cassel and warm over the old connection!

So Meyer packed his medal case again and hopped on the stage that went from Frankfort to the Hessian capital.

The boy was right: it was an idea. Why hadn't he thought of that himself all those years? It was better than all the court-business he had been angling for and never got. With his past services and his Court-Factorship for prestige, he ought to get a chance easily. And then the dowry for Schoenche and the launching for Amschel and the younger boys!

It did not go quite so fast as all that. His Serenity—without, of course, admitting the tradesman to his presence—did surely enough take the trinkets Meyer brought down for his inspection. The prices were too temptingly low. He even made a shrewd guess why the Jew was so generous, and sent out word that the next time he had checks to cash he would see to it that Meyer was remembered. But that, for the time being, was all. Meyer went back to Frankfort and sat down hopefully to wait. He waited for an entire year, but the court did not remember.

It was risky, but Meyer saw no other choice than to remind Highness of his promise. So he wrote him a letter recalling the services he had rendered back in Hanau, the low discounts he had been content to work for, his punctual payments, and his loyalty and devotion. He was, he declared, again prepared to match the highest bidders, to be grateful for the most modest credit allowance, and to be in all ways His Serenity's most faithful humble servant. After all, he concluded, I am not exactly a stranger to Your Princely Serenity, having these many years enjoyed the distinction of being a Hessian (which sounded better than Hanau) Court-Factor. Upon all these asseverations "the records of the Most-High Princely investment office and state treasury department will not fail to bear me out, and I have no hesitation in referring myself to them."

It seemed, however, that the Landgrave had completely forgotten Meyer's constancy and services. Moreover, the officials at Cassel knew nothing of the affairs in Hanau. Therefore the references (which poor Meyer had given more for their sound than for their substance) were very thoroughly looked up; and it being found that the transactions at the little capital had been few and of the most passing and trifling nature—of English check discountings not a trace could be discovered—the inquiry was extended to Frankfort. From the business community there the reports were equally unimpressive. Among the great firms no such person as Meyer Rothschild was known at all, favorably or unfavorably; the others, while giving him a good character as a reputable and honest tradesman within his sphere, were in no position to state anything definite about his financial standing or responsibility. The only safe guide as to that might be the assessment lists of the Jewish community; which being consulted, showed that Meyer Rothschild was paying taxes upon a fortune of two thousand florins, and that this rating had remained stationary for fifteen years!

The upshot of all this research was that the court, after months and months of further delay, graciously resolved to redeem its promise by authorizing for the petitioner a credit allowance of one thousand pounds sterling—the next time a batch of drafts arrived from London. In the closing months of 1789 checks in the amount of eight hundred pounds actually were turned over to him. It was by that time nearly two years since the hopeful transaction with the medals.

Matters went along at the same snail's pace for over a decade. The following year when Meyer applied to have his credit raised to ten thousand pounds, Highness munificently doubled his previous allowance, making it two thousand at the same time that a Cassel Jew named Feidel David was put down for twenty-five thousand. But Meyer, egged on and abetted by his boys, hung on; so that, little by little, his credit increased. The French Revolution came, and cotton cloth rose into the luxury class; but what with Amschel's device of paying the Manchester dealers direct with the Prince's drafts on London, the firm of Rothschild obtained first choice. The shop grew and prospered. A bombardment of Frankfort by French Revolutionary troops in 1796, doing great damage to the Ghetto street and resulting in the City Council's granting Jews the right of free domicile, had given Guetele and Schoenche their long-desired sitting room. The "Green Sign" had, as it happened, been barely struck; but the shop was now in rented quarters on the centrally located Schnurgasse nevertheless. And (as the surest measure of the family's prosperity) the Jewish community for the first time in nearly a quarter of a century raised Meyer Rothschild's tax-assessment.

II

But the greatest thing was yet to come: Two years later Nathan, the third of the boys, suddenly decided to go to England. It frightened Meyer at the time. He had taken the young man with him to look at the Manchester dealer's samples; and before he knew what was happening, some hot words had been exchanged between the two, the Englishman had snapped his cases shut angrily, and was showing father and son the door. Lord, but this was serious! The family's whole prosperity and future was bound up with the textiles, and the dealer knew it—that, and also that he had the entire Frankfort market in his pockets; no competitor touched the town. The Revolution and the strained relations along the Channel made trade too hazardous for very many merchants to venture over to the Continent; with the consequence that the few who still did come across had things their own way.

But the high-spirited Nathan did not seem disturbed in the slightest.

To the salesman he flung back over his shoulder: "I don't want your shoddy anyhow. I know where to get stuff as well as you do."

Then he reassured his parent: "It is all right. I am going to England tomorrow. I'll send you all the cloth you want." And he kept his word.

That amazing youth of 21 had hardly had time to get his bearings in the alien land and to pick up the most fragmentary smattering of English—in all his forty years of residence he was never to lose his Judengasse accent—than he had begun showing what he was made of. In less than a year he had tripled the little capital he had brought with him. For the present he was confining himself to cotton cloth for export to Frankfort. But he was already looking beyond Manchester to London. There in the world's business and financial capital were opportunities worthy of his talents. His affairs with the Lancashire weavers had progressed far enough to enable him to operate at a distance. But it was useless to go to London without money. The only place he knew of where big money was to be had was the palace at Cassel. His letters, piously addressed to his father but intended chiefly for his brother Salomon, begged for that money. Could they not somehow get nearer to that pig-tailed miser in the court of Hesse, and whisper in his ear? Was there not someone about the treasury who did have his ear? It did not matter in the least what his price was. Buy him at any price, and get the money, and send it to where it will do the most good. The Landgrave will lose nothing and we will become rich, richer than he. It is the opportunity of a lifetime. Get the money, the money . . . Nathan's letters became an insistent clamor, a bombardment.

It made the young men at home feel sick and helpless. Now they realized as never before how very little they had yet accomplished. They were nowhere at court; their credit was insignificant; and they had no friends, none at least of any consequence. The petty discount business they got from time to time was the barest beginning toward what Nathan had in mind; the really big affairs at Cassel they were not allowed to touch, and if they were they had not the experience or the education to carry them out. They were shopkeepers, not bankers. All that they had to recommend them was their energy, their ambition and their native gifts. But what good were these in face of the handicaps they must overcome? Their path to the Landgrave's treasure was barred as by a triple wall, of mistrust, jealousy, prejudice. The Prince was indeed not the man to let sectarian considerations conflict with a good bargain. Still, he was of his time and class. Everything else being equal, he preferred to transact important business with German firms of patrician antecedents. His courtiers more than shared that sentiment. Naturally, the great bankers of Frankfort, like the Bethmann Brothers and Rueppell & Harnier, made the most of their advantage and jealously kept the prejudice at Cassel warm. To complete the encirclement, the Jewish merchants at the Hessian capital looked upon the court business as their special preserve and hounded their foreign coreligionists bitterly, relentlessly.

What were the young Rothschilds to do? Somehow or another, straight-forwardly or by indirection, by fair means or otherwise, the capital which Nathan clamored for must be secured him. Only one possible door was open. It was not the most promising approach, not the most dignified; it was, in fact, a back-door. Oh, well, they were in no position just now to consider dignity. It might, if successful, force them to be unfair to those who opened it for them. So be it; ambitious men could not, at this stage of their progress, afford to be over-scrupulous. It might lead to a fight; there was no choice but to risk it, and arm for it in the meantime.

The plan was as simple as it was ingenious. Those old established German banking firms, though they guarded their connections with the Landgrave jealously, heartily disliked dealing with him; and the Rothschild boys knew it. Cassel was, to begin with, in these days of stage coaches, a long way off. That, however, was a minor item. It was Serenity's business manners that tried the patience of a self-respecting banker. William was arrogant, petty, mistrustful, vacillating, greedy, exacting. One never could be sure with him until he had actually signed a contract, whether a deal was closed or not. He dickered and haggled worse than a Judengasse shopkeeper, and then he stood off loftily and demanded special consideration for his rank and wealth. The smallest transaction necessitated repeated journeys and endless correspondence before Highness's doubts were dispelled and his cupidity appeased. And yet, with all his faults, no banker could afford not to reckon with him: he was one of the richest men in the world.

In these circumstances it was not surprising that Rueppell & Harnier and—after a good deal of persuasion—the Bethmanns gave serious attention to the proposal which the young Rothschilds brought to them. It was briefly this: You are great and important houses. You have your dignity and traditions to consider. The Landgrave is a big buyer of securities, but a trifle difficult. If we may put it that way, it sometimes wearies you so to do business with him that you are on the point of dropping the connection. That would be rather reckless, however; don't you think? Now, we are young men, without any particular antecedents or position to worry about. We are ambitious, we want to make more money, and we shall feel honored to work for such distinguished houses as yours. Well, let us be the buffers between Serenissimus and yourselves. We can handle him. His nonsense won't disturb us; we are used to tough customers. If you will pay us a small broker's commission, we will take the fuss and bother and haggling off your shoulders. In all honesty, we are moved to offer you our services by one consideration of which we have not yet spoken. For a number of years our father and ourselves have been attending to little matters for His Highness—those English drafts, you know. But our coreligionists in Cassel are making trouble for us. If we can go to the palace as your brokers, it will make things a bit easier.

There were one or two other, even more moving, considerations, as will appear directly, which the keen young men omitted to name. Why overplay their hand unnecessarily? The plan was going over as it was. Ruppell & Harnier agreed right off; the Bethmanns seemed impressed. In the two years that followed both houses willingly turned over their court business to them. Again and again the Rothschilds sold the Landgrave parcels of Danish bonds issued by the Frankfort concerns; in one or two instances they were allowed to convert the interest coupons; once at least they arranged a partial Danish amortization for the Bethmanns. Everyone was pleased: Prince William was delighted to have his investments attended to by men to whom he could talk as he liked; the bankers were happy to be relieved of an irritating client while retaining his account; and the brokers were for the first time taking a hand in financial operations on the grand scale. The plan functioned without a hitch; there appeared to be no reason why it should not go on indefinitely. But just then a curious thing happened. Just as the German firms began congratulating themselves on having found a perfect instrument, the very men who had devised it withdrew from the arrangement. The Rothschilds ceased to wait on their patrons in Frankfort, for what cause they did not vouchsafe to explain. Rueppell and the Bethmanns were sorry and mystified, but they were too proud to ask questions. It was by that time the year 1804.

III

The Rothschilds had been as truthful as they had said they were when they named the opposition of the Cassel Jews as their motive for offering to act as the brokers of the two old Frankfort houses. They had merely not told the whole truth. Two further incentives spurred them on. Their ultimate goal was nothing less than to become the chief, if not the sole, bankers of the Landgrave of Hesse (the Elector of Hesse since 1803), so that by having his huge uninvested surplus on deposit they might supply their brother in England with the capital he required. To arrive at that goal they must learn a great deal more of banking than they yet knew, and—even more important—make friends at court. By 1804 both these objectives had been attained and passed. The Bethmann and Rueppell connections had served their purpose. It would have been idle to continue them, yes even risky. In the same year Nathan left Manchester for London.

So long as the Rothschilds remained on the outer fringe where their services were restricted to the trivial business of draft discounting, their opportunities either to make valuable contacts with the men close to the millionaire-prince or to gain anything like a comprehensive view of his affairs were almost nil. The English note transactions were a routine matter; clerks gave out the checks, clerks received the money. Bond-selling, more especially interest and capital collecting, were quite another thing. They came under the head of grand finance; they involved discussion and negotiation with high officials. Moreover, the brokers to some degree reflected the prestige of the great houses in whose name they acted. Thus, without transition, the young sons of Meyer Rothschild suddenly found themselves translated into the innermost circle of the Prince's entourage, but one remove from direct contact with All-Highest himself.

It took Salomon, the diplomatic genius of the family, only a very little time to get the measure of William's men. All in all, he decided, the best choice he could make was Karl Friedrich Buderus. Buderus fulfilled all the requirements. He was still a young man, yet he had gone far and seemed likely to go very much farther still. Son of a schoolmaster, who back in Hanau had been tutor to some of Highness's numerous natural progeny, he had entered the Prince's service as a bookkeeper attached to the tax office of that little principality. He had risen gradually in his master's esteem, so that when the latter became Landgrave of Hesse Buderus was left in charge of the finances at the old capital. In '92 he had been called to Cassel, where his progress had been extraordinarily rapid. He now held the title of a War Councilor and was the Director of two of the state's four treasury departments, one of which—the so-called War Treasury—contained the fabled millions and handled the investments. As nearly as anyone could, Buderus enjoyed his master's confidence and was consulted by him in all the more important financial operations. Quiet, diligent, painstaking, reserved, his clerical exterior gave no hint of the man's real talents. Salomon saw in him a collaborator ideally suited to his purpose,—discreet, competent, dependable, a good soldier who in a scrape would know how to fight his way out, a courtier remarkably free from the sectarian prejudices of his class.

Terms were a detail. The Rothschilds needed protection in the worst way; Buderus, if anybody, could give it to them; he should have whatever he asked. Of course, Buderus had his price; they all did. That was the standard, recognized method of doing business around courts. The highnesses themselves tacitly encouraged it; it enabled them to keep large staffs at small expense. The courtier, having come to a cordial understanding with one of the firms supplying his master, saw to it that as much trade as possible went to his friends and as little as possible to those of his colleagues. In return for his amiability, the merchants remembered him and his with suitable gifts at certain seasons of the year, and helped him out from time to time with a loan—which neither side, naturally, expected to be repaid—to enable him to meet extraordinary obligations for which Highness's salary scale made no provision. Even princes' younger sons and heirs to thrones themselves, when the parental allowance was not elastic enough, did not disdain mercantile gratuities in exchange for a bit of quiet support—as William of Hesse, recalling the lean years before his accession, was not unaware.

Salomon Rothschild and his brothers diligently cultivated the man Buderus. They found him a friendly soul, once his thin reserve was penetrated; he liked a chat, did not even mind exchanging confidences. Nothing uppish about him. And his conversations about the courtly finances were immensely instructive. They had had no idea until now of the real magnitude of the quarry they were after. The Prince, according to Buderus, was a fabulously wealthy man. His loans and investments were scattered all over Europe, from London to St. Petersburg, from Copenhagen to Vienna. Those stodgy old bankers in Frankfort had barely scratched the surface. If they had been alert and energetic, if they had even halfway availed themselves of their opportunities—of their sheer geographical position, to mention but one—they could by this time have got exclusive control of the business. Why, William's income alone was more than a million thalers a year, most of which, under the frugal economy he maintained, had to be reinvested. Naturally mistrustful and suspicious, he parceled out his affairs to all sorts of people everywhere. There were, for instance, the Van Nottens in Amsterdam, with their branch in London—another petrified ancient house, of splendid traditions and moribund vitality. They handled the Dutch and English business. The Russian loans were attended to by a St. Petersburg concern, the Austrian by a Viennese firm, and similarly all the way through. It was all nonsense; a fortune, like a state, should be administered from a single, central point. He, Buderus, had been urging that policy for years. One sound bank, run by young and capable men, accessibly located for easy supervision, ought to have the entire thing in their hands. They could too, if they would go after it, and had the right kind of backing at court. . . . The hungry Rothschilds' mouths watered at the prospect. God himself had guided their footsteps when they chose this man for their friend.

The loans, now: there were a half dozen profits to be made out of each one, which under the existing system often went to as many separate firms. First of all the business had to be negotiated; a commission was paid for that service. The terms having been agreed upon, and the contracts signed, the funds must be conveyed to the borrower. For this there was a second fee. After a time the interest coupons began falling due. Somebody had to turn them into cash, and naturally he must be compensated. The debtor paid, usually, either in foreign currencies or in notes. Bankers were needed to convert both into legal tender, at a discount, of course. Lastly, the loans themselves matured; which, again, involved deliveries, conversions, exchanges—and commissions. This entire gamut of operations was being performed at the Cassel offices almost daily, through a dozen hands or more. Buderus could see no reason why a single pair could not much more efficiently do all the work, and earn all the commissions.

But, upon being cautiously sounded, Buderus seemed to betray not the slightest interest in seasonal presents or periodic personal loans. That was rather astonishing, as well as deucedly inconvenient. Was it possible that he was that nine-days' wonder, a courtier unsusceptible to bribery? Bah, there was no such animal! One encouraging sign was that the diplomatic conversations were not broken off. Buderus continued friendly and talkative. Sometimes he discussed one thing, sometimes another; the important point was that he kept on chatting. Salomon was of the opinion that there was a sort of direction to these apparently aimless remarks, that Buderus was getting at something; only what that thing was, was not clear. Thus, for instance, Buderus occasionally alluded to the lack of generosity in his master's composition, his parsimony, and the way he underpaid his staff. But when Salomon, sensing an opening, tried to step in with a suggestion about how income might be supplemented, his friend hastily added that he was not thinking of himself, that he was interested merely in the general principle and in the efficiency of the service. As for himself, he had no cause to complain. He was a lucky fellow: he had begun at the bottom, here he was at forty-two Director of two departments, and still rising. . . . Wasn't it perfectly dreadful how, with the disorders in France and the unceasing wars, the cost of living had soared? However, they, his family and himself, were people of simple tastes, who had learned how to restrain their wants. . . . Without being immodest, he was probably the most influential man connected with the Landgrave's financial administration. . . . It was fantastic how many petty houses Serenity insisted on employing. But some day he would see sense, and then the concern that had in the interval gained his confidence would have an account worth talking about.

His family—Buderus was like a Jew in his devotion to his own people. Just às one thought he was coming to the point, he suddenly waved his hand philosophically and wandered off to "more agreeable topics." He never wearied of telling one about his splendid children, his excellent wife, his happy home. And this would lead up to what seemed another small, uncertain opening. The dearest wish of his heart—he would confide—the one thing in life for which he labored and hoped, was that he might assure his children an independent income and a title of nobility . . . Then once, in an undertone, Salomon was sure he caught something to the effect that men of the world should understand. . . . That was enough. Salomon, being a man of the world, understood. He understood, namely, that a friend who had the will and the power to do for him what Buderus would do, merited something better than trivial gratuities. Why, he would not insult him by even suggesting such a thing. Buderus deserved a share in the Rothschild firm's earnings. He should have it, by all means.

Mutual comprehension having been achieved, Buderus had an idea. There was a man he knew up Altona-way, in Holstein, a banker by name of Lawaetz—Johann Daniel Lawaetz. He was in excellent standing with the Danish finance authorities, had been doing business with them for a great many years. There was even talk of giving him a decoration of some sort. Also, he and the Landgrave were old friends, the Hessian ruler having been educated in Copenhagen and having married a daughter of the Danish king. Suspicious though he was of all the world, William had faith in Lawaetz. Well now, Buderus would approach this splendidly connected man, ask him how he would like to negotiate a Danish loan with the Landgrave's money, on the understanding, of course, that the Cassel end of the transaction be entrusted to the House of Rothschild. He would get a letter off to him forthwith.

IV

Lawaetz was willing. So, after a little dickering and hesitating, was Serenity. The royal Dane was more than willing. The Copenhagen exchequer, chronically at low ebb, was in the year 1804 more than usually dry. A loan was in fact at that moment being negotiated with the Bethmanns, who on the plea of the great money stringency, demanded the exorbitant interest rate of eight per cent; so that Lawaetz, acting for an "enormously rich capitalist in Frankfort who was uncommonly well-disposed toward the Danish court," and offering to take up the entire issue at four and a half per cent, seemed nothing less than a god-send. The Elector of Hesse was delighted not only because the transaction enabled him to dispose at one stroke of the greater part of his then very troublesome surplus, but even more because by the Lawaetz plan the identity of the lender would be kept from his poverty-stricken relatives in Copenhagen. And the Rothschilds, in their turn, were not averse to screening themselves behind their Altona correspondent for reasons of their own. They had a presentiment that the good patrician bankers of Frankfort who had so lately initiated them into the mysteries of state loans might take it in bad part were they to learn that it was their protégés' competition that had caused their own eight-per cent offer to be rejected.

For more than two years, during which no fewer than four loans were arranged between Hesse and Denmark, the ingenious system worked without a hitch. The borrowers themselves did not know from whom the money was coming. Every so often an instalment of the bonds, made out to bearer, was forwarded to Lawaetz. Thereupon he notified Buderus of their arrival and total value. Buderus then sent on the money through one of the Rothschilds, who paid it over to Lawaetz, received the securities and returned with them to Buderus. Not a soul in Frankfort had any inkling of what was happening.

By this time it was early in 1806. In January of that year negotiations for still another loan were in progress. Whether by now the Lawaetz-Buderus-Rothschild consortium had become over-confident, or the Elector William had begun to fear that excessive secrecy might lead to detection, or the Danes had raised some objection, in any event the veil was now for the first time partially lifted. William's part in the proceedings remained as hitherto unrevealed, but Lawaetz did at last mention by name his "enormously rich capitalist" in Frankfort. It so happened that the firm of Bethmann Brothers were these days also offering Denmark a loan of a half a million. They had been smarting under their repulse of two years ago, and were determined to win back their old clients from those mysterious competitors, whoever they were. Who those elusive people might be, had been bothering and puzzling the Bethmanns a good deal. There were circumstances, seemingly unrelated to that Danish defeat, which simply cried to be resolved. There was, for instance, the strange behavior of the Rothschild boys. Three, four, five years ago, they eagerly snapped up the smallest crumb which the great banking houses deigned to toss them. Now they were oddly indifferent, astonishingly busy. One or another of them was continually on the road; their affairs seemed to be prospering hugely, too. They had lately managed to secure a warehouse on the Kurtrierplatz, although Jews were expressly forbidden to take part in the bidding. Very remarkable, again, their father had in 1803 been appointed an Oberhofagent to the Hessian court, and the two eldest boys now bore titles of Hessian Pay Office Agents. It was all very, very odd.

Oddest of all was their coldness to the brokerage arrangement which they had themselves so recently pleaded for. The Bethmanns, counting on the Elector William to take up a portion of their forthcoming Danish loan, had had the young Jews approached, only to be put off with shrugs and excuses. It appeared that Rueppell & Harnier had had a similar experience. The Bethmanns had then addressed direct inquiries to the Cassel War Treasury (Karl Friedrich Buderus, Director). Would His Serene Highness be interested in investing a hundred thousand thalers or so in a Royal Danish loan about to be issued? To which the cool reply had been, in effect, that the Elector of Hesse was not buying any Danish bonds today, thank you.

In the meantime, in Denmark those dark competitors were again busy. Once more they were offering easier terms, as well as a larger sum. Certain men in the royal finance department at Copenhagen were favoring their bid, and the Bethmann offer was again in danger of rejection. Thereupon vigorous measures had become necessary. Who, the Bethmanns demanded to know, were these people who had the effrontery to make offers to His Majesty without coming into the open? Oh, it was an enormously rich capitalist of Frankfort who was uncommonly well-disposed toward the Danish court. What was his name? Why, Rothschild! Or was it Gruenschild? Something like that.

At this the Bethmann agents laughed bitterly and uproariously. Rothschild! Did they say Rothschild? That was a pretty bed-time story. Did His Majesty's servants know who the Rothschilds were? The father was a petty curio peddler of the Frankfort Ghetto. His sons ran a shop, which until very lately had been housed on the street floor of their Judengasse home. Enormously rich capitalist, fiddle-sticks! Why, they were nothing but irresponsible, insignificant fly-by-nights, without capital or credit or connections, as anyone in the city on the Main would testify. Let the Royal Government take warning. It was quite out of the question for these men to market a bond issue of such magnitude. They might, relying upon an investing public which in the present disorder of Europe and Germany had ceased to exist, think they could. But the moment they went out and tried, they would strike the inevitable snag, and then they would simply leave His Majesty in the lurch. They were that kind of men. Besides, there would really be no other choice for them. The ancient and honorable House of Bethmann, on the other hand, had great resources of its own, upon which it could count with perfect safety. Let Denmark consider ere she plunged!

Denmark, however, took the warning lightly, and closed with Lawaetz-Rothschild-Buderus. How should the Bethmanns know that the combine had in the past two years thoroughly proved its soundness by repeated loans successfully placed? On July 2, 1806, Lawaetz wrote Buderus:

"I am asking Rothschild to inform you that the new Bethmann Danish loan, which seems purposely to have been kept secret from me in Copenhagen is actually a fact. I am told in a letter at the same time that it was not possible to say No to this old Bethmann House, which felt rather humiliated; and I observe that those who are not well-disposed toward our good Rothschild have held out promises that the Bethmann loan would cost less and be more promptly liquidated than Rothschild's. In order to contradict this last to the best of my ability, I shall this very day take up the entire remainder of the loan out of my own resources, and relying upon your coöperation look forward confidently to the final remittances from you. . . . I hope people will finally become convinced that he (Rothschild) is a good man who deserves respect, let envy say against him what it will."

The result of Lawaetz's energetic procedure was that the snag which the Bethmanns had so confidently foreseen was actually encountered by themselves. That summer Prussia lay prostrate under the heel of Napoleon; investors throughout Germany ran to cover; and the surplus of the millionaire Elector of Hesse was, through the good offices of shareholder Buderus, at the disposal of the House of Rothschild. Regretfully Bethmann Brothers found themselves driven to write to Copenhagen in November that in view of the terrible events of recent date, which no man could have foreseen a few months earlier, and the consequent ruin of the most prosperous German lands, they must ask to be released from their promise and for the return of their initial advance. The ancient, patrician firm did not easily forget the humiliation of this letter nor their erstwhile young brokers who had obliged them to write it.

Next came the turn of Rueppell & Harnier. The lifting of the veil on the Copenhagen mystery had given them an even broader peep at the proceedings behind the scenes than the other banking house had got. The Elector, as it chanced, wanted a portion of the 1806 loan to be paid in old Danish bonds which were due to mature that September. That loan, however, had been issued through Rueppell & Harnier—interestingly enough, it was the very one in which the Rothschilds had for the first time acted as their brokers—and, if it was to be called in, the notice to Copenhagen must go through those bankers' hands. This concern, naturally, had its own friends at court; wherefore, in the course of time, the news was brought to them that the purpose for which Serenity desired those securities was to convert them by way of part payment toward a new loan, which not only was being negotiated by the House of Rothschild but—in order to screen Highness's identity—actually carried the Rothschild name on each bond as the lender!

Rueppell & Harnier were a younger firm than the Bethmanns; that is, they had a great deal more pugnacity and considerably less business. They were, therefore, not going to take a thing like this lying down. For that matter, as will presently be seen, neither did the Bethmanns. Unfortunately for the cause of both houses, there were several important details about the affair of which neither of them had the remotest inkling. They were not aware that in these two and a half years the Rothschilds had put through several loans between Cassel and Copenhagen (via Altona) and had made themselves extremely solid with the royal ministry of finance. They had never as much as heard the name of Lawaetz. Least of all did they know—at this time they did not even suspect—that the real villain of the piece was a gentleman named Karl Friedrich Buderus who, close as any man to the Elector, was even closer yet to the brothers Rothschild.

So, rather amusingly, Rueppel & Harnier opened hostilities by addressing a protest to the very man in Cassel who was the source of all their trouble. They Lordshipped and High-Well-Born-ed him all over the place—in point of fact, the modest schoolmaster's son was not even knighted till some months later—and begged him to consider how impossible it was for them to call in those bonds after the six-months' notice period had passed. But chiefly and bitterly they complained of the humiliating necessity of explaining to the Danish authorities that it was in order to make the Rothschild investment possible that these bonds must now be so irregularly amortized. "The conclusion which the Royal Finance Ministry might draw from this is that it is not the Danish state credit itself but solely the Jewish name of Rothschild which enables Danish state securities to find a market in Hesse; and this is surely so contrary to His Electoral Serenity's Highest intention that we account it a merit on our part to call your Baronial Well-born and High-Well-Born Excellency's attention hereto" as well as to a counter-proposal of their own.

The plan suggested by Rueppell was, of course, not adopted. But the temper of the letter gave Buderus more than one sleepless night and frightened the Rothschilds greatly. A fight was clearly coming. They were not yet ready to join issue with the most powerful banking houses in Germany. Satisfactory though their progress had been these last two or three years, their position was not yet solidly intrenched enough for such a struggle. How would it end? And in an open break what would that incalculable man on the Hessian throne, the timid, suspicious, vacillating William do about it?

And then, just as things looked their darkest, came Napoleon, the man who was so often to smooth the path unconsciously for the Rothschilds, and saved the day. On the last day of October, 1806, French troops, heedless of the Elector's "no trespassing" signs, crossed the frontiers into Hesse. In the middle of the night of November first Serenissimus hurriedly clambered into his carriage, and fled from Cassel in a panic. His beloved Hesse was not to see him again for seven years. Karl Frederich Buderus, silent partner in the House of Rothschild, was left in all but complete control of the princely finances at home.

By an interesting coincidence, the years of the Elector's exile were also the decisive years in the rise of the Rothschilds.

CHAPTER IV

BATTLE

WILLIAM, after some breath-taking mishaps and after narrowly escaping capture at the hands of the invader, sufficiently recovered his composure to turn his horses in a northerly direction. Two weeks later he drove over the frontier into Denmark. There his younger brother, the Landgrave Karl, who like himself had married a daughter of King Frederick V, and who was now resident governor of the Duchies of Schleswig-Holstein, welcomed the bedraggled fugitive cordially enough and assigned him the royal suite in his palace at Gottorp as a temporary residence. The first man to visit him in his exile was the Director of the Hessian War Treasury. William was so happy to see him that he conferred upon him the title of Von Carlshausen. One half of Buderus's dearest wish was thus fulfilled: his children were nobles. All they lacked now was an independent income; the Rothschild connection would take care of that.

Buderus stayed with his master only a few days, noting down orders for the disposition of the great quantity of boxes and bundles of valuables left behind. Then he returned to Cassel with his newly-acquired halo to carry them out. William himself was too unhapy to remain long at Gottorp. To be at a court where others ruled and strutted while he was but a barely tolerated interloper, was not his notion of princely grandeur. Every time the Crown Prince-Regent came down to Gottorp the aged Elector must clear out of his royal suite, gather up his boxes and papers, seek a corner in his brother's apartments, and listen to everlasting reminders about the kindness and hospitality he was enjoying. When, therefore, some two months later, the agreeable Countess von Schlotheim,—"my best friend for whom I wait yearningly" as his diary describes her—followed him with their children into banishment, he set up housekeeping first at Rendsburg and later—Lawaetz having secured a suitable place—at Itzehoe, where he "felt almost at home again."

Back in Cassel meanwhile events moved swiftly and tragically. The French troops had completely occupied Hesse. The day after the flight, Governor General Lagrange had taken possession of the Landgrave's palace, packed the frightened old princess off to her daughter at Gotha, and two days later issued a proclamation confiscating all the former ruler's possessions in the name of the Emperor Napoleon and ordering all the state's revenues to be paid into the imperial treasury. In a panic Buderus and the secret regency council which William had appointed before his departure made haste to get their master's remaining treasures into hiding. Truckloads of coffers and boxes were buried under the walls and stairways of the palaces of Wilhelmshoehe, Sababurg and Loewenburg, one cartful of securities and other valuable papers was dispatched in the dead of the night to a warehouse in Frankfort, a number of cases filled with records found their way into the basement of the Judengasse home of old Meyer Rothschild. Subsequently it transpired that Lagrange had an itching palm, so that the greater part of the property safely reached its anxious owner at Rendsburg and Itzehoe, with the Governor General's connivance. The rest, consisting of eleven million thalers in bonds, coupons, cash, silver services and jewelry, including even William's prized rare-coin cabinet, which Meyer Rothschild had helped to fill, must be turned over to the imperial war chests. A round million francs went to Lagrange for his coöperation.

The Landgrave's sudden flight did not, as the Rothschilds had hoped, make an end of the bankers' war which had just previously broken out. It only delayed it for a space and shifted the fighting to another sector. Unquestionably the new alignment favored the Buderus-Rothschild side. So confident of this was Buderus that, far from endeavoring to pacify the enemy, he now boldly moved to eliminate the remaining competitors, all the way from the Jews in Cassel to the Van Nottens in London. On the very day of his master's departure he virtually appointed his associates sole bankers of the court of Hesse. They alone were henceforth to discount English and Danish drafts; they alone were to receive deposits of cash on hand. He instructed the Van Nottens to pay the interest on the Elector's English investments directly to Nathan in London. As everyone in Frankfort was aware that Buderus was in sole charge of his absent master's financial affairs, this practical Rothschild monopoly of the business could only come about through his orders. It was an open defiance of the great Frankfort houses, a frank avowal of his understanding with the Jewish concern, and a challenge to its competitors to do their worst.

The Bethmanns and Rueppell & Harnier accepted the challenge and carried the fight into Denmark, to the Landgrave's exile. The older house deemed it beneath its dignity to do more than write; it wrote to Rendsburg often and vigorously; the other was not too particular to employ the same kind of weapons as their Jewish adversaries. Rueppell & Harnier, too, had friends at court. They were on the most cordial terms with a man—Lennep was his name—who stood as high in the Prince's esteem as Buderus. Lennep, too, was an honest courtier with a family to provide for. He had won the rank of War Privy Councilor long before Buderus had, and during those difficult days of the flight and the rescue of his master's possessions had shown the utmost courage and devotion. Best of all, he was now on a mission which carried him back and forth between Hesse and Schleswig-Holstein, so that he was in direct and frequent touch with All-Highest.

Early in March both partners journeyed to Rendsburg, accompanied by their friend Lennep, to lay their case before William. They brought with them an earful of news, part of it true, some of it fact grotesquely distorted, much of it pure gossip, all of it disquieting. Serenity's mistrust, never fully relaxed, was readily roused. He believed all that his visitors told him, and suspected a great deal more. So that was what his good man's much-made-of devotion amounted to! The moment his master's back was turned, he proceeded to rob him for his own enrichment. That was how he repaid his Prince for the faith reposed in him, for being raised from obscurity to titled rank, for the kindness and generosity shown him. Only lately he, William, had offered to double his Director's salary, notwithstanding the impoverishment that stared him in the face, though in truth Buderus had, out of regard for his master's late misfortunes, declined it. Oh, there was no loyalty in the world, no appreciation, no gratitude. ("Oh, Hessians, in what a light you show yourselves," wrote the exile in his diary on another occasion.)

Prince William had from the start looked with distaste upon the evident alliance of his most trusted business adviser with the Jewish firm. That Buderus, like every one else, should have the customary ties with one or another of the court purveyors, his master took as a matter of course. But why those upstarts of the Judengasse? Weren't there enough high-grade houses who would gladly coöperate with a man of Buderus's position?—The high-grade houses might, to be sure, be unwilling to go so far as a share in their profits, or the idea might not occur to them; but William knew nothing of that arrangement.—And, of course, receiving favors, Buderus must necessarily earn them. That was all right. But, after all, his chief duty was to his Prince, to the man upon whom he depended in the first instance not alone for his living but for the power which made him valuable to the others. What was the fellow thinking of? Couldn't he see that by giving his friends a virtual monopoly, he was making enemies for himself and exposing his master to the gravest dangers? This was no time to stir up bad blood. With the invader in occupation of the country, with loyalist conspiracies continually hatching for his expulsion and the restoration of the rightful ruler, with scores of boxes of valuables still far from safety and the foe's secret police hunting for them high and low, Serenity needed,—oh, tragically—the goodwill of every man in Hesse, in Frankfort, everywhere.

Though this was the aspect of things which principally worried the Elector, the tales he was listening to disturbed him most profoundly on another ground also. He had, indeed, always found his man Buderus honest, loyal, dependable. Still, how could one really know? He was the head of a large family; his income was quite modest; his temptations, now especially when there was no one on the ground to supervise him, were enormous.—It was that thought, among others, that had moved Highness to suggest the salary increase.—Suppose, in these demoralized times, under the influence of the dreadful ideas issuing from France, suppose he were not to resist! There was no limit to the things he might not do, to the loot he might not take. There were a hundred unliquidated affairs of every conceivable kind that he could by collusion with the debtors wipe off the slate. Hundreds of thousands of thalers flowed monthly through his hands. There were countless transactions of which he alone knew anything. Come to think of it, his accounting for January and February had not yet come in—and Buderus was usually so punctual! It made William suddenly realize how utterly he was in his Director's power, and the realization made him profoundly uneasy.

So, partly to pacify his visitors, partly to administer a gentle snub to Buderus—a severe one he did not dare risk—he promised to look into their complaints. He promised it, and he meant it. He really must pull Herr von Carlshausen up a bit. Meanwhile, as an earnest of his esteem for the House of Rueppell & Harnier and for his man Lennep, he would forthwith entrust the latter with a financial transaction in Cassel of considerable importance, which should serve the double purpose of salving their feelings and sobering Director Buderus.

The bankers and their friend went on their way rejoicing. Their triumph was to be of short duration.

II

The longer the Elector reflected on the tidings he had received, the more he was disquieted and the higher soared his temper. When, therefore, he presently took action he proceeded rather more precipitately than he had meant to and than appeared necessary. He was in very bad humor with the world. His luck had deserted him; none of his affairs prospered any more. A revolt of the Hessian soldiery, from which he had expected great things, had ended in bloody failure. His endeavors to placate Napoleon and regain his throne—with Majesty superadded, the rascally go-betweens whispered to him—were apparently futile and certainly costly. The boorish disregard of his high station by the Holstein peasantry, who never so much as dropped a curtsy or lifted a hat when he went riding in his carriage, chafed his noble spirit beyond endurance. The unspeakable French were despoiling him without mercy. And now this fellow Buderus too, scheming heaven only knew what with those Jews of his! Well, he would stop that at least.

The explosion came the last week of June. In a letter, which by a sort of poetic fitness was sent through one of the Rothschilds, William suddenly decreed that, effective at once, the English and Danish checks, hitherto cashed by Buderus via Rothschild on the spot, be forwarded untouched to the Reserve Treasury at Itzehoe, the new seat of the captivity. "I shall expect from you," thundered His Highness, "an immediate acknowledgment of this decision and your compliance therewith (dass das Noetige besorgt ist)."

Coming thus without warning, this was an extremely unpleasant surprise. It not only knocked Buderus von Carlshausen's newly acquired knightly dignity askew, it struck terror and confusion into his and his associates' plans. Deliberate malice could not have chosen a worse time. A few months earlier such a blow, vicious as it was, might have been borne with resignation. But since the previous November things had been happening; startling, wonderful things. To continue happening, those English and Danish moneys of Serenity were absolutely indispensable. They were the concern's working capital. Their withdrawal spelled catastrophe.

The Elector had no sooner, by his sudden exit on the first of November, given the Rothschilds access to his money, than Napoleon, on the 27th, obligingly provided them with a profitable trade to employ it in. Having in the course of the summer thoroughly whipped Prussia and seized her coasts, the Emperor had on that day launched against Great Britain his memorable Continental Blockade. The Edict of Berlin, as it was called, prohibited all trade with England, declared all British merchandise contraband of war and closed the ports of the mainland to all ships arriving from the British Isles. This was the very thing that the Rothschilds needed. With Nathan in London to do the buying, with the Van Nottens handing him a monthly check for close to two thousand pounds, with Buderus in Frankfort supplying an equal or larger sum to the parent house, with cotton cloth and every other commodity from Britain or her colonies selling at famine prices, with four energetic, able-bodied, keen-eyed but close-mouthed young men on this side the Channel, the business of smuggling was as if made for the House of Rothschild. Nathan's connections in Manchester, his recent marriage into one of the most influential Jewish families in London, his evident command of considerable capital and his own great gifts as a merchant, had served to enlarge his credit over there. The family opened a receiving depot at the port of Hamburg, which was put in charge of old Meyer and one or another of the boys. By the end of June the imports from England had become by far the principal activity of the concern. The little shop on the Schnurgasse was still kept going, largely as a blind for the French police. The Rothschilds were doing a thriving commission business not only in cotton cloth but also in yarn, tobacco, coffee, sugar, indigo and other colonial wares, reëxporting to every part of Germany, to Holland and the Scandinavian countries and even into France itself. Things were going along swimmingly, and Nathan was once again spurring on his brothers, as well as doing his own bit, to get hold of further capital from the Elector—when, suddenly, the thunderbolt fell.

Worse things yet seemed to be looming. Throughout the summer Serenity kept ceaselessly ordering his Director to present himself at Itzehoe and give an account of himself. There were so many things he could not understand; he was all in a muddle about his affairs; besides, he was lonely and homesick for old faces. Buderus assured him he would be delighted to answer any question, from a distance. But he begged to be excused from undertaking that journey just now. He pleaded urgent and heavy duties at home, the hardships and the dangers of travel, the suspicions his departure would arouse in the watchful

French police. But William insisted. So early in September, his arguments and resistance exhausted, Buderus packed his bag and mounted the stage coach for Itzehoe. On the evening of the tenth he stood before his quizzical master.

He stood in the little house in Holstein with hat in hand and trepidation under his tunic. Yet, now he was here, he was almost glad. At last the long-threatened storm was about to break. Let it break; he could weather it. What had he to fear? He had done nothing he could not defend. Any other man in his place would have done as much, if not more. He was making the most of his opportunities, as a responsible head of a family was in honor bound to do, without in the slightest degree hurting his master's interests or betraying his trust. What was more, he had the inside grip on the situation; it would take months and a staff of auditors to check up on him. Highness might thunder. But so long as he kept his head he, Buderus, would hold the upper hand. Whatever happened, he was confident of the outcome. None the less he could wish it were behind him.

In three days it was over, and he was returning home triumphant beyond his rosiest hopes. He had beaten them all—the Cassel Jews, Rueppell & Harnier, Lennep, and the mighty Bethmanns themselves. The future of his children was assured!

The first encounter, on the evening of his arrival, was at best a draw. William, lofty, overbearing, injured and fussy, led off by demanding why his Director was so thick with the Rothschilds and so distant toward the Bethmanns. Exactly what was the reason that he so invariably favored those Jews of low antecedents and doubtful repute against the oldest and most honored Christian banking house in Germany? Buderus, a little disconcerted—he had expected a somewhat different opening—hedged and stammered. Why, there was no reason, other than the wish to do his best for His Electoral Serenity's interests. Devotion to his master was the tenderest, the only concern of his days and nights. William waved the generality aside with an impatient gesture. Then Buderus recovered some of his composure. The very superiority of the Gentile firms, he pointed out, counted against them at this time. Their high standards, their great past, prevented them from being useful in transactions which, since the French occupation, were necessarily of questionable legality. Indeed, the Bethmanns and the Christian houses generally, had shown little eagerness to risk their good name in the deposed ruler's cause. They were too much taken up with themselves to give a thought to Highness's misfortunes. The Rothschilds, on the other hand, precisely because of their humble origin, precisely because they had no ancient reputations to consider, were willing to do whatever was asked of them. They never refused a task, however difficult or dangerous, where his lordship was concerned. They were a god-send. He, Buderus, would hardly know what to do, or how to carry on his work, without them. They were Serenity's most loyal and devoted servants.

Buderus retired from the presence uncertain whether he had lost or gained ground. Alone in his chamber that night he went over the interview step by step. He decided that he had not acquitted himself as gallantly as he had expected. Without exactly losing the first round, he had let his master browbeat and confuse him. His choicest arguments were still unused. No, he would not risk another personal encounter if he could avoid it. He was too easily put out of countenance. Here in the quiet of his room he could think of any number of things he ought to have said. He would say them, now, in writing, away from that irritating, suspicious eye. He got up and went to work. The next day he handed William a long letter, categorically explaining his position. It was in effect a brief for the Rothschilds; and while it was by no means the last word that was to be said, it decided the argument.

Buderus began by frankly admitting that ever since the day of his master's regrettable departure, he had, with one or two exceptions, let the Rothschilds convert all the drafts coming from the Van Nottens in London. It had seemed to him good to do so because working through a single house was always more efficient and in these cruel times the only safe way. There was no need to dwell on the danger of too many people knowing his master's affairs just now. He had picked the Rothschilds for the reason already mentioned, as well as for the following:

Firstly. They were punctual with their payments. With money nowadays going out faster than it came in, this was of first importance. Indeed, on more than one occasion when there were pressing bills to pay, the Rothschilds had cheerfully settled up in advance of collection.

Secondly. They could be trusted absolutely to hold their tongues. When some disgruntled individual, unmindful of the injury to Serenity's interests, had recently informed against them, the police utterly failed to get a word out of them—not even after examining their books!

Thirdly. They always paid the exact rate of exchange prevailing on the day of sale.

Fourthly. They willingly attended to certain payments which need not be named and which were he to handle them himself would expose All-Highest to very serious consequences.

There were many other advantages about the arrangements that he could easily point out. However, he had said enough to show that, unlike certain people whose church affiliations were doubtless more commendable, the Rothschilds were loyal, discreet, business-like, honest, dependable and tireless in the service of the Most-High.

"And since," added Buderus sweetly, "I am unable to discover the smallest difference between a florin of Rothschild and a florin of Bethmann, I thought that I was doing everything for the best. It hurts me, however, to observe that Your Prince-Electoral Serenity, to judge by yesterday's verbal utterances, does not seem graciously to approve. I should, therefore, like to ask for definite instructions as to how the English checks are to be disposed of in future."

It was to him, he repeated, a matter of complete indifference. Only he must say right now in advance that after punctually carrying out highest orders, whatever they might be, he would not hold himself in any way responsible for any untoward consequences they might have. And this reminded him of something. His P.-E. S. doubtless recalled the sudden fit of mistrust that seized him earlier in the summer, when he issued that ill-timed order about sending on the checks here to Itzehoe. Well, it was no use now dwelling on the mischief that resulted in—the unpaid bills, the want suffered by interned Hessian officers and his own wounded pride. The one thing he was in duty bound to say was this:

"Had Yr. P.-E. S. been most graciously content not to interfere in my business, I could have sold 20,000 pounds sterling at 141½. Today they are worth at least six thousand florins less, and no human ingenuity on earth can now prevent that loss."

That thrust struck home. There was no fight left in William. He made a brave show of pretending that he was unconvinced at yet another conference. But he knew, and Buderus knew, that the battle was over. Serenissimus' religious preferences were not as extreme as all that. When it came to losing six thousand florins he was as open-minded as any French revolutionist. So he threw over Bethmann and the rest of them without much further ado. On the following day, amid mutual expressions of esteem and regret, peace was signed.

III

Returning home to Hanau—he had moved his head-quarters to the little old capital, so as to be more accessible to his Frankfort associates and less in the way of the French usurpers at Cassel—Buderus went methodically to work to consolidate his victory. The Bethmanns were out. Lennep, as might have been expected, had during the summer eliminated himself by making a fiasco of the commission entrusted to him at Rendsburg. The man was not a financier to start with. In addition, he had had the ill-luck to lose a parcel of his master's bonds, which he insinuated certain Jews, including the Rothschilds, had stolen from him. Lastly, he had attempted to execute that commission without saying a word about it to Buderus; and that misstep had only given the latter the needed opening to crush him. That had done for him and for his patrons Rueppell & Harnier. The Cassel Jews need not worry anybody. They had no channels worth mentioning to Serenity's ear. They could be brushed aside without ceremony. So, competition all but wiped out, the Rothschilds had a clear field. The question now was, What were they going to do with their monopoly? No, even before that, the immediate problem was to see that they held it.

Buderus had from the beginning given much thought to that aspect of the situation. The Prince's flight, he perceived, was the greatest opportunity of his career and of his friends'. It not only made him all-powerful, so that he could put business into their hands to an extent which would have been out of the question in normal times; it enabled him and them to render services to the wealthy ruler in his hour of trouble and so to win his favor and gratitude, just when everyone was being cool to him. Before all else, then, there must be the strictest honesty and punctuality in money matters; everything they were entrusted with must be promptly and fully accounted for; he must never lose a penny through any fault of theirs. If losses occurred, they must suffer them themselves—and make them up in ways less obvious. But that was not enough. They must play the courtiers, wait on him and coddle him and cater to him in every way possible, regardless of time, effort or expense. They would find it worth their while. Highness loved flattery and attention; he was used to it and expected it; he would love it all the more now.

The keen young men knew wisdom when they heard it. It needed no urging from Buderus to tell them that this policy would be its own reward. All they required of him was a bit of prompting now and then as to the surest way to please the man he knew so well. When they opened their places in Hamburg that summer, they made the most of their nearness to Denmark to lend a hand with the transporting of the exile's treasures. One or two of the precious boxes were obligingly taken care of at their Hamburg premises till they could be safely moved further. A number of the coffers and parcels were relayed through them to Lawaetz, who saw them to their destination in Gottorp, Rendsburg, Itzehoe and subsequently in Prague. From their home base in Frankfort they disbursed the salaries of Hessian agents, soldiers and others in the former ruler's pay, sometimes deducting the outlay from Buderus's deposits, often uncomplainingly advancing the money out of their own pockets. Loans undertaken by William just before his banishment and partly liquidated but now threatening to turn bad, were taken over by them, further payments stopped if necessary, and the irate borrowers faced. No charge was made for any of these ticklish services. They were the unselfish Rothschilds' contributions to the comfort and peace of mind of their noble patron in his misfortune. Buderus had hardly overstated the case when he had told his master that without their support he would be helpless.

Buderus, however, did not intend to recline on his laurels. His victory at Itzehoe was a justification of his good counsel. So far, so good. But he knew his Prince too well to assume that any understanding with him was final. There would be other fusses no doubt, as the Rothschild-Buderus program went on toward its fulfilment. Serenity was not likely to submit to the very next step without a struggle. The competitors, temporarily routed, were bound to reshape their lines and attack again. This was little more than a breathing spell. It was the part of prudence to utilize it in preparation for future trouble.

The votive offerings to Highness must not only continue, they must be increased.

Waiting on William became henceforth a regular feature of the concern's business. To facilitate the work—and also to escape the excessive curiosity of the Napoleonic police—the Rothschilds bought a coach of their own. In it one member or another of the family was constantly journeying between Frankfort and the cities of refuge. Kalmann, the least gifted of the five brothers, who was by now a young man of nineteen, did most of the traveling. The eldest, Amschel, often remained within call for months on end, buying and selling and running errands for the Prince and the Countess von Schlotheim, advising him on money matters, bringing him news of home, of political events, of the activities of the French in Hesse—performing in short the combined functions of an ambassador, a personal manager, a secret agent and a courier. When William migrated to Prague the next year, it was the Rothschilds who helped dispose of the house at Itzehoe and secured for him the Zatory farm near the Bohemian capital. Their carriage was equipped with a secret compartment, in which reports from the Hessian regency council, bundles of securities and other bulky articles could be conveyed. Ordinary mail was concealed on the messengers' person.

The personal ties with the Prince were knitted closer in other ways as well. Occasionally old Meyer, as the titular head of the concern, wrote the exile a cheer-up letter, assuring him of his loyalty "to the last drop of my blood," advising him not to take too high and mighty a line with the conqueror, volunteering to interpose on his behalf with the Empress Josephine on her expected visit to Frankfort, and to use his influence with Governor General Lagrange by way of conserving the ex-ruler's property. The aged merchant knew, of course, that he was promising more than he could perform; but Buderus believed there was no harm in being hopeful. It would keep his master in good humor toward the firm; he rather liked feeling that people were exerting themselves in his interests, even if their efforts came to nothing. And it so happened that the Rothschilds did in fact play no small part afterwards in easing the rigors of the occupation for the Elector and his faithful. For that thanks to the interesting comradeship which grew up between a Catholic archbishop and the Jewish merchant family. Of the good prelate, more anon.

Just what use, however, all these ministrations were, is problematical. For the fact is that the peace made at Itzehoe did not last. Of course, renewed friction might have come sooner and gone further, had the Rothschilds been less thoughtful. There is no knowing. The Serene William was a difficult man, without a doubt. Hopelessly mistrustful certain people—Buderus, for instance—found him. He may have been. And then again, it is possible he was merely taking bankers' helpfulness and unselfishness at a discount. He had a shrewd and cynical streak in him. However all this might be, it was not many months after September 1807 that his suspicions woke again and the tension between Prince and Director quickly rose to the breaking point. And for this there appeared to be grounds.

Years and years ago it had become an established rule that Buderus render each month an account of his transactions. Upon William's precipitate exit there had followed such confusion, however, that Buderus was compelled to depart from custom. This was one of the agenda, it would seem, at the Itzehoe conference. With a reduced staff, with the French police watching his every step, with the administration divided between Hesse and Denmark, with the mails in chaos and less safe than ever, Buderus argued that in the interests of prudence, if for no other reason, he should be permitted to lump the entire year 1807 in a single report. Highness, surprisingly, agreed. He had his reasonable moments, at intervals. He realized what difficulties his man was working under, and he was not disposed to add to them. But he assumed that as soon as the year was over the report would promptly follow. When, therefore, 1808 came round and month succeeded month without a scrap of an accounting reaching him, he was first surprised, then annoyed and finally indignant. He urged, he pleaded, he became dangerous and threatened, he resorted to reprisals; the report did not come. It never did come till October of 1810, and then it was so tangled-up as to be unintelligible to the auditors. Thereupon William ordered Buderus to present himself at Prague and explain it. Buderus refused, and William made unprincely insinuations and held up the clearances on all the other accounts. In retaliation Buderus threatened not to dip another pen in ink till his reports were duly and formally acknowledged. So menaced, Serenissimus mended his manners and assured Herr von Carlshausen of his complete confidence. Only why not come to Prague? Now Buderus's tone also softened: He would be glad to take the trip, as soon as the political situation permitted. But alas! Napoleon continued to make war. And so the report for the year 1807 remained undeciphered till that triumphant day when, following the Battle of Leipzig, the Elector was carried into Cassel upon the shoulders of his jubilant subjects. Some of the clearances were still to be signed while the Emperor Napoleon was on his way to St. Helena.

There is no overwhelming reason for doubting Buderus's sincerity in this whole affair. There are only some remarkable coincidences. In the summer of 1808 when his master was becoming unpleasant, Buderus defended his delays quite convincingly. He must, he said, do every bit of writing and figuring with his own hands, attend to an enormous correspondence which in these times required the most painstaking care both in wording and posting, go on numerous journeys, carry on complicated negotiations with all sorts of people—and all this in the strictest secrecy. Besides:

"It is surely most graciously known that my papers are hidden away, so that I could not (even if I had the time) possibly work at my accounts. I trust I shall soon be able to fetch them again, and then by taking extra time at night I shall try to relieve Your Electoral Serenity of uneasiness on this score, and prove that I have not a single penny of Your Highest Self's money in my hands."

Could anything be more straightforward? And yet—

Napoleon had no sooner seized Hesse than he went vigorously to work to collect the deposed ruler's loans. In those three and a half years between the spring of 1807 and the autumn of 1810, while William was waiting for his Director's accounting, repeated and ever-increasing inducements were offered the debtors to pay up what they owed to the imperial treasury. Concurrently the exiled Elector took steps, through Buderus, to have his money returned to himself. A large number of the borrowers settled with the usurper; many others preferred to redeem their bonds from the rightful lender. In some cases Buderus collected the sums in full, in others he must meet the terms offered by the French. Of all these complex transactions no accounting was rendered till three years later.

Interesting to note also is the fact that between 1807 and 1810 the contraband exported by Nathan Rothschild from England went on continually mounting. The biggest month was July 1810. By October of the same year Nathan had found more interesting ways to invest the Elector's funds, as well as other and larger ways of access to them.

Still it is not impossible that the two sets of occurrences have nothing to do with one another. The coincidences may be purely fortuitous.

CHAPTER V

POLICE!

THE French seizure of their country was accepted with resignation neither by the populace nor by its banished ruler. The Hessians were not exactly devoted to their miserly prince, but they loved the foreign usurper even less. Such is the curious sentiment of race. Napoleon and his royal brother Jerome and their lieutenants were no indulgent masters, it is true. They squeezed the last sou out of their German subjects, and carried the money out of the country, and in general conducted themselves as the victors in conquered territory always do. But the rightful and hereditary William and his predecessors, who had been governing Hesse for five centuries, had done precisely those things. The French made no abstruse distinction between public funds and the private purse of the chief of state, and governed by edict without so much as pretending to consult the pleasure of the governed, and when they wanted men for war, as they constantly did, they recruited every able-bodied male they could get their hands on and marched him off to wherever he was most needed, irrespective of his religious convictions on the subject. But it was by just such ideals of statecraft that the Landgraves had made William the richest money-lender that had ever sat on a throne. Nevertheless, the Hessians believed they could see a difference, and strenuously objected to the change. They addressed petitions to the Emperor for the restoration of their legitimate Prince, vowing that they had always been "completely happy under his rule;" and these being roughly dismissed, they took secret and solemn oaths to drive the foreigner out by force.

William's preference for the old régime is somewhat easier to understand. It was also rather more fervent and enduring. To exchange his lonely exile for dear, familiar scenes, the dethroned Elector shied at no weapon and scorned no ally. He prayed to heaven, to his subjects, to his supplanter. The most transparent charlatan could get money out of him by promising to use his influence at the Tuileries. Half a dozen such obliging diplomats were at one time exerting themselves in the cause. Simultaneously William, from his refuge, bombarded his accredited envoys at all the capitals, his poor wife, his daughter the Duchess of Gotha, the Austrian Emperor and no end of other people, likely and unlikely, to plead for him with Napoleon and to assure him of his loyalty and devotion. But as Napoleon had other plans in mind for Hesse, as he was, besides, more keenly interested in William's well-known millions than in his slightly tainted allegiance, and knew he could have only one or the other, he went after the cash and let the assurances go; so that nothing but snubs came of all these far-flung endeavors. The anxious Prince, for his part, was not quite so hopeful as to put all his wine in one vessel; wherefore, whilst his go-betweens were busy in Paris and elsewhere, he joined the various German liberation movements, went regularly to church so as to induce the Almighty to bless the hand of Napoleon's would-be assassins, and encouraged his agents at home to foment revolts which he undertook to subsidize, "in the event that they achieved their purpose."

It goes without saying that the imperial deputies and officials in Cassel, Hanau and Frankfort had more than an inkling of these latter enterprises, and kept a watchful eye open on all and sundry who still maintained contact, direct or indirect, with the absent monarch. And thus it came about that when the French, some two months after the occupation, upon ordering the Hessian military to don the imperial uniform and make themselves ready for service in Spain and upon being met with rebellious shouts of "Death to the invaders!" proceeded to ferret out the ringleaders and accessories of the plot, some good friend whispered to them that if they would go around to Number 148 Judengasse, to a house called "Zum gruenen Schild" but at present occupied by a family named Rothschild, they would probably find what they were looking for and maybe something more for good measure.

As a matter of fact, the information turned out to be mistaken. That is to say, the police did not find what they were looking for. They found, instead, a Jewish family of the middle class, consisting of an elderly pair, several daughters with their husbands, one or more married sons with their wives, and one or two unmarried younger members. The group was obviously worried and frightened; but, upon being questioned, gave what appeared to be a good account of themselves. They denied all knowledge of the soldiers' uprising and of the exiled ruler's affairs. They promptly, even cheerfully, produced their books when asked for them; and an examination of these seemed to prove that the family had told the truth. Not a trace of any dealings with the Prince or his agents could be found in them.

And that, for immediate purposes, was the end of the first encounter of the Rothschilds with the Napoleonic authorities. All in all, it was the family's inning. They had had a scare, it is true; but even that was not an unmixed evil: it gave them confidence for future searches, if there should be any. Their skilful conduct throughout was, moreover, likely to avert suspicion later on. Most important of all, they had not slipped up on a thing. The police seemed to have gone away no wiser than they had come. His Serene Highness would be delighted when he heard that; it should strengthen his belief in their ability, their discreetness, their loyalty. He should hear of it, of course, at the first opportunity. The good Director Buderus must see to it.

This was in the summer of 1807. A month or so later, as might be recalled, Buderus was facing his master at Itzehoe. In defense of the Rothschilds and of his close relations with them, he did surely enough cite the incident with the French at Frankfort. It was one of the things that impressed the Prince and ended the discussion.

But the Napoleonic police, as it turned out, took a lot more convincing than that.

II

It would have been little short of a miracle if the curiosity of the occupation authorities had been appeased by that initial visit. Their failure on that occasion to connect the house with the Elector's plots had been disappointing, but it did not allay their doubts. They drew from it the simple enough conclusion—the firm was keeping a double set of books. It was an irritating device; however, there was no help for it; the merchants would use it, to escape taxes and cover up doubtful transactions. The Jewish family's resort to it was anything but reassuring; it only indicated that there were aspects of their business which they wanted to keep dark. The house of the Green Shield with its dependencies on the Schnurgasse, the Kurtrierplatz and elsewhere would bear watching.

Exactly what those very busy young men were up to remained, for the time being, to be found out. Nor did it look as if it were going to be easy, even afterwards, to bring them to book. They were about as keen and tough and slippery and uncommunicative a lot as any police officer in His Majesty's service would care to meet. For all that, no amount of shrewdness could possibly keep their hand concealed forever. They were much too active, their enterprises were too varied and numerous, for that.

There was, to begin with, the refugee Prince with his millions. An undetermined but certainly a huge part of his fortune was known to have been left behind, in the form of outstanding local loans, in securities of every sort, in jewelry, silver and what not. Gossip had it that this entire treasure had on the night of the flight been rushed to the Rothschild premises and that it still remained in their care. However that might be, a lively commerce between him and them was obviously going on. For the longest time every one in Frankfort had been suspecting that Buderus von Carlshausen was on a certain footing of intimacy with the Jewish merchant family. After October 1, 1807, that suspicion had turned into fact. This Buderus was by common knowledge the man whom the exiled William had left in charge of his financial affairs. It was clearly his job to rescue his master's loans from the imperial grasp, to gather up the tangible property and get it across the frontier to its owner, and in other ways to look after the ex-ruler's pecuniary interests. But Buderus was keeping mouse-quiet at Hanau and on his little country estate of Carlshausen nearby, while his associates the Rothschilds were working like beavers and their carriage was uninterruptedly on the road. It was as simple as two and two: The young bankers were the link between the flown Elector and his man on the ground.

That was one thing. Then there was another. William, as the police had long ago found out, had left behind him in Cassel a secret ministry, or regency council, to represent his political interests. It was they who directed the agents and conspirators in Hesse, who kept the communications open with the League of Virtue and other German liberation societies, who watched over the disbanded army chiefs and their subordinates, and who inspired the petitions and the popular patriotic fervor. The council, the agents, the old officers and soldiers must live. Their master, through orders on Buderus, saw that they did not starve. And the Rothschilds were Buderus's bankers.

Then, again, there was the Continental Blockade, which prohibited trading with Napoleon's arch enemy, England. The Rothschilds not only had a shop in which English cotton and English colonial wares, such as coffee and tea and indigo, were sold; one of their number was residing and doing business in London; his father and brothers on this side of the Channel kept in touch with him regularly both from Frankfort and from a branch office which they had latterly opened at the port of Hamburg. This absent member seemed in effect to be one of the firm, its representative in the enemy capital. And meantime the blockade was being patently violated by somebody; for the Continent, notably Frankfort, was filling up with contraband. It looked rather as if the concern might be having a hand in the smuggling trade.

In sum, even without anything unusual happening, the sheer complexion of the Rothschild affairs and contacts had a suspicious color. In disturbed times like these, when extraordinary events were crowding one another off the calendar, when even the most peaceful citizen of an occupied country had all he could do to keep off the police blotters, a great firm on the make such as the House of Rothschild could hardly expect to escape attention. That first little episode in the summer of 1807 was nothing but a prelude. Between that year and 1811 no fewer than five actions were taken, four of them in their raids on the premises or summonses to headquarters. The French authorities had scented blood and meant to trail the quarry to its lair.

To make it easier for them, there were the coreligionists of the Rothschilds, to whom the progress of the brothers was not an agreeable sight.

III

On the 7th of July, 1807, Napoleon and the Tsar of Russia signed at Tilsit a treaty of peace and friendship, whereby the two emperors agreed to divide Europe between them. Five days later the Electorate of Hesse along with some other fragments of the Confederation of the Rhine was transformed into the Kingdom of Westphalia. At Cassel preparations were at once begun for the entry of the new monarch into his new capital. Two weeks before Christmas Jerome Napoleon I ascended the throne amid the cheers of his loyal Hessian subjects.

Governor General Lagrange, who had hitherto ruled the province in the name of the Emperor, and who had proved so obliging in the matter of dispatching Prince William's coffers out of the country, became Minister of War in the royal cabinet. He had hardly taken office, however, when rumors of the unkindest and most disquieting sort began reaching the palace on the Wilhelmshoehe. If they were to be believed, Lagrange had as Governor General not performed his duty as faithfully as could have been wished. Thus, among other things, he had confiscated eleven million thalers of the Elector's money, which had been duly delivered to the imperial exchequer in Paris. This he had reported to be the sum total of the former ruler's fortune still within reach. It now appeared, however, that at least an equal amount, consisting of negotiable securities and other things of value, had somehow slipped through the lines into the hands of their outlawed owner; that, in addition, a great assortment of loans to princes, merchants and others of the vicinity had by the General's indulgence been permitted to be repaid to the original lender, instead of being collected for His Majesty in accordance with the Decree of St. Cloud and other decrees; that a not inconsiderable number of such loans were still outstanding; and that, lastly, the grateful ex-Elector had rewarded the amiable Lagrange with a little gift of one million francs, besides gallantly presenting a memento to Madame Lagrange in the form of a necklace valued at 30,000 francs.

In view of these rumors, which inquiry showed to be not unfounded, it became the painful duty of King Jerome Napoleon I to offer the portfolio of War to some incumbent of sterner composition and to banish the good Lagrange from his royal presence. It seeming improbable, moreover, that the negotiations between the refugee Elector and the late Governor General had been conducted without intermediaries on the ground, or that their execution had been effected without the aid of subordinate French officials, the inquiry was widened with a view to discovering such possible accessories. The trail led, on the French side, to certain of the former Governor's immediate aides, and, on the Serene William's, to Buderus, his preferred bankers and one or two others. Lagrange's dismissal occurred in January 1808, only a few weeks after Jerome's arrival in Cassel; the supplementary investigation lasted till mid-summer of the same year.

The upshot of it all was that Buderus as well as his old rival Lennep was arrested and taken under guard to Mayence. Buderus freely admitted his continued loyalty to his banished master and his concern with the latter's affairs, but no amount of grilling or threats would produce anything more. He was, he insisted, merely His Highness's bookkeeper and factotum; there was nothing illegal about that. Yes, he was sending reports and balance sheets and that sort of thing by post to Denmark, to his employer's present address. If the authorities had anything against his doing so, he would, of course, have to stop. No, the police were quite willing to have him continue. Only he must submit all papers, before posting them, to His Majesty's servants. With this warning, suggestive of future interviews, both men were allowed to go.

The Rothschilds' turn had come earlier. Old Meyer being ill in bed, Salomon responded to the summons by appearing at the court house in Frankfort. He entered a sweeping denial, of course; his firm, he declared, had had nothing to do with the Lagrange bribery episode. It happened to be quite true. That entire affair had been handled by William's political representatives, not by his financial agent. The secret regency council had seen the Governor General, had come to an understanding with him as to terms, and had then merely asked Buderus to provide the wherewithal. Partly because Highness was just then in bad humor with the Rothschilds—it was the time of the Bethmann and Rueppell & Harnier insinuations—and partly because the Jewish bankers were likely to arouse jealousy in mercantile circles and suspicion in official quarters, the Prince's ministers directed that the payments be made through a concern of their own choosing. The Rothschilds' hands were thus clean. Salomon, however, could not deny that certain correspondence from Holstein reached Buderus through his address; and upon being ordered to deliver the same to police headquarters in future, he was excused.

No more enlightening was the examination of Bansa & Son, bankers, the concern above alluded to. They, too, entered a general denial, they likewise cheerfully submitted their records, and these, equally with the Rothschilds', contained not a solitary mention of Governor General Lagrange. The Frankfort schools of business taught double-entry bookkeeping as a regular part of the curriculum, clearly.

The Royal Westphalian police were sure they were on the right trail. Their failure to bag their game baffled them. Their doubts increased, and so did their vigilance.

IV

The erection of a kingdom upon the ruins of his beloved Electorate, the Majesty whereof adorned not himself but the son of a Corsican lawyer, was a cruel blow to William. "Most terrible of all days!" he moaned in his journal. "I am deposed. Hesse, my dear Hesse, knocked down to the Kingdom of Westphalia. . . . My house has reigned uninterruptedly for 542 years, since Henry the Child, through twenty-one rulers, attained with me its highest peak, and now has totally ceased to be! O God, give me strength to bear this misfortune as thou wouldst have me, without whimpering."

The prayer must have been granted; for though he never ceased complaining, his courage did return after a time. The wretched fiasco in which the Christmas soldiers' rebellion had ended had not disheartened him. It had on the contrary given him much hope. For the lesson which he drew from it was, not that the usurper was invincible, but that his people were ready to die for their Prince. Logically, therefore, he buckled on his saber for fresh efforts. How very much in earnest he now was may be judged from the fact he no longer insisted on bartering Hessian troops for English subsidies (as he had obstinately done before his flight) but volunteered to put an army corps of four thousand men into the field at his own expense, as his contribution to the anti-French war then brewing, and even to help with money in the ambitious plans for a general revolt in Northern Germany which were being fostered by the Prussian minister Von Stein. The corps, to be sure, subsequently shrank to thirteen hundred men and not quite three hundred horses; but he did design the uniforms himself, and anyhow it was nobody's fault that recruiting was so slow.

The whole adventure misfired, unfortunately. A letter of Von Stein's dealing with the projected war and uprisings fell into the hands of the French, and this caused Napoleon to demand that the Prussian king dismiss and banish his minister. In April (1809) the Austrians were beaten at Eckmuehl, by way of a prelude to the crushing defeat at Wagram. On the same day French artillery scattered the premature rebellion of the under-armed and badly-led Hessian peasantry.

As might have been expected, the royal police at Cassel once again determined to hunt down the financial agents of the plot. Poor Lennep was at once taken into custody, and locked up in the fortress at Mayence where for weeks he was treated like a common criminal. Then, on the 9th of May, a detachment of soldiers commanded by a police officer showed up at Buderus's home in Hanau with a warrant for his arrest. Buderus happened to be with his family at his country place in Carlshausen that day. A sister of his was alone in the town house. Pointing a gun at her head, the officer demanded to know where her brother was hiding. After much rough-handling of the lady, breaking open of desk-drawers and rummaging through files, they were persuaded to leave. They then proceeded to Carlshausen, seized what papers they could find, and marched Buderus as their prisoner back to Hanau. There he was severely grilled for two days and finally released under bail.

The Rothschilds came off rather easier. Residing in Frankfort, they were not within the jurisdiction of Jerome's kingdom. To be sure, Frankfort was, like Hesse, part of Napoleon's empire; it was, however, a separate unit, and was governed by a gentleman of quite another stripe. Archbishop Carl von Dalberg, sometime Elector of Mayence, had found favor in the imperial sight by doing the preliminary diplomatic work in the formation of the Confederation of the Rhine. A good Teuton, an easy-going, kindly man, an ambitious prelate, he was convinced that Napoleon was destined to do infinitely more for the advancement of German unity than all the petty, selfish, mutually distrusting native princelings. For his services the Emperor appointed him primate of the Confederation, and assigned him the City of Frankfort as his more or less sovereign domain. His bailiwick was left intact even after the anointed Jerome entered his kingdom. In 1810 Napoleon named him Grand Duke of Frankfort and gave him Hanau for his capital.

Thus the Rothschilds, though in fact subjects of imperial France, came directly under the allegiance of Archbishop Dalberg; and he and they were the best of friends. The Jewish firm had from the beginning made a point of cultivating the good prelate. His cloth notwithstanding, he was a man of the most liberal views; also, he was ambitious and hard up. The bankers, on the other hand, had ample funds, and their affairs just then were of such a nature that influence in high quarters was desirable at any cost. As time was to prove, Dalberg's friendship was decisive in at least one crisis in the family's history.

It surely was a life-saver in the spring of 1809.

Having disposed of Lennep and Buderus, the Westphalian Commissioner of Police, Savagner, gave his attention to the Jewish banking house. He made up his mind, now once and for all, to finish with those bright young men. He had had enough of idle hearings and farcical examinations of their dummy books. He wanted the lot of them jailed. He wanted them jailed, and he wanted their places, all of them, thoroughly ransacked. Evidence that they had played any part in the recent revolt was, to be sure, lacking. No matter. It was manifest to everyone that they had their hands in a dozen unlawful operations. Well, this was the time to bring them to book. The late uprising was merely the needed pretext.

But Dalberg, it appeared, was of another mind. He was sorry to seem unobliging to a friendly neighbor state; but really he could not have his subjects annoyed, let alone imprisoned, on mere suspicion. He refused the warrants, therefore, for which Savagner asked. He did something more: he quietly let the Rothschilds know that trouble was brewing for them, and that though he was doing his best, he might be unable to avert it altogether. With this timely warning, the energetic young people set about preparing for the worst. The boxes of documents belonging to the Prince were during the night hauled out of their hiding place in the house cellar and laboriously transferred through a subterranean passage to the long-disused space underneath the court which in times gone by had served the dwellers of the Judengasse as a refuge from rioting mobs. Papers of their own which were likely to arouse embarrassing attention were similarly disposed of. The merchandise, which just at this time came in especially large shipments from certain countries unapproved of by the French, it was, of course, impossible to whisk out of sight. The most one could do was to remove tell-tale wrappers and tags. That done, the family carefully rehearsed the threatened interview, and sat down to pray for more power to the Archbishop's elbow.

Events showed the wisdom of these preparations. In the next day or two the good Dalberg was rather forcibly reminded that there were limits to his sovereignty. Pressure exerted from Cassel via the imperial envoy at Frankfort could not be ignored. A point had, therefore, to be yielded. Of the arrest of the bankers Dalberg still would not hear. With no more evidence than Savagner had to offer, it would be unconstitutional and outrageous. However, if the Westphalian authorities really believed it would be of any use to them, why, of course, they could have a search warrant. But propriety and due respect for the sovereign dignity of Frankfort demanded that an officer of the city state assist at the proceedings. He must insist on that, naturally.

So Dalberg's man assisted, and did what he could as public defender. None the less, the visit was by no means an empty formality. The search, begun at the house on the Judengasse, was carried into the merchants' dependencies in town. Old Meyer, though again ill in bed, was questioned and cross-questioned most thoroughly, and so was Guetele, his wife, their daughter Jettchen, who was in charge of the cash box, two sons—the others being on the road—and their wives. Perfunctorily, too, the visitors glanced at the books. They had learned by this time how little they must expect from that source.

A certain directness and self-assurance marked the authorities' conduct of the personal examinations. The questions had not only been written out in advance; they seemed to be based on information of a peculiarly intimate nature, as if someone on the inside of William's affairs had had a hand in their preparation. It disconcerted the family not a little.

Old Meyer especially was upset by this unexpected development. The apparent omniscience of the police played havoc with his poise. A sudden question brought from him the admission that Buderus had earlier in the year deposited twenty thousand florins with the firm. It had been drawn out again, however, by checks payable to a number of persons. Who these persons were, he could not remember, nor anything about them. He was an ailing aged man, and his memory was not what it used to be. Could he at least explain how it was that the transactions had not been entered in the books? Yes, he could do that. The whole matter was in the nature of a friendly personal service, and Buderus invariably made good each disbursement; thus the account remained constant and did not have to be kept track of. Thereupon his inquisitor pounced on him. That being the case, Savagner demanded, was it not true that the bank still owed the ex-Prince's man the full twenty thousand florins? The confused old man conceding that it must be so, was commanded to hand the sum over to the imperial treasury, in accordance with the Edict of St. Cloud.

This, after all the warnings and rehearsals, was a sad slip. It hit Buderus particularly hard. Here he had been harping for three years on the discreetness and self-sacrifice of the Rothschilds, and now he must report that! He would have to do a deal of explaining, and stress the far greater losses which the faithful bankers had prevented.

The unerring intelligence that guided Savagner's men in the questioning seemed also to inspire their search through the buildings. To the riot cellar, where William's boxes lay interred, they miraculously did not penetrate. But the way they hustled through the stores of merchandise and eyed each piece of English stuff betrayed a remarkable expertness. With every identifying mark removed, they could naturally do no more than think things. But their discoveries and the Rothschilds' halting explanations forebode trouble in the future. It came the following year, and hit many other people besides the Rothschilds.

Meantime it transpired by whose hand the police had been so ably directed on this occasion—as well as on some previous ones no doubt. The questionnaire had actually been prepared and the constables coached by one of the Rothschilds' old friends among the Jews of Cassel. The little group of merchants in the Hessian capital had never forgiven their Frankfort rivals for grabbing off Herr Buderus and his flesh-pots. When they saw, however, such powerful houses as the Bethmanns' going down in defeat before them, they abandoned all hope of redress through appeals to Highness direct, and adopted the purely negative tactics of trying to injure the upstart concern through the new régime. They were aware, of course, that by so doing they would strike quite as much at Buderus's master as at his Jewish associates. They did not mind taking that risk. They were, to begin with, half-convinced that the Electorate would never be restored, not at least in William's lifetime. The Bonapartes were growing stronger every day, and the exiled Prince was a gouty old reprobate. Besides, the more of his money fell into the hands of his conquerors, the less would there be for the Rothschilds to play with. Lastly, though they were careful not to come out into the open, they rather felt that a bit of quiet intimidation would have the desired effect on the faint-hearted refugee.

A gentleman named Levi was especially active in the pursuit of this policy. Son of a merchant with whom old Meyer had clashed years ago, married to a daughter of Michel Simon (later M. S. Meylert), one of the leading bankers in Cassel, and associated with the latter's firm, he had good cause for viewing the rise of these once negligible competitors of both his houses with ill-feeling. With his knowledge of the Elector's affairs, his wide acquaintance in the Jewish community of Frankfort, and his former dealings with the Rothschilds themselves, he was in a first-rate position to help the police where the bright young brothers were concerned. He was a little too confident, however, this time; and his part in the proceedings, thanks to Archbishop Dalberg's good offices, became known. It helped Buderus to eliminate the house of Michel Simon from the Princely finances for good and all. Moreover, as this raid on the Rothschild premises led to much unpleasantness for other merchants in due time, Levi succeeded in bringing upon himself the execration of the Frankfort business community as well. It taught him to coöperate with the French authorities more cautiously in future.

The customs authorities in Paris had been aware all along that a lively trade in contraband was going on across the Channel and the North Sea. Some of Napoleon's advisers had for some time, therefore, been in favor of modifying the Edict of Berlin. The blockade, obviously, did not prevent Britain from selling her own and her colonies' products on the Continent; it merely robbed the imperial treasury of much needed revenue. Would it not then be wiser to open the coasts to a limited list of articles, tax them heavily, and use the money to tighten the restrictions on the rest? The Emperor, being a soldier, not an economist, was not moved by this logic. He was determined to strangle the "nation of shopkeepers;" besides, though there was doubtless considerable smuggling, the extent of it was, he thought, much exaggerated.

The police news from Frankfort, however, in the summer of 1809, obliged him to change his views. It was not so much that the premises of a particular merchant family named Rothschild had been found to be crammed with goods of suspicious origin. It was the inescapable conclusion to be drawn from that accidental discovery that was disquieting. Frankfort was a great, bustling commercial center. People of all kinds were getting rich there every day. Never in all its history had it been as prosperous as in these last two years since the Continental Blockade. Was it not evident that others besides the Rothschilds were engaged in the forbidden trade? And Frankfort was only one town.

It was many months before this reasoning could reach the Tuileries. Napoleon was that year divorcing Josephine and marrying Marie-Louise, as well as winning fresh victories on the battlefield. In August of 1810, however, he took action. The Edict of Trianon, dated that month, left the restrictions on British manufactured goods unchanged, but declared colonial products admissible under duties averaging about forty-five per cent. At the same time a secret agent named Thiard was sent up to Frankfort to see whether the suspicions about its merchants were justified. Early in October Thiard sent in his report. Its nature was such that Napoleon immediately framed a new decree especially addressed to the affairs of that city. It charged that Frankfort was full of contraband and ordered the unlawful goods seized. Though the document was at once communicated to the authorities there, it was not to be published for several days, lest the smugglers take warning. On the 30th two regiments of infantry marched into the city and began a general raid on shops and warehouses. No fewer than two hundred and thirty-four merchants were caught unawares. Several millions in taxes on colonial goods were collected by the French, and a quantity of English manufactured goods was seized and publicly burned. By a lucky stroke, however, the Rothschild stocks were just on that day all but depleted of contraband. Though Nathan had only some weeks earlier sent over from London his largest shipments, the raiders found no English goods whatever and a mere trifle in indigo and some kindred substances. On these they willingly paid the demanded imposts.

It is a fact, however, that from this time forth the smuggling of goods ceased to be a part of the firm's commerce. Whether this was because they had tired of being eyed with suspicion, or because the blockade was too efficiently maintained, or because they found some new outlet for their energies, remains to be seen.

Certain it is that the authorities, aided as usual by jealous people in Cassel and Frankfort, continued to burden the house with its attentions. Indeed, the most irksome display of French mistrustfulness toward the family was not to occur till a year later. But of that in its place.

CHAPTER VI

THANK GOD FOR NAPOLEON

YEARS later—it was in 1834, to be precise—Nathan Rothschild told friends at a dinner party in London how he had got his start. He said, among other things:

"The Prince of Hesse-Cassel gave my father his money; there was no time to lose; he sent it to me. I had £600,000 arrive unexpectedly by post; and I put it to such good use that the Prince made me a present of all his wine and linen."

This bit of reminiscence has had a curious destiny. The many authors who have since written about the history of the family have treated it either as literal truth or as an out-and-out invention. It is really neither. It is simply fact, slightly embroidered. Nathan did receive £600,000 of the Prince's money—and a little bit over—and he did put it to excellent use. Only it came to him neither unexpectedly nor in a lump. Whether the Prince was so grateful for the way Nathan used it as to make him a present of anything, appears more than doubtful. Several barrels of wine from the palace cellars were during the exile actually stored with the Rothschilds, but His Highness not only asked them back on his return but was rather horrid about it. Of linen the records say nothing at all.

The plain truth of the matter is that Nathan begged and schemed for that money, and left no stone unturned to get it, for all of two years; that it was two years more before he got anything like the entire amount; that, though he invested it so skilfully as to make the fame and fortune of his whole family, the Prince was so little pleased with the relationship that he threatened to withdraw from it altogether; and lastly, that while William lost little money by the transaction, he worried and fretted himself almost into the grave over it, and had to wait years before Rothschild even began to give him the accounting he demanded.

As far back as the spring of 1807 Nathan had begun casting covetous glances at the more substantial reserves of the Elector's fortune. William, as he knew, had many years before invested some half a million sterling in the British "Funds" or Consols. He knew it, because his father had away back in the 'eighties begun discounting the London dividend checks for the Prince, and because he himself was now collecting those same remittances for him through the London bank of Van Notten & Company. It occurred to him that perhaps the surest way to get access to those reserves would be to have his brothers persuade Buderus to induce Serenity to put through him, say, an equal sum into the same securities. There could not be a safer investment than Consols, and there could not be a better time to buy them than right now. What was more to the point, Nathan needed the money in the worst way. In London, where he had now been for three years, he saw men not half as clever as himself making fortunes every day on the bullion market, in the cotton trade, in war supplies, in stock exchange operations and what not. He could do as much and more; but his hands were tied for lack of capital. What, he asked, his brothers, was the good of having Buderus in the firm if he could not do a little thing like that?

But the cautious Buderus, on being approached, counseled patience. Therefore Nathan was obliged to see what he could accomplish through other channels. In London was the Elector's chargé d'affaires Lorentz. Nathan secured an introduction to him; and so ably did he present the case for Consols and Rothschilds that the diplomat was won over, at least to the extent of conveying the idea to his sovereign. Unhappily, the démarche proved worse than useless. Nathan was no doubt right in thinking 1807 a good time to invest in the "Funds;" but he overlooked the fact that it was equally the worst possible time for any Rothschild to approach Highness with any proposition whatever. For it happened to be the inauspicious month of August, when the Frankfort rivals of the family were bombarding Itzehoe with rumors and insinuations, and when Serenissimus was peremptorily summoning Buderus to explain what in heaven's name he meant by being so thick with those unspeakable people of the Judengasse. So the upshot of Nathan's efforts was that William, replying to Lorentz, wrote that should that fellow again dare inquire about All-Highest's affairs he was to be unceremoniously shown the door. "For it is the farthest thing from My intentions to have any dealings with him."

Almost immediately after this cold rebuff, however, the prospect brightened. The very next month, as will be recalled, Buderus did journey to Itzehoe and succeeded in calming his master's fears. The effect of that reassurance was—not, indeed, to evoke the hoped-for half million sterling—but at least to dispose the Prince favorably toward the firm in case he should some day decide to put more money into Consols. Hardly had that preliminary been disposed of than along came Napoleon to attend to the rest. In the ensuing fifteen months or eighteen, political and military events so shaped themselves as to destroy virtually every other investment market for the Prince's millions and to leave him scarcely any other choice.

II

The years 1806–08 were a period of uninterrupted catastrophe for the Electoral finances. One after another Prussia, Denmark, Austria, Russia—all the smiling lands where he had for long years been reaping such rich harvests—became submerged. The Bonaparte inundation gradually spread over and engulfed them. Some were conquered outright, others succumbed to alliances with the usurper, the rest were driven into bankruptcy.

The greatest of these calamities was, of course, the seizure of his own beloved Hesse and contiguous lands. Yet so long as the reasonable Lagrange Governor-Generaled it there, some hope remained of an arrangement whereby investments at least might be made secure. But then, with tragic swiftness, came King Jerome, Lagrange was bidden to go elsewhere, and Napoleon—whose inexorableness toward William was mainly an affection for his money—redoubled his efforts to collect the refugee's loans. By offering the borrowers increasingly tempting rebates, by threatening them with penalties if they failed to pay up, and by promising rewards to all and sundry for informing against recalcitrant debtors, the Bonaparte brothers succeeded in collecting a round six million thalers, in addition to the much larger sum which Lagrange had previously been obliged to turn over.

That did for Hesse and vicinity. It did also for Russia. For the same treaty which had made Jerome king had tied the Tsar by an alliance to the Napoleonic chariot.

Next came the turn of Denmark. When William fled there in the autumn of 1806 that country was still neutral. A year later, however, England had in self-protection found it necessary to bombard Copenhagen and seize the little kingdom's fleet; with the result that Denmark was likewise driven into the arms of the enemy. Thereafter William's unhappiness over the Holstein peasantry's boorish manners was aggravated by a vague feeling that his continued presence on Danish territory was both dangerous to himself and embarrassing to his hosts. The king, who was both his nephew and his debtor, was polite to be sure, but in subtle ways he made it evident that his uncle's departure would be viewed with relief. So William found it prudent to collect his boxes and things and go wandering again.

At this juncture it was that Prussia too fell from grace. As a field for investment that kingdom had in fact hardly counted since she had been bagged by Napoleon at Jena two years before. But now she added insult to insecurity. At the time of his flight the Prussian king had invited the Elector to come and occupy one of the royal palaces as his guest. In his present quandary William bethought himself of that offer and reached out a feeler with the intimation that he might now be persuaded to accept; to which His Majesty replied that nothing would make him happier—if Serenity would first obtain the consent of the Emperor Napoleon! Surely no self-respecting Prince could consider lending money on any terms to people who insulted one that way.

The Emperor Francis of Austria, it was true, had shown a more hospitable spirit, and had willingly let the homeless Prince find asylum in the capital of his Bohemian kingdom. But Austria was a bad risk. William had had no end of annoyance in his dealings with her. Already five years before her finances had come to such a pass that she must stop paying interest on her debt. Since then continuous war and invariable defeat had all but ruined her. The Austrian paper currency was almost worthless and the state was on the verge of bankruptcy.

The result of it all was that by the end of the year 1808 William found himself with money accumulating on his hands, loan after loan coming due, and no place to put a thaler safely out to interest. Next to the loss of his throne, this was about as distressing a situation as he could imagine. Then it was—but not till then—that Buderus came forward with a bright idea. Why not Consols? In these dreadful times, they had proved almost the only safe investment. They were now cheaper than they had ever been in their history or were likely to be at any time in the future. . . . And, in passing, why not commission the House of Rothschild with the deal? They were anxious to be of service, they were as always willing to work for less than others (like the Van Nottens, for instance) and they had a capable man right in London. The Rothschilds, like the Consols, had been a rock in adversity for Serenity. When fair-weather friends had run to cover, they had stood by loyally, dependably, unselfishly, without a thought of the risks to their own lives and fortunes.

III

For once William agreed promptly and without dickering. There was really nothing else to do. Those idle thalers were worrying him nearly as much as those much too active Bonapartes. He grasped at Buderus's suggestion gleefully. In the two years between February 1809 and December 1810 he authorized three purchases of "Funds" amounting in all to £550,000. As the accruing interest was also to be invested in the same security, the grand total came up to considerably more than the figure named by Nathan in his after-dinner reminiscence of 1834.

The Rothschilds, too, were as good as their word. They had said they were going to do this business for their noble patron without a thought of self, and they meant it. They waived commissions entirely. All they asked was a nominal brokerage fee of ⅛%, based on the face value of the bonds, to cover portage and incidental costs. They did not care to make any profit whatever. As the securities were bought at an average of 72, their services cost the investor the altogether negligible sum of a thousand pounds. A mere thank you. William was delighted.

To Buderus, likewise, the bankers behaved handsomely. They had intimated that if he would put through that long-coveted deal, they would show their appreciation in a large way. The very day the Prince's consent was received Buderus was presented with a generous block of stock in the concern and the old verbal understanding was formally reduced to writing. The document is dated February 17, 1809, and reads thus:

"The following agreement has this day been concluded between the War Privy Councilor Buderus von Carlshausen and the mercantile firm of Meyer Amschel Rothschild in Frankfort:

First. Buderus has invested with the banking house of Meyer Amschel Rothschild the sum of twenty thousand florins and has promised to assist the said firm with counsel and in other ways to the best of his ability.

Second. The House of Meyer Amschel Rothschild promises, on its side, to give the said Buderus a faithful accounting of its earnings upon the above-named capital stock of twenty thousand florins, and grants him the right of access to all the firm's books at all times, to the end that he may be sure of the most equitable treatment."

William's rejoicing gradually sobered down as time passed. He had expected, it would seem, that the London Rothschild would the moment Serenity's order reached him hurry to the nearest broker's, buy the bonds, rush with them to the Bank of England, and having duly registered and deposited them, forward the certificates to Prague by the first boat. It was, on several counts, a vain hope; and only goes to show how naïve a great capitalist (and Fuerstlichkeit into the bargain) may be. In the first place, Nathan did not actually receive any such thing as £600,000, nor even £150,000 all at one time. William sent him his order, and then took his time to furnish the wherewithal; he was relying for the funds on maturing loans, and dribbled them out in monthly instalments as they reached him. For Nathan to have executed the commission immediately and in full would have meant that he must tie up his own capital. He had no capital. It was to secure that commodity that he had prayed for this business all this long while.

Then there was another, even more persuasive reason why Serenity must be disappointed. By the terms of the contract the exchange rate for sterling as well as the price of Consols was fixed at a definite figure, win or lose. Now the Napoleonic wars had already brought both the English currency and the English "Funds" to a lower level than they had ever known; and more wars were coming. The chances of a further drop were therefore excellent. A little waiting was likely to be worth while. As a matter of fact, Consols did fall approximately ten points before Nathan got around to buying them, or at least to delivering them.

Lastly, what did that pig-tailed innocent back there in Prague imagine the Rothschilds were doing this thing for? Did he really suppose that six able-bodied and agile-minded men (not counting Buderus) were going to give their time and labor for a brokerage fee which would hardly feed their horses and keep their carriage in repairs? Or did he imagine that they were so naïve as not to know what to do with money when they got it into their hands?

Well, William had not stopped to consider all these questions before he gave his orders. He began to wonder a little now. Months passed, a year, two, three, and no certificates came—not a scrap of a receipt from the Bank of England to show that a man named Rothschild had deposited Consols there in the accustomed way. He became a bit uneasy. A doubt arose in his mind: Was his money safe at all? To be sure, communications were chaotic. The blockade did make travel unsafe; and entrusting valuables to the mails was out of the question. And yet, the money from this end seemed to be reaching London somehow. Was there any more risk in one direction than in another?

He began regretting Denmark and giving ear to Austria. Come to think of it, he had never quite got it straight in his mind why that last affair with Copenhagen had come to nothing, away back in '07. Odd! The Danes wanted the money, and heaven knew he was ready to give it to them. The differences that had come up were trifling; the usual sort of thing. He held out for a long term loan; they were for a short term one. Surely that ought to have been ironed out. But the most curious thing happened. The Rothschilds, who naturally should have stood with the borrower on such a point (the shorter the period, the greater the turn-over and the larger the bankers' commissions) took a determined stand with the lender; and then before he knew it, they reported the negotiations broken off. At the time he had written it down as a striking instance of the well-known Rothschild loyalty. Well, was it? He now wondered whether they had not been moved by some more human motive. Hadn't they already in those days begun clearing the field for the English business, and discouraging every other borrower? It seemed that way. They surely were endowed with long sight, those people! Was it not that very summer Lorentz wrote that their London man had made overtures to him?

Austria now—true, she was in a muddle. But at least she was not away off at the other end of the world like London. And could anything be less safe than Consols with such brokers? Moreover the Emperor Francis had been a magnificent host; had given him an honor guard and otherwise treated him as a visiting sovereign. All in all, Prague was the nearest thing to a home that he, William, had had since he quit Cassel. Besides, Consols brought 3½%, while the Austrians were prepared for almost any terms; they needed the money so badly. No, he would think twice before he declined their proposals.

So he wrote Buderus to ask what he thought of the matter. Buderus, of course, informed his Frankfort associates of what was brewing; and these, terrified at the menace to their London enterprise, were at first for vetoing the Austrian plan out of hand. Upon deliberation, however, a subtler course was adopted. Let Serenity meet his hosts half way, by all means. There were some six million thalers outstanding among thirty-odd debtors here and there and everywhere, which for a variety of reasons—chief among them the long arm of the Bonapartes —were uncollectable. Why not have William suggest to His Viennese Majesty that he take them over? In that way Austria would have what she wanted; Serenity would get his bad debts into a single, relatively safe, place; Nathan's operations in London would continue unembarrassed; and everybody would be happy.

That strange man in Prague actually took up the scheme. He saw nothing ridiculous about a Hapsburg turning sheriff for his benefit. So he informed Vienna that he would be most happy to tide over His Majesty, if the latter would persuade his son-in-law Napoleon to let him collect certain loans due the Elector of Hesse-Cassel, a list of which was herewith appended. The proud paupers in the Austrian capital, however, did not seem to take kindly to the idea; for the Emperor had his treasury people write back, a bit ironically, that he appreciated the Elector's thoughtfulness and goodwill, but felt the offer did not quite comport with the dignity of the imperial and royal state.

This was in the spring of 1810. All through the summer, consequently, William saw with a heavy heart his strong-box filling up and no outlet in sight. By September he must therefore again listen to Buderus's counsel and authorize the London Rothschild to invest for him a third £150,000 in Consols.

IV

And all the while no sign of a Bank of England certificate, not even for the first purchase, ordered now nearly two years ago.

He gently prodded Buderus. "I am not unaware," he wrote, in effect, "of the grave risks involved. I have the fullest confidence, too, in the wisdom and loyalty of the Rothschilds. Yet here it is more than a year and a half now since that first contract was signed. Don't you think that in all that time a way might have been found to forward that document to me? It seems to me odd that there should be so much hesitation and delay, when the remittances from this side reach England month after month without loss. Would not the same precautions, whatever they are, serve also in an easterly direction?"

Buderus began to be nervous. He warned his Frankfort people that the air was becoming electrical, that a storm was gathering, and that something had better be done about it soon.

At this juncture the diplomat of the family had an inspiration. Short of handing Serenity the certificate itself—which obviously was impracticable so long as the Consols were unbought—there was nothing in the world would so delight his soul as a little concession on the new contract. The firm could afford it—it need not be more than a trifle anyhow—and it would relieve the tension. In October, therefore, Buderus was able to write: "After much persuasion and effort I have succeeded in cutting down Rothschild's price on the third Funds investment one-quarter percent, thus saving Your Serene treasury 4521 pounds." Nevertheless he felt it desirable to add: "The certificate for the first investment will be brought over by young Rothschild as soon as there is the slightest chance of safety."

And William was even more pleased than had been expected. He not only did not cancel his recent order; he raised it to a quarter of a million! That, however, did not prevent him from reminding Buderus that he was still waiting for his receipt. "I instruct you at the same time to see to it that the document for the first investment reach me now without delay and that the others follow as soon as possible."

Just then, however, Buderus was obliged to report some unpleasant news. No more than a fortnight after his last letter came the great raid on the Frankfort business houses. He gave William a terrifying account of the event. "The Court-Agent Kalmann (Karl) Rothschild was about to start for Prague when several French regiments marched in with artillery and a great number of customs men, seized all the City's gates and ordered no one to leave . . . I have taken all conceivable care and I can only give the highest praise to the sons of the Superior Court Agent Rothschild for the indefatigable concern and zeal with which they have shown their devotion to Your Electoral Serenity."

Moreover: "New incentives have been offered informers and borrowers to bring about the liquidation of Your Electoral Serenity's loans, by assuring them of a reward of fifteen percent, and the quantity of spies and traitors under every disguise is so great that no one can be trusted any more."

Finally: "As soon as it is possible I shall see that the Court-Agent Kalmann Rothschild leaves Frankfort with the packs."

Without saying so outright, Buderus evidently meant to convey that the Bank of England certificate would be contained in those delayed "packs." But five months later, nothing of the sort having arrived in Prague and William having again made inquiry, Buderus tells him: "Young Rothschild is really going to London to fetch the receipts for the Funds investments." Incidentally: "His father has, without my asking him, succeeded in collecting 160,000 florins from Copenhagen. Will Serenity permit me to express to him Your satisfaction at his manifold endeavors in this connection." Then: "I am notified by Rothschild that the police in Prague have discovered the secret drawers in his carriage. I have therefore thought it prudent not to send along my accounts for last month and enclosures. These cannot be concealed in the clothing like letters."

Whether or not young Rothschild went to London, he did not fetch the receipt for the Consols. At any rate six weeks more passed without any such document reaching its anxious owner. Wherefore, though William obligingly forwarded the requested thanks for Rothschild, he must say: "I had no idea that the police here have found out the secret hiding places. There is in any event nothing to fear at this end . . . I am looking forward with genuine longing and justifiable eagerness to the Funds documents."

The summer was half gone and still nothing had arrived. William, despairing of ever accomplishing anything through Buderus, bethought himself of another channel. He instructed his envoy in London to make direct inquiry. What was his astonishment to learn that this was the first Lorentz had heard of the whole matter! Buderus had never said a word to him about Consols. And not only that: The Funds were down to 62 and still falling!

Then the dykes gave way. "I am distressed beyond words," he notified Buderus, "and am looking forward with genuine yearning to your explanation.

"Till then please stop all further payments against the Funds.

"Neither are any more interest moneys to be reinvested therein.

"Lorentz must be kept informed of all My English financial affairs. Especially must he know about the capital invested for Me by Rothschild so that he might as My chargé d'affaires keep an eye on it.

"I request you to attend to this without delay."

The effect produced by this bombshell in Frankfort may well be imagined. Buderus wrote often and sorrowfully of the already well-known dangers of carrying valuable documents across the Channel, of the tireless efforts of all the Rothschilds to satisfy Serenity's genuine longing, and of the inadvisability of confiding business secrets even to accredited chargés d'affaires. Kalmann went to Prague and argued and pleaded in person. But William was adamant. For the better part of a year nothing would induce him to authorize the payment of a solitary thaler to London. There is no telling what might have been the consequence of this obstinacy, if by a rare piece of luck Buderus's deposits in the Rothschild bank had not just during that period risen to quite unusual figures. Whereas in September (when the stoppage order reached him) his account showed a balance of less than 30,000 florins, it now gradually began increasing so that by spring it was 360,000—which was slightly over the normal monthly instalment remitted to Nathan.

The embargo was at last lifted in May. For though Buderus had repeatedly assured his master that no pressure would or could in the slightest degree affect the blockade, the first certificate did brave the Channel that month, after nearly three and a half years of faint-hearted hesitation. A second followed within less than a year.

By 1813, however, the House of Rothschild could afford to be indifferent to both the millions and the wishes of the Elector of Hesse-Cassel. How this consummation was effected in so brief a time will appear in the pages immediately following.

GLORY

CHAPTER VII

AID AND COMFORT TO WELLINGTON

INTERESTED people in Frankfort observed a curious phenomenon toward the end of 1810. The young Rothschilds had scattered and vanished from sight. In the last four years one had become accustomed to their periodic disappearances, one at a time; and one could even make a fair guess at their destination. This was something new; it looked for all the world like an emigration; it was a shift of base. What and where might the new enterprise be? That was what puzzled competitors and old rivals. The refugee Prince? That was an old story; his affairs could hardly absorb the entire lot of them. Nor did it seem to be blockade running. That once thriving business had gone lean of late; and the Rothschilds had, like most other merchants, given it a wide berth. Their export and commission undertakings, as a matter of fact, were decidedly languishing. The shop and the warehouses were in charge of an aged man and a young girl. Yet, far from declining, the prosperity of the family seemed to be flourishing more luxuriantly than ever. They had lately acquired two parcels of land on the Bornheimerstrasse on which they were planning to erect a bank building of their own. Old Meyer and the women-folks were in the most cheerful of moods.

What might it all mean?

The phenomenon remained a mystery. No Frankforter had the remotest inkling of the Elector's recent English investments, still less that the Van Nottens had gone the way of the Bethmanns, least of all in what manner their successors were employing the enormous wealth thus suddenly dropped into their laps. Even those who were in the secret were scarcely aware of all that was happening. Buderus, for instance, who had had some little part in the initial proceedings, might have found it difficult to expound their present ramifications with anything like certainty. It is doubtful whether the titular head of the House of Rothschild himself was abreast of the details. The business was much too complex and confidential and far away for Frankfort to follow. And the young men were much too preoccupied to report back with any frequency.

In the beginning Nathan's thought in reaching out for a bit more of William's surplus had been simple enough: he could use it advantageously in expanding his contraband operations. If he got all he hoped for, he might, indeed, discover a few things to do on the Royal Exchange. But that miser back there in Prague hung on to his thalers with the grip of death. He sent him authorizations—as if one could do business with a scrap of paper—and then tremblingly dribbled out instalments. For the better part of two years, therefore, anything more ambitious was not to be thought of. Besides, defying Napoleon had its rewards. Then just as the monthly remittances had accumulated to a sizable sum came the Edict of Trianon and emasculated the blockade to a tame, more or less legal and not especially remunerative business. Some months later followed the great raid on Frankfort. That was the final blow. Willy-nilly something must be found to take the place of contraband.

Nathan did not have to look either long or far. England had other irons than the blockade in the Napoleonic fire. There was, for instance that obscure struggle in Spain and Portugal, and the muddle it had got into. Everybody in England knew there was a Peninsular War, that its aim was the invasion of France by land, that for a long time past the expedition had not budged, and that the reason was the inability of the government to get provisions to its forces. Everybody knew it; yet nobody seemed to have thought of exploiting it. What, now, did the situation offer? The failure to keep the army supplied was due to the unimaginative efforts of the government to reach the Peninsula direct from the sea. More than once ships carrying money had been captured or sunk. Therefore Wellington, the commander, rather than see his men starve, had been obliged to take the bull by the horns. He had in effect set up a small bank of issue of his own right in Portugal. His drafts—being nothing but paper money drawn against reserves which, though solid enough, were inaccessible—could only be circulated at a fantastic discount. The government was scandalized, but it must honor the drafts just the same. And a group of scalpers—Spanish, Maltese and Sicilian—were, clumsily and with no more imagination than the London authorities, reselling Wellington's paper to bankers near home, away below its face value, of course. Before the notes reached England they had gone through half a dozen hands and the originally enormous profit had been largely frittered away.

Obviously the whole performance was silly from beginning to end. So long as there was a land route between Portugal and London it was sheer incompetence to try to send money by water and take all the risks. That, however, was the government's affair. What interested Nathan was the brainlessness of those scalpers, "The Cab," as they were called. Their paper eventually must find its way to London, or it would not be worth buying at all. And so long as it arrived eventually, there was no good reason why it should not get there directly and the proceeds stay in one hand.

Well, he had the organization, he had the capital, and he was willing to give the game a try. It was an enterprise exactly to his taste. It afforded all the adventure and rewards of the late lamented contraband trade. Why, it was in fact really nothing but smuggling of a new and peculiarly interesting kind. His Continental brothers would take to it as fish to water. Their five years of blockade running had them left as fit and agile as athletes. Add to that the equally ticklish courier work for His Highness, and there was not a more competent or better trained staff for the job anywhere between Lisbon and London. False papers, disguises, bogus names, secret caches, official-bribing—all the tricks and dodges of the spy—were old familiar things to them. It was not by prayer that they had become successful men of affairs in time of war.

II

Quiet, home-loving Amschel was persuaded to relieve Kalmann (Karl) of the Frankfort-Prague route. Father took over the diplomatic mission of contracting Buderus. The goods trade at home, stripped down to a bare skeleton, became the province of the unmarried girls, Gotton (Julie) and Jettchen (Henriette), flanked by their sisters-in-law.

And mother Guetele kept house for her family as usual, leaving business to those who fancied and understood it. Thus liberated, the three youngest and ablest male Rothschilds could dedicate themselves to the new venture. Blessed by their parents and their women, they pushed off silently while Frankfort slumbered. Ignorant of any language but Jewish-German, they threaded their way across frontiers, over hostile country, through armed outposts; paying when they must, dodging where they could, confident of their well-filled purses and their own stout hearts; and presently bobbed up on the Western rim of the Continent to keep the tryst with Nathan.

The two youngest men took the ends of the line—Kalmann the Pyrenees, Jacob the Channel coast. Salomon, the persuasive and diplomatic, stationed himself between them, in Paris. In the nature of the case, London remained the headquarters and terminus, as it had been the originating source, of the enterprise. The chain complete, the machinery could begin to function. Kalmann speedily entered into relations with the merchants along the Franco-Spanish frontier, offering to buy from them whatever notes of the British commander they might acquire in trade. Mutual safety required that the commerce be kept dark; the Spanish shopkeepers understood that. They may or may not have understood, further, that too much advertising tended to force up prices. As soon as Kalmann had got together a sufficient quantity of Wellington's paper, he headed north with it; Salomon at the same time quit Paris; along the route somewhere the brothers met, exchanged satchels, and then faced about. Avoiding the capital, Salomon journeyed on toward the Channel, found Jacob at an appointed spot, and the performance was repeated. From Dunkirk or Gravelines London was but a jump, and in London the almost worthless drafts became legal tender acceptable at par. The water-stage was at first attended to either by Nathan traveling south or by Jacob going north; later on dependable English sea-captains were commissioned with the task.

This was the colorful and exciting aspect of the venture. Danger of the most breath-taking variety attended every link of the chain. It was espionage and commerce with the enemy, and the penalties for these offenses were, then as now, brief and final. The smallest slip of eye or foot brought one face to face with the guillotine. Of course, the brothers were not so reckless as to neglect precautions. Itching palms were generously greased all along the route from the mountains to the sea; on the Narrows the prefect of police of the Pas de Calais Department himself lived so prosperously on the Rothschilds' bounty as to attract the critical notice of his superior in Paris.

But the business was not all poetry. The pedestrian element was to find the shining metal cash, which alone was of any use to Wellington. Toward this consummation Nathan contributed more than his share, both with substance and ideas. He had anticipated the problem from the beginning and had arranged to meet it. Each man in his territory was between trips quietly picking up all the yellow loose change he could get his hands on. The light-footed Jacob was particularly active, not only in France but also in Holland and elsewhere; Salomon helped out from Paris and the larger towns of his route; and Nathan himself did his best to turn Wellington's drafts into guineas. Kalmann, at the extreme end of the chain, had his hands full collecting the paper. All of them had to work with the utmost circumspection, not alone because exporting gold was everywhere forbidden, but principally because of the influence on the exchange.

Sooner or later, however, the traffic was bound to hit a snag. After half a year of combing the world for gold there was no gold left to comb. Every country in Europe was on a paper basis; what little coin was still in circulation was, as always in times of inflation, being hoarded; the rest had, by the Rothschilds' own efforts, rolled down into Spain. The difficulty seemed insuperable. The British authorities ought, of course, to make things easy; the Rothschild consortium was doing their work for them, and rendering a patriotic service to England besides, in the face of the gravest danger to themselves. But those complacent and unimaginative men at the royal exchequer knew nothing about the consortium or its work, and if they did know they might take it into their heads to spoil the game. It would be not unlike them.

But Nathan still had a shot in his belt. He took to haunting the curio shops, the old metal-dealers, the junk yards and the bullion market. It was not long before the trade came to know the paunchy young man with the inscrutable face as a buyer of unlimited capital who paid the highest prices for everything made of gold. When therefore the East India Company brought in a large shipment of gold bars, Nathan was one of the first to get wind of the event. The lot was to be sold at auction at the Company's offices. Nathan showed up early and bid so lustily that the entire shipment, valued at close to a million pounds, was knocked down to him. Thereupon word went out over the Channel to Dunkirk that all was well.

III

But the good news proved to be a little premature. Before Nathan had had time to remove his treasure, let alone get it across to his brothers, a very official-looking document was brought to him. It was a letter signed John Charles Herries, Commissary General, inviting him to be so good as to present himself at that gentleman's office for a conference. Mr. Herries, who had expected a rather impressive personage of the customary City dimensions, was not a little taken aback to see this very unprepossessing, ill-groomed Continental being ushered into his presence. His surprise was heightened when the visitor began speaking. Could this be the man at all who drove bargains involving hundreds of thousands of pounds? Never before had the English tongue been spoken with such an accent in His Majesty's offices. But as the interview continued Herries found himself listening with close attention to what his guest was telling him and forgetting altogether the oddity of his idiom.

The Commissary General began by inquiring whether it was true that Mr. Rothschild had acquired a certain quantity of gold from the East India Company, and upon receiving an affirmative answer, went on to say that His Majesty's Government would consider its repurchase at a given figure. There happened just at that time to be a military expedition on the Iberian Peninsula; it was the duty of the Commissary General to supply the army engaged in that enterprise; owing to the blockade great difficulty had been encountered in shipping provisions in natura; and according to the officer in command, he could readily live on the country providing he had the necessary funds. The government, therefore, desired to secure the bars in question for that and kindred purposes. Mr. Rothschild, being a British subject and patriot, was entirely ready to comply, for a consideration. If he might be permitted, however, he would like to ask just how the authorities proposed to reach Spain. He had no wish to pry into state secrets; only as it happened he had acquired the metal for that identical purpose. He had, if the truth must be told, been doing his humble part in keeping the Peninsular forces alive for some little time past. Naturally, he had not attempted to ship by water. As the government had doubtless found out for itself, that route was not quite safe. Fortunately there were other ways, which, if the Commissary General cared to hear of them, he would be glad to explain.

Nathan sketched in outline his organization, his methods, and the recent hardships he had had to face in consequence of the growing scarcity of gold coin on the Continent. As a private person, he could not, of course, honorably do the things that the situation demanded. There was, on the other hand, no reason why the state should stop where he must. It could, for instance, in a time of national peril like this, produce French napoleons and Portuguese ounces in its own mint without asking the permission of the governments concerned. There were other short-cuts, too.

Herries not only cared to listen; he was so hugely impressed with what he heard that he invited Mr. Rothschild to put himself and his organization at the service of the British government. Nathan was aware that the East India gold, purveyed down to Wellington in the old way, would have brought many times the returns he was getting from Herries. Still, low profits never yet ruined a merchant; he was disposing of the whole thing in a lump, without effort or risk or worry. And, lo! he had made a priceless contact with the English Treasury into the bargain. In that 1834 after-dinner reminiscence, already quoted, he described this day's adventure as the best piece of business he had ever done. Well he might! Nothing that had ever happened to the Rothschild family, since the Elector's flight five years before, was destined to mean so much for its future.

IV

While these happy events were occurring in England, the mainland was becoming uncomfortably warm under the other Rothschilds' feet. The curious Frankforters, though still baffled as to the nature of their young fellow-townsmen's affairs, had traced their whereabouts. The locale seemed to them suggestive. Enterprising business men did not go to French seaports for the salt and the bathing. Therefore the imperial authorities began receiving hints, in writing and otherwise, that the undefined activities of a certain trio of brothers would in all likelihood repay looking into. The communications in due course were forwarded to police headquarters in Paris, and thence to the prefect of the Pas de Calais department. It became the unpleasant duty of this well-disposed official to warn his young friend Jacob that matters were passing beyond his control and that it might be best to go while the roads were still open.

Jacob had rather been thinking so himself for some little time past; so he took good advice when it was given him.

Early in March, 1811, he therefore dropped everything and sank out of sight. Much as he disliked saying anything about his movements even to the discreet Frankfort authorities, he felt it necessary to regularize his status; and it was better to confide in the good archbishop than to risk unpleasantness in Dunkirk. Dalberg, as it happened, was himself getting ready for a journey to France. Marie-Louise was about to present Napoleon with an heir to his throne; and throughout the empire and its dependencies well-disposed chiefs of state were arranging to assist at the grandiose ceremony with which that long-awaited event would be attended. The pope himself was to baptize the eaglet; and Dalberg, apart from wishing to pay homage to his secular chief, deemed the occasion good for bringing certain matters in which he was interested to the attention of his spiritual overlord as well. But going to Paris in such circumstances required money, a great deal of it. Old Meyer Rothschild, the moment he learned of his friend's difficulty, cheerfully offered him a loan of eighty thousand florins.

Naturally, therefore, when, as chance would have it, a son of the generous lender needed a little favor at that very time, the grateful Grand Duke could hardly refuse it. James obtained not only a passport duly visaed with which he could return to France openly; he got something in addition which, as time soon proved, was infinitely more valuable still. Dalberg gave him, namely, several letters of introduction to important Paris banking houses, including one to Count de Mollien, the imperial minister of finance.

Noblesse oblige. It would not do for one coming so highly recommended to slink about in the dark. Consequently James laid his cards before de Mollien with the most engaging frankness. He had, he confided, a brother in London, with whom he was in constant touch, and from whom he received at intervals shipments of English gold. As to the ultimate destination of the metal he was a bit reticent; but he communicated enough for de Mollien to draw his own conclusions. And Napoleon's minister of finance who, it seems, did not quite measure up to his generals, perceived at once that a country which was so stupidly governed as to let a thing like that happen could not but be on the brink of economic disaster. He so told the emperor. He only prayed that this brilliant young Frankforter might be correctly informed. To doubt James's truthfulness did not occur to him. The Frenchman, indeed, was so convinced of the boy's sincerity (James was only nineteen years old) that he took him under his wing and shielded him from annoyance at the hands of other officials.

Savary, for instance, the imperial minister of police, was inclined to be skeptical. Here, he figured, was a much too plausible stranger from a conquered province who, while pretending to have nothing to hide, was carrying on a very doubtful kind of commerce with an associate in an enemy country. He might be harmless; yet it would be as well to keep an eye on him. So Savary quietly put his subordinates on guard everywhere from Mayence to Paris and the Channel ports, ordering that the goings and comings as well as the mail of all Rothschilds from Frankfort to London be given the closest attention.

Unfortunately for this loyal and astute servant of Napoleon, the Rothschild movements, and especially the Rothschild mails, were not as susceptible to observation as he imagined. There was, as a matter of fact, no such thing as a Rothschild mail. Between Frankfort and Prague they had for six years past been their own post office, as well as the Elector William's. Across the Channel their trusted sea captains brought and carried whatever was needed. And from Dunkirk to the Pyrenees, the brothers attended to major matters themselves and delegated the remainder to safe couriers in their pay. Moreover, even if by some remote accident a letter of theirs were to fall into outsiders' hands, it would convey precious little. The correspondence of the firm and of those with whom they did business was carried on in a code, no names were either signed or mentioned, and the key to both was frequently changed.

On the first of November, a letter of mysterious origin, bearing the signature "O. H." was in fact intercepted by the French secret service in Hamburg. Had those functionaries known a little more about the Rothschild way of doing things, as above outlined, they would readily have recognized their catch for the canard it was, if for no other reason than that it revealed so much. "O. H.", who appeared to enjoy a high position in the absent Elector's entourage, was addressing the latter's brother in Gottorp, and telling him the latest news about the progress of the secret political movement for the liberation of Germany. The letter, incidentally, mentioned Lawaetz and the Rothschilds by name and Buderus under the somewhat thin disguise of "Bravo." The communication left no doubt that all these people were deeply involved in the Elector's treasonable schemes and their financing, and was patently designed to cast suspicion upon the Rothschilds and their associates.

But as Monsieur Citiz in Hamburg was informed neither of the family's methods nor of its enemies in Cassel and Frankfort, he took the intercepted document at its face value and promptly forwarded it to his chief in Paris. Thence a hue and cry went out to secret police headquarters in Mayence, to ambassador Bacher in Frankfort and to the coast guard at Dunkirk and Gravelines urgently requesting that the affair be pursued to the limit and the various persons named taken under close surveillance. Bacher, in his reply, suggested proceeding cautiously, lest the suspects take warning. Dalberg, as usual, made light of the whole matter, and gave the meagerest coöperation. From Mayence the report stated that the House of Rothschild had since the raid of the previous year apparently given up smuggling and now confined itself to trade in legal merchandise and banking; that their sentiments toward France, while correct on the surface, were far from loyal at heart; and that Dalberg was for some unaccountable reason so thick with them that he refused nothing they asked of him.

The correspondence on the subject was kept up with undiminished zeal for several months. Every day, it seemed, the French net was about to close on the elusive gentry. It never did, however; and in the end, the pursuit which had so hopefully begun was abandoned for lack of results. It would, in fact, have been given up sooner, if in the midst of it, one or two even more suspicious looking letters had not been picked up on the coast as well as, again, in Hamburg. This time the internal evidence showed unmistakably that the police had in their hands genuine correspondence between one Rothschild and another. What was especially noteworthy was the circumstance that one of these documents was discovered not in the mail bags but on the person of a courier. If these gentlemen's operations were as pure as they pretended, why should they try to avoid the regular postal service? Their excuse that the letter had missed the mail and had been rushed to the port so as to catch the boat, was patently specious. Besides, the contents were hardly reassuring. James was telling his brother in London that he had duly received several shipments of English and Portuguese gold coins, and that he had got drafts for them from the bankers in Paris!

Savary and the military governor at Hamburg were, therefore, in favor of speedy and summary action. They wanted James arrested, and at the very least expelled from France. They were so sure of the treacherous character of the brothers' activities that they carried their conclusions to the emperor himself. But Napoleon dismissed their fears with a wave of the hand. Why, de Mollien had been aware of the traffic all along. It was quite all right.

And all the while Nathan sat at a desk in Commissary General Herries' office in London, or traveled under his orders on the Continent, to all practical purposes an official of the British government; and hundreds of thousands of pounds in gold—English guineas, Dutch ducats, and French napoléons-d'or, the latter either collected in France itself or minted in London—were quietly, unobtrusively, without disturbing either the bourses or anybody's blockade, rolling down into Spain to feed and clothe Wellington's Peninsular army. Suddenly, upon returning from his disastrous expedition to Russia, Napoleon woke up to learn that the British general—the man who was so soon to crush him at Waterloo—had somehow extricated himself from the impasse that had so long held him fast beyond the Pyrenees and was marching his well-fed and well-equipped forces into the southern provinces of France.

V

Meantime in Frankfort Meyer was nearing the end of his days. A man of over sixty at the time of the Elector's flight, these years of unwonted toil and anxiety had sapped his declining vitality. Already in 1808 he had had to undergo an operation for an internal malady. He was pronounced cured; but as a matter of fact he never quite recovered from the shock and his wound gave him almost continuous pain. Toward the end of the year 1811 he was once more obliged to take to his bed. After an illness of several months he again rallied. On the Day of Atonement (September 16, 1812) he insisted, despite the warnings of his physician and the solicitous objections of his family, on fasting the full twenty-four hours and on spending the entire day kneeling in prayer at the synagogue. On the morrow his old wound burst open and it was evident to those standing about the bedside as well as to the sick man himself that a crisis was approaching. A notary and witness were hurriedly sent for, and in their presence Meyer dictated a new will to replace the one he had made four years earlier. He had barely enough strength left to sign the document. Summonses were dispatched to his scattered sons, but only two—Amschel and Kalmann—arrived in time. Early on the evening of the nineteenth all was over. He was buried in the ancient Jewish cemetery of his birthplace, aged sixty-eight years and seven months.

There seven generations of his ancestors rest with him, but not a single one of his descendants.

Did Meyer as he lay dying see in his mind's eye a vision of the greatness that was so soon to come to his house? From beyond the northerly entrance to the Judengasse he could dimly hear the sounds of the workmen erecting the structure in which the business he had begun so long ago was to be housed. Meyer Amschel Rothschild had labored and striven and brought forth sons, and now the time had come for him to take permanent leave, but the firm of M. A. Rothschild & Sons was going forward. How far would it go? It seemed a miracle, when he thought back over the years, that it had come as far as it had. A bare dozen years ago he had been a small tradesman and money-changer, with the most modest capital, credit and prospects. Before that the rare-coin case, the second-hand shop with Moses and Kalmann in the back-yard of the Saucepan, the clerk and the messenger boy at Oppenheim's in Hanover, the penniless orphan, the Talmudic scholar at the Yeshivah of Fuerth. And now! No one knew better than he how much of this extraordinary growth was owing to his remarkable sons. Still, it was on his foundations they had built. But they would go on building, and he must do all he could not to hamper them.

Meyer's will was designed not so much to dispose of his estate as to secure the future. The business was left absolutely in his sons' hands. To make sure that his daughters and their husbands would not interfere, he went so far as to sell out his own share to his male heirs. The hundred and ninety thousand florins thus realized, were, apart from his home, distributed between his wife and his ten children. "I direct and desire, therefore, that my daughters, my sons-in-law and their heirs shall have no part whatever in the existing firm of M. A. Rothschild & Sons, and that still less shall they, on any pretext whatsoever, . . . claim the right to examine the said business, its books, papers, documents, inventory, etc. . . . And I shall never forgive any of my children if they should against this my paternal will take it upon themselves to disturb my sons in the peaceful possession of their business." Moreover, the entire inheritance of his wife and daughters must remain in the sons' keeping, to be used as capital in the firm and to receive interest at five per cent.

Guetele was more fortunate than her husband. She survived him thirty-seven years, and lived to see the culmination of her sons' careers. But she remained throughout her long life the same simple, unassuming, pious housewife she had been from the beginning. Though Amschel presently built himself a palace and gave banquets to statesmen and diplomats, she refused to give up the humble home in the Judengasse where she and Meyer had spent so many happy years. Her sons would send her jewels and costly lace kerchiefs from Paris, London and Vienna, and she accepted them with pleasure, but nothing would induce her to eat at their tables because their French chefs did not conform to the Jewish food ritual. She reveled in pride at her boys' achievements. When many years later a poor woman came to her crying because her only son was to be sent to the wars, Guetele reassured her. "Never fear," she said, "there is not going to be any war. I shall tell my boys not to lend them the money." Like Letitia Bonaparte, she enjoyed the rare destiny of seeing her sons the most powerful men in Europe, and her glory was marred by no St. Helena.

CHAPTER VIII

THE GOODNESS OF MR. HERRIES

JUST what had the trusteeship of William's English investments netted? No one, perhaps not even the brothers themselves, could have said exactly. Certainly those six hundred thousand pounds had been productive in their competent hands. Had they multiplied five or six times, eight or ten, in those four epochal years? Had the capital (costing three per cent) earned a hundred and fifty or two hundred and fifty per cent? They did not take the time to figure it out. They were too busy, their holdings were too scattered; and anyhow what mattered a few hundred thousand more or less to men who had overnight become millionaires in sterling? Besides, they were not quite such materialists as to miss the essential point, which was that the cash dividend was a small thing beside the friendship of the British Commissary-in-chief.

With the entry of Mr. Herries, indeed, the center of gravity had shifted from Frankfort to London. Nominally the concern still rotated about the old home office; and Amschel (renamed Anselm), as the eldest of the five, was chief. In reality the leadership had long since passed to Nathan. It was he, to begin with, who had conceived the great plan which had enriched them all, and had set up the organization to carry it out, and it was he who had made the contact with Herries and must go on cultivating it. For a good while to come, clearly, Herries was destined to play a part roughly resembling that which Buderus had lately filled. Hesse-Cassel had served its time, and would henceforward fade out of the picture, to be supplanted by His Britannic Majesty's Treasury Department. Therefore, regardless of age and priority, and quite apart from natural talent, the man who sat in London would inevitably be de facto head of the firm.

Nathan and his brothers did not have to be trained statesmen to foresee, in outline at least, the history of the next few years insofar as it concerned their interests. So long as Napoleon remained emperor of the French, England would go on making war on him. The difficulties she had hitherto encountered in supplying her forces were not likely to diminish; and that being the case, there was no reason why Herries, or whoever was charged with his duties, should not continue using the Rothschild plan and the Rothschild organization which had proved so effective in the past. In reality, these calculations erred on the side of conservatism. As the Napoleonic interlude approached its final phase the problem of transferring British funds to the Continent became graver and more complex than ever.

Ever since Austria had signed the Treaty of Vienna in 1809, the German states had been at peace with France. It was not a matter of choice. Nor was it resignation. Prince Metternich, for all his sacrifice of Marie-Louise on the altar of the conqueror, was straining to be at it again. So was the ineffectual Frederick William III of Prussia. So, of course, was the banished Elector of Hesse and the great majority of the lesser princelings. What cooled their enthusiasm was partly an almost superstitious awe of Napoleon and chiefly lack of money. Their economy, antiquated and ill-administered at best, had become hopelessly disordered under the stress of war. Defeat, inflation and extravagance had ruined their credit. In Prussia things had come to such a pass that the king was unable to meet his private expenses and was continually harassed by tradesmen and bill collectors. The case of other German sovereigns was at least equally trying.

Napoleon's disaster in Russia in the winter of 1812–13, followed as it was by the virtual annihilation of the Grande Armée, put fresh heart into the German liberators. It did not, however, solve the problem of finance. The Prussian Chancellor Hardenberg no doubt expressed the sentiments of all the Continental Allies when he told England that without pecuniary assistance it was out of the question for his country to fight. Fortunately England was, under her new treasury head, prepared to return to the policy of Pitt and grant subsidies in exchange for soldiers. The very year of the retreat from Moscow Chancellor of the Exchequer Perceval had been assassinated. Vansittart, his successor, managed to convince the Government of Lord Liverpool that the defeat of Britain's great enemy would be cheaply bought at such a price, and that it was in any event unlikely to be had any other way. In the years 1813–15 Parliament appropriated fifteen millions sterling for the support of the Continental Allies, more than two-thirds of the sum going to Austria, Russia and Prussia.

Now arose the old question of remittances. In the past the British authorities had known but two ways of making payments on the mainland, one more costly than the other. They either shipped silver bars or gave the payees a free hand to draw on London. The insurance rates on bullion however, were prohibitive; besides, there was no such thing as fifteen million pounds' worth of silver, or any approach to it, in the whole of Britain. Drafts on London, again, in such enormous quantities not only played havoc with sterling exchange, causing terrific losses to both Britain and her friends; the markets of Europe became so swamped with the paper that after a short time it was nearly impossible to cash it at any price. Thus, in all Berlin Hardenberg could only with the greatest difficulty and at heavy discounts dispose of twenty-five thousand pounds' worth of his English checks, at a time when he had two-thirds of a million to realize. In Vienna the offer of drafts on London in the sum of eighty-three thousand pounds resulted in depressing sterling by several points. The operations must be carried out with the utmost secrecy, and that involved paying commissions to numerous agents, as well as competition on the exchanges between states fighting in a common cause.

At this juncture Herries laid before Chancellor Vansittart the Rothschild plan which had proved so workable in Spain, with the suggestion that it be extended to the subsidies problem. He put stress on the advantages of the new method: it was economical, and it virtually was not felt on the exchanges. What was more, there really was no other way in sight by which any large sums could be transferred to the Continent. Vansittart did not take much urging, and Nathan was sent abroad as the secret agent of the British Treasury to do for the coalition what he had now for some time been doing for Wellington.

In the interval, however, the situation had greatly improved, and it was no longer necessary to go to the danger and trouble of collecting coins. The French were in retreat on all fronts,—it was after the decisive Battle of Leipzig—the Allies were pursuing them across the Rhine and through Belgium, while Wellington was rapidly moving across the Pyrenees into the southern provinces. The Continental Blockade was a ruin and smugglers were more active than they had been since the summer of 1810. In the ports and commercial centers of Holland and Germany merchants were struggling with the question of how to pay for the British merchandise they were receiving. It was, as the Rothschild brothers rather simply perceived, the reverse of the problem with which the governments were troubled. Here, on the one hand, were state treasuries bursting with drafts on the British capital which could not be cashed; and yonder, on the other, were the contraband carriers wondering what they were going to do in London with all their checks drawn on Frankfort, Amsterdam and such places. It seemed to the Rothschilds that they and their father had long ago dealt with a situation not unlike this. They had ample funds on the mainland. Why not relieve the smugglers of their paper, exchange it with the governments for theirs, solve both sides of the difficulty in one simple operation, and without one party knowing what was happening to the other, gain the thanks and the discounts of both? It was legal, safe, easy and every bit as profitable as the old way.

The chancelleries could not quite figure out how it was done, but they were delighted to find that somehow and suddenly their checks were being accepted without demur and credited as bank deposits wherever the money was needed. And when Nathan returned to London and related his success, Herries sent a secret report to Vansittart glowingly praising the astuteness of the man who had not only carried out his commission without a hitch, but had in addition secured seven hundred thousand pounds' worth of checks on Frankfort and Holland for future use; and all this without in the slightest degree affecting the exchange on London! He was quite sure, added Herries, that an operation involving a mere fraction of these sums, entrusted to treasury officials or British diplomatic representatives on the Continent, would have had ten times the adverse effect on sterling.

II

Traders on the Royal Exchange began to take notice of Nathan Rothschild. This pudgy foreigner with the baggy clothes and expressionless eyes seemed to have sources of information inaccessible to anyone else. At least he was acting as if he did. There was the matter of bullion, for instance. Early in the year, when the first rumors of a new coalition began to be heard, with probable subsidies for the Continental states, there was a great boom in the precious metals. Rothschild was the only considerable man on 'Change who was not looking at silver; he was in fact bearing the market. The prophets predicted his ruin. But presently it was learned that the Government had made other arrangements and was not going to ship any cash. That sort of thing happened again and again. Now it was the Funds, and another time it was Continental drafts. He rarely steered with the current, yet almost invariably he touched shore first. He was called a speculator; but he appeared to know, when others merely guessed.

Did he really know? A web of myths began to form about the strange unkempt alien. People talked of the Rothschild instinct, a sort of infallible inner light. Others whispered about a pigeon post, about his brothers in Germany who were reported to be monsters of wisdom, about occult Jewish divinations. No one even gave a thought to the Commissary-in-Chief. For that was a dead official secret, of which no one in the Government itself except the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Mr. Herries's private secretary had the smallest inkling.

Nathan impassively relished the interest he was arousing. His prestige and his credit did not suffer from the legends; they were making him an important man at the same time that his operations made him an enormously wealthy one. As the war progressed he contrived, in fact, to deepen the mystery and to provoke gasps of wonder elsewhere than on the stock market.

Like all exceptional men, Nathan was astonished at the stupidity of the mass of mankind. The Royal Exchange, for instance, was alive with individuals who called themselves speculators. That meant, if it meant anything, that it was their business to read the future, and they really pretended that they were going about it in rational fashion. What they did read in actual fact were the newspapers and the government decrees. That is to say, they tried to make capital from events after they had become common knowledge. It was a case of the halt leaning on the lame; for editors and authorities alike muddled along on general sources of information. Such a thing as exclusive news was unknown in their system. No one seemed to realize the importance of knowing things in advance, not of their occurrence, but of publication. Time after time the Government learned of battles and their outcome from him, hours before the official dispatches arrived, and hours (of course) after he had turned them to account on 'Change. And when they did learn them they either wagged their heads incredulously or gaped admiringly at his cleverness, but seldom knew what to do with their information.

After the Battle of Belle-Alliance, for example, the Government did hear the results before he did; only what they heard was not so. He got word of a victory for the British troops, and when he brought the news to the Treasury, the officials there laughed patronizingly. Oh, yes, Mr. Rothschild was very kind and helpful, to be sure. They appreciated his desire to be of service. As it happened, however, the Government had got a dispatch from its own people on the ground, and unfortunately there had been a defeat. Later the truth came out, and then the most fanciful stories were invented and believed about the sources of Mr. Rothschild's knowledge.

Then came Waterloo. As often before, it was he who first communicated the facts about that epoch-making event to the authorities. This time there was no shoulder shrugging; they had learned to take him seriously at last. But what legends, in the City and everywhere else, were spun out of that scoop of his! He had himself (so it was said) gone to Belgium, witnessed the battle, then rushed back home to make the most of what he had seen. The tale was embroidered with breath-taking circumstantial detail: how just as he had reached Ostend a hurricane had broken out on the Channel; how after much haggling he had hired a fisherman to take him across and had paid two thousand francs in advance for the service; how on arriving on 'Change the next day he had looked so mournful as to cause a violent drop in the British Funds, the while his secret brokers bought up every piece of scrip they could get their hands on at panic prices; and much more of the same sort.

No, he was simply a speculator who used his wits. His notion of looking into the future was to obtain news of significant events before it reached other people. To this end he cultivated high Government functionaries; not so much to learn about policies and decisions as to influence and help form them. The reason he was cool to bullion and sympathetic to Continental drafts in '13 was because the Government plan of transferring the Allied subsidies was of his own making. And to this end, too, he had devised ways of keeping abreast of world happenings, independently of both press and officials. He had, to all practical purposes, set up a private news service away back in his smuggling days. He had found out then that prices and the ups and downs of his business were affected by what Napoleon did on the battlefield and in the council room. Therefore it had seemed to him a very simple thing to instruct the skippers who carried his cotton cloth across the Channel to bring him the latest issues of French, German and Dutch newspapers. Later his Wellington enterprise had made military, naval and financial developments a matter of vital concern to himself and especially to his brothers. Therefore at the first opportunity he had thought it good business to secure a small fleet of his own, so that officers and crews might devote themselves exclusively to his needs. These boats were not common carriers; they were a bridge between the London house of Rothschild and its associates on the mainland. Chiefly used for the conveyance of money, securities and letters, they were in effect one of the earliest foreign news services in the world. For their commanders had orders to hurry back, regardless of wind and weather, whenever any event of outstanding importance had occurred on the Continent. It was thus that Nathan learned of battles and things ahead of the British Government. That was all there was to the mystery.

III

Following the fall of Paris and the first abdication of Napoleon, in the spring of 1814, Mr. Herries was able to show Mr. Rothschild in a larger way than before how greatly he valued his services. The Count of Provence, long a refugee in England, was proclaimed by the Allied victors king of France; the sacred principle of legitimacy had been (for the Austrian chancellor, at any rate) one of the higher aims of the great struggle against the usurper. This, to be sure, did not prevent them from imposing a crushing indemnity upon the restored monarchy. Meanwhile Louis XVIII, after these twenty-five lean years, was in no pecuniary position to undertake the triumphant entry to his capital. He applied for a loan of five million francs ($200,000) to his good hosts, the British Government. The Treasury granted the request, and the Commissary-in-Chief called in Nathan to handle the transfer. As a transaction the affair was not in itself of any especial moment but Nathan saw further than immediate gain. The House of Rothschild, so strong and honored in England, had no standing proportionate to its wealth on the Continent. In France especially it was in fact suspect and obliged to carry on under cover. To hand the new ruler this round sum at such a memorable moment as this, in checks payable at the Paris office of Rothschild Brothers, could not but raise the firm's prestige enormously. It promised even to knit a permanent tie with the court, and give James a position there comparable to that of his brother in London.

That was not all. Though the long Napoleonic nightmare was over, temporarily, the impecunious Allies still required, and were by agreement entitled to receive, the British subsidies. It was not entirely out of friendship for Nathan therefore, that Herries now energetically undertook to convince the ambassadors of the Allied powers in London that it would be to their advantage as well as England's to centralize the payments somewhere on the Continent; he was thinking primarily of the economies that arrangement would effect for the British treasury and of the salutary influence it would have on sterling exchange. Incidentally, however, he proposed that the place be Paris, and without naming Rothschild, that the choice of the agency be left to the English financial authorities, which in this department meant the Commissary-in-Chief. The amiable thought behind the proposal was, as in the advance to King Louis, to smooth the path for young James and the remaining Continental Rothschilds.

But the Allies, particularly Austria and Russia, raised objections. They were conservative powers; they liked to do things as they had always done them; besides, they owed favors to their own money-men. The negotiations, moreover, were now conducted with the principals of the Allied governments in Paris itself, whither Nathan had accompanied Herries; and the Eastern statesmen entertained certain sentiments toward the name, the sectarian affiliations and the social and personal traits of such people as Mr. Rothschild. Prussia, being the neediest of the brethren, was more agreeable; and some little progress was achieved with the others after lengthy discussion. On the whole, the project did not promise to have the success that Herries had anticipated. During the remainder of the year 1814 the major Allies continued realizing their subsidies by drafts on London executed through their own bankers.

Early in 1815, while the victorious statesmen sat haggling over the spoils around a green-baize table in Vienna, the alarming news rang out over Europe that Napoleon had landed near Cannes on the Riviera, had been wildly acclaimed by his old followers, and was rapidly collecting an army and marching on Paris. The intelligence had a sobering effect on the Congress. Irritating differences were suddenly ironed out, and the diplomats who had the day before sat glowering at one another embraced affectionately and became allies once more. In a trice the coalition was reconstituted. The armies, dawdling at their ease in France, shouldered their muskets again, reinforcements set out from every corner of Europe, and England loosened her purse-strings and began pouring out fresh subsidies. Under the stress of renewed war Herries was pleased to note a more accommodating spirit on the part of even Russia and Austria toward the Rothschild plan of handling the remittances. It was the last but probably the greatest in the long series of services which Napoleon unconsciously rendered to the five brothers.

Indeed, the problem for Herries and the Rothschilds was now, not to persuade the Continental governments so much as to find the wherewithal in cash and credits on the spot to satisfy their needs. Once again the British Treasury was obliged to coin French louis-d'or in its own mints and otherwise to resort to extra-legal means. The Prussian command in Belgium was during the Hundred Days as before in the gravest straits, so that at one time Bluecher was driven to the expedient long ago adopted by Wellington of issuing his own drafts on London, while von Buelow, the Prussian finance minister, urged and implored to have at least a hundred thousand pounds advanced without delay.

The pleas remained for a time unanswered because both Herries and Nathan were themselves at the moment busy on the Continent. They returned to London late in April. Thereupon the Commissary-in-Chief referred the entire matter to his associate; and Nathan, perceiving that one of the great opportunities for which he had been waiting had come, dispatched an order to his brother Salomon to deliver in person to the Prussian minister of finance two hundred thousand pounds on behalf of the British treasury. The diplomatist of the Rothschild family did not fail to make the most of this the first direct contact of his house with one of the first-class powers on the Continent. Finding that Buelow was in very great financial difficulties, he offered on his own responsibility to take over a hundred and fifty thousand pounds of the English subsidy obligations, over and above the sum he was instructed to pay out. Considering, however, the low rate of sterling in Berlin and his want of authority and the risks involved, he was regretfully constrained to charge so heavy a discount that Prussia had later to ask Britain to make up the difference. Nevertheless Buelow was delighted. In his letter of thanks to London he commented with enthusiasm upon the energy, the helpfulness and the amiability of the House of Rothschild. He saw to it personally, moreover, that both Herries and Salomon were fittingly rewarded, the British official with a porcelain service from the royal manufactory, the banker with the title of a Prussian Trade Councilor. Best of all, he retained a lasting impression of the evident influence of the firm and never after lost contact with it.

Nathan's delight was at least equal to Buelow's. The immediate profits of the operation, or even of similar business to come, meant little to him. Reading between the lines of the minister's gratitude, he saw that Salomon had made a permanent conquest. Prussia had clearly been won, definitely and unreservedly, for the House of Rothschild. That was matter for congratulation. For Nathan's restless spirit, looking beyond the moment, had begun to be concerned about the future. However it might end, the renewed struggle with Napoleon could not go on forever. And the moment it was over, victors and defeated alike would have to take stock of the damage and set to work rebuilding. Rehabilitation would take money; and as virtually all the governments were bankrupt, the only way money could be raised was by loans. Nor was that all. This quarter century of disorder was not likely to be lost even on the backward-looking men who governed Europe. Therefore standing national armies were here to stay. Troops must be fed and clothed, munitioned and housed. Lastly, one side or the other was going to pay a goodly sum in damages, and that, like all the rest, would have to be borrowed from those who had had the foresight to lay by a bit during the storm. A rich harvest was awaiting the firms with sufficient resources and the right connections. He and his brothers were amply provided with the first item. They must make haste to secure the second as well. That was why the news from Berlin was so heartening.

But Prussia, though splendid for a beginning, was, when all was said, but a rather small patch on the map of Europe. The great prize on the Continent was imperial Austria. Austria was not only the leading state in the German Bund; she was a great power with immense subject lands, and she stood only second to Britain in the councils of the Coalition. The banking house which secured a firm foothold in Vienna would gain something more than prestige and a leverage for future conquests. It would become the first financial institution on the European mainland.

Unfortunately Austria was not to be captured so easily. Her own favored bankers had neither the vitality nor the necessary connections to handle the subsidies with the vigor and dispatch that the situation demanded. Yet, though the good Herries did his utmost and though her forces suffered from inefficient provisioning, it was only with the greatest difficulty that she could be persuaded to accept payment according to the new system even during hostilities. Her big men, unlike the alert Prussians, held aloof away off there in Vienna, and were inaccessible to mere business men; with the consequence that the war ended and no Rothschild had got within earshot of an Austrian minister. After Waterloo she stiffened still more. Her haughty governing clique, accustomed to servility from all who came near them, demanded preferential treatment and made endless difficulties. At the base of their resistance was mistrust toward the still little-known Jewish concern.

But Nathan and his brothers were persistent. Amschel in Frankfort and James in Paris sat on the doorstep of the Austrian envoys, and gave them no peace. Without so much as a hint at the possibility of their standing or credit being questioned by anyone, they played up in glowing colors the services they had rendered and the favor they were enjoying at other courts. Not that it had any bearing on the subject in hand, but it might interest His Viennese Majesty's representatives simply as a fact of common knowledge that the House of Rothschild was delivering the subsidy moneys for Prussia, Wuerttemberg and numerous other German states in so satisfactory a manner as to earn the commendation and the gratitude of their governments. No other firm in all Europe probably possessed the facilities of Rothschilds for the prompt, safe and economical disposal of that business. This was simply a fact which it would be immodest to ascribe to any superiority on their own part but was owing to the complete and extraordinary confidence which the London member of the concern enjoyed at the hands of the gentlemen charged with the administration of the subsidies by the British Treasury.

All these strenuous endeavors, however, seemed to go for naught; and in the end it fell to Herries to bring Austria around. He tried persuasion through his agents on the ground; he addressed communications to the imperial authorities, dwelling upon the savings in time, in money and in the good influence upon the exchange which the improved remittance plan effected, confirming all the boasts of the Paris and Frankfort Rothschilds and adding his own high opinion of their ability, their financial strength and their entire reliability; and when Vienna still hesitated he ended the interminable discussion by summarily taking the matter into his own hands and relieving Austria of responsibility altogether. For while the Allies doubtless had the right to employ what men and means suited their own fancy in converting the subsidies, it was, after all, the British Treasury that held the purse, and so long as the remittee got his money safely, promptly and without loss, he could not reasonably complain as to the manner or the agency. Herries, therefore, quite simply instructed his friend Nathan to pay the monthly instalments to Austria as and when she wanted them and to accept her drafts on the British Government at par. As to costs, commissions and discounts, why, England would take care of them herself! He, Herries, would show the people over him that the arrangement was the cheapest in the end.

This somewhat high-handed procedure had the desired effect. Vienna at last realized that the queer English meant business, and that this suspect Rothschild plan and Rothschild concern were evidently held in some regard by the one European nation to whom finance and business were second nature. And since the islanders were the rich uncles of the Coalition, it might be as well for proud but needy kin to keep on the sheltered side of the tradesmen they favored, even if the terror of Europe was now safely stowed on St. Helena Island. Austria, therefore, did more than submit to Herries's decision. She went a long step further and arranged with the House of Rothschild to handle her share of the French indemnity. Presently, finding that these payments were coming in too slowly to mend her disheveled finances, she approached the concern with the idea of liquidating the outstanding instalments in advance of their maturity. These transactions were not only enormously more profitable than the subsidy affairs, they brought the House into immediate contact with the finance administration in Vienna, and in addition served to raise its prestige in France. Nathan had sized up things correctly: the rapprochement with Austria was to make Rothschilds the first financial institution in the world. Right off it enabled James to establish himself definitely in Paris. In a very short time it was likewise to erect Salomon's house in Vienna and Karl's in Naples.

CHAPTER IX

NOBILITY

ONE good turn deserves another—in the same direction. Having got what they wanted, the brothers now considered that they deserved well of their new clients. True, they reasoned, they had made a good thing of the subsidy transfers to Vienna; but then the bargain had turned out still more advantageously for the Austrians. The imperial treasury had, owing purely to the Rothschild influence in London, saved an enormous amount of money in bankers' commissions and an even larger one in interest on the advances. These sums, to be sure, had not come out of the Rothschild pocket; they had been made good to the last penny by the British Government. The fact remained nevertheless that Austria had got several millions ahead of time without paying the customary charges. Only a house having the influential friends in London that they had could have done such a thing for her, and she knew it; her own bankers had asked one per cent commission and six per cent interest. Was it not legitimate, therefore, for Austria to show some appreciation for their loyal services?

This logic of business, whereby the merchant made the profits and the client emerged as the beneficiary, was no invention of the Rothschilds. It had come to them by inheritance, from their father and from William of Hesse-Cassel. Had not old Meyer earned his Court Factor title as a kind of bonus from the Landgrave for the privilege of letting him buy a batch of trinkets? Had not the Landgrave himself been elevated to the dignity of an Elector in recognition of a loan he had made to the same Emperor of Austria at a good rate of interest? And had not Prussia, upon a gentle hint, recently honored Salomon with a Trade Councilorship in circumstances similar but much less favorable to that state than the present ones were to Austria? How else were men of business to become gentlemen of rank?

It was not vanity altogether; the Rothschilds were painfully in need of lifting up. At least the Continental ones were. Nathan, over there in England, could afford to smile loftily at ribbons and crosses. He was a full-fledged citizen of a country where a comfortable balance at the bank was as good as an earldom, and where race, religion and family descent counted for little in a man's affairs and for not much more in his social position. But in France, and particularly in Germany, a Jewish merchant could not live by bread alone, nor be anybody with mere millions. These incurably aristocratic lands rated people by their antecedents, or at least by the length of the handles attached to their names. The Frankfort patricians could not forgive the Rothschilds their Judengasse origin and their shopkeeping past. Their amazing rise, their incredible financial genius, their fabulous wealth, did not help to advance them socially; Continental Europe took no stock in the self-made man. It was jealous of him and distrusted him. Napoleon, the supreme example of the species, was a fresh and painful memory to ruling families lately returned from exile. The Rothschilds' money, far from exacting respect, only heightened the contrast between their present magnificence and their lowly beginnings, threw into the more striking relief their cultural rawnesses and provided wags and Jew-baiters with handy gibes. While their Gentile competitors, like Bethmann, mingled on easy terms with statesmen and field marshals, they neither received invitations nor could get their own accepted. It hurt, that; also, it made the ladies unhappy; not least, since finance was so much a matter of teacups and small talk behind potted palms, those bolted doors were not good for business.

So it was urgent that something be done. Those minor dignities were not any good. They must get no mere Kommerzienraths and that sort of thing any more, but a spangle so gigantic and lambent as to cast their entire previous history into the shadow. Now the country where the name Rothschild stood in highest repute was England. If Nathan cared, he might possibly obtain a knighthood by way of reward for his aid to the Duke of Wellington and subsequent usefulness. But Nathan was the one brother who did not care, and even if he did, it was hardly likely that the honor would be of any use to his foreign relatives who needed it most. Prussia was very friendly, but the shining things in her gift were not big enough. There remained only Austria. That conservative state, for all its unenlightened treatment of the Jews in general, was not ill-disposed toward deserving individuals of the faith. The present emperor had conferred nothing less than a barony upon one Jewish financier. What he had done once he might be induced to do again. In any event Salomon thought the attempt worth making.

II

As one dynasty to another, the House of Rothschild approached the House of Hapsburg initially through the latter's envoy at Frankfort. This was not just conformity to diplomatic usage; in the absence of more direct channels, it was the only thing to do. In times to come the firm found it quite unnecessary to speak to emperors through mere ambassadors. But this was only 1816, and one must work with the tools at hand. So Salomon, after alluding to the cordial relations that had always existed between the two Houses, passed on to more recent history and begged Schwinner, the financial man in the Frankfort legation, to recall the loyal and unselfish services which he and his brothers had rendered to All-Highest in connection with the English subsidies, as well as of their readiness to be of use in all future undertakings, specifically in the matter of the advances on the French indemnity. Concluding, he begged to be so bold as to suggest that some recognition from His Majesty of their endeavors might not be out of place and would certainly be treasured by himself and brothers now and forever. It was not for him to say what form such recognition was to take. (Why ask for a knighthood? Suppose he should want to make it a dukedom!)

This verbal feeler was in due course transmitted to the minister of finance in Vienna, Count Stadion, who in his turn handed it on to the emperor. Stadion, though he had never laid eyes on any Rothschild, recommended favorable action. The man was nearly frantic with the effort to save the country from bankruptcy, and the opportunity to gain the adherence of this energetic young house with its powerful connections in London looked to him like a god-send. Negotiations for the liquidation of the French indemnity were still in progress with James in Paris. They had come to nothing so far because the brothers, for all their unselfish devotion to His Majesty, were obliged to offer the somewhat low figure of sixty kreutzers to the gulden. Were the emperor to confer upon them some fitting honor, they might perhaps reconsider the question and be content with a twenty-per cent profit on an advance repayable over five years.

The monarch, however, was not to be rushed. Stadion's troubles did not disturb his sleep. Besides, a Christian emperor could not just like that hand out distinctions to people who not only were theologically unacceptable, but were tradesmen of doubtful origin and foreigners to boot. So Francis took his time to reflect. Also he consulted his chancellor and one or more of his courtiers. The chief minister, Prince Metternich, was on general principles disposed to cultivate good relations with moneyed people, regardless of race, creed or antecedents. One never knew when they might be needed. Leader and fountain-head of the reaction though he was, he had a singular tenderness for the Jewish people, individually and collectively, and was doing everything in his power to secure the rights of citizenship for them in Frankfort, if not in Austria. So Metternich seconded his colleague's motion.

But in other, no less influential, quarters, the Rothschild proposal encountered severe and ironic opposition. A gentleman about the court, Lederer by name, subjected the petitioners' claims to such close scrutiny that the project seemed in peril of falling to pieces. What, he asked in effect, had they done to merit consideration? As far as those subsidy remittances were concerned, now, it was quite true they had not required Austria to pay any commissions on the matured instalments nor any interest on the advances. Well, they were not entitled to any. England had squared the account with them in full. They had not sacrificed a penny in the whole operation. Did they expect to be paid twice? Similarly, their great to-do about having carried through a complex financial enterprise without disturbing the exchange. So they had. But their cleverness had nothing to do with it. Events over which they had no more control than over the weather, had been favorable; that was all. As for their punctuality and efficient management—good heavens, what were the men thinking of? They were bankers, weren't they? Was it not their simple duty to be punctual and efficient?

Then Lederer gave some attention to Stadion's doctrine of putting the firm under obligation for the sake of future needs. To him the whole notion seemed the veriest innocence. Did the minister of finance suppose that business men governed their conduct by sentiment? It was one thing or the other: either Austria was a client worth having or she was not. If her affairs were profitable they would go to all lengths to get them; if they were not profitable they would not lift a finger, no matter what favors were shown them. The only criterion was profit and loss. This was the first time he had ever heard of the idea of men of the trading class being expected to operate on any other basis.

Lastly, they were Jews. Not that he entertained any prejudice against any people or faith. Still, facts were facts. In Frankfort where the men in question had their home, the Jewish question was just now particularly acute.

A proposal to grant the Jews equal rights with Germans was under discussion before the council of the states sitting in that city, and feeling on both sides was running high. Were His Imperial Majesty to single out a Jewish family of Frankfort for distinction at this time, the impression was certain to go abroad that Austria was taking sides with the Jews and trying to force the issue; which surely was not what All-Highest intended.

However, when all was said, the brothers, or one or two of them anyhow, had certainly given valuable service to the empire. He was not in the slightest degree disposed to minimize that, however much they might have to thank England and the course of events for the result. Nor did he mean to suggest that they were entitled to no consideration at all. Just what form the reward should take, it was not his place to decide. But if his opinion were required, he would suggest that they be given each a gold case with His Majesty's monogram outlined in diamonds!

III

This devastating analysis came very near dashing the brothers' hopes. The emperor hesitated and weighed the pros and contras as if it were a question of war and peace. But Stadion, backed by Metternich, pressed on. No doubt, there was much to be said for Lederer's objections. Still, Austria was in no position to repulse friends with money and influence. Inspired reports from the legation in Frankfort dwelt on the power and the wealth of the House of Rothschild, on its eagerness for social recognition and on its goodwill toward Austria. There would probably never be another opportunity like the present for winning its gratitude. So at last His Majesty assented. Now came the question, What kind of a spangle? Several motions were made and considered. There was Lederer's satirical idea of the gold case. Someone else suggested a sum of money; but Stadion felt that would not do. A mere token of recognition in that form would scarcely interest the Croesuses, and a bounty large enough to impress them might strain the imperial exchequer. In any event they were more likely to appreciate some less tangible honor which would have the advantage, moreover, of costing the government nothing. The police director of the city of Gratz favored their being named Imperial and Royal Councilors, a distinction, however, which was reserved exclusively for deserving state functionaries. An order, again, was not in keeping with the nature of the service rendered, and the Civil Medal was sure to disappoint their expectations. All in all, therefore, a title of nobility seemed best calculated to answer the purpose, even if it did promise to stir up jealousy among Gentile bankers and the squirearchy at home. That, of course, was the solution which the gentlemen in the Frankfort legation had been driving at from the start.

Meantime, before the grave discussion had come to an end, the Rothschilds had made bold to supplement their petition. Originally the plan had contemplated honoring only the two eldest members of the family, Amschel and Salomon. On second thought, it was pointed out that, while they had been particularly active in the subsidy operations, the firm was a solid unit and worked together on each and every undertaking. Consequently it might be both invidious and prejudicial to the solidarity of the family were some of the brothers to be raised above the rest. The logic was clearly sound and incontrovertible, and that point, too, was granted.

Salomon was now asked to convey to the imperial heraldry office his ideas of a coat of arms for his House, and Salomon complied to the best of his ability. Left to himself, he would have taken the opportunity to paint a symbolic history of the family, or at least of those aspects of it which lent themselves to public admiration. Wasn't that what armorial emblems were for? Besides, one was not asked to become a nobleman every day in the year. A natural reserve, however, bade him be moderate. The quartered field, therefore, showed but three colors, red, yellow and blue; figures, all told, a meager seven—two lions, a leopard, a stork, a hound, half an eagle and an arm holding five arrows, the whole surmounted by a crown. Even this was largely in grateful allusion to the honored patrons of the family rather than to its own magnificence. Thus the leopard symbolized England, the eagle Austria, and the lions the Elector of Hesse-Cassel. In the field itself only the arm with the arrows spoke of the unity of the five brothers, while the hound and the stork, which held up the shield, stood for loyalty and piety.

The martinets in the heraldry office, however, were not in the habit of letting things go through just like that, and they blue-penciled Salomon's draft unmercifully. The animal collection was wiped out almost entirely. Why? Tradition! The rules of heraldry forbade the arms of a foreign country, or any reference thereto, to appear on a device granted by Austria. The crown, too, must go; it belonged to a loftier style than was being contemplated for the moment. Even the hound and the stork, those gentle creatures representing the virtues that had made the House of Rothschild great, were not allowed to remain. The ridiculous slashing went to the length of reducing the number of arrows in the arm from five to four. Sheer stickling! By the time the experts were done there was so little left of the original design that Salomon hardly knew it. Nevertheless the 25th of March, 1817, was a red letter day in the history of the family. For on that day the final document went forth from the imperial palace in Schoenbrunn declaring that henceforth the four continental Rothschilds were members of the Austrian aristocracy. The snobs of Frankfort might now give themselves what airs they liked; the sons of Meyer, the Jewish curio dealer, were by imperial decree as good as any of them. And James in Paris could prefix a significant "de" to the Rothschild Frères on his office sign, and look the proudest courtier of Louis XVIII straight in the face. Only Nathan remained a humble plebeian. But he did not mind.

IV

But though Nathan was inclined to smile at armorial bearings, there was one species of official dignity to which he was not indifferent. Cordial relations with Herries had shown him the value of being on the inside of government. There was more worth-while information to be picked up around the ministries in a day than in all the London drawing rooms in a year. Now that the war was definitely over and subsidies a thing of the past and the British connection safely clinched, it behooved him to spread his nets into new waters. For any number of reasons, but chiefly because of the geographical distribution of his brothers, France and Austria were the most desirable waters in sight.

Paris would take considerable wooing. Vienna, on the other hand, was coming along very nicely. The past performances on behalf of Austria were, however, no more than a good beginning. If the same rate of progress were to be maintained, it was essential to keep the closest kind of watch on developments in her fiscal policies. Her old bankers at home were surely making the most of their proximity to the court; and although Salomon and the others were nobles now, they had no firm footing on the ground. There was no Rothschild office in Vienna,—not yet. By the time news reached Frankfort it was apt to be of little use. Therefore some channel of a more direct kind must be cut to the great capital on the Danube.

It so happened that the Austrian consulate general in London was vacant at the time. It seemed to Nathan that that was the very thing for him. Were he to fill that place he would be in effect the financial attaché of the embassy. Considering that London was the world's money capital and that Austria was bound for a good while to come to borrow, this would mean that the ministry of finance in Vienna would guide its fiscal policy by his, Nathan's, reports and opinions. That is to say, he would not only know far ahead of the court bankers when a loan was being contemplated, he would have a hand in determining when and whether such operations should be undertaken. Incidentally he would, as the accredited representative of a great power, be brought into intimate contact with the official folk of other countries as well, not by way of fox hunting and tea parties, but in their business capacities—the only aspect of fashionable society that mattered to him.

He conveyed his thoughts to his brothers, and Amschel went to work at once. While he was about it, indeed, Am-schel discovered that the Austrian consulate general in Paris was likewise in need of a good man, and it occurred to him that he might as well give his little brother James a boost at the same time. So he wrote to Vienna that should the chancellor contemplate filling those two vacancies he knew the very men for him. He was not, he explained, seeking any new honors for members of his family; his brothers and he were much too grateful for the splendid surprise His Majesty had lately seen fit to give them. It was precisely for that reason that he was anxious to make some small return. The members of his House in London and Paris, owing to their prominence in the business and banking of those capitals, were in an excellent position to further the commercial interests of the Empire abroad. They had, moreover, no thought of asking any kind of pay for their services. They merely wished to demonstrate their gratitude and loyalty.

Meantime Nathan himself let no grass grow under his feet, but plied the Austrian ambassador in London to the same effect. Vienna, however, was in no haste this time. It looked to the authorities there as if the Rothschild people had an unhealthy appetite for distinctions which grew by what it fed on. Without exactly refusing their request, the Austrians decided that a little check would be good for them just now. It might spur them on to show their devotion in some more tangible form, such, for instance, as an offer of better terms in the French indemnity matter. For the time being, therefore, nothing much happened. The Rothschilds, however, were not discouraged. They kept on begging and pulling wires. But it took three years before Vienna got around to the appointments.

That was a long time to wait. Fortunately there were other things to keep Nathan and James occupied in the interval. Early in that eventful year 1817 the royal government of France, upon balancing its books, discovered a rather staggering deficit. Prospective revenues would not only leave nothing over for indemnity payments, they would not even meet current expenses. A loan of some three hundred and fifty million francs was imperative. Such a sum could not at this time be raised within the kingdom, to be sure; but the credit of France, despite the instability of the last quarter of a century, was still good abroad. The ministry therefore set the machinery in motion by calling in, not James Rothschild, but that financial wizard, Napoleon's old banker, J.-G. Ouvrard. Ouvrard, however, though he had made several fortunes in his time, was richer in ideas than in money just now; so that he in turn sought the help (again, not of de Rothschild Frères) but of the great British financiers Baring Brothers and their associated firm of Hope & Company.

James was frantic to take a hand in this first great operation since the war. It was not so much the profits—he was not doing so badly in his other affairs—but if he could at least participate in the syndicate, his standing in France would be assured. But neither the Englishmen nor the Frenchmen would have anything to do with him. The Rothschilds' exploits in the Peninsular campaign were no secret any longer; but far from being admired for them, they were looked upon as unscrupulous tricksters who had abused the confidence of French bankers, had helped the enemies of France and would very likely do so again if they had the chance. Labouchère, the brother-in-law of Alexander Baring and the head of Hope & Company, conceived an unconquerable aversion, moreover, for young

James personally. He despised the insignificant little man with the marked Semitic features, the deep restless eyes and the curly red hair, who could cringe when he wanted something, became arrogant when he had got it, and was insufferable at all times. Ouvrard more than concurred in this estimate. To him the Rothschilds were "simple money changers, who owed their fortunes more to accident than their own ability."

But James was determined. Unable to gain access by the door, he tried the windows as it were. Associated with Baring and Hope in the preliminary negotiations was the dashing David Parish, a Hamburger of British descent, one of the most picturesque and adventurous figures in the world of finance. James managed to strike up an acquaintance with him. It was a strange fellowship: Parish the bon vivant, the intimate friend of Talleyrand, the beau who was at home in the best circles of London, Paris, Vienna and even Washington, and the rich but crude shopkeeper's son. They were attracted to each other by a mutual need. For Parish, with all his personal charms and high connections, lacked the capital just then to play the kind of part he desired in the syndicate, while James had the funds but lacked the connections. An understanding was therefore reached between the two, whereby Parish was to secure James's admittance to the consortium and share in his part of the winnings. But though Parish did everything in his power to push his partner forward, his efforts went for naught. He succeeded in bringing young Rothschild to the attention of the ministry of finance; and that was as far as he could go. Labouchère and Ouvrard were adamant. For no consideration would they work with the upstart. Indeed, they advised Parish to steer clear of all the Rothschilds. In years to come Parish wished he had taken his friends' warning.

The loan meanwhile was awarded to the two British houses without Rothschild participation. James took the blow hard, and vowed that he would make the snobs rue it. Nathan, on the other hand, did not mind. Precisely because it was the first big international transaction since the peace, it was an enormously risky thing. Let others make the trial flights. There was no telling how the investing public, spoiled by the fat profits of the war years, was going to react to this relatively sober business. The loan might very well be a fiasco, and in that event there would be neither glory nor money in it for the promoters. If, however, it was a success, it would serve to create confidence in state bonds, and the House of Rothschild could then make a more active bid for future loans. This was only the first; there were plenty more coming. For the moment it was just as well for the brothers to go slowly, make friends and build up their fortune. Besides, even though they had failed to be included in the consortium, nobody could stop them from playing as big a part in the loan as they liked and as seemed to them safe. The moment the security had made the grade, they could step in and acquire as much of it as they wanted. They need not even use their own capital in the speculation. Just as once long ago the Hessian Elector's Consols had laid the foundations of their fortune, so now the French indemnity payments to Austria, Prussia and the rest of them, which the House was handling, could be employed to expand it.

As it happened, the French loan was a brilliant success. Baring and Hope—though not Ouvrard—cleared enormous gains. But the Rothschilds were not impoverished by it either. They bought on margin and largely with the untransferred indemnity funds, such great blocks of the securities that they presently controlled the price of them. Ouvrard later calculated that they made a good fifty per cent with the self-loaned Allied moneys in this affair. Ouvrard, however, did not know the half of it. In his bitter hatred and contempt of the Rothschilds he could not believe that they ever thought of anything but gain. As a matter of fact, their interest in mere profits was only a passing phase this time. For a while, indeed, they bulled the market with great energy, much to the joy of Baring and Hope. But the sequel was much more interesting and rather less agreeable to these gentlemen. Of this, in a later chapter.

CHAPTER X

THE FIRST LOANS

NATHAN had sized up the situation more accurately than he knew. Of course, there would be other loans. His brother James was still lamenting his rebuff in Paris, when along came Berlin to cheer him up. True to her promise, Prussia had never forgot the help she had got from the Rothschilds during the critical Hundred Days. What was perhaps even more to the point, her finances were in a desperate state. The British subsidies and the French indemnity, mere stop-gaps at best, were about drying up; a few millions which, thanks to Salomon and Karl's good offices, she had lately borrowed from the Elector of Hesse-Cassel, were gone almost before they had reached her; her own people, burdened with taxes and economically exhausted by the long war, were as poor as their government; and the state treasury was barely able to pay the military and the civil servants their salaries. A foreign loan was the last and only hope.

With Karl virtually residing in Berlin, this state of affairs was no secret to Nathan. Therefore, along about November 1817, he sought out the Prussian consul in London, and after several conversations reached an understanding with him. This gentleman—Barandon was his name—without taking the time to consult his country's ambassador on the spot, communicated what he had learned (or such part of it as seemed to him relevant) direct to Berlin. There were, he said, but three firms in all England equipped to place a loan for Prussia in the London market. Of these the House of Rothschild was held in the greatest esteem both by the investing public and by the British government; so that, were this concern to undertake it, the operation was a foregone success. He then went on to state the factors which might have an adverse influence on the project, lest too sanguine expectations should lead to disappointment later. The British were a clannish lot and loaned their money very reluctantly to foreign governments. When they did it at all they expected a high rate of interest, having been spoiled by the French rentes which yielded about eight per cent, while the Prussian loan, as contemplated, would pay only five. Moreover, several recent attempts to launch foreign bond issues in England—Austrian, Spanish, Russian and Neapolitan—had been complete failures. Nevertheless he was hopeful. Prussia's integrity and thrift were much admired beyond the Channel. At the present moment, also, Consols only yielded a little less than four per cent; so that if Berlin could see its way to offer a rebate of ten per cent to the investor and a five per cent commission to the bankers (thus raising the interest rate to seven and a half) he believed success to be assured.

This highly inspired communication no sooner reached the Prussian chancellor than he authorized Barandon to proceed, and negotiations were opened forthwith. It soon transpired, however, that Barandon had misunderstood something. The House of Rothschild was indeed prepared to float twice as big a loan as the royal government desired, only the rebate would have to be not ten but thirty per cent. Why should anyone want to invest in Prussian bonds at ninety when French ones could be had for seventy? This seemed reasonable, and a provisional agreement was drawn up on these terms. But before the final contract could be signed, news reached London of projected flotations by several other countries, with the consequence that money became tight. Thereupon a very curious thing happened. Barandon, namely, made public Nathan's printed plan for the Prussian loan. In that document the amount of the issue was stated at twelve millions, instead of the twenty provisionally agreed upon, and the emission price not seventy but sixty. The purpose of this interesting procedure, as Barandon apparently understood it, was to discourage other prospective borrowers away from the London market. However that might be, it was received in Berlin with raised eyebrows, and Barandon was asked to explain just what the changed figures signified.

Barandon's explanation was so clumsy and tactless that Nathan saw with dismay that the man he had picked was not exactly a Buderus either for financial astuteness or for keeping those over him in the right mood. He blurted out things as they were told him, without stopping to think of their possible effect. Thus he told Berlin straight out that the reduced price had been dictated by the fall of the French rente to sixty-five. Sixty was, of course, less than that; but then the British investor preferred the French paper because it represented the recognized national debt of a first-class power whose credit had safely weathered three successive revolutions. As a matter of fact, he added, Austria was offering her five-per cents as low as fifty-two, and Russia was vainly trying to float a loan at seven and one-fifth per cent. So what could Prussia, whose securities were quite unknown to this foreign market, expect! How all this sounded to Chancellor Hardenberg can only be imagined. But Nathan was sufficiently discouraged to drop the rough-and-ready diplomat, and henceforth transferred the negotiations to the embassy. For a space it seemed as if the entire project would go aground. The Berlin authorities were extremely put out with what seemed to them a highly suspicious way of doing business, and efforts were made to secure a loan elsewhere or to manage without one. Ambassador von Humboldt (a brother of the famous scientist) succeeded, however, in calming the air.

Humboldt put the whole blame on the unfortunate consul, and recommended sending over a well-trained man specially for the purpose. As for Rothschild he was not only "easily the most enterprising merchant here now" but an entirely trustworthy man, honest, fair and intelligent. He transacts much business with the British government, and is through his brothers thoroughly familiar with the Prussian situation. To advance his brothers' interests he is disposed to make himself agreeable to "our Court" and it will not be easy to find another house as friendly. What Barandon had said about the difficulty of placing foreign loans over here is quite true, and the success of the French issue must be regarded as a special case; so that it were best to think twice before trying someone else. Rothschild, on the other hand, is not going to be very manageable. He has the independence which comes with wealth and prolonged residence in England, and the ministry of finance must be prepared once the conditions were agreed on, to let him handle the whole thing without interference. His affairs and speculations are so comprehensive and varied that it means very little to him whether he secures this particular enterprise or not.

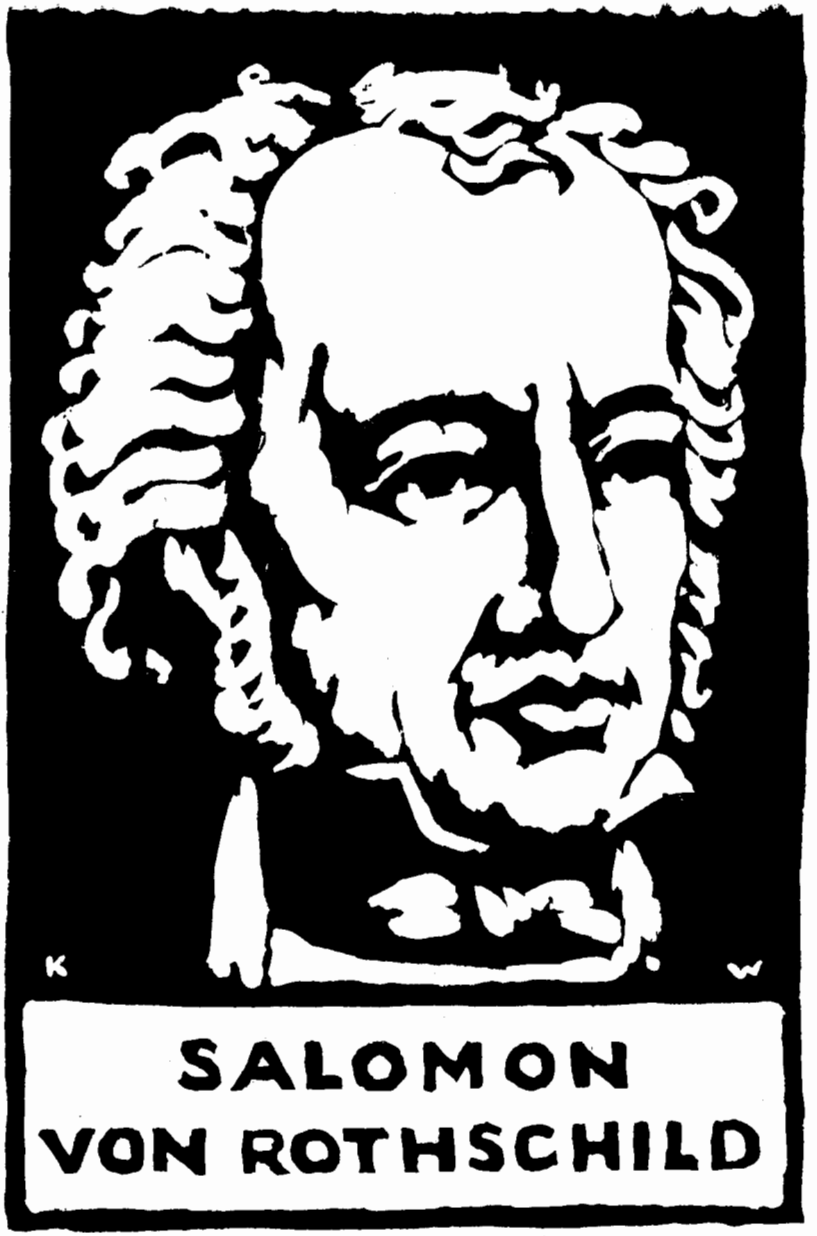
II



Prussia then sent over her keenest financial intellect, a man named Rother, who having started as a regimental clerk had risen by sheer force of character and ability to the directorship of the treasury. The negotiations now began in earnest. Nathan at once perceived that in Rother he had met his match. Here was another Buderus indeed, but a Buderus who took his responsibility with the utmost seriousness and would represent his royal master's interests as loyally as if they were his own. Nathan not only respected what was to him a quite novel type of official mentality; he found delight in pitting his wits against those of an equal. This was going to be a chess game after his own heart, with no victory assured in advance. Well, he would rather lose against an opponent like Rother, than win with Barandon.

Rother shared this feeling; only he had the advantage of having something like his opponent's measure in advance, whereas he was an unknown quantity to Nathan. Before proceeding to England he had painstakingly prepared his retreat. All in all, he preferred to have the loan launched in England, but only provided the amount and the conditions were at least equal to those that could be obtained elsewhere. To make sure of this he had entered into negotiations with bankers both in Berlin and in Amsterdam. Moreover, he had outlined a plan for a direct government flotation without the aid of bankers. As it happened the Netherland authorities were contemplating a loan themselves and could not permit a foreign one to be offered on their exchanges at this time, but privately a number of capitalists assured Rother that they would be glad to invest in the Prussian securities if they were issued abroad. In Berlin, despite the general depression, a consortium was improvised which was willing to take up fifteen million, possibly twenty, on acceptable terms. Prussia was thus well armed for the fray. The Rothschilds by no means had the field to themselves. They must reckon with strong competition.

Realizing all these initial disadvantages, Nathan called his brother Salomon to his support. This was the first government loan the family had ever been called upon to float, and it must go warily. Salomon had had dealings with Rother before, was closely in touch with developments in Berlin, and might well know something about the rival terms. Nathan, moreover, though he was confident of his own business skill, did not trust himself in delicate manœuvres with diplomats, especially Continental ones. That was Salomon's forte.

The conversations began at noon on the 25th of March and continued for an entire week, sixteen hours a day, frequently till the small hours of the morning. Rother opened by declaring the conditions named in the printed plan unacceptable. To this Nathan replied that he was prepared to listen to any reasonable proposal. However, that plan had been made public, and it would be a breach of faith with prospective investors, as well as compromising to both Prussia and his House, to dishonor it entirely. Prussia was about to make her initial appearance in the London financial market, and such a beginning would injure her prestige. While, therefore, he would be glad to consider raising the price somewhat, he would suggest that at least a portion of the loan be offered at the figure originally named. But in any case, he wished to say at once, it would be useless to try to float the issue at over sixty-five on the average. As Herr Rother was aware, even the French bonds were unable to lift themselves above that level, and the Prussian Funds were a new and untried investment over here. Yes, Herr Rother had heard this reasoning before from Consul Barandon. Also, he knew that he could do better than match these conditions much nearer home, and that in all probability Mr. Rothschild would not let it come to that.

SALOMON

Aloud Rother observed that without wishing to make odious comparisons, he regarded his own country's credit as an infinitely sounder risk than that of France, and that this he had reason to believe was also the general view. If the public had any real confidence in the newly restored French monarchy, its securities would command a much higher price. But France, as the last quarter century had amply shown, was a turbulent country. Besides, her national debt was tremendous, and she was at present groaning under the burden of a still unpaid indemnity. Prussia, on the other hand, was a young and vigorous state, with an orderly population devoted to its reigning House and quite proof against revolutionary infection. Her internal debt was trifling, her foreign one almost non-existent. The entire world admired and trusted her honest and efficient government, and her hard-working, pious, intelligent inhabitants. In sum, the low state of the French rente had nothing whatever to do with Prussia.

The Rothschilds conceded that there was much to be said for this reasoning, and requested a counter proposal. Rother replied that Prussia must have five million pounds (thirty million thalers) and was prepared to offer the bonds on a sliding scale of seventy-five, seventy-eight and eighty net, that is, without any deduction for bankers' commissions. This was, of course, merely an asking price. Even so, however, Nathan found it fantastic; and after submitting reasons why it would be useless to undertake the loan at anything like those terms—reasons which commanded even Rother's admiration—he frankly declared that unless his opponent was in the mood for large concessions the conferences might as well be abandoned at once. For a moment the air grew extremely tense. Rother, partly because he felt that he had the inside grip on the situation, partly as a tactical move calculated to force the bankers to name their final figures, said that he feared there was nothing else left. As Humboldt had warned beforehand, Nathan was too independent and prosperous to care. Had he been alone, he would at this stage quite likely have walked out of the room without any further ado. Salomon, however, was anxious that this undertaking should not end in failure; his mind was dwelling on the still exposed position of himself and his brothers on the mainland. So he counseled patience. Both sides, therefore, retired to think it over, and the heated session ended in mutual expressions of friendship.

The next day a succession of compromises was proposed and discussed. Finally Nathan declared himself willing to float the bonds at seventy straight. In view, however, of the condition of the market and the consequent risks involved, he must ask for no less than four per cent commission. Again, the negotiations were in peril of an abrupt termination. Rother was still soaring in the region of eighty, and commissions of four per cent he declared to be unheard of. The discussions continued until long past midnight. Not only the price but the amount of the loan were still in dispute. The Rothschilds argued that to launch five million pounds' worth of an unknown security was to risk both their own fortune and the credit of Prussia unnecessarily. It were far more prudent to start modestly with three millions, and in the event of success to follow it up with a further two, which would then doubtless command a better price. As the hours dragged on with no solution in sight, a spirit of accommodation possessed both sides. Rother agreed to the four per cent commission, Nathan gave in on the five millions. On the price, too, a compromise was reached. The first half was to be issued at seventy, one half the remainder at seventy-two and a half, and the last quarter at seventy-five. The understanding was verbal; papers were to be signed on the morrow.

III

Between supper and breakfast, however, Rother did some sums and observed that at this rate the treasury would realize on the average somewhat less than seventy per cent of the face value of its script. This was no better than the German bankers were prepared to do, and he would have a difficult time explaining his reasons for placing the profitable business with foreigners, in particular as public opinion was strongly opposed already to having the bonds go out of the country. Besides, were he to sign up on these terms he would be exceeding his authority. He disliked very much reopening the discussion—it meant a deadlock now, he feared—and seeming to be going back on his word; but there was nothing else he could do. In the morning he therefore dispatched a letter to Salomon explaining his position.

He began very pleasantly by paying a warm tribute to Nathan. His journey to London, he felt, had been worth while because it had enabled him to become acquainted with Salomon's brother, "for whose intellect and character I have the greatest admiration—even if our affair comes to nothing." Having thus casually introduced the main purpose of his letter, he went on to say that his hands were tied by explicit instructions which prevented him from definitively entering into the provisional agreement of the night before without consulting his government. These instructions he would gladly lay before Salomon—"not as Mr. Rothschild but as my friend"—when they met again. To Berlin he surely enough did write that same day—not, however, to ask for wider powers but to say that the negotiations were progressing favorably! But that he really held Nathan in high esteem he showed in the way he spoke of him to the authorities at home: "The London Rothschild is a very estimable man and has an almost unbelievable influence on all money affairs in the city. It is saying a good deal, yet it is well-nigh true that he controls prices on the exchange here. His strength as a banker is very great."

Salomon was not to be outdone in courtesy; for his gifts as a diplomat were superior to his grammar. If he was put out he did not show it. Writing back promptly, in language which even old Meyer would have been ashamed of, he assured Rother that they wished nothing to be done in haste, that good-fellowship and sincerity were more to them than business, and that they were his cordial and devoted friends.

There followed four more days of fencing and bargaining and threats of rupture. Finally at three o'clock in the morning of March 31 an agreement was secured. It was not this time a compromise; all the concessions came from the bankers, and Rother emerged with flying colors. The flotation figures were unchanged—seventy, seventy-two and a half, and seventy-five—but the commission of four per cent had been eliminated entirely. Immediately upon the signing of the contracts Nathan dispatched a boat to Hamburg with a million thalers in silver, to await Rother's arrival there, and a second million in commercial paper on the same city was handed him on his departure. Humboldt was delighted; Rother's skill had achieved a triumph beyond all expectations. The felicitations, however, were premature; Rother still had a card in his sleeve. He had held it for a climax all along.

When, early in the negotiations, Rother had painted the economic outlook of his country in bright colors, the picture represented his genuine convictions. All that Prussia lacked was a world market for her credit. This loan, now happily arranged, would give her that. He trusted the Rothschilds to handle the exchanges with skill. In these circumstances it would not be long before the bonds would rise in value. Why, then, should not the royal treasury share in the profits? The country did not need the entire five million pounds at once. She could afford to invest a bit in her own securities, now that the pressure was relieved. In a final conversation with Salomon he, therefore, suggested that Prussia would cheerfully take over one million pounds from the loan herself. Considering that the bankers had throughout fought for keeping the total down to a lower figure, they could hardly object now that Rother so obligingly lightened their burden. The brothers graciously consented, and the parting letters exchanged between the negotiators were almost tender. Rother wrote to "my dear Salomon" that he was leaving London happy, and Salomon replied by assuring him that he had done "a divine piece of business. God knows," he added, "that our hearts are with you and that we are moved by no desire for profit. . . . We are heartily, eternally and loyally your friends."

Why should they not be? The new loan was taken energetically in hand by all the five brothers and pushed simultaneously in all the more important exchanges of the Continent as well as in London. Trading in it was so brisk from the start that within six months the price rose to eighty-three. It went back for a little time, without however falling below the level at which it was issued, and then recovering it went on upward till at the end of six years it mounted to par. The Rothschilds thus had reason to be content with their first venture into state financing. They had been generous without exactly sacrificing themselves. Doubtless they could have wrung more favorable terms out of Barandon. But where would have been the glory? They had learned something from the contact with Rother, had triumphed over competitors, and had recaptured the confidence of the Prussian court, which in the first stages of the negotiations they had almost forfeited.

As for Rother he had during a time of depression succeeded in obtaining terms which were the admiration of the experts. His last-minute move had been a stroke of genius. The bonds had scarcely been put on the market when a Paris banking-house offered to take over the million pounds he had reserved, at five per cent above the flotation price. Many people in the government were in favor of accepting, but he held on till the height of the boom, and the state realized a round hundred and fifty thousand pounds on the incidental operation. Moreover he had avoided the risk of a direct loan and had put Prussia definitely on the European financial map.

CHAPTER XI

HONEYMOON

TO return to France and the sequel to James's rebuff. Why the Rothschilds should take the lead in bulling the loan of 1817 puzzled Labouchère and Alexander Baring not a little. It looked to them like the purest benevolence. The brothers, after being not only beaten but snubbed into the bargain, were returning good for evil, like apostolic Christians. It did not sound like them, or even like rational business. What might they be up to? Make a killing? Naturally. But that was too obvious. They could as easily profit by bearing the market. The only plausible explanation seemed to be this: they were currying favor with their rivals by a demonstration of their power on the exchanges. It was a peace offering. Ouvrard and Labouchère lost what little respect they had for men who could resort to such groveling tactics.

The gentlemen were in error, however, and unjust to Nathan's resourcefulness. Not that he was not capable of precisely those tactics; only in this instance he had other objectives in his eye. A corner in the new French rentes was desirable on general principles, as well as for two or three specific ones. In view of the firm's manifest destiny, the public ought to have its confidence educated in state securities. A weak response to this initial venture would be a setback for all loans and hurt more people than Baring and Hope. Contrariwise, a brisk absorption of the French offering would create a thirst for future issues. But public spirit aside, Nathan did purpose a show of strength,—to impress, however, not his rivals, but the financial world in general and the French government in particular. What with her economy disordered by a quarter of century of almost constant war, the Allied armies in occupation of her territory eating her out of house and home, and a sizable part of the indemnity still to be paid, France had only begun to borrow. True, helping the present loan to its feet might merely result in strengthening Baring and Hope. The Rothschild demonstration, instead of showing the authorities where the real money power was, making them regret the error of their past ways and disposing them for a wiser course in the future, was running the risk of leading them to the superficial conclusion that the two British firms were so influential that even disappointed competitors were bound to support them. Well, that might happen. And then again with a bit of caution one might very well induce the French public, if not its government, to ask a few embarrassing questions about this too successful (and too profitable) loan of Baring and Hope. And lastly, control of the market would make the House of Rothschild the arbiter in the next flotation; would not only enable them to dictate the price, but give them in effect the power to veto the project altogether. In given circumstances the exercise of this last would be nearly as sweet as the award of the loan itself.

What followed came close to bearing out Nathan's calculations. Within less than a year the French bond issue of 1817 soared twenty per cent—from fifty-five to sixty-six. The British firms came off so well that the Paris investors and even more the French taxpayers complained loudly at the tribute they were forced to pay the foreign bankers. Even the government was stirred, and brought suit against Ouvrard for profiteering. Nevertheless, when early in 1818 the budget again failed to balance, the ministry of finance turned for help once more to Baring and Hope, and the Rothschilds found themselves as much on the outside as the year before. Neither gratitude for past aid nor veiled threats of future obstruction would make Labouchère overcome his aversion for the brothers. This time, however, Nathan as well as James must be reckoned with. The London Rothschild, fresh from his triumph with Prussia and his victories on both royal exchanges, was determined that no new French loan should be launched without at the very least his participation in the syndicate. If Baring and his friends refused to take warning, then he, Nathan, would have no choice but to use his veto power.

II

Negotiations in Paris began early in the year. By summer a tentative agreement had been concluded with Baring and Hope, whereby the two associated British firms were to raise two hundred and seventy million francs for the final liquidation of the indemnity. By way of a sop to public opinion, the government did for a while give some perfunctory attention to schemes of a direct treasury loan, and listened with one ear to proposals of the native bankers; but nothing came of either alternative. In one respect at least Nathan's fears were thus justified. For the government took the position that it could not risk untried men and methods at a critical time, and that the British houses had more than earned their profits by the great lift they had given French credit at home and abroad through their successful handling of the last loan. Indeed, it was owing to their efforts that the nation was now able to command a much improved figure for its bonds.

For the time being, however, the agreement was provisional. France must first secure the assent of the Allied governments, and that meant a wait of several months. In the autumn a conference of the Powers would meet at Aix-la-Chapelle to consider the evacuation of the French provinces, the payment of the balance of the indemnity and some related matters. Till then, therefore, the precise terms of the loan contract must remain in abeyance. The Rothschilds were going to have their delegate at Aix, and Nathan was still hopeful that Baring would be realist enough to come to terms. The last word at the conference would rest not with France but with the statesmen of England, Russia, Austria and Prussia. With all these countries the Rothschilds were in good standing. At any rate, James and his brother in London went on trading in the French bonds of the previous loan and pushing them up.

Meantime Karl, the fourth son of Meyer, had reached his thirtieth year and felt it was time for him to marry. Choosing a mate for a Rothschild had, by the year 1818, become a serious matter. Amschel and Salomon had taken wives in the dim days when the family were Judengasse shopkeepers; Nathan had wedded Hanna Cohen during the smuggling interlude. But Karl was fifteen years younger than Amschel, and thus the first to attain marriageable age since the House of Rothschild had become a dynasty. They were not only the richest Jews in the world, but nobles to boot. Their former neighbors and business associates were away beneath them; families on their own economic level still hesitated to accept them as equals. Moreover, Karl was the least clever of the brothers. It was therefore a brilliant achievement and another step in the rise of the House when the erstwhile Kalmann won the hand of Adelaide Herz. The young lady was not only beautiful; her family belonged to the small and exclusive circle of cultivated German Jews who had had their money long enough to attain enlightenment and social graces.

The wedding took place on the 16th of September, at the very time when Frankfort was filling up with notables on their way to the Congress at Aix. It was a gorgeous throng. From the four corners of Europe Emperors and kings, statesmen and generals and great ladies were converging upon the ancient capital of Charlemagne. Originally it had been planned that Salomon should be the sole plenipotentiary of the Rothschilds at the big show; diplomacy was his bailiwick. But Adelaide was tempted; and since the young pair must go on a wedding journey somewhere, why not combine pleasure with business and take their honeymoon at Aix amid the gilded pageantry? The notion caught Salomon's fancy. Finance being so largely an affair of the right social contacts, the presence in the delegation of a lady with Adelaide's accomplishments would be a distinct asset. Her beauty, her poise and her family connections might easily turn the scales in the delicate mission ahead of him. By all means let the couple come along.

III

In truth, Adelaide and her people had begun helping out even before the wedding. No one surely who had thus far come into their ken was fated to mean so much in the destiny of the Rothschilds as Friedrich von Gentz, and it was Frau Herz and her sister who provided that introduction. Salomon and his brothers, not being reading men, were unaware that Gentz was the most distinguished publicist in Germany. Nor is it likely that they would have gone out of their way to make his acquaintance on that account if they had been aware of it. Writing men doubtless had their merits. At least princes seemed to think so. The Duke of Weimar, for instance, had made one of them, a Frankforter named Goethe, his chief minister. But what possible use could they be to bankers? What was interesting about Gentz was that he was the secretary, the close friend and adviser, almost the other self of Prince Metternich, the man who in the affairs of Europe had inherited the mantle of Napoleon, who was the power behind the throne of Austria and who would hold the Congress at Aix in the hollow of his hand. That was important, and equally so was the fact that Gentz was a gentleman of expensive tastes and meager income, so that he probably must make ends meet somehow.

The facts in the case were a great deal more interesting than that. In his youth Gentz had shown decided leanings toward the radical ideas of the Revolution. Later, the excesses of the Jacobins and an offer of employment at the court of Prussia had made a wiser and a disillusioned man of him. He read Burke's "Reflections" and swung completely around. A man of rare political insight and literary gifts, he soon attracted notice in influential quarters by his eloquent defense of the old order. Foreign diplomats in Berlin approached him with assignments in behalf of their governments. He sold his pen and his editorial connections to England, to Russia, to whoever was willing to pay for them. At a time when courtiers and even ministers balanced their private budgets with gifts and loans from court merchants, when reigning princes themselves bartered their subjects for money, it was too much to ask of an impecunious young writer to be swayed by ethical scruples. Gentz was anything but ashamed of the "subsidies" he got; he noted each item gleefully in the Journal he kept as "an agreeable transaction" or as "good news." Subsequently, after entering the service of Austria, he discovered that bankers were prepared to make safe investments for him with their own capital in exchange for advance notice of his master's intentions, and he delivered this intelligence as freely and with no more thought of wrong-doing than he had previously shown in merchandising his literary wares.

Gentz preceded Metternich to the congress, and arrived in Frankfort on the 3rd of September. The same evening, his journal records, he saw Moritz Bethmann the banker, by whom he was "very cordially received." (Bethmann's firm, like most financial houses, had irons in the fire at Aix.) On Sunday he lunched at Bethmann's home. But the man with whom he spent most of his time was David Parish, the young Vienna banker who was again operating on the sidelines for Baring and Hope. Parish, however, was no mere check-book to Gentz. "David Parish," he wrote to another friend, "is the matador, the pearl of the business world in all Christendom on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean, one of the most complete men that I have ever seen." They too met and talked every day for as long as Parish remained in Frankfort, which was till the eighth,

It was only after Parish's departure that Gentz found time for the Rothschilds. At ten in the morning of the next day they paid their first call. Three days later there was another visit of an hour, during which Gentz and they had "an interesting conversation about the local Jewish question," then up before the council of the German states sitting in Frankfort. Thus far neither "agreeable transaction" nor "good news." But presently the tempo quickened. Sunday the 20th was a hectic day for Gentz. In the morning he had a conference with the Austrian ambassador, on leaving him he stopped in to see Salomon and his brother at their own place, where "everything was happily disposed of." Then he must rush to Bethmann's for lunch. At nine A. M. on Monday one of the brothers came alone, and the conversation was important enough for Gentz to write his Prince the moment his visitor left. Tuesday evening he dined with "the family," which included beside the Rothschilds, Madame Herz, Madame Frohberg (Adelaide's aunt, an old friend of Gentz), a general and several lesser notables. At daybreak next day he was off to join his master.

Salomon, accompanied by the honeymooners, followed him the same afternoon with a light heart.

IV

At Aix the proceedings got slowly under way. At least the official ones did. How much was being accomplished at the ceaseless round of luncheons, dinners, soirées, balls, the Rothschilds had no way of knowing for certain, but what they surmised made them uneasy. A score of bankers—Alexander Baring and Labouchère among others—had arrived on the ground before them, with their suites of well-groomed, genteel-mannered lieutenants. They were seen everywhere, riding about in their proud equipages, halting at one palace after another, gold-laced magnificoes and splendid ladies at their side. Parish and Gentz apart, Salomon saw scarcely anyone in that whole brilliant assemblage with whom he was on speaking terms. Hardenberg was there for Prussia, but Rothers was not in the delegation. England had sent Castlereagh but not Herries. Even Barbier was absent. Neither Adelaide's beauty nor Gentz's friendly offices seemed to be of much use. The shimmering pageant rolled past, but the Rothschilds looked on at the windows, wistful spectators.

Gentz was touchingly attentive. The busiest man at the congress, he would tear himself away from a reception at the Nesselrodes', a tête-à-tête with Lady Castlereagh, even Metternich's dinner table, to spend a couple of hours with Adelaide and her husband and brother-in-law. Almost every day he found time to receive Salomon and Karl at his own rooms. And he did his utmost to convince his Prince that the Rothschilds were too rich and powerful to be overlooked, while Parish on his side urged the same logic upon Baring and Hope. But it was all to no purpose. Metternich and the bankers were committed. In those two or three days before Salomon's arrival an understanding had been reached between them, and there was no going back. It was too late for a peaceful solution of the Baring-Rothschild rivalry.

Already in September, while the forehanded guests were assembling in Aix, some rumblings had been heard on the Paris bourse. They were mere warning signals, however, which soon passed. On the second of October Gentz had a reassuring talk with Parish about "important money affairs in Paris;" on the ninth he received "good news" from the same quarter. On that day, too, the Congress fixed the conditions for the remainder of the French indemnity, Baring and Hope undertaking to float the loan—at a greatly advanced figure, of course, in view of the high standing meanwhile attained by the issue of the previous year. The Duc de Richelieu for France approved the enhanced terms with pleasure. The Allied representatives gave the enterprise their blessing. All the nervousness of the past fortnight had disappeared. Bankers and statesmen told one another confidently there would be no storm, and Aix gave itself up to unrestrained gaiety. The Rothschilds seemed finally and irretrievably beaten. Gentz's visits to "the family" came to an abrupt end, though Salomon and Karl continued to call on him from time to time. He was very, very sorry; he had done his best. But what was the use? The decision was patently irrevocable; they could see that. And he was terrifically busy. He was the secretary not only of the president of the Congress (Prince Metternich) but of the Congress itself, and the protocols of the proceedings devolved upon his shoulders. Well, better luck another time.

Nevertheless the two brothers remained serene and devoted. On the twenty-seventh, after Gentz had about made up his mind that they had at last given up,—they had come only twice since the ninth—Salomon appeared and handed him eight hundred ducats, winnings from a little investment in the English Funds. The busy secretary pocketed the windfall gratefully enough, though he was a little puzzled. The persistence of those people was astounding. What could be their game now? The mystery was to be resolved a week later.

On the fifth of November the thunderbolt fell. While Aix had been enjoying itself, some terrifying things had been happening in Paris. About eight days ago—on October twenty-seventh, to be exact—a mass of 1817 government bonds had suddenly been unloaded on the bourse. The result had been pandemonium. Within five days the state securities had dropped from 74 to 68. Every other paper had followed suit. There was no let-up in sight. It was a panic. From the French capital the movement was spreading to the other Continental markets. Even London was showing the strain.

V

The bad news threw the Congress into confusion. "They all pretty much lost their heads," says an eyewitness; "only Baring kept his." Lucky for him that he did. He had something more tangible to save than his self-control. By the contract which he had signed here at Aix less than a month ago, he had on his hands a trifle over a quarter of a billion new French obligations, which he had bought at an average of seventy, and which therefore meant not only an immediate loss but that they could hardly be offered on the market at all. Unless he held his wits together and found a way out, he was a ruined man. The situation was as desperate as could be imagined; there was no mistake about that; all the greater the need for straight thinking.

"An Englishman the like of whom there are not many," was Gentz's characterization of Baring. He proved himself worthy of the compliment now. No muddling through for him. A glance showed him pretty clearly what had happened, who had made it happen, and why. Patently a couple of gentlemen in London and Paris had decided to show him who was master. Well, they had succeeded. It was useless to deny that. But they were mistaken if they thought they had got his scalp. One way or another he was going to squeeze out of that contract. That was all, and that was enough satisfaction for any rival surely. There would be no new French loan just now; but the House of Baring Brothers would go on standing for yet awhile.

The proposal, however, to break the engagement could hardly come from the banker. It would be not only undignified but useless. He would be read a stern lecture about the sacredness of contracts, and be held to his pound of flesh. As it happened, a number of the leading Allied statesmen had an interest in the ill-starred loan, other than official. Hardenberg of Prussia, Nesselrode of Russia, Prince Metternich, not to mention Gentz and other smaller fry, each had signed up for a parcel of the as yet unissued bonds. They had not actually put up any money of course. If all had gone well, they would have clipped the coupons every six months or so, and eventually have collected the full value of the matured paper, without the bankers being too petty about the accounts.

But things were not going well, alas! not well at all. So Baring via Parish via Gentz begged for an audience with Prince Metternich and the other chiefs of the Congress; which was grudgingly granted. The statesmen would rather have avoided the meeting; it did not promise to be pleasant. The unlucky financier would probably whimper and crawl and appeal for mercy. But no! surprisingly. The thoroughbred was taking misfortune like a man. He did not so much as hint at release. A contract was a contract; he meant to stand by his guns, whatever the cost. What could be finer! However, there was something more—another surprise, not so agreeable. He expected the good gentlemen to honor their commitments also, and thus distribute the burden! In view of the fact that the operation was to be a loss from the outset, he must respectfully and regretfully suggest that all subscribers pay up in advance, trading on margin being feasible only on a rising market. And so on . . .

This was unheard of, fantastic. Metternich was thoroughly outraged. No banker had ever made any such proposition to him before. He had no money for investments of any kind, least of all for flivvers. Rather than do what Baring wanted, he would throw the loan out altogether. And that was what happened. At the session of November 19, the chair informed the French delegation that, mindful of the deplorable news from Paris and having the credit of France at heart, the Congress was obliged to reopen the matter of indemnity payments. A canvass of the assembled powers revealed that the representatives of Russia, Austria and Prussia favored postponing the question to some future conference. The Duc de Richelieu had no choice but to agree. The houses of Baring Brothers and Hope & Company were saved, but they left Aix with their glory dimmed. Metternich never forgave them. Their primacy in world finance was gone forever.

VI

Meanwhile, between the fifth and the nineteenth, while the wearisome bargaining was going on, Metternich managed to spare a little time for Salomon and Karl. On the twelfth he asked Parish, Gentz, the two brothers and one or two other people to take lunch at his table. As an earnest of friendship and goodwill, the busy Gentz dropped everything the next day to prepare a memorandum on the Jewish question for the Council at Frankfort. That was on the thirteenth of November. On the fourteenth Salomon, considering his task done, quit Aix-la-Chapelle, together with the honeymoon couple and David Parish. The Congress continued for a fortnight longer. Journeying home to Vienna, Gentz stopped off again in Frankfort for a week, and while there saw the brothers daily. Prince Metternich arrived in the Main city on the evening of the fourth and left the next morning, but Salomon and Karl could not let those fourteen hours pass without paying their respects, whereupon Gentz noted briefly in his journal: "arrangements with the Rothschilds." Finally Gentz himself was off for Vienna right after lunch on December sixth; but though he had many friends in Frankfort, and though he had taken leave of the Rothschilds at their home the evening before, he ran in again for a last handshake while his coachman waited whip in hand.

His next halt was Munich, where he was received by the Bavarian king and treated on all hands as a personage. He felt himself that he had acquitted himself more than creditably at Aix. As he added up the proceeds of those two months' work he must admit that he had not done so badly: two orders (the Red Eagle from Prussia and the Anna Order from the Emperor of Austria) besides six thousand ducats in cash, thus: France eight hundred; ditto from Prussia and Russia; seven hundred pounds from England, and from a Herr Bentheim on behalf of "the mediatized" nobles one thousand ducats. Nothing at all, of course, from Baring, but to make up for it, another eight hundred from the Rothschilds, with much more in prospect. And his total expenses, including gifts for loved ones in Vienna, barely more than a quarter of the total.

Money, however, is not everything. Aix had been a turning point in his career. Writing to a friend from Munich, he let himself go in exultation: "Never, I can truthfully say," he declared, "have the laurels been heaped so thick on my head; every day I was flatteringly assured that without me it was no longer possible to have a congress. . . . It was proposed I regard this period as the culmination of my life . . . that I be forced to marry, so that my stock at least might not die out. . . . Partly for official reasons, but also because I felt I could make no better or more interesting use of my spare time, I have had the most instructive conversations with the most powerful figures in the commercial world—Baring, Labouchère, Parish, Rothschild, etc.; and it was no small advantage to hear the innermost secrets of the greatest money affairs that have ever been carried on among men, negotiated in my little house."

Exciting and delightful as all this was, it did not prevent him from observing the financial gods with a twinkle in his eye and making thumbnail sketches of them. Parish, "the matador, the pearl," was a boon companion after his own heart. He admired the intelligence and the broad training of Baring. But the phenomena, the marvels, of the entire assemblage were the Rothschilds. As men they could not compare with the others, and he frankly despised them: "They are common, ignorant Jews, outwardly presentable, in their trade the sheerest materialists, without the remotest inkling of any higher relationship in the world." But they are "endowed with an admirable instinct which always makes them take the right course and between two right ones the best. Their enormous wealth (they are the biggest in Europe) is entirely the product of this instinct, which the vulgar call luck." It must not be imagined, however, that all the Rothschilds are equally gifted. Of the five one is only so-so, (Amschel) and another (Karl) is wholly negligible. Finally, the moral of the financial drama he had witnessed:

"The profoundest reasonings of Baring, now that I have seen everything at close range, inspire me with less confidence than a single healthy glance from one of the more intelligent Rothschilds. If ever Baring and Hope go wrong, it will be because they think themselves wiser than Rothschild and do not follow his advice."

But there was little danger; Baring had learned his lesson, and he had no thought of defying his rivals again. In the years to come the two houses coöperated often and amicably.

PART III

GRANDEUR

CHAPTER XII

IN THE SADDLE

AIX was a turning point. It was another milestone, like Nathan's fateful journey to Manchester, like the banishment of the Elector William, like the gold purchase from the East India Company. No, it was more momentous than all these. Everything that had gone before had been but a preparation; this was the harvest, that magical time when dreams and scarcely articulated hopes take solid shape. With Gentz, like a very genie, unlocking fairy palaces; with Metternich, the portentous, the all-powerful, safely in tow; with the majestic Hapsburg himself waving a genial scepter, the whole past had grown dim, shadowy, far-away. Buderus, the Elector, Rother, even Herries, shrank and faded and became unreal like the characters in some tale read long ago. With Parish a devoted associate, with every major financial house in Vienna reduced to a state of virtual vassalage, with the proud Baring himself making overtures of peace, friendship and alliance, how remote and insignificant seemed the foes and rivals of another day—Feidel David, Michel Simon and his son-in-law Levy, Rueppell & Harnier, even the Bethmanns, even Van Notten! Had all those people, indeed, ever existed? Had they actually ventured to put themselves in the path of the mighty, irresistible juggernaut? They were such vague, insubstantial shapes. And, most incredible of all, could it be true that only yesterday Salomon Rothschild and his brother Karl had been slinking about on the twilight edge of Aix-la-Chapelle, patronized by Gentz and Parish, snubbed by Labouchère and Baring, outsiders in the grand show? How strange and sudden were the ways of destiny!

But now,—now came the sky-rocket years,—the glamorous, golden harvest years. Fortresses so long besieged that they had almost appeared impregnable suddenly surrendered without resistance, with hardly a blow, unconditionally. The whole battered front gave way, wilted, and collapsed. The conquering five, with flags flying and drums rolling,—the strangest host in all history—marched on to victory. So swiftly that it made their heads dizzy, everything that they had ever aspired to, things that they had hardly dared breathe of even to themselves, dropped into their hands, all in the space of three brief years. The Austrian Consulate Generalships in Paris and London went to James and Nathan; a new house rose up in Vienna with Salomon in command; Naples, at the extreme tip of the Continent, was taken, and Karl, too, reigned in sovereign grandeur; and then came the splendid climax: all the brothers were raised to the baronate, with their children and their children's children to perpetuity.

It was Austria, the one country that had taken such long and arduous courting, which, having once yielded, gave herself so unreservedly and so whole-heartedly. Scarcely had the agenda of the Aix Congress been finally disposed of when Salomon emerged as His Imperial Majesty's chief banker. The haughtiest and most fastidious court in Europe opened its proud doors wide to welcome Salomon and Karoline (née Stern) Rothschild. With the mighty Chancellor securely bound to the golden chariot, the rest of the cabinet were drawn into the procession as a matter of course. Where the political power of Austria was ascendant, there also the financial power of Rothschild swayed. Salomon had but to whisper that he desired honors for a man in his employ or privileges for a relative, and the Imperial Hapsburg thought twice before he declined. Invitations poured in upon the banker and his wife; hardly a state function passed without them; archdukes and ministers dined and danced at their home. On the bourse he was supreme. He made and destroyed men and fortunes with a nod. To be in his good graces was better than credit; to incur his displeasure was ruin. Former rivals and competitors submitted to his dictation and prayed fervently for his continued success; for, in the words of Moritz Bethmann, the very prosperity of Austria was inextricably bound up with the fortunes of the House of Rothschild, "and the fall of such a colossus would be terrible."

But not alone in Vienna was the sun shining. In France also a new king had arisen, or at least a new minister of finance. Count Joseph de Villèle, like Metternich, was an ultra-monarchist Christian gentleman and thus had a natural aversion for the people of Jesus; but, even as the Austrian Chancellor, he was drawn toward the Rothschilds, and—so it was rumored and insinuated—by the same irresistible lodestone. So James acquired an ancient palace on the Rue Laffitte and filled it with masterpieces of painting, sculpture and such things, hired a box at the opera, and became a patron of the arts. The last of the sons of Meyer to be born, he was still a bachelor; but his position in society, the multitude of his friends and retainers, and his elaborate entertainments, made a wife indispensable. Therefore he bethought himself of marriage presently. The latitude of choice, however, had since the last Rothschild wedding become still more restricted. What with being Austrian barons and all the rest of it, even families like the Herzes could now hardly aspire to family alliances with them. They were, like royalty, a subspecies apart. Only a Rothschild was fit to breed Rothschilds; and surely none but a Rothschild could provide the dowry fit for a Rothschild. The consequence of all of which was that in the summer of 1824 James was wedded to Betty, the youthful daughter of his own brother Salomon.

II

Imperial Austria, as distinguished from its imperial Chancellor and his efficient secretary, took Salomon to her bosom for pressing reasons of her own. The "good news" and the "pleasant surprises" which came to Gentz; the loans and gifts and holiday remembrances which Metternich received, the mediation and expert advice of David Parish, certainly removed obstacles; but the ministry of finance was in no position and in no mood to be choosy anyhow. The state exchequer had been suffering from distempers and violent attacks of vertigo for decades; the wars with Revolutionary and Napoleonic France had aggravated the malaise immeasurably; and no amount of subsidies, indemnities and kindred doses had sufficed to effect a cure. The Vienna bankers administered temporary relief from time to time; but their resources were limited, they lacked the necessary connections abroad, and, the authorities having once or more suspended cash payments and defaulted on the interest, they entertained serious doubts about the solvency of the fatherland. It thus fell out that the monarchy was chronically hard up, that its securities found few buyers on the home markets and none at all on the foreign ones, and that the publication of bids for a new loan seldom occasioned bloody strife amongst the competing financial houses. It had been years, if the truth must be told, since more than one bidder had shown any interest in the nation's fiscal affairs; and even that was commonly such a lukewarm one that it must be bolstered with extravagant concessions to make it stick. Meanwhile the state's responsibilities were enormous and growing. The monarchical establishment, with its "Roman" traditions, its pretensions, its battalions of archdukes and courtesans, was the most expensive in Europe; the government departments were fantastically over-manned and putrid with incompetence and corruption; and the aftermath of the Napoleonic business had brought in its train a whole series of local combustions which, in view of Metternich's self-imposed duty as the guardian of law and order and legitimacy, was involving Austria in one costly military adventure after another.

In these circumstances the financial alliance effected at the Congress of Aix was as gratifying to the distracted Minister of finance as it was to Gentz, Metternich and Salomon. Here was a concern with unlimited means, with youth, energy and ambition, and with powerful roots in Frankfort, Paris and the world's money capital, London. Most happy augury of all, the Rothschilds were making the advances; they were clearly taking a sanguine view of the Austrian economy. Count Stadion, the then head of the treasury, was not disposed to play the blushing maiden: he met the bankers more than half way. At the first opportunity he displayed his goodwill by putting business into Salomon's hands. Not many months after the dissolution of the Congress several trial operations of the already familiar type were entered into,—indemnity transfers and the like—and cordial feelings developed between the minister and the banker. A shrewd official without any nonsense about him, Stadion took the measure of his man at once, and having satisfied himself that the connection was promising, went to work with all his might to clinch it. Rothschild craved decorations, social advancement and an improved status for the Jews of his home city; he, Stadion, was prepared to labor with the Emperor, with the council deliberating in Frankfort, with Metternich, to secure them for him. It was an article of his faith that men placed under obligation made loyal servants; Austria, heaven knew, had little enough to offer; and if this useful house could be bought with such counters, why, he was willing to pay the price.

The next year business began in earnest, and Salomon justified Stadion's trust in human gratitude. There being as yet no Rothschild office in Vienna, and the nature of the enterprise being new to the firm, David Parish conducted the preliminary negotiations and shared subsequently in the result. Early in April the Emperor authorized the associated houses of M. A. Rothschild & Sons and Fries & Company (the Parish concern) to float a lottery loan of half a hundred million florins. Salomon, however, had ideas of his own about ways and means. With Stadion's approval he proceeded to throw open to the public only a fraction of the issue. He calculated, and rightly, that an undeveloped market like Vienna and an untrained investment community like the Austrian would be swamped with such a mass of securities released all at once. Therefore, naturally, not a word was whispered about the next step, not for three months at any rate. With the help of Gentz, meanwhile, and with the aid, also, of a Baron Meseritz, who represented in Frankfort the Augsburger Allgemeine Zeitung and a syndicate of lesser journals in other German cities, a brilliant publicity campaign on behalf of the loan was launched in the press —not paid advertising, but a regular modern public education fanfare, with advice to investors, and short, snappy, popular disquisitions on finance and thrift and the like. Nor was the effort wasted. In a few weeks the scrip rose from barely over fifty to eighty, ninety and par; and long before the time the bankers had planned to let out the secret about the remainder of the loan, the first twenty millions were selling at three times the flotation figure. The loan was a riotous success.

Salomon's objective had been something more than a comfortable margin of profit; he was expecting a storm, and the ballyhoo with its effect on the market was to serve as a screen. Surely enough, the moment the remaining thirty-five millions were announced, there was a violent and agonized outcry from the purchasers of the earlier issue. It did no good for the bankers to point to the splendid results of the manœuvre and the high price at which the security was quoted. The public suddenly remembered that the culprit was a Jew, that the state (which meant the Austrian Christian taxpayers) would have to pay back almost two guldens for every one the loan had netted, and—worst of all—that they discovered, too, that owing largely to the release of the new scrip the old was tumbling furiously and disastrously. There were open charges of manipulation and Jewish trickery (the participation and the correct church affiliations of Parish being overlooked) and whispered insinuations that Metternich, Gentz and many other high officials, including even Count Stadion, had had their palms greased. However that might be, the market gradually rallied, and thereupon the popular indignation subsided.

Salomon subsequently declared that his firm alone had cleared six million florins; but that must have been the gross. Extraordinary charges, such as the newspaper campaign and other expenses, were borne by the Rothschild part of the combine alone; and unless Parish lied on the night of his tragic death six years later, he did not even know of them. At least, he said then that he knew nothing of the other expenses, which included one or two items recorded by Gentz in that outspoken journal he kept. Under date of June 7 (1821) Gentz noted a conversation with Rothschild, in the course of which the secretary conveyed "remarkable and flattering comments" of his master on the banker, which "produced favorable results" from the latter. Neither the nature of the comments nor in whose favor the results were had is indicated; but an entry of some weeks later is more explicit: "He (Salomon)," says Gentz, "gave me an accounting of my share in the last few financial operations, and it turned out that, contrary to my highest expectations, I was five thousand florins to the good."

III

Parish performed his part of the contract efficiently and loyally, and it does not appear that Rothschild was in any way dissatisfied or that any differences had come up between the two firms in all the months of their coöperation. Yet Parish was left completely in the dark about the friendly support given the common enterprise from the office of the Chancellor, and about its cost. It could not have been reticence on the part of Salomon; for Parish and Gentz were old comrades and men of the world, and he knew it. It seemed to have been something else. Parish, in the letter which he wrote Salomon on his last day on earth, accused him roundly of having deliberately and systematically worked around Metternich so as to set him against himself, and he repeated the charge to Metternich also. No doubt a despairing man on the brink of death may say wild and bitter things. This much is certain: the first important venture of Rothschild in Austria was carried out in intimate association with Parish's firm; but the first was also the last time the two concerns worked together. There were many and greater transactions in the years to come; but Parish had no part in them. The friendship between Salomon and Gentz and Gentz's master ripened into close companionship, and in proportion as it did so, Parish (whom Gentz had on his way home from Aix described as the pearl and the matador) faded from Gentz's diary and from Metternich's favor. His elimination may, of course, have been merely coincidental with Salomon's advancement. Statesmen are notoriously fickle friends.

As far as the Rothschilds were concerned, their consciences were easy. Where was the bad faith in the matter? A year ago Parish filled a need, and they used him. No one could say that they had failed in their obligations toward him, that they had not lived up to the letter of their contract. Now his usefulness was finished, and they had let him go. It was the way of business, of progress, of the world. He had ceased to be useful because Salomon having set up headquarters of his own in Vienna, the firm was now directly represented in the empire. Naturally he had done what he could to strengthen his position at court. If Parish with his personal attractiveness and his prior connection did not do the same he was simply neglecting his opportunities and had only himself to blame. Naturally, too, Salomon did not hesitate to inform the proper authorities that the association was off. Why should he? He was the House of Rothschild in Austria, and it was his right and duty to conduct his business as he saw fit. It would have been intolerable to let the government dictate to him. Therefore when the following year the Naples affair came up he very broadly intimated to Stadion that the concern was quite strong enough to handle it alone, and he had his way too. As a matter of fact, Parish did not weakly accept the situation; he tried, poor man, to assert himself. Only his judgment was faulty; he lacked the gift of sizing up men. When he found himself shelved in the Naples operation, he attempted the next time a loan came up to exert pressure on the finance minister; but Stadion was merely the workhorse and the figure-head of his department; the power was in the Chancellor's hands, and the way to the Chancellor's ear was through Gentz. What happened? The kindly treasury chief made an honest effort to have Parish participate; in a mild way he even insisted. Thereupon Salomon paid a visit to Gentz, and complained (says Gentz's diary) "with many tears about the inconsiderate manner in which various people were behaving towards him in connection with the new loan project." And within the week Gentz, to his "no small astonishment," received three thousand ducats on the Naples account and a day or so later two thousand more. Parish, in the meantime, went on shooting and drinking parties with Gentz—the jolliest pair of boon companions in the gayest capital in Europe. What could the unsocialized product of the Frankfort Ghetto do to match that?

Any other piece of business would not have mattered greatly. But Naples was not commerce; it was conquest, empire. A banking firm might share risks and profits, without injury to its standing. Sovereignty was quite another thing. You either held it in solitary grandeur or you did not have it at all. And it so fell out, to Parish's misfortune, that the Neapolitan adventure followed hard upon the lottery loan.

The beginnings of the affair went back, like everything else in European politics since 1815, to Napoleon. Under the empire the Kingdom of Naples and Sicily had been governed by His Majesty Joachim Murat. After Waterloo the legitimate monarchy was, of course, restored by the holy alliance of the victors and for a space Ferdinand I ruled the land autocratically and more or less tranquilly. The embers of 1789, however, which Napoleon had unwittingly carried to all the ends of the Continent, went on smouldering, and it was only a question of time when they would burst into flame. What actually occurred was not a conflagration but a smudge. The liberal elements, that is to say, did not assault the strongholds of absolutism; nor did they guillotine the monarch; they only surrounded the palace with cannon and bayonets, deposited a constitution after the French Rights-of-Man mode, under his beard, and suggested that he sign on the dotted line. He very much disliked complying, but he was a prudent man with a good memory, and he did as he was told; after which the rebels departed and left him to reign though not to govern. Ferdinand, however, was not half so irritated by the high-handed proceedings of his subjects as was Prince Metternich in far-away Vienna. This sort of thing was getting altogether too fashionable. Only yesterday it had been Spain,—another of the Corsican's late satrapies; now it was Naples; where was it all going to end? And if the unspeakable liberal ideas went on spreading what, in heaven's name, was to become of the sacred principle of legitimacy? Well, it just must not spread. Metternich buckled on his shining armor; that is, he issued a call to the threatened monarchs of the Holy Alliance bidding them assemble in solemn conclave to deliberate on the menace. The Congress of Laibach summoned the spineless compromiser from Naples and ordered him to explain what he thought he was doing. He vowed that he had not meant to surrender, that nothing in the world was dearer to him than the doctrine of absolutism, but that he had not had much choice. The upshot of the discussion was that Austria was authorized to dispatch an army to the disaffected realm, tear up the newly granted constitution, and restore the monarchy to its ancient and rightful glory.

In Vienna, meantime, Stadion was breaking his heart in the endeavor to keep the leaky treasury from drying up. The news from Laibach did not fill him with rejoicing. He had not enough money to pay his clerks their salaries. And now he was to clothe, feed and equip an army! But Metternich reassured him. Austria would indeed furnish the troops, but the bill would be paid by the people of Naples. In the interval the funds would have to be raised somehow. In all probability Herr von Rothschild would be delighted to advance the initial million or so. Salomon's feelings, however, upon being sounded, were found to be divided. He wished profoundly to be agreeable to Metternich, to strike out into new territory, to get the profitable business. But the situation was fearfully involved. The British and the French governments were opposed to the whole adventure, and if the House of Rothschild gave it its financial backing there might be unpleasantness for Nathan and James in London and Paris. Nearer home, too, there were complications. It was the time of the violent agitation against the lottery loan, the market (owing in part to the intimations leaking out of Laibach) was depressed, and the name Rothschild was in the worst possible odor. All in all, therefore, it would be rather imprudent for the firm to identify itself openly at this unfavorable moment with a project which already was causing uneasy stirrings in various quarters.

There was no thought, of course, on Salomon's part of keeping out of the enterprise. The needed advances, indeed, he furnished forthwith, so that the expedition might be set marching without delay. He only begged Metternich not to insist on his personal presence in Laibach at this time. Instead, he would send him down his younger brother Karl. Karl was still floating about vaguely in the old way, running errands, keeping up contacts, filling in, the last of the five brothers to find a local habitation. Who knew? Perhaps his chance had come at last.

So the weakest of the Rothschilds—as Gentz had long ago described him—showed up at the Congress, and after receiving the final instructions from Metternich, proceeded southward on his great adventure. For a moment, just before he started, panic seized him. The Piedmontese, taking heart from the happenings in Spain and Naples, rose up against King Victor Emmanuel and demanded not only a constitution but an end of the monarchy. The explosion threatened to engulf Austria's own Italian possessions in Northern Italy, the Lombard and Venetian crown lands through which Karl must journey. As it happened, however, Metternich's forehandedness saved the day. Before the movement in Alessandria (Piedmont) could get fairly under way, the Austrian troops had pushed forward without appreciable resistance, had taken Naples and restored order, with the consequence that the revolutionary stirrings throughout the peninsula subsided. Gentz, who was in Laibach with his master, and who a few days before was nearly out of his head with fright himself, now assured Karl that there was no further danger and that he could start with an easy mind. In Florence, where King Ferdinand and his ministers had interrupted their progress till the Austrian commander gave the all clear signal, Karl discovered that he would have to reckon with competition. Not only was an Italian syndicate prepared to float the loan at better terms, the Neapolitan authorities were disposed for political reasons to arrange the affair with people whom they knew and whom they could control. Ferdinand felt it in his bones that if he signed up with the Rothschilds, the proceeds would go in the main to Vienna while his own part in the transaction would be limited to paying the interest. As it turned out, the royal anticipations were, if anything, over-sanguine. For upon His Majesty's arrival in Naples, the Austrian envoy gave him to understand that it was indicated from headquarters that no other banking house was to be considered; and although the diplomat exerted himself at the same time to keep the Rothschild terms within reason, Karl, knowing that he had the field to himself now, could not be budged. Naples must guarantee repayment by hypothecating the state domains, she must pay three per cent commission, for three years she must not borrow another ducat, and after that time the preference in future loans must be given the House of Rothschild. The Austrian troops stayed on for four years, faithfully guarding the country against revolution, and the bookkeepers in Vienna regularly sent in a bill for their upkeep, which Karl (as a sort of treasurer extraordinary) promptly paid. Pretty soon the first sixteen million ducats had dried out, and then His Majesty signed for another bit and still another. For awhile the difficulty was to dispose of the royal obligations. The country being poor and the government eyed askance, the natives did not invest very heavily. Then Nathan conceived the idea of having the interest made payable in sterling and in London, so that the British market was won over. Meanwhile Karl and Adelaide grew fond of the lovely southern city, and though the conquering army marched away again the conqueror lingered. He and his descendants lingered on till Italy became a nation, more than forty years later. At last, after years of wandering and waiting on his brothers, the last of the sons of Meyer had found an anchorage.

Six years before, for a mere little job of transferring, the good Emperor Francis II had seen fit to raise four of the brothers to the nobility. As he thought of it now, Salomon felt that His Majesty had behaved rather handsomely. In comparison with the services the House had rendered since, that subsidy affair had been the veriest trifle. The lottery loan had, on the other hand, done nothing short of putting the state's credit on its feet. The business in Naples, moreover, had saved the world from liberalism and republican chaos. Was not the time, therefore, ripe for another bit of an honor? He put the rhetorical question to Gentz; Gentz put it to his master; and Metternich repeated it to All-Highest. Looking before and after, the chancellor, the monarch and not least the minister of finance, agreed that the time surely was ripe. Stadion was not only grateful for past favors; he was thinking anxiously of his flat exchequer and the weary days ahead. Metternich, for his part, was actively preparing to do for Spain what had just been so brilliantly accomplished for Naples. It so happened, besides, that his personal finances were in somewhat of a muddle just at the moment, and he was intending to obtain a loan of a million or thereabouts from Salomon himself. By all means the obliging fellow should have anything he reasonably wanted.

Fortunately there was no need to ponder this time what would please Herr Rothschild. He was right on the ground now, and he was not making any mystery of his aspirations. For five years he had been hankering after those fabled beasts that a martinet in the heraldry department had cut out of the coat of arms he had submitted. He wanted them back, and he wanted a title that sounded like something. Well, he should certainly have them. No officious meddling by experts now, no irony and no captious criticism. On the 29th of September 1822 all the five brothers were by imperial letters patent admitted to the hereditary aristocracy with the dignity of barons. Amschel, Salomon, Karl and James rejoiced and celebrated. Nathan eyed the sheepskin sardonically, dropped it into a desk drawer and forgot it.

CHAPTER XIII

IN QUEST OF A HALO

THEY should have been happy; they were not. They had the world at their feet in a way that Napoleon had never had it. Yet there was an emptiness at their hearts, a void that craved to be filled. Shimmering with orders, with stars and jeweled crosses; caparisoned with the ribbons and decorations of a score of states, from France to Russia and from the Mediterranean to the North Sea; courted and fêted by emperors; richer probably than any five men had ever been in history before; dwelling in palaces like princes, surrounded by hosts of servants, subordinates and retainers; flattered and envied and their supremacy acknowledged by the financial potentates of the whole world; in the prime of vigorous youth, loaded down with achievement, confident of the future, lacking nothing that money or power could give—what more could men want on earth? Cynics railed and called them unappeasable; courtiers shrugged their shoulders at their ceaseless pursuit of honors; their foes hated them for their covetousness. It was true; their ambition was boundless. It gave them no peace. It drove them on relentlessly, as if against their will, without bringing them to their goal. They grasped at ever more wealth, more power, more recognition; and when they got it they saw it was not what they wanted.

For they felt, without knowing it, that they were out of their element, creatures torn from their background and their native surroundings. Their very splendor oppressed them, and in their simplicity they strove on, vaguely hoping that somehow a little more magnificence would ease the discomfort. Their uneasiness, their restlessness, sprang from an unavowed sense of having failed to make themselves over. They did not fit. No wealth, no power, no grandeur, had changed them. They were still the sons of the "Little Bauer," of the unassuming Guetele, of the shop and the Ghetto. Far from sensitive, they none the less were conscious of an incompatibility in the air. They sat at the tables of statesmen and kings, and tried to pretend they were in bliss; but the dainty morsels stuck in their throats. They were not used to them, and they suffered in their consciences at eating forbidden food. The court tailors sewed their garments; but no skill on earth could make them wear them as they should be worn. They danced with archduchesses and princesses, and the gracious creatures listened to their talk and laughed at their wit; but the next moment they floated away in the arms of a guard officer, and even an Amschel or a Karl was not so obtuse as not to note a difference.

There was something far more painful than all this. Monarchs, chancellors, ministers, aristocrats and their ladies made one feel at his ease. Lesser men were not so considerate. In Austria and throughout the German lands, a strange, confused wave had suddenly arisen against the "kings of Jews and Jews of kings." The most incredible assortment of people and passions were stirred against them. Liberals who abhorred Metternich and all his works; functionaries and petty nobles resenting invasion of their privileges and dilution of their rank; staunch yeomen of the old régime suspicious of all change and innovation; philosophical race purists and sectarian obscurantists; impoverished scions of decayed old families who scorned the trader class; and at the base of the whole, the motley horde of the disinherited mistrustful of wealth on principle. Nor was this curious army leaderless or without a tongue. Their sentiments were given voice in nearly the entire press and made graphic by scores of caricaturists. A flood of scurrilous articles and cartoons poured forth, retailing the doings and lives of the financiers, casting aspersions on their past, ridiculing their persons, and asking embarrassing questions about the source of their wealth, bases of their power, and the reasons for their favor in high quarters. The Rothschilds endeavored to stem the nuisance. They threatened; they paid hush-money to individual writers; they invoked the aid of their friends to silence newspapers or to suppress them; they got other friends to reply or to exert a counter-influence. Whereupon new journals and new authors stepped into the breach and enlightened the public about the reasons why the silenced had ceased to speak. It was most annoying and disturbing.

II

The great trouble was that Salomon and his brothers lent themselves so aptly to this sort of thing. Humorists with pen and brush found them a god-send. They were not only fabulously wealthy; not only parvenus of obscure and doubtful origin, and the favorites of the mighty of the land, and members of a hitherto despised race and religious sect; other people were all these things, yet it occurred to no one to make sport of them. The Rothschilds, as even the devoted Gentz had observed, were a species apart. They hobnobbed on terms of equality with distinguished and cultivated men, with the flower of breeding and learning; and all the while they remained the crudest ignoramuses. They spoke the harsh, guttural jargon of the Ghetto; they could not write a presentable letter; their manners were offensive, their persons unattractive, their voices rasping, their gestures irritating, their minds commonplace. Advancement had no effect on them; contacts did not develop them; they seemed incapable of growth; their brains were impervious to ideas; their souls resisted refinement. The brilliance in which they moved only heightened their ludicrousness.

Where had they come from and how had they got there? It was known only that they hailed from Frankfort. The rest was a mystery; and they did nothing to dissipate it. Their father was a merchant—vague word. Merchants, even Jewish ones, educated their sons. These astonishing monarchs of finance were all but illiterate; they had risen to their commanding position with less learning than their humblest clerk; it was reported that they were not at home even in the lore and traditions of their own people. Surely any merchant, however lowly, could scrape enough income to bring up his children respectably. And it was hardly imaginable that the shadowy Meyer was a poor man. He must have given his sons some kind of a start. Such fortunes as the Rothschilds' do not grow from nothing in a single generation. And they were still young men. The oddest, and certainly not the most reassuring part of it was the consistent silence—one could almost call it secrecy—in which they wrapped their antecedents and their beginnings. They seemed to be ashamed of them.

The more scandalous sheets harped on the racial and religious aspect, rehashing the age-old imbecilities which have not even yet quite lost their currency, conveniently forgetting that there had been great banking establishments and great fortunes before the Rothschilds, that the mass of Jews then, as now, were poor, and that this particular Jewish family were only a little more skilful in exploiting situations which they had had no part in creating than were their rivals of other creeds. More intelligent critics in the absence of data concerning the origin of the Rothschild wealth gave attention to the methods by which it was growing. And on this latter subject there was considerable light. While thousands of small people had been ruined by the lottery loan, Herr Rothschild had had the hardihood to boast that he had cleared six million florins on the transaction! And he had done it by a shameless trick, by sharp practices, by deceiving the public. The best that even such a learned and judicious authority as the Bavarian state councilor Von Goenner was able to say on the topic was that he was quite convinced "that these manœuvres could not be laid at the door of the very estimable Herr von Rothschild. They were the work of subordinates, brokers, and dealers in this wretched speculation." Perhaps so; but the wretched speculation would never have afflicted the nation at all if the very estimable Herr Rothschild had not backed the authorities into a corner and ordered them to deliver. Fifty-two kreutzers for a florin! More than a hundred millions to pay back for fifty-five borrowed! Was ever a people so mulcted in all history? And who was to sweat and starve so that the Jewish baron and his brothers abroad might pocket the difference? (The excited economists naturally omitted to mention that the insolvent state was unable to induce the Christian bankers to take the business even at that figure.) How had Herr von Rothschild succeeded in misleading and betraying the populace? By spreading lies in a press that was either too dull to see through his game or something worse. By giving away whole parcels of the securities to people whose names need not be mentioned because everybody knew them. By driving up prices on the exchanges which he held in the hollow of his hand. By withholding the truth. In short, by subterfuges to which no gentleman with honest Teuton blood in his veins and the teachings of Holy Church to guide his footsteps would ever have stooped.

Then the liberals took up the lament. An edifying spectacle: the Prince of the reaction and the king of coin cooperating to extinguish the freedom of Europe. In Naples, in Piedmont, in Spain, oppressed peoples arise to demand their rights; they exact constitutions from their tyrants; liberty and justice triumph; a new era of democracy and progress is about to dawn; when, lo! the unholy alliance descends upon the helpless lands with steel and with gold and restores the cowardly assassins to their thrones. The artists performed their part with devastating effect. One cartoon showed a gentleman with marked Semitic features, attired in slovenly Ghetto garb and an aristocratic lace shirt-front, standing in a chariot made out of a strong-box and propelled by the two-headed imperial Austrian eagle, careering over Europe. In another, entitled "The Pump," Rothschild, obese and coarse, stood knee deep in a pool of gold and with both arms acting as suction levers poured the world's wealth into the pockets of monarchs.

III

This was cruel enough; but what cut Salomon and Amschel to the quick were the everlasting insinuations about their un-German blood and their antecedents. The wags never wearied of the grotesquerie of the Jewish tradesmen airily whirling in the charmed circle. Hapsburg, Metternich and Meyer's boys! Gold lace, diplomacy, courtly etiquette, the destinies of Europe, willowy archduchesses, and Yiddish! It was too rich, and the humorists squeezed the last drop of succulence out of it. They celebrated it in word and song, in black and white and in color. And the public relished each bit with gusto. The lampooned bankers writhed in agony; but what could they do? Devoutly religious from childhood and pillars of the synagogue, it was unthinkable for them to change their faith. They would not, even if they could, deny their race. And in any event that would hardly mend matters. The only real way to raise the standing of Jews in the community was after all to improve the lot of the race as a whole. In Frankfort the council of the German states was still sitting on the question, despite Gentz's memorandum of six years ago. Would not the good Chancellor exert a little pressure on the chairman of the body, possibly on a few picked delegates also, and have the business over with? That was one thing. Then, as to the family history, why not let the public have a sympathetic and dignified account of the Rothschild antecedents, before some unfriendly individual got out a malicious one?

Some such step as this had become particularly urgent of late. So long as mere newspapermen nibbled at the matter, the risk of any serious divulgence was slight. The enemy, however, had some little time ago been reinforced by a formidable ally. The new adversary, a personage by name of Hormayr zu Hartenburg, was not only powerfully connected; he possessed, in addition, the inconvenient qualifications of being a trained investigator and a trenchant writer. He had, as a matter of fact, till recently held the post of curator of the imperial archives. Thus far he had been only annoying. He had quarreled violently with the Emperor and Metternich over some court intrigue, and among other things he had openly charged the Chancellor with having held up the diplomatic mails arriving from Constantinople for a day or two just outside Vienna so as to enable his friends the Rothschilds to effect a coup on the exchange. Incidentally it had been he who had first used the phrase "Kings of the Jews and the Jews of kings"—an alarming hint of what the fellow could do when he got a pen into his hand. Suppose that this individual now, with his nose for documents, his virulent style and his connections, should take it into his head to get a line on the parentage, the boyhood and the early activities of the Rothschilds? Heaven alone knew what court tittle-tattle he might be already having in his possession. Gentz was a boon companion and no little of a gossip, as who should know better than his friend Salomon? Was it altogether impossible that certain affairs between the banker and the courtier had been confided to third parties? And if there were leaks, there was no telling what else had trickled out by this time. Nothing could be more innocent than the tributes of respect, for instance, which Salomon now and then sent to Frau Metternich and the children—a costly bonbonnière, a live American deer for Christmas, a trifle of some sort for a birthday—and surely no transaction was straighter business than the loan to His Highness himself. Yet it could only too easily be imagined the interpretation that a scurrilous press and an evil-minded public would put on them.

And that was only the beginning. Once a gentleman like Hormayr commenced prying, what lengths might he not go to? The Elector William was dead, and so was Buderus; but their correspondence files were not buried with them. And the Jewish community of Frankfort still had its tax records. And the police archives of Dunkirk, Gravelines, Paris. And London. What a tale it would all make! Salomon shuddered at the thought.

IV

The protracted deliberations of the council in Frankfort came to a sudden head. For years the Jewish question had been bandied about, while a determined clique with the presiding officer at its head blocked its final liquidation. Metternich had been friendly all along; but he was a very busy man, and the rights and liberties of a few thousand Jews in a single city were rather a small patch on the map to a statesman who carried the world on his shoulders. When, however, Baron Rothschild intimated that his good offices would be gratefully remembered, the thing began to look very different, and word went out to the Austrian delegation as well as to a few lesser ones in the Chancellor's sphere of influence urging speedy action. The obstructionist chairman, as it happened, was himself a Metternich subaltern. He was given to understand that his tactics were unpleasant, and that he had better change them. He resisted; whereupon the axe descended upon his head. His successor received explicit instructions from the outset, so that there was no further trouble. In the summer of 1824 the Jews of the free city of Frankfort were at long last citizens.

It was not as brilliant a victory as had been hoped. If the new citizens expected to find themselves on the same footing with their German neighbors, they were disappointed. They were free to reside in all quarters, and the Ghetto passed into history; but the marriage limitations remained, and so did the restrictions on trade and property ownership. Still, even this niggardly compromise was something, and there was much rejoicing in the now obsolete Judengasse. Amschel let himself go completely and somewhat tactlessly. He gave a great dinner party in honor of the delegates; but so bitter was the feeling in the city that even the friendliest members of the council deemed it wiser to stay away. In Frankfort first, and presently throughout Germany, it was openly declared that the whole thing was but another triumph of Rothschild money—and (sotto voce) of Rothschild methods. Subtle persons adverted to the curious phenomenon of the imperial Chancellor giving his ardent support to liberty, equality and fraternity. For, to begin with, in Austria itself the status of the Jews was no better than medieval; and, besides, that the man whose very name had become a sort of symbol of reaction should take to his heart one of the pet doctrines of the French Revolution was, to say the least, remarkable. So tongues continued to wag and eyebrows went on shrugging.

But Salomon was unrebuffed and proceeded with his program. The next year he and Gentz set earnestly to work to appease the public curiosity. Early in 1826 the product of the extraordinary collaboration was given to the world; it was entitled "A Biographical Account of the House of Rothschild." Gentz in a private letter to a friend boasted that it came from his "workshop"; but though he considered it "well done," he modestly withheld his signature. In reality, several hands contributed to the final result. The material was collected and winnowed by Salomon; Gentz then whipped it into shape and handed the first version around to a few select journals. It was thought desirable, however, that the story should receive as wide publicity as possible. It was therefore sent on to Amschel. He, after suggesting a number of additions, passed it over to Baron Meseritz for revision. Lastly, Meseritz not only syndicated it broadcast but persuaded his friends on the staff of the great Brockhaus Encyclopedia to include a slightly condensed form of it in their edition of 1827. Subsequently the story found its way into popular collections of hero-tales, such as the "Sprichwoerter der Deutschen." For the better part of a hundred years it remained the sole authentic history of the Rothschild family.

The modern personality magazines could do worse than go to school to Gentz and Meseritz; for it is very much to be doubted whether these early nineteenth-century publicists have yet been surpassed as writers of success stories. They were certainly past masters in the art of omission. (Or perhaps that was where Salomon's skill entered; it is always difficult to apportion credit in collaborations.) Gentz's "Biographical Account," being mainly concerned with background, devotes little space to the activities of the five sons. A general phrase thrown in here and there about "extraordinary circumstances," "fortunate conjunctures," and "world-shattering events" is about the only allusion to the contraband episode, the Peninsular War, the Wellington drafts, Herries, and the dramatic happenings at Aix-la-Chapelle. On the other hand, old Meyer emerges as an overshadowing figure, as the founder not only of the family but of its fortune. The shop and the Judengasse days do not come in for treatment. Meyer is from the start a banker, a man of substantial resources, a personality in affairs. "His capacity, his untiring energy and his well-tried integrity" win him the confidence of important people, and presently he comes in contact with the man who is destined to be the "great influence in his gigantic rise,—the then Landgrave, later Elector, of Hesse." Beyond an appointment as court factor, however, nothing much happens apparently till the year of William's flight. Then the distracted prince, in a panic over his menaced millions, bethinks himself at the last moment of his faithful Jewish agent. Meyer reluctantly but obediently consents to guard and administer the entire fortune, and Serenity goes into exile with an easy mind. But, alas! the predatory French descend upon the Rothschild premises, seize every penny that the good Meyer has been able to lay by in a life of untiring energy and well-tried integrity; and it is only by the sacrifice of his own property that the wealth entrusted to him by the Elector is saved from the clutches of the invader.

Then follows the dramatic climax. There being no such person as Buderus in the cast, the exiled William and his trusted banker are wholly out of touch with one another during the seven years of the captivity. Only a distant rumor reaches the Elector of the bad behavior of the French toward Meyer; whereupon he resignedly concludes that his own fortune has been seized along with the Jew's. What, therefore, is his surprise and delight when, returning home in 1813, he learns that not only is every kreutzer of it safe and intact but that the House, having kept it active, is prepared to return the capital with accrued interest. Naturally no prince, least of all William of Hesse, would think of considering such a generous proposal. William, indeed, is so overwhelmed with astonishment and gratitude that he entreats the family to carry on with his money, and only with the greatest difficulty is he induced to accept a nominal rate of interest for the future. The Rothschilds, then, continue working with his millions for several years more, and providence blesses them with prosperity. And the Elector, mindful of their "honesty and right conduct," shows his appreciation by commending their services and their virtues to other princes.

Meyer, in the meantime, has passed away, but his soul lives on in his sons to guide and direct them. When about to die he calls them to his bedside and adjures them to keep the torch of high principle aglow, to love one another and work in harmony; and so deep is the young men's piety and veneration toward their saint-like parent that they never forget or depart from his will. "Herein lies the answer to the question which so many people have puzzled over; namely, how it has been possible for the House of Rothschild to achieve its unprecedented and miraculous success in this short time." Every project, no matter from what quarter it may issue, becomes the subject of common counsel; each operation, be it even of relatively slight importance, is carried through in accordance with a previously elaborated plan, which all have had a share in devising, and with united effort; and all the brothers share alike in the result. Another of the basic principles bequeathed to them by their father is to move with the times, though all the while keeping a reverent eye on the hallowed past. Should there on some rare occasion be a difference of opinion between the brothers, the difficulty is at once overcome and harmony restored by the simple device of each one asking himself how father would have acted in the given circumstances. "Finally, it must never be overlooked, that in addition to the reasonableness of their terms, the punctuality of their services, the simplicity and clarity of their methods and the intelligence with which they are carried through, it is the personal moral character of the five brothers that has had the greatest influence upon the success of their undertakings."

With the example of the Rothschilds before us, concludes Gentz in a brilliant philosophical peroration, it is idle for people to talk about luck. "In particular instances good or adverse fortune may, indeed, determine a man's destiny in life, though even then not exclusively. But enduring success, like persistent ill-fortune, is always and to a far greater extent than is commonly supposed, the fruit of personal merit or personal inefficiency and wrong-doing."

VI

Gentz looked upon his handiwork and found it good. Salomon was pleased enough with it to pay for it. Amschel only wished there were more of it. And what editors thought of it, from the Augsburger Allgemeine Zeitung to the Brockhaus Konversations-Lexikon, can fairly be inferred from their readiness to publish it. One man's judgment alone has, unhappily, not come down to us. Back in Cassel, the Elector William II was reigning in his late lamented father's stead. A man of thirty-six in 1813, he had witnessed one or two of the post-exile passages between his parent and the heirs of Meyer not recorded in the "Biographical Account"; and if he read the Gentz idyl, his comments must have been worth hearing; but his literary interests appear to have been limited, and he may never have laid eyes upon it.

There was, for instance, the irritating affair about wine. During the occupation Marshall Kellermann, commanding the army of the Elbe, made his headquarters just outside Hanau. He fancied the liquids in the palace cellars, and when he was obliged to move on he ordered them taken along. They were later offered for sale in Frankfort. Someone notified the rightful owner, at the moment languishing in Prague, and William, after sampling them, sent word to Meyer that he buy them back and store them in his warehouse against a happier day. There the barrels, fourteen in number, remained till 1814. On their being delivered to Cassel, it was found that the numbers did not tally and that the quality of the contents did not measure up to the price. There followed a lengthy and acrimonious correspondence, the court demanding that one of the bankers present himself at Cassel to "straighten out the difference." The Rothschilds, at the moment occupied with more important matters, politely declined the invitation. Serenity's letters becoming from this point on a little too hortatory, the Rothschilds did not answer at all. Thereupon an ultimatum from All-Highest reached the offices of the Bornheimerstrasse, which elicited the following reply:

"As we have most humbly explained already, our only motive in this transaction has been to give satisfaction to Your Royal (!) Highness. The wines were brought to us by the late Councilor Winzingerode. We have faithfully stored them; but we can hardly be held accountable for the invasion of our cellars by foreign troops, for the outbreak therein of a conflagration and for the consequent breaking in of all sorts of people. . . . It is impossible for us to know what has happened to the wines in the course of these catastrophes. We are nevertheless willing, though we cannot justly be compelled, to stand the loss to this extent: We will on our part waive the very considerable traveling expenses to Prague which are still due us, as well as the equally substantial and likewise unpaid advances on account of courier and mail charges; providing that Your All-Highest will at the same time agree to regard the mine matter as closed."

Whether or not it was has not transpired. But William could in this instance hardly be blamed for being a little suspicious. It so happened that some time earlier another incident had set him wondering. He had asked for those boxes of documents which at the time of his departure had been taken to the Rothschild cellar in the Judengasse. He had needed only to glance at them to perceive that they had been tampered with. One may imagine his consternation when, upon their being opened, it was found that not only had his own papers been grievously disturbed but that a number of bond certificates belonging to the departed Meyer had been stuffed in among them! The young Rothschilds had offered a curious explanation: Originally the boxes had been placed in the house cellar. On the night preceding the raid by the French police, it had been deemed wise to remove them to the secret space under the courtyard. The boxes were large, and the connecting passage was narrow. At the last moment it had, therefore, become necessary to break the things apart and after effecting the transfer nail them up again. It was dark and damp, and the time was short; effects of the family's own were being brought to safety at the same time; so that some confusion was inevitable. Why had no word been said about the matter at the time? To that the only reply they could make was that they did not know; it had happened so many, many years ago.

But William II had no wish to reopen old sores, and if the Gentz-Meseritz version of the Rothschild relations to his father did come to his attention, he kept silent. Other people, on the other hand, were less discreet. If, said the cynics, Meyer really was the noble soul he was represented to be, why then there had been a distinct reversion. His successors had certainly inherited his energy, his punctuality, and his capacity; but whether he had also bequeathed to them some of his other shining virtues seemed open to doubt. On the whole, therefore, the immediate effect of the "Biographical Account" was somewhat disappointing; and in the years to follow, Salomon and his brothers found that Gentz's extravagant pæan had done more to make them suspected and ridiculous than all the libels and calumnies of their enemies put together.

CHAPTER XIV

LEADEN SKIES

DEEP was Salomon's disappointment, and bitter were his reflections upon human incredulity. A callous and cynical world declined to take him at his own valuation; his toilsome effort to set opinion straight had been useless, worse than useless. But the rush of events did not let him mourn long. Over in the West forces shifted suddenly and terrifyingly. Rumblings from above and below, at first faint and far-away, but swiftly coming nearer and gaining in intensity, brought the five brothers up with a start. The very year of the misfired "Biographical Account" witnessed developments in Paris and London that made the most insulting caricature in the German press look trivial; and presently there followed a crisis so grave and menacing that the Rothschilds were forced to give thought to the foundations of their House, without worrying over its outward glory. Uninterrupted progress, a rapid and continuous rise marred by never a reverse, had almost made them believe in their own star. Now for the first time in over two decades the question they must ponder was not how to make their light shine more brilliantly but how to prevent its being extinguished altogether.

The ominous part of it was that, each time, the upheaval occurred in the territory of the family's titans, Nathan and James. Salomon's imperium in Vienna, though younger by many years than the Western seats, grew daily more solid; the home base in Frankfort and the newest outposts in Naples held firm, for all the mediocrity of their command; while the very men whom the rest tacitly acknowledged as the brains of the whole combination contrived, not once but twice, to get themselves into the most breath-taking perils. And "get themselves" precisely described it. Certainly the "conjunctures" of Gentz's glib phrase were not as fortunate as usual; "extraordinary circumstances" did on these occasions the reverse of playing into their hands; but what were great financial minds for if not to turn accidents and eventualities unforeseen by common clay to account? In reality it was worse than that. Twice within four years James, teamed with Nathan, plunged headlong and with his eyes shut to the edge of an abyss. They plainly did not see what was at the end of their noses. Closer than any other moneymen to the governing powers in their respective capitals, they ventured into undertakings that staked the family's whole fortune, preposterously over-confident, misinformed, grossly out of touch with the forces at work. And of all places, in France!—in that fluid, mercurial, unstable country, which had violently changed its constitution a dozen times in four decades and where a rejected and discredited dynasty was being maintained by foreign dictation in the teeth of an awakened national will. Shortsightedness, political miscalculation, insufficient understanding of economic factors and—inexcusable in a Rothschild!—failure to get inside information, were the elements of the threatening ruin. Was the time at last come when horse sense and empiricism were not enough, when the Rothschilds, unschooled, instinctive and (as Gentz had long ago said of them) "without the remotest inkling of any higher relationship in the world," must go down before rivals with culture and education? It looked very much like it. Their enemies, believing what they hoped, were convinced of it. But providence had other plans.

II

The series of operations with the French monarchy, when they were begun three years before, had held out every promise of being the most productive, as they were the boldest, stroke the House had yet attempted. Patterned on a gigantic scale, executed by James under the immediate and constant direction of Nathan himself, assured of the government's adherence by the complaisant and powerful Villèle, (who was now chief minister) they had seemed a foregone success. They were to be one more turning point in the sweeping Rothschild advance. With their limitless resources in capital, influence, connections, nothing could possibly go wrong; yet, as it turned out, nearly everything did go wrong. No danger, no accident was overlooked or unprepared for—none, except those that actually came along. When, by 1830, the great muddle was cleared away, the firm emerged shaken and sobered, its standards very much bedraggled, its losses in prestige, friendships, confidence and money so vast that any other organization would have collapsed under them.

The preliminary step was taken in 1823; and although the transaction—involving a capital of over four hundred million francs—was far and away the most ambitious in its line since Waterloo, it was only a step. Government loans, however large and lucrative, had begun to pall on Nathan. He had had them now for half a dozen years, with nearly every state in Europe, and his restless spirit was reaching out for something fresh and different. His whole reputation and fortune had been made by short-cuts, by daring ventures, by doing things that others were afraid of or did not see. Now Rothschild's was in a rut; leadership it had certainly, but not originality; it was plodding along at the head of the herd; but the whole financial brotherhood was keeping timidly to the beaten path. And there was no particular reason why it should. One instance: England, and to a smaller degree the Continent, was wallowing in money. An era of prosperity, of capitalistic expansion, such as the world had not witnessed since the time of the Lombards, had followed the Napoleonic nightmare. Investors were frantically tossing their surpluses into everything and anything that promised a dividend. Mushroom corporations, literally by the hundred, were springing up everywhere—in England alone over six hundred of them were organized in a single year—bubbles and schemes of the wildest species were being launched. Across the South Atlantic the Spanish colonies were breaking away from the mother-country, and Europe had suddenly discovered Latin America with its undeveloped resources. Business was booming; speculation was going mad. Yet all the while government credit remained stationary. England alone excepted, the rate of interest on state securities had not changed by a fraction since the wars. It was preposterous. Even Neapolitan and Papal annuities were safer than mining stock in the Andes.

Lack of imagination and old-world inertia alone were responsible for the burden of usury under which the nations were groaning.

The idea of converting the whole accumulated debt of Europe to a lower-interest basis seized upon Nathan's mind. He began with France; that is to say, he put that country at the top of his list; but before he even broached the scheme to Villèle he gave it a try-out at home. The advantages of such a move were obvious. Twenty-five years of disorder, instability and foreign wars ending with the débâcle of 1815 had made the French national debt the biggest on the Continent. For all that, her economy and her finances were probably as sound as any in the world. She was thus an excellent risk; but she, like every other European state, looked across the Channel for guidance and leadership in all fiscal matters. Should the English conversion, therefore, come up to expectations, it would have an encouraging effect on Villèle and furnish him with a weapon with which to silence opposition. The trial operation, moreover, need not be large, whereas in France the game would run into the billions. As it fell out, the British investor did not respond to the plan with as much warmth as could have been desired; for a year later Nathan still had close to three million pounds' worth of three-per cent converted Consols for which no buyers had applied. This, however, did not prevent him from going ahead, nor Villèle from being impressed by the example of his English colleague. If Chancellor of the Exchequer Vansittart believed in conversion—so Villèle, prompted by Nathan, reasoned,—the scheme could not but be sound. He did not pause to reflect—and Nathan apparently quite overlooked—that France, with her hundreds of thousands of small investors represented in the chamber of deputies, was another kettle of fish. He grasped at the proposal with enthusiasm, partly because the annual interest charge had become an intolerable drag on the budget, and partly (if Ouvrard's insinuations are to be believed) on more human grounds.

And so the preliminary loan of four hundred millions was floated. This preparatory manœuvre had a twofold purpose. It was to provide an opportunity for forcing up the price of all the previous issues of French government securities, and it was to furnish Nathan and James with quantities of cheap capital for the great operation that was to come. Clearly, it was not much use asking bondholders to accept a three-per cent paper in lieu of one yielding five per cent until the state was in a position to redeem its obligations; that is, until the older issues had reached par. Whichever the investor did: whether he converted his holdings or cashed in, a hundred francs must be worth a hundred francs; otherwise the royal treasury would be losing capital instead of saving interest. It so happened, however, that the rente was at the moment fluctuating between ninety and ninety-two. That, then, was one thing. The other was this: Considering that the loan was designed as an aid to the government and the national credit, Nathan argued, would it not be just common humanity if the treasury were to issue the securities to him now and wait for payment till the bull market for which both were hoping had been realized? Villèle apparently thought the suggestion reasonable, and agreed.

Having got that far, Nathan proceeded to set up his consortium. The preliminary loan was a family affair, none but the Rothschilds participating. But, daring as he was, he hesitated to plunge into a four-billion franc operation single-handed. So for the conversion scheme he called Baring in London and Laffitte in Paris to his side. The tables had turned somewhat since the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle; and the distinguished British house made no difficulties. The three firms then made up a pool of a billion francs, in the event that they should have to take over a sizable part of the three-per cent rente solid, and lined up the smaller banks in their respective spheres. How Baring and Laffitte raised their part of the outlay the story does not tell; but a circumstantial account of the trouble that Nathan went to is given by Ouvrard in his Memoirs. Ouvrard's feelings toward the Rothschilds make him normally a prejudiced witness. In this instance, however, his testimony is largely corroborated by another, more credible, contemporary. What the Rothschild brothers did, it seems, was this:

Nathan, it must be remembered, still had his mass of unsold Consols from the English conversion deal. It occurred to him that by withdrawing them from the market at this time, he might kill several birds with one stone. First of all, the impression would go abroad that the securities had found buyers, thus enhancing their price. Secondly, the same idea would just at this moment have a salutary influence on French financial opinion. Lastly, the Bank of England, eager on its own account to bull Consols, would do whatever it could to lend color to the above-named impression. The Bank, in fact, took Nathan's unsold bonds as collateral, and advanced him bullion at a nominal rate of interest. The gold was now shipped across to James, who deposited it with the Bank of France against fluid capital. This complex operation, however, only netted a matter of seventy million francs, while the pool required a third of a billion. There was, to be sure, the deferred payment arrangement in connection with the four hundred million loan; but from that source only about a quarter had thus far been realized. Total: a bare two hundred million. Then Villèle came to the rescue with a hundred and twenty millions' worth of treasury certificates (bons royaux), which James took over against future payment and at a rate of interest far in excess of the current market.

In the meantime the bull movement was coming on at high speed. Within a few months the old French rentes had touched par; by the beginning of spring, 1824, they had soared to 110—away beyond what was needed for the purpose of conversion. Even for the promised but as yet unissued three per cents, investors were offering over 80, which was several points above the quotation at which the government was prepared to float them. The Rothschilds looked on with delight at the strange spectacle of their old rival stocking up on French bonds, so that a loan of their own might be boomed. It was the performance of Aix over again, with the rôles reversed and the motivation slightly revised.

"Looked on" is hardly an accurate description; for James was enormously active. The moment 110 was reached Baring and Laffitte advised the head of the consortium that in their opinion it was time to start selling. Well, it certainly was. James had thought so long ago. He had been unloading for weeks past, not only the five per cents destined for retirement but the as yet non-existent threes. Without putting too fine a point on it, this quiet lone-hand work was nothing but bear tactics against the converted security and something not to be distinguished from a betrayal of associates. At any rate that was how Baring and Laffitte viewed it, when they found out what had been happening. Baring, indeed, took the matter so hard that he never again coöperated with the Rothschilds, though James protested he had only been throwing off his last year's loan in which the consortium had no share.

The worst was yet to come, however. While the bankers were busy tuning up the market, Villèle was making ready to have the scheme approved by the nation. Early in April he laid his bill before the Deputies. It was in this lower house that the mass of large and small rentiers were concentrated, but the minister had assiduously oiled the machinery in advance and he was confident of the result. An agonized outcry, to be sure, did go up. Charges of manipulation, exploitation and dishonesty were hurled at the government, and Villèle was accused of robbing the country to enrich the bankers—a thrust which, considering that the syndicate was to receive the entire proceeds of the difference between the old and the new rate of interest for one year, was not as wild as it might sound. But the shouting soon died down, and the measure was carried with a comfortable majority. It now went to the Peers—a mere piece of ceremonial mummery, as everyone knew, the great nobles and landowners having no preponderant economic interest in the rentes and always loyally working in unison with His Majesty's advisers. What, therefore, was Villèle's surprise and disgust when the upper house suddenly developed a profound concern over finance! Led by the Viscount de Chateaubriand, a member of the cabinet but a violent personal enemy of the chief minister, the opposition carried the day and the measure was beaten.

The consternation among the bankers may be imagined. Here for months Baring and Laffitte had been raking in all the old French bonds they could get their hands on, and driving up the price beyond all reason, on the assurance of Rothschild and Villèle that the chambers were as good as in their pocket; and now, with hundreds of millions of the paper in their possession, these two bunglers let the game slip through their fingers when it was all but landed. Nor was that all. The head of the syndicate himself, clearly knowing something more than he imparted to his associates, had been playing with his left hand against a storm, and crawled out from under just as the clouds burst over the heads of those whom he misled. On the day of the Peers' vote the old rentes stood at 106—having gone back several points during the debate —on the morrow they dived to 98. It was small comfort that the king dismissed Chateaubriand; there was, indeed, a flicker of hope upon the announcement, but it could hardly last. To begin with, a powerful syndicate headed by Ouvrard had been bearing the conversion scheme from the start, and it now applied all its might to halt any upward tendency. Moreover, with ruin staring them in the face, Baring and Laffitte as well as the scores of minor houses associated with them lost their heads and took the brief respite to help the depression along. The result of this combination of forces was to send the rente back to 98 within a few days, where it stuck for a long time.

Ouvrard and his friends cleared several millions, while the Rothschild consortium (minus Rothschild) barely scrambled out alive.

A year later Villèle returned to the charge. He had learned something by experience, it seemed; for this time both houses of parliament docilely approved his measure without delay and almost without discussion. The Rothschilds, however, had likewise profited by the past, and committed themselves to nothing outright. Their precaution was justified by the event. Out of four billions in outstanding bonds hardly thirty millions were turned in for conversion. The unlucky scheme was doomed. And then in the course of the summer the shadows of the approaching crisis—the greatest that the world had seen in a century—began to lengthen over every bourse in Europe. The wild era of speculation had come to its disastrous and inevitable end. In England alone there were in the ensuing year more than three thousand bankruptcies—two and a half times the normal number. Nathan Rothschild, looking out over the havoc, could only be grateful to the Viscount de Chateaubriand for having balked him in his ambition. He often said that had the French conversion operation succeeded, it would almost certainly have dragged his house down to ruin.

IV

To one of the Rothschilds' former friends and associates, fortune proved less indulgent. In Vienna, among the first victims of the great crisis was the ancient firm of Fries & Company with David Parish at its head. Driven out of the lucrative state affairs, in which it had played a leading rôle since the time of Maria Theresa, its position during the past three years had been precarious enough. Still, so long as fair weather prevailed, it managed to keep up a brave front. In a storm such as was now raging it was bound to be blown down. Signs of its impending doom became visible early in the year 1826. There followed a desperate and pathetic struggle, while Parish fought to save his fortune and his name. He sought aid among his hosts of friends in London, in Paris and at home; but the weakness of his house was an open secret, and his urgent pleas hardly tended to restore confidence. Those, moreover, who might have been moved to help him were themselves in difficulties. Meanwhile obligations were falling due, protested bills were being returned in floods, credit was tightening on the panic-stricken bourse, and the anterooms of the bank were filling up with impatient creditors. Then Parish was seized with terror. In a mood verging on derangement he presented himself at Metternich's office. Years ago he had advanced the Chancellor a hundred thousand florins. It was one of those familiar transactions between bankers and statesmen which, while duly executed with promissory note and interest clause for form's sake, are really honoraria for value received. In prosperous times Parish, the man of the world, would have been the first to declare anyone expecting them to be redeemed a lunatic. It was exactly what Metternich thought now. He protested that the obligation had been canceled by mutual agreement way back in 1818. But the despairing man, though he had no illusions about saving his firm with this bit of small change, insisted that it was a proper debt. At least it would silence one or two of his most nagging creditors, and give him a breathing spell. Rather than have a scene, Metternich handed him part of the money and signed a fresh note for the rest. Now came Gentz's turn. Poor Parish had not the heart to go in person to his old companion, and he handed over his note to a third party. Gentz, however, did not mix money matters with sentiment. He declined absolutely to recognize this "utterly rimeless, crazy, antiquated obligation."

All along Parish knew that only one man in Vienna could save him—Salomon Rothschild. Indeed, he not only could but would. He was a rough diamond. Had not Moritz Bethmann said that "no person ever left him uncomforted?" But he hesitated in his present plight to appeal to the man whom he had once helped, patronized and perhaps slightly despised. He went finally when every other hope had vanished. Was it the distracted mood, the too proud tone, the dignified manner as if he were asking his due when he ought to have humbly begged a favor? It might have been any of these or all; or possibly, because Parish simply could not bring himself to say what was in his heart, Salomon did not fully realize the desperateness of the situation. Only this is sure. Parish did leave Salomon uncomforted. And the next day—it was April 27—his body was found in the Danube. In his rooms were several letters. One of them was for Prince Metternich. It began:

"Before I leave the world I must write a few words to you, my Prince, to tell you that I am going to my grave without malice but with the conviction that you have treated me very unjustly and have sacrificed me to the greed of a family who have known better than I how to attach you to their side. It is unnecessary to go into the early history and development of our acquaintance with the Rothschilds. That these people are with all their riches heartless men, with no feelings other than for their cash-box, the world has long known; and how ungratefully they have acted toward me under your special patronage cannot after my death remain a secret either."

After telling him what arrangements he had made for the collection of the residual note, Parish concluded the letter thus:

"Farewell, my Prince. Should you ever think of an unfortunate who was sincerely devoted to you, I hope that the recollection may cause you no remorse."

To Salomon he wrote with even greater bitterness: "I am leaving the world because I have been most shamefully betrayed on the one hand and rewarded with the blackest ingratitude for very real kindnesses on the other. If you have any conscience it cannot but tell you that you and your brothers richly deserve my last reproach, and that by your recent heartless conduct you have caused the ruin of one of the best friends your house ever had. When I drew you in 1817 into the French and Austrian affairs, against the wish of my oldest and most intimate friend, I was warned on all sides that you would leave no stone unturned to force me out of them. How well and by what means you have succeeded, under the patronage of Prince Metternich, to grab for yourself alone a variety of transactions in which I was by the laws of God and man entitled to have a share, I have known for some little time . . . Although my house is pretty badly shaken, I could still have managed, with the help of friends and family, to meet all our obligations—had you only found it in your heart to restitute a fraction of the money which would never have become yours if I had during our association stood upon my rights and demanded my just share in the business with the Austrian and Neapolitan governments. You, however, have found it more convenient and more profitable to come to an understanding with the Prince in the matter of the old bond operation and by this means to get him entirely on your side. The moment I found myself on the outside of this combination, I knew that it was impossible to save the firm, and I decided not to live through the disgrace. Now I must close. I hope for your sake that you will but rarely think of a friend whose memory can only be painful to you."

There were echoes in that letter that reminded Salomon as he read it of other days and other controversies. Where was it and when that a rival, beginning as a friend and associate, had pitted himself against the House of Rothschild and lost? Why, of course, Rueppell and Bethmann, the innocents who, away back in 1801, made the then young Amschel and Salomon their brokers to the court of Cassel! Oh, but this was really sad. Poor, poor Parish! Such a proud, brilliant fellow, to end like this! Yet, what could one say? Or do? It was the way of the world, of business, of destiny. The giant wheel turns, one basket goes up, another down. It is no good to sit and lament. For some must perish while others triumph. But life must go on.

The giant wheel gave another lurch, and for one breathless moment it seemed that the turn of the great colossus itself had come. Two years after the unlucky conversion adventure King Charles X had weakly submitted to the popular will by throwing over Villèle and his cabinet. The last of the Bourbons refused to believe that the nation's mistrust was directed less against his minions than against the monarchy. At first he had even toyed with the idea of resisting altogether; but despite his family's reputation to the contrary, he had not quite forgotten the miseries of '89 and their sequel. He had therefore compromised to the extent of appointing a somewhat less intransigeant ministry. No sooner, however, had public feeling calmed down a little than he regretted his moderation, and disregarding parliamentary majorities, he called his ultra-royalist friends back to power. The new cabinet, composed of such fire-eaters as Polignac and Peyronnet, was, if possible, more reactionary than the Villèle group, and constituted a direct provocation to the disaffected country. The climax soon followed. In the general election of the spring of 1830 the voters, instead of ratifying the monarch's choice, as he had rather hoped, returned a chamber of precisely the same coloring as its dissolved predecessor. The government now resolved upon a showdown. In Paris the most exciting rumors circulated. It was asserted that Polignac was mobilizing troops to prevent the people's representatives from taking their seats, that the king had already signed an order declaring the city under martial law and that revolutionary bands in the suburbs were preparing to resist.

Just prior to these developments, meanwhile, the House of Rothschild had secured a contract, in open competition, for a large new French loan. What with the market artificially boomed up by the conversion manœuvres of a few years back, and the brisk bidding, the new issue had been taken over at an extremely high figure—above par. If the gossip was even partly true and there was to be a coup d'état, then riots were sure to follow, there might be a revolution and not impossibly a general war. What in these circumstances would become of French credit and of the expensive new bonds? From London Nathan reported that a group of bankers and brokers headed by the ubiquitous Ouvrard were busy unloading French securities at panic prices, and he urged his brother to stop the avalanche by a bull manœuvre and to get to the bottom of the persistent rumors about the government's plans. James could hardly believe that Ouvrard was acting on inside information unknown to himself; but the situation appeared so ominous that he went to Polignac and asked him point-blank what his intentions were. The minister smiled at him blandly and assured him that all the talk about a coup d'état was idle tittle-tattle, that if any important action were contemplated he (James) would be the first to know about it, and that as a matter of fact the government was on the point of convening the new chamber.

This was on the evening of July 24. The next morning, before he went to mass, Charles X signed the Polignac decrees, and of the following day they were published. Among other things, the recently elected chamber was declared dissolved, fresh elections upon a more restricted suffrage were ordered, and the press was gagged. Paris immediately took up the challenge. Overnight barricades made their appearance in the streets, and there followed bloody encounters with the military. On the bourse pandemonium reigned, with the rente falling thirty points in a single day. Old inhabitants said it was 1789 all over again. The king and the ministers, terrified by the storm they had let loose and deserted by their supporters, fled the capital. Then unexpectedly a savior appeared. Louis Philippe, Duke of Orleans and a cousin of Charles X, was known for the liberal proclivities he had inherited from his popular father, the famous Philippe Egalité of the first revolution; and when he now gallantly rode out among the embattled mobs, he was acclaimed with enthusiasm. France had a new king and a more or less new dynasty; the Bourbons were dethroned for ever; and the July Revolution was over as suddenly as it had begun.

That was all very fine, but it hardly comforted James and his brothers. The compromise was a great victory for the commercial middle classes, and that was all to the good. As James, who was, moreover, personally very close to the new monarch, wrote to Salomon a little later: "Business will certainly be safer here in France now than it was under Polignac." The situation, however, was not just local. There were apt to be European complications. Within a few weeks, indeed, the conflagration, though it had been so miraculously got under control at home, leaped across the frontiers to devastate the innocent bystanders. In numerous places in Germany, including the district around Frankfort, there were peasant uprisings, castles were attacked and burned and their noble occupants driven out. The exiled liberals of Spain and Italy, emboldened by events, became active again. In the United Netherlands a revolution broke out which not only deposed the king but ripped the country across the middle and made Belgium an independent state. Grave rumblings were heard as far east as Poland. Naturally the Tsar was disquieted, and refused to speak to Louis Philippe, whom he somewhat illogically saw as the source of all the mischief. Metternich, it goes without saying, was thoroughly scandalized at this destruction of his life-work for absolutism and legitimacy. War and peace hung in the balance.

James, Nathan and Salomon went to work with all their might and energy and influence to save the world from catastrophe. It was not an easy task. Luckily for them, Louis Philippe was reasonable and conciliatory, and England saw no menace to her interests in the Continental realignment. The powder magazine lay over in the East with Metternich holding the match. If Vienna was determined on hostilities, the Holy Alliance would follow its leader and even pacific London might be persuaded to overcome her indifference. Then the fat would be in the fire. The Rothschilds concentrated their efforts upon their great friend and patron, the Chancellor of Austria. Their French loan commitments were merely the largest single stake in the pot; and although they were the responsible underwriters of the issue, the loss, if loss it must be, would be fairly distributed among their satellites. Doubtless the little fellows would yell; that could not be helped; they must take their chances of loss as well as profit. The House was directly involved with some twenty millions of the ill-starred operation; distressing enough, in all conscience; but France was only one item. All Europe's credit was in their strongbox. Their entire might and greatness stood and fell with the solvency or bankruptcy of the governments. The House of Rothschild was literally a paper house; and war, whose first casualty was invariably in the financial sector, would dissolve it in smoke.

And so the Rothschild couriers kept the roads hot between Paris and London and between both these places and Vienna. With arguments, with solemn warnings, with exhortations almost religious in their earnestness, they labored over Metternich to preserve mankind from the frightful shambles. Louis Philippe, they assured him, far from having started the miserable conflagration, was in reality the one man who had checked it. Had he not intervened in the nick of time, no one could tell what might have happened. There might even have been a republic in France today, heaven save us. A democrat, a bourgeois monarch, a citizen king to the general populace, he was among those who knew him at close range a ruler of the old school, the most determined foe of liberalism, a disciple and a sincere admirer of Prince Metternich. He was the last hope of the Metternichean principle in France. One had but to shut his ears to his proclamations (designed for home consumption) and look for a moment at his deeds. The subverters at home and abroad were mercilessly hounded by his agents; revolutionary placards and newspapers were prohibited; he was suppressing riots and every kind of public meeting with a strong hand. Why, to make war on him was to attack the staunchest upholder of the old régime that Western Europe still had. And did His Serene Highness stop to think of the effect war would have on the laboriously erected and still precarious structure of Austria's own credit, of the injury to commerce and industry, of the tragic cost in human life? "And, my dear brother Salomon, . . . everything depends on the Prince . . . we have on our hands eighteen millions' worth of active French bonds, and if it's peace they go to 75 and if it's war they drop to 45 . . . I can tell you it's enough to lose your mind . . . For common sense is all for peace, yet the idea of war is gaining favor on all hands."

The idea might gain; but war, after all, did not come. England held firm; the king of France, assiduously coached by James, conciliated the ruffled feelings of his brother monarchs; even Metternich, after a year of bristling and sword-rattling, listened to the wisdom of Salomon. Providence in its inscrutable way, after having raised up the House of Rothschild upon a foundation of war, now chose to make it its instrument of peace. Surely, it is not for blind, weak man to question or to mock.

CHAPTER XV

PASSING OF A TITAN

THE terrible days of 1830–31 were survived and forgotten. Five years later the House was shaken by a crisis of quite another kind. It was midsummer 1836, and from every corner of Europe Rothschilds, Schnappers, Cohens, Montefiores had assembled at the ancient family seat. Lionel, eldest son of Nathan and heir-apparent of the London domain, was to be united with Charlotte, a daughter of his uncle Karl of Frankfort. At the climax of the festivities—at the very height of the most brilliant spectacle that the city had seen since the coronation of the last Holy Roman Emperor—the blow fell. Nathan had left home in ill-health. For some time he had been troubled with a carbuncle, but neither he nor his physician had made much of it. On the day of the wedding he suddenly developed grave symptoms. The family were alarmed; he, however, insisted that he was all right and refused to do anything that would upset the nuptial program. That night he became delirious. His condition had taken such a bad turn that his London doctor was hurriedly sent for. It was too late. For several days he lingered on. General poisoning had set in, and on July 28 he died.

He was not yet sixty years old. In the ordinary course he might have lived to a ripe old age. The Rothschilds came, on both sides of their ancestry, of long-lived stock.

Meyer had been nearly seventy when he died; Guetele, the bereaved mother, survived her great son by thirteen years; and of Nathan's four brothers three lived to be over seventy-five. Was it the hardships and exertions and perils of his youth that had undermined his resistance? He seemed to thrive on hard work; and surely Amschel and Salomon, both of whom were born before him and survived him by a score of years, had had it no easier. He was wont to say that he paid the price of wealth, success and recognition in universal jealousy, envy, and perennial threats of death; and though he was anything but a sensitive man, unpopularity and insecurity doubtless affected his nerves. Yet, living in England, he was very much safer and more respected than his brothers on the Continent.

Twenty-four years before, the death of his father, the titular founder of the House, was scarcely remarked beyond the Judengasse of his native city, and even the newspapers of Frankfort did not mention it. The passing of Nathan stirred every capital of Europe; a tremor went through the bourses and the chancelleries from St. Petersburg to London; hardly a journal of importance but noted the event and sketched his career. To England, if the tale is to be believed, the news was brought by his own pigeon post. Several days later his body arrived in a coffin so magnificent, "so handsomely carved and decorated with large silver handles at both sides and ends that it appeared more like a cabinet than a receptacle for the dead." Jewish funerals are distinguished for their austerity, for a kind of Oriental gloom; flowers, music, processions are rigidly excluded. The corpse is wrapped in hastily sewn muslin garments, placed in the crudest pine casket, and carried silently to its last destination. Nathan was all his life long a member of the Orthodox congregation, and he was buried in the Jewish East-End Cemetery. But he was after all one of the greatest of his race and time, and so "he was placed in his last resting place with a gorgeous pomp and display that seemed hardly appropriate to the solemnity of the occasion. . . . A procession of carriages nearly a mile in length followed it. Among those who were present . . . were the Austrian, Prussian, Neapolitan and Portuguese ambassadors, besides the Lord Mayor, the sheriffs, aldermen and a crowd of minor dignitaries."

Whether credit for these arrangements belongs to Nathan himself or to his family cannot be determined; for his complete will was not made public. Because of that, also, it has remained a dead secret to this day just what fortune he left behind. Even to his executors the details were not revealed. The skeleton testament which was given out confined itself to the conduct of the business and the marriage of his daughters. The management of the House in St. Swithin's Lane was entrusted to his four sons, and they were to work in harmony with their uncles' Houses on the Continent. Each of his daughters received a legacy of £100,000. They, like the daughters of Meyer, before them, were to have no part or lot in their father's, now their brothers', affairs. To charitable institutions, employees or other dependents, no bequests were made.

II

While the official press and official personages were busy repeating the legends made familiar by Gentz, and vying with one another in hyperbole, here and there critical-minded people did not hesitate to present a slightly different picture of the man and the methods by which he had risen. A mass of anecdotes gained currency—some malicious, some sympathetic, most of them doubtless apocryphal, but each, as is often the case with such stories, seizing upon some central truth of character. The most prolific of these narrators was Nathan's old friend, the famous anti-slavery apostle, Sir T. Fowell Buxton; and though his intention was certainly kindly in every instance, it may be doubted whether outspoken enemies like Ouvrard have done quite so much to strip the greatest of the Rothschilds of his halo. Thus by way of illustrating Nathan's industry and solidity, Buxton reported a dinner-table remark of his which is at least open to less flattering interpretation.

"I hope," said another guest to the banker, "that your children are not too fond of money and business to the exclusion of more important things. I am sure you would not wish that?"

"I am sure," Nathan replied with emphasis, "that I should wish that. I wish them to give mind, soul, heart and body—everything—to business. That is the way to be happy. It requires a great deal of boldness and a great deal of caution to make a great fortune; but when you have got it, it requires ten times as much wit to keep it."

And that Nathan meant what he said is confirmed by an incident related by Spohr, the German violinist and composer, who sought him out in London with a letter of introduction from Amschel. Nathan gave the musician a limp hand to shake, which he promptly returned to his pocket. "Music?" he queried without interest. "I understand nothing of music. This," as he rattled the change in his pocket, "this is my music."

But he found little joy even in his wealth, despite his own formula. When Buxton, impressed by the comforts and luxuries of the Rothschild mansion, said to him, "You must be a happy man in such a home as this," the disillusioned magnate replied, "What? Happy! I happy, when just as I am going to dine a letter is placed in my hand saying: 'If you do not send £500 I will blow your brains out.' Happy, indeed!"

To show that the great man was not a mere moneybag but had a vein of humanity and even wit in his make-up, Buxton reports him as saying, "Sometimes to amuse myself I give a beggar a guinea. He thinks it is a mistake, and for fear I should find it out off he runs as hard as he can. I advise you to give a beggar a guinea sometimes. It is very amusing."

So much for the Rothschild sense of humor. Equally self-revealing are Nathan's observations on success in general and his own in particular:

"I have seen many clever men, very clever men, who had not shoes to their feet. I never do business with them. Their advice sounds very well, but fate is against them. They cannot get on themselves, and if they cannot do good to themselves, how can they do good to me?"

Besides there were what he called his principles: "I always said to myself, what another man can do I can do too. I have always been an offhand man. I never lost any time. I came prepared for everything and closed bargains on the spot."

More detached observers believed to have discovered the sources of his greatness in a variety of other principles. "One cause of his success," said a contemporary, "was the secrecy with which he shrouded all his transactions, and the tortuous policy with which he misled those who watched him the keenest. If he possessed news calculated to make the Funds rise, he would commission the broker who acted in his behalf to sell half a million. The shoals of men who usually follow the movements of others sold with him. The news soon passed through Chapel Court that Rothschild was bearing the market, and the Funds fell. Men looked doubtingly at one another; a general panic spread; bad news was looked for; and these united agencies sank the price two or three per cent. This was the result expected, and other brokers, not usually employed by him, bought all they could at the reduced rate. By the time this was accomplished, the good news had arrived; the pressure ceased; and Mr. Rothschild reaped his reward."

An acquaintance of a more sympathetic temper declared: "This is the key to an understanding of Rothschild's character. His ambition tended to the accomplishment of elaborate financial operations—of making money, if you like. But in this phrase the emphasis must be placed on the making; for he did not value either money in itself or the things that could be procured by it. He had no taste or inclination for what every Englishman seeks as soon as he has money enough to buy it—comfort in every respect. His ambition was to arrive at his aim more quickly and more effectually than others, and to steer toward it with all his energy. When his end was reached it had lost all its charm for him, and he turned his never wearying mind to something else."

The inspired Gentz had something akin in mind when he wrote of the family generally that one of their leading principles was "to look for no exaggerated profits in any undertaking, to set definite limits to each operation. . . . In this maxim—servare modum finemque tenere—lies one of the chief secrets of their strength. There can be no kind of doubt that with the means at their command they might have obtained far greater advantages in one or another particular operation. Yet, even though the safety of the enterprise might not have suffered by their so doing, in the end they would nevertheless have profited less than they did by giving their resources the widest scope and thus having a greater variety of business constantly returning to them." All of which is a high-flown way of saying: Not all the eggs in one basket. Quick sales and fast overturn; for low profits never yet ruined merchant.

III

A shrewd and vivid, if not wholly appreciative portrait of Nathan as he appeared on the Royal Exchange has been drawn by a fellow-speculator:

"There is a rigidity and a tension in his features that would make you fancy, if you did not see that it was not so, that someone was pinching him behind, and that he was either afraid or ashamed to say so. Eyes are usually denominated the windows of the soul; but there you would conclude that the windows are false ones, or that there was no soul to look out of them. There comes not one pencil of light from the interior, neither is there one scintillation of that which comes from without reflected in any direction. The whole puts you in mind of a skin to let, and you wonder why it stands upright without at least something in it. By and by another figure comes up to it. It then steps two paces aside, and the most inquisitive glance that you ever saw, and a glance more inquisitive than you would ever have thought of, is drawn out of the erewhile fixed and leaden eye, as if one were drawing a sword from a scabbard. The visiting figure, which has the appearance of coming by accident and not by design, stops but a second or two, in the course of which looks are exchanged which, though you cannot translate, you feel must be of most important meaning. After these the eyes are sheathed up again, and the figure resumes its stony posture.

"During the morning numbers of visitors come, all of whom meet with a similar reception and vanish in a similar manner. And last of all the figure itself vanishes, leaving you utterly at a loss as to what can be its nature and functions.

"The name of this gentleman, the entertainments given by him, the charities to which he occasionally subscribed, and the amount of his transactions in the money market were blazoned abroad. Peers and the princes of the blood sat at his table; clergymen and laymen bowed before him; and they who preached loudest against mammon, bent lowest before the mammon-worshipper. Gorgeous plate, fine furniture, an establishment such as many a noble of Norman descent would envy, graced his entertainments. Without social refinement, with manners which, offensive in the million, were but brusque in the millionaire, he collected around him the most fastidious members of the most fastidious aristocracy in the world. He saw the representatives of all the states in Europe proud of his friendship. By the democratic envoy of the New World, by the ambassador of the imperial Russ, was his hospitality alike accepted; while the man who warred with slavery in all its forms and phases was himself slave to the golden reputation of the Hebrew. The language which Mr. Rothschild could use when his anger overbalanced his discretion was a licence allowed to his wealth; and he who, when placed in a position which compelled him to subscribe to a pressing charity, could exclaim, 'Here! write a check, I have made one —— fool of myself!' was courted and caressed by the clergy, was fêted and flattered by the poor, was treated as an equal by the first minister of the Crown, and more than worshipped by those whose names stood foremost on the roll of the commercial aristocracy. His mode of dictating letters was characteristic of a mind entirely absorbed in money-making; and his ravings when he found a bill unexpectedly protested were translated into mercantile language ere they were fit to meet a correspondent's eye."

Patently the anonymous author of these lines did not admire Nathan Rothschild. Yet the portrait is not malicious or overdrawn. Many men who thought well of Nathan—among them Rother, Wilhelm von Humboldt, Herries and even his own brother-in-law Moses Montefiore—testified to the same effect either explicitly or tacitly. The warmest admirers of his truly great gifts thought it prudent to pass over in silence or to allude in veiled words to his arrogance, his utter lack of refinement and civilized manners, his indifference to the amenities of decent society. Perhaps Humboldt summed up the man, when in a private letter to his wife, he said: "Rothschild is a quite raw and quite uneducated man, but he has much understanding and for money real genius." His trouble, like Napoleon's, was that his rare and special talents lifted him far above the social station for which his birth and his youthful environment had prepared him. Like Napoleon he was in his human relations an "ogre"; and the two had this characteristic further in common that their consciousness of social inferiority was turned by their eminence in another field and by the instinct of self-defense into deliberate insolence. Nathan's brothers rendered him a poor service when they flung a halo round their origin, though he himself played a sufficient part in the silly performance. Long before Gentz had dreamed of composing his "Biography" it was Nathan who, in his memorable after-dinner reminiscence concocted the fantasy about the Hessian Landgrave's six-hundred-thousand pound remittance. And among the credulous English, if not in Austria, the tale seemed to have been taken at something like par. His evident desire to make himself out a scion of "good family" betrayed both his sense that he was passing for something less and his dissatisfaction with his social status. But the effect of the invention was the reverse of what he had expected. The English would have humored a man of genius who had risen from poverty and simple surroundings; and under gentle ministrations his angularities might slowly have polished round to a degree at least. But he was taken at his word; and when he found, since he was not a dullard, that he could not live up to the standards expected of him, he turned round and flaunted his barbarities as the bluff virtues of an honest and gifted soul; and in England, where even shopkeepers and stock-gamblers strive to be gentlemen, this line did not go at all. It was a vicious circle. Nathan sneered at courtesy as so much sham and insincerity; he mocked at his brothers' pathetic endeavors to crawl in among the élite; he loftily refused to wear the baronial title they had wrung from Austria; he appeared on 'Change in even more slovenly garb than was natural for him; he gloried in his Ghetto accent. Cultivated people who could afford the luxury snubbed him; and the more they did so the more contemptuous he grew.

What had he to do with such superficialities? He was an original, a great man. He had trampled on the conventions of business, he had broken all the precedents of the Royal Exchange, and the world applauded him. The weaklings who had got hurt might scream and call names, but in the seats of the mighty he was received with acclaim. Let silly, pretentious idlers with nothing else to distinguish them worry over such trifles; he had bigger things to think about. The world did not expect conformity from such as him. The proof of it was that the strong, the highly placed, even the well-bred opened their homes and their arms to him. He was a doer, a natural aristocrat, one of the chosen of earth. With great wealth, with achievement, there was no need of submitting to the ordinary rules of courtesy; he was judged by standards of his own.

But he found out presently that he was mistaken. He caught people taking him in with raised eyebrows; there were suppressed grins behind well-kept hands. Oh, well; he would make some small concession. His wife and his children had a right to their social position, and he would do nothing to jeopardize it. There was so little to it all anyhow—an affair of externals. A man who had done the big things he had done would hardly be fazed by such trivialities once he cared to attend to them. He would surpass the snobs in display. So he filled his premises with pictures and plate and upholstery. He dressed up. He bought a house in Piccadilly and a princely estate in the country. He even rode and played the country gentleman. It was Napoleon reviving the glories of the Bourbons all over again, and it succeeded even less. Nathan Rothschild being himself was at least dignified; but the up-start of the Judengasse aping the toffs and the squirearchy was ridiculous.

He felt it, and he resented it. He took to making a virtue of his shortcomings, to revel in his enormities. But he found no peace. The older he grew, the more powerful he became, the more the world of rank and fashion fawned upon him—the deeper he raged within, the more hopeless appeared the prospect of his ever belonging on the plane where an ironic destiny had flung him, and the more savage became his behavior. He did not mellow; he soured. The high-spirited boy who flung out at the Manchester traveler grew into an irritable, misanthropic, violent old man. He underpaid and ill-treated his clerks because their grammatical speech, their neat dress, their good manners annoyed him. Most of all he delighted in being rude toward those who by rank and ancestry were his superiors but who must come to him for favors. "I am as good as you," he snapped at the Duke of Montmorenci, while a salon-full of aristocrats and ladies tried not to hear. "You style yourself the first Christian baron; well, I am the first Jewish one." Princes applying for loans were by his orders kept waiting in ante-rooms for hours. One such personage was, after lengthy delay, at last admitted to the presence. He introduced himself and named the object of his visit. Nathan did not so much as glance up; he was busy over a pile of documents on his desk; but he did ask a caller to take a chair. Considerable time passed, and the highness became impatient. "Did you hear who I am," he asked. "I am——," and he named his full title. "Very well," said Nathan from among his papers, "take two chairs."

But he was not alone in his misery. With the possible exception of Karl, all the Rothschilds of the first generation were haunted by the mocking ghosts of their past. The Judengasse and the shop threw a gray shadow across their path; to no matter what heights they rose it followed them and dulled the luster of their achievements. It was the price they paid for success.

PART IV

DECLINE

LONDON

THE death of Nathan was not only in itself an occurrence of the greatest moment, it was coincident with a profound change in the fortunes of the family. An era had come to its close. In England the young generation was at the wheel, with a background, a tone, an outlook only distantly related to the past; and though on the Continent Nathan's brothers continued to rule for many years, a new spirit was manifest in all the branches. The House of Rothschild, after thirty years and more of storm and stress, had at last entered the tranquil harbor of security and worldwide recognition. Incalculable as the loss of its most gifted member was, it was in a sense only after his disappearance that the family shone forth in all its splendor. Rothschild's became an institution and a household word, like sterling, like the British empire itself. Old rivals were reduced either to impotence or servitude; finance ministers in every state of Europe—of Europe and of America, too—when their treasuries needed replenishment, turned to New Court or the Rue Laffitte before they even thought of lesser firms. In official circles and in the popular mind there was but one world financial establishment, just as there was only one Bank of England and one pope.

Not that within the banking fraternity this monopoly went unquestioned. Far from it. The history of the House for the next fifty years is a continuous series of challenges, with ever-new combinations rising up to attack its supremacy. But it is the Rothschilds who are in possession, while others are on the outside engaged in offensive campaigns to dislodge them. Nor do they lie back on their achievements. So long as the first generation survives—and to a degree even afterwards—there is a ceaseless readjustment to changing times and new conditions. They are among the first and biggest railroad magnates in Europe. They finance and control vast mining enterprises—mercury, diamonds, copper, nitrates, petroleum. For a long time their immense properties in the Baku field make them the principal competitors of Standard Oil. Rothschild money is the power behind Cecil Rhodes and the South African diamond development; they dictate to, and almost annihilate, Mr. Barnato. An interlude comes when it appears as if they would extend their empire to North America; they have the lion's share in the funding of the United States national debt; they play an important, but losing, hand in the financial history of the Southern Confederacy. One Rothschild branch is the exclusive financial agent of the Russian empire, another guards the papal treasury. The firm extends its sway across the South Atlantic to become the dominant influence in the fiscal —and, inevitably, the political—affairs of the major states in Latin America. The death of Nathan was beyond doubt a staggering blow, but the family is far from moribund in consequence.

And yet it is difficult to escape the feeling that all this varied and far-reaching activity, immense and significant as it would look in the hands of a rising young concern, is —against the dazzling background of the age just past—something of an anti-climax. There is expansion, even conquest; but it comes easily, almost unsolicited, without the fierce clashes, the resounding turmoil of other days. The big moment of the drama with its breathless suspense, its color and its intensity, is past; and the action takes on a slower and more stately measure as it declines to its inevitable dénouement. After 1836 the House of Rothschild, though apparently growing, merely holds its own. It cannot be said—not at any rate for yet a long time—that its vitality has departed; but having climbed to its zenith, it can henceforth do no more than either stand still or descend. Actually its seeming gains are but the harvest of its youth. Everything comes to it in virtue of the past, and its greatest triumphs are only repetitions.

Nor can the historian of the family avoid an inversely corresponding change of tempo. To relate the remainder of the story with anything like the fulness given to the earlier period would be to want in a sense of proportion. The epic rise of the Rothschilds has merited an elaborate narration; but the remaining years are a gaudy and largely prosaic procession of the rewards of success. The very conclusion lacks spirit. There is no crash at the end, no catastrophic débâcle such as has marked the exit of other dynasties.

II

But the end is still a long way off. It is, rather, the entry into the promised land. The promised land, certainly, for Lionel and his brothers; but to Nathan, had he been able to see it, it would have seemed the vale of disillusion. His heirs, alas! did not all fulfil the tender and pious dreams he had dreamed for them. Perhaps in the arrogance of youth and sudden liberation they considered themselves ten times as clever as their father. From infancy he had preached to them the maxim that it takes ten times as much wit to keep a fortune as to make one. They had come to believe it, and having entered into their inheritance, they practiced it. To preserve the parental legacy; to administer it wisely and diligently; to increase it, even, within the limits consistent with the family's high traditions and their own varied and exacting avocations—that surely was their duty to the founder and to their own interests; but as to giving "mind and soul, heart and body, everything, to business," it was not their idea of "the way to be happy," whatever their father's convictions on the subject might have been.

So it has always been, and so most likely it will always be. The self-made man, coarse, greedy, ignorant, capable, ambitious, not too seriously irked by scruples, unaware of the world's disapproval and of life's greater prizes or indifferent to them, a little brutal and more than a little ridiculous, strives for wealth, for power. He attains them; and, not illogically perhaps, he tells himself that if he, in spite of his handicaps (he does not know it is because of them), could get so far, what might not his children, with their knowledge, their refinement, their well-groomed persons, their friendships and their head-start, accomplish? He is not guided by reason or even by affection as much as he thinks, of course. In his children he sees himself again, reincarnated, possessing all his abilities, lacking all his crudities. In them he shall recapture what he missed in youth. They shall have the advantage their father could not have and be the equals of every exalted one who ever snubbed their father, and at the same time they shall have the driving force, and the narrow single-mindedness, and the rude, all-conquering, reckless cupidity with which his own uncouth beginnings equipped him.

And so Nathan the financial genius, being human after all, bungled sadly when it came to bringing up his successors. If he really wanted them to follow in his tracks, he should have given them the same kind of surroundings as he had himself had in boyhood. They should have been reared in the slums of Whitechapel—the nearest equivalent London could offer to the Frankfort Judengasse—and sent to the Jewish communal classes called Talmud-Torah till they were confirmed at thirteen, and thrown upon their own resources from then on. There is every indication that Lionel at least, if not his brothers, was as intelligent, as hard-working, as gifted as his father; but he suffered from his advantages. The trouble was that his parent's desires were divided and confused. Nathan strove to make his son a combination of two incompatible ideals. He wanted Lionel to be what he himself was and also what he himself had failed to become. In pursuit of one latter objective he placed him at an exclusive English school and later at the University of Goettingen, lavished luxuries upon him and surrounded him with refined and distinguished companions. Lionel, being a bright and adaptable boy, took to the strange and agreeable environment with avidity. He was growing up a young gentleman. But just then his father remembered with a start his other goal. He snatched the youth away from his college and put him through a rigorous course of training in the business. It did not work out very well: Lionel labored earnestly under his father, under the department chiefs, under the clerks; he was getting a thorough grasp of affairs; but as for this régime exerting a counter-influence, as for its producing another Nathan, devoted mind and soul, heart and body to business, it was disappointing. Nathan had not been trained by any indulgent and obsequious staff of experts in a world banking house. He had learned finance by buying muslins in Manchester. It made an enormous difference.

There were other differences between founder and heir. Lionel was not only a young man of education and culture. He had been born to fortune and to a high destiny. He had inherited a name, a tradition, even a social position. Nathan, too, had rubbed elbows with the great and the fashionable; it was another kind of relationship, a phase of business on both sides. But aristocrats and statesmen, men of letters, distinguished generals, famous and important people of every sort, were Lionel's natural circle. They were his school friends, his fellow-members in clubs, his equals. For he was himself a native Englishman of the upper class. This last was perhaps the most significant departure from the previous generation. He had roots in a country that it was possible to love—which was not the case with Frankfort, not for a Jew at least—and he did love it. Moreover, the intimate association with the upper class gave him a point of view that would have pained his father. He developed a conscience, public spirit, a sense of social responsibility. He discovered the nation, and the poor—and art; his younger brothers simultaneously discovered sport. There were, it seemed, other things in heaven and earth than business and money-making. Art, for instance, was something more than an invention for the rich to display their wealth; philanthropy was the duty of a gentleman; and sport, as young Meyer learned, was not only vastly more interesting and exciting than floating foreign loans, it made one a hero with the British populace, while finance did the reverse.

And so there was a sharp break with the past. No more was a Rothschild seen standing with his back against a pillar of the Royal Exchange like an empty flour-sack. Speculation, manipulation, the clamor and dust of the market-place, which were the breath of life to Nathan's nostrils, had no charm whatever for his sons. Shiftless, improvident states and princes, with whom the founder had loved to do business because they paid fat commissions and did as they were told, were dropped from the books without a qualm. New Court became the most dignified, the solidest and most conservative financial institution in the City of London. The Royal Exchange never saw Lionel or his brothers; if it needed them, it could come to New Court, in St. Swithin's Lane. It came willingly and often. Every morning the great procession of brokers, promoters, speculators, merchants, filed by Lionel's desk, each man whispering his mission, none pausing unless commanded to, and under no circumstances longer than two minutes. And as the years sped by the quiet grandeur of the new day shed its mellow luster over the past, the outlines softened, dubious episodes were forgotten, and Nathan was remembered as the legendary hero of a romance.

III

As emblematic of the new order as the toning up of the firm was the spreading out of the younger Rothschilds into the fashionable portion of London and their migration into the country. During all but Nathan's entire lifetime the home remained beside the business in St. Swithin's Lane. In 1835 he had, indeed, yielded to family pressure by purchasing the historic Gunnersbury House and Park, once the estate of a royal princess. He had died, however, before the alterations and refurnishing had been completed, and his eldest son was the one to take possession. But this was only a beginning. Presently Lionel built a magnificent town mansion on a plot adjoining Apsley House, in Piccadilly, and following him his brothers and other relatives flocked to the same district, until that quarter of Mayfair became known as Rothschild Row. In the neighboring counties ancient manors and vast hunting preserves came into the family. Anthony, the second son of Nathan, who was subsequently created a baronet by Queen Victoria, bought a château and a forest not far from Gunnersbury; his youngest brother Meyer set up his stud at Mentmore, in Buckinghamshire, and made it a favorite rendezvous of sportsmen and aristocrats. Meyer, though his rôle at New Court was that of a subaltern to Lionel, was the worldliest and best-known of his name. Eupeptic, pleasure-loving, popular, he was a typical Englishman of the racing, fox-hunting tradition. A lavish entertainer both in town and country, a breeder of fine horses (with one of them he won the Derby), it was he who was Baron Rothschild to the classes as well as the masses of the British public. All the brothers were passionate collectors and patrons of art; but Lionel and Sir Anthony took a more sedate view of their position and their responsibility. Lionel in particular, was circumspect and took pains to consort with the graver strata of society.

He rode to hounds not so much for pleasure as because a gentleman must. His dinners in London and his week-end parties at Gunnersbury were as splendid as those of his younger brother; but it was a splendor tempered with dignity as became the head of a great House and an eminent family.

An excited but anonymous guest at one of these entertainments has left us her somewhat overwhelmed impressions of what she witnessed, the occasion being a dinner to Lord and Lady Lyndhurst, the political god-parents of young Disraeli. "Silver and gold plate shone on the table and buffets; exquisite flowers delighted the eye; while the retinue of servants in full dress, so well trained that not a footfall told of their presence, and the ease and repose that prevailed, the result of perfect training, were forgotten in the distinction of the company." But even that apparently was thrown into the shade by the namesake of the old court-factor of the Frankfort Judengasse. "Another still more splendid and prolonged fête in Lord Lyndhurst's honor, to which we were also bidden, was given by the Baroness Meyer Rothschild at her Venetian villa at Mentmore—rather palace than villa, however. The Baroness had sent early in the week to have the house and grounds put in perfect order. Such pictures, such furniture, such park scenery, racehorses and hounds! Such a breakfast and lunch al fresco . . . as words cannot describe."

That was all very fine; but Lionel was conscious of duties and a mission in life. That colossus at New Court must be governed and must be reconciled at once with the spirit of the new age as well as with the doings of his relatives on the Continent, those amazing survivors of another world. Just as he was succeeding in drawing the veil over the past, along would come Uncle Salomon in Vienna or more likely Uncle James in Paris and start a stench that wafted itself across the Channel. It was very trying and made him wish sometimes that his father had not insisted on coöperation with the old fellows over there. Nor was that all. Earnestly as he was devoting himself to the management of the business, there were things in the world which claimed his attention and which as a great figure in the community and as a cultivated and educated man he could not disregard, even if he had wanted to. The public side of his life even had a way of getting mixed up with the financial. He was, for instance, a Whig by party affiliation, that is, a liberal. Liberalism was, among other things, opposed to imperialism, his best friends detested the oppressive, medieval Russian monarchy. But Russia was one of his most profitable clients, she was in the market for a big loan, and she was going to use the money to fasten her yoke on Poland. He was loath to forego the operation, yet if he undertook it he would be going counter to his declared principles and lay himself open to charges of hypocrisy. Complex situations like this came up constantly; they were very awkward and embarrassing. How much luckier his simple, unsophisticated parent had been!

Moreover, he was a Jew. Nathan had been content to attend services on the Sabbath and on the High Holidays, to pay his temple dues, and observe the traditional rites and practices. More than likely he would put down his successors as something not far removed from renegades. Nevertheless Lionel and Sir Anthony were, for all their French chefs and their compromises with the dietary laws, devoted to the race and the faith. For the greater part of their lives they were the presidents of their respective synagogues, and the Jewish community of London regarded them as their natural leaders. They erected hospitals, they headed charities, they gave generously of their time and money for Jewish education. In the international field Lionel, as the head of the House, worked indefatigably to improve the status of his people abroad. He backed his maternal uncle, Sir Moses Montefiore, in the latter's efforts on behalf of the Jews in Russia and Poland; and when the Congress of Berlin, after the Russo-Turkish war, met to readjust the jangled balance of power in Europe, it was Lionel's letter to the assembled potentates that, more than any single factor, forced the emerging kingdom of Rumania to promise a civilized solution of its Jewish question.

IV

Undoubtedly, the most notable event in Lionel's career was an outgrowth of his deep interest in the status of his race. English Jewry in general and the Rothschild family in particular had, it is true, little to complain of. Compared with their brethren on the Continent, and more especially with those of them who dwelt in the Eastern parts of it, their position was enviable. They enjoyed economic equality with Christians, socially they were restricted only by income and personal fitness, even politically the British Constitution protected them. Yet one distinction remained—a survival from the ages of prejudice, which set Jews apart as citizens of the second class. No professing Jew could sit in either house of Parliament. Catholics, non-conformists and infidels were all represented. There was, in fact, no explicit law against the Jews either; only the oath of office was so worded as to exclude them in practice. It concluded with the words "on the true faith of a Christian." Reform politicians had repeatedly sought to change the formula, but so long as the Tories were in power all such endeavors were foredoomed to failure. In 1847 Lionel Rothschild began his long, spectacular fight to end the discrimination. His determination to do so was brought about, curiously enough, through the influence of a man who was himself both a Tory member of the House of Commons and an apostate to the Mosaic faith.

Benjamin Disraeli had for many years past been Lionel's most intimate friend. The two men, so different in their backgrounds, their temperaments and their fortunes, had nevertheless many interests in common. "Dizzy," loaded down with debts, dandified, dreaming of literary eminence and the Premiership, converted to the Established creed by the whim of a queer parent, was irresistibly drawn toward the great capitalist. When he came to write his Novel "Coningsby" he took Lionel as the model for Sidonia, the ideal young public man. As far as he was concerned, his abandonment of the synagogue had not altered the blood in his body or the heritage of his soul. Certainly it had not by one jot diminished his deep concern over the welfare of the Jewish people. Why, but for a fortuitous incident in his boyhood, he might himself have been kept out of Parliament and his ambition nipped at the start! It was stupid and unfair and dangerous for the nation's own interests to exclude an entire group of useful and intelligent citizens on no other ground than that they differed from the rest of the population about the hereafter. Some day when he became Prime Minister he would change all that. But then the thought came to him, why wait till then? Lionel Rothschild was the man to take up the cudgels against the musty prejudice, and at once. With his wealth, his personal qualities, his powerful connections and his family's long record of patriotic service, he was the natural standard bearer for the cause and no opposition could withstand his leadership.

In truth Dizzy's anticipations were somewhat too sanguine. The fight as it turned out was a very long and bitter one. Lionel, urged on to the enterprise by the leaders of the Jewish community, offered himself as the Whig candidate for one of the two divisions of the City of London. He was easily elected; and his colleague, who happened to be Lord John Russell, the Premier, made a motion in the House of Commons in favor of the "removal of the civil and political disabilities now affecting Her Majesty's Jewish subjects." Later he introduced a bill to the same effect, which being warmly supported by the oratorical gifts of both Disraeli and Gladstone, was after much discussion adopted. When, however, it reached the Lords, the reactionaries would have nothing to do with it. Lionel thereupon resigned, and at the first opportunity stood again. Six times he was reëlected, six times he appeared before the bar of the House demanding to be sworn on the Old Testament, ten times Lord John introduced his bill for the revision of the Oath of Abjuration, and every time it was accepted by the lower house and rejected by the upper one. The electorate protested; the refusal to seat their chosen representative was tantamount to disfranchising the constituency. Finally one of those compromises which have made the British constitution so unique an entity was patched up. A committee was appointed with Rothschild as one of its members, to draw up reasons for disagreeing with the Lords; and upon its handing in its findings, a resolution was offered in the House of Lords whereby each of the branches of Parliament was to have the right to determine the wording of the oath for its own members. This was adopted, and Lionel, after eleven years of controversy, was permitted to take his seat. He was the first professing Jew to gain admittance to that august body, but he was not the last Rothschild to do so. Once the doors had been forced open, they never closed again. Lionel continued to represent the London financial district for fifteen years. He did not, as some of the Tories in the House of Lords had dreaded, disrupt the Imperial legislature either by his forensic talents or by the extraordinary measures he introduced. He was in fact a silent, passive and wholly innocuous member. He had fought his way in to establish a precedent, and having achieved that purpose he was content to relapse into obscurity. But his victory was not a sterile one entirely. From that time to this Westminster has with but rare interruptions always counted at least one Rothschild among its members. Lionel's brother Meyer and his son-in-law Ferdinand held seats in the Commons during his own lifetime, and not long after his death his son Nathan pushed the victory further by becoming the first Jewish peer to sit in the House of Lords.

A less spectacular but equally significant result of Lionel's intimacy with Disraeli followed later when the House of Rothschild became instrumental in giving Great Britain control of the Suez Canal. Under the administration of Lord Palmerston England had had the opportunity of making that enterprise, so important to the trade and the very life of the empire, her own. That jaunty statesman, however, would have nothing to do with it. He characterized the project as a fantasy, and De Lesseps as either a swindler or a lunatic. Even after the waterway was completed and in operation, he could not be brought to see its value. The consequence of that incredible blindness is well-known: the Canal became virtually a French possession. But the gods watch over babes and innocents; wherefore, not many years afterwards, France had to have a war with Prussia and be so badly defeated as to all but destroy her prestige in the concert of Europe and reduce her to the status of a second-class power. It so happened, furthermore, that the Khedive (at that time more or less under the suzerainty of Turkey), in granting the concession, had reserved for himself a large block of the operating company's stock—177,642 shares to be exact, for which he was to pay, and did pay, over a period of years the sum of eighty-nine million francs. These details have a bearing on what ensued, as do also the following: Although by the contract with De Lesseps's company the Khedive was entitled to receive a minimum dividend of five per cent on his stock, he as a matter of fact lost precisely that much in interest on it. That was, to be sure, nobody's fault but his own. His Egyptian Majesty was a victim of the extravagance and improvidence common to Oriental potentates. He never had the money to pay in when instalments fell due, and when he applied to the French financiers for a loan they required ten per cent interest, exactly twice the amount the shares brought him. Moreover, they demanded security, and thus it came about that the Khedive was separated from his dividend coupons for a period of no less than twenty-five years to come. He consoled himself for this loss with the thought that he was still going to come out ahead, since by another clause of the contract he was to receive fifteen per cent of all profits made by the Canal. Unhappily for him, however, the Company was not making any profits. It was, in fact, facing bankruptcy.

In these very unsatisfactory circumstances, the directors conceived the idea of pulling out of a scrape by selling the Canal to the Powers. The Khedive, greatly alarmed at the prospect of an international board of control settling down on his front-door step, tried to protest; but he was a minority stockholder, and his objection was overruled. Thereupon he quietly sent for the British Consul-General on the spot, a certain General Stanton, and begged him to urge his government to buy the Canal alone. In addition, he persuaded his overlord, the Sultan of Turkey, to make a bid for the property, in order to dispose of it later to England. Finally, De Lesseps himself, though he greatly disliked selling out, went over to London and engaged in conversations with the authorities there, in the hope that their offer to buy might stimulate the other maritime powers to compete. The English rulers, however, even though Lord Palmerston had in the interval been superseded by Mr. Gladstone, were not interested, and lent a cool ear to all three proposals. They would not buy themselves, and they gave the Porte to understand that they would not tolerate any other purchaser.

De Lesseps was desperate, but he still had a shot in his locker. The Canal, as he saw it, was his property and he could administer it as he saw fit. He raised the tolls one franc per ton, and when that did not suffice he resorted to an ingenious scheme of revising the definition of "ton of capacity" in such a way as to yield an additional thirty-three per cent of revenue. The maritime nations protested violently. In France itself the Messageries Maritimes, a shipping concern doing a big carrying trade to the Orient, carried the controversy to the courts. Britain, acting through the Porte, demanded that the whole question be referred to an international commission. It was, and the commission ruled that the old English system of measuring tonnage was the only correct one and ordered the Canal company to refrain from collecting the revised tolls. But De Lesseps balked. He threatened to close the waterway altogether, and he notified the British admiralty and Board of Trade that if they refused to pay the passage dues fixed by his company their ships would "have to take the old route around the Cape." It was not till the Khedive mobilized a force of ten thousand men with orders to evict him that De Lesseps yielded.

De Lesseps's protest against the Commission's ruling reached London on the 12th of February, 1874. Nine days later the Gladstone Government was defeated and Disraeli became, for the second time, Her Majesty's Prime Minister. With characteristic energy he at once went to work and made a thorough study of the whole controversy. Having concluded that his predecessors in office had badly bungled matters and that control of Suez was of vital importance to England, he sought the help of his friend Lionel Rothschild to undo the mischief. The firm had already on its own initiative made several attempts to obtain the Khedive's holdings; but owing to their conservative policy of having no dealings with irresponsible and financially incompetent princes, their connections in Cairo and Constantinople were nil, and they had failed. Lionel now explained to the Premier how things stood. Disraeli, however, was not thinking of the Khedive; he was for reopening the negotiations with De Lesseps of three years ago. The day following this conversation Lionel's brother, Nathaniel, crossed the Channel to Paris and got into communication with De Lesseps. It so happened that in the meanwhile France had paid—thanks to the coöperation of the Paris House of Rothschild—the last billion of her indemnity to Germany, and her foreign policy had in consequence materially stiffened. Lesseps therefore told Nathaniel that he most emphatically was not contemplating any sale. Why should he? His country was making the Canal a national issue, and Russia was backing France on the international commission, so that he was in a position to threaten the Khedive with putting his company under his government's protection.

The prospects for Britain were dubious in the extreme. Then suddenly help came from an unexpected quarter. On October 7, 1875, the government of Turkey went bankrupt. In view of Egypt's connection with the Porte, a financial panic speedily seized Alexandria, the consequence of which was to threaten the solvency of the Khedive. Interest on the Egyptian debt was due before the end of the calendar year. In these circumstances the finance minister bethought himself of his master's Canal shares, and he opened negotiations with two French syndicates. Nominally the stock was to be mortgaged, but the bankers took care to impose terms so usurious as to make it practically certain that the Khedive would default on the payments and thus forfeit his interest in the Canal. Somehow the British government got wind of what was toward and dispatched a protest to Cairo, which produced an assurance that the sale of the securities was not being considered.

In the end the rivalry of the two banking combinations prevented the French authorities from lending their support to either. The Crédit Foncier syndicate, moreover, came to the conclusion that only outright purchase would meet the Khedive's needs. But the government of France hesitated to approve such a step for fear of diplomatic complications with Great Britain. A feeler was, therefore, reached out toward London, which brought an emphatic note from Lord Derby (Disraeli's Foreign Minister) declaring that Her Majesty's Government would regard the "making of the Canal any more French than it already "was" as an unfriendly act. But the Khedive anxiously saw the days rolling by and no money in sight with which to meet the interest payments on his debt. There was no alternative but to send for General Stanton again. On November 23, 1875, Stanton telegraphed that Egypt was prepared to relinquish her entire holdings for one hundred million francs. As it happened Parliament was not in session just then, so that it was impossible to obtain the necessary appropriation in the usual constitutional way. But that did not deter Disraeli from acting swiftly. He called Derby and Salisbury into conference, and having assured himself of the support of these two members of his Cabinet, he sent round to Lionel Rothschild to tell him that the transaction was coming through and to be prepared with the money—a matter of four million pounds. He could not guarantee that the House would make good, but if Lionel was willing to take the risk, he (Disraeli) would warmly appreciate the favor. The risk was not very grave, considering that the valuable stock was to be transferred into the hands of the banker. At any rate, Lionel did not hesitate. There was a two-and-a-half-per cent commission—a hundred thousand pounds—involved. The Khedive gave up not only his hundred and seventy-odd thousand ordinary shares but threw in also fifteen hundred founders' shares as well as his fifteen-per cent interest in the revenues of the Canal; and all this, together with the small batch of shares already held in England, gave the Queen the predominant voice in the enterprise. At least Disraeli told her that it was she who was the sole gainer. "It is just settled; you have it, Madam. Four millions sterling! and almost immediately. There was only one firm that could do it—Rothschilds. They behaved admirably; advanced the money at a low rate, and the entire interest of the Khedive is now yours, Madam."

VI

Less than four years later Lionel died suddenly, and the governance of the London House of Rothschild passed to his eldest son. Even better educated than his father, Nathan (or Nathaniel) was almost exclusively a public man. From his uncle Anthony he had inherited the baronetcy, and his close friendship with the Prince of Wales, whom he had come to know at Cambridge, presently brought him a peerage. The daily morning procession at New Court continued; government loans, particularly with Brazil and Chile, kept on coming to the House; but it was purely and simply inheritance. Already in the third generation, the descendants of Nathan began showing the tendency, which has since become general among the Rothschilds, of converting their banking houses into mere administrative offices for the investment of their capital. Society, art, politics and Jewish affairs absorbed Lord Nathan almost wholly, and his brothers, like their uncles before them, went in for sport and fashion.

Unmistakably, also, the bonds of family tradition began weakening in the second half of the century. While a majority of the first Nathan's grandchildren married Rothschilds, no fewer than four of them went for their mates beyond the limits not only of their own clan but of the race itself. The strayers from the fold are reputed, it is true, to have remained Jews in faith and have even continued to interest themselves in Jewish charities and public questions; but the same cannot be said of their descendants.

Among the present, the fourth, generation, both these manifestations have become stronger. One of the latter-day Rothschilds has gone to the length of giving up his very name. He has changed it to Pascal, and the street in Paris which bears that designation is named not after the French philosopher but after one of the scions of old Meyer of Frankfort. So also with the firm. Though St. Swithin's Lane continues to be something of a power in British finance, and though its investments in South American loans, in railroads, mines and industrial enterprises are enormous, the significance of the House lies purely in its command of huge capital and not in the least in its skill or enterprise. The initiative, the force, the brilliant originality, the fierce vitality of the days of the first Nathan have passed to younger and more determined men with other names who still have their reputations and their fortunes to make. In so far as Rothschilds in England can be said to have survived, it has done so wholly on the momentum, one could almost say on the inertia, of the past. And the London House is the least moribund of its name.

CHAPTER XVII

JAMES AND HIS HEIRS

THE drift of events in Paris followed lines roughly parallel to the development in London. There was one important difference, however: While beyond the Channel the heirs came into possession early, the first generation continued to control in France for half a lifetime longer. James was but forty-four when Nathan died, and he lived to be seventy-six. In the prime of life, by far the most brilliant of his remaining brothers and so by them acknowledged, strategically located, rich in experience, he readily stepped into the captaincy left vacant by Nathan. More even than by personal endowment, he was equipped for leadership by favoring circumstances. The Revolution of July—that very overturn which had come so near bringing ruin upon his House—once it had survived the crisis and consolidated its gains, fulfilled all his expectations. He emerged from it sobered and immeasurably strengthened. His German birth, his Jewish accent, his obscure and questionable beginnings, his social inferiority, his past failures, were all forgotten and forgiven; and he attained a power in government and a dominance over the national economy which Nathan himself in his best days had never equaled.

Nothing like the July Monarchy had ever been known in the whole predatory history of French royalty. For eighteen years big business was supreme. It governed with an insouciance, a blatancy, a callous disregard of public decency and national well-being that would have made Louis XV blush with shame. The citizen king, mindful of the classes to whom he owed his throne, turned the country unreservedly over to the haute bourgeoisie. Painfully conscious of the precariousness of thrones in general and of his own in particular, he was determined that whatever came he and his family should never be exposed to want. And so there followed an era of stock-jobbing, speculation and corruption in which Majesty, court, parliament, anybody and everybody with a paw in the trough of power shared freely and richly. Above all, Louis Philippe was too loyal to forget his debt to James and his House. It was James's generosity that had enabled him to survive patiently and in comfort the days preceding his accession, and but for the combined support of the Rothschilds he might—he almost certainly would—have been annihilated by Metternich and the Holy Alliance. Well, James should now have his reward. He had been snubbed by the haughty Bourbons; therefore he should never now be absent from palace functions, and his own parties should always be graced by royal presences. The chauvinists held it against him that he was a foreign baron; they should be silenced and James should wear the grand cross of the Legion of Honor. More tangible recognition, also, was to be his. He should have a monopoly of government loans as a matter of course. Privileges, contracts, concessions should be granted him regardless of public policy and public opinion. And incidentally he should handle the royal investment account and hatch Majesty's nest-egg against the evil days that one could only hope would never come.

JAMES
VON ROTHSCHILD

Squeamish people, at home and abroad, were scandalized by the spectacle—or made a note of it with sardonic humor. Metternich, the high-minded puritan, saw the disgraceful alliance between monarch and plutocrat as the inevitable result of democracy. It caused him to shake his head with pained resignation. "The House of Rothschild," he said, "plays a much bigger rôle in France than any foreign government, with the possible exception of England. There are of course reasons for it, which to me naturally appear neither good nor morally gratifying: Money is the great motive force in France, and corruption—which is in practice the most important factor in our modern system of representative government—is quite openly reckoned with." But he took comfort in the thought that in Austria at least filthy lucre was scorned by all right-thinking men. "Among us the traffic in this commodity finds but few friends."

Heine, on the other hand, who dined in the Rue Laffitte often and had ample opportunity to observe what was going on, reveled in the delicious situation. He declined to grieve over it at any rate; or possibly, like the Barber of Seville, he laughed to hold the tears back. "A few hundred years ago," he wrote, "the king would quite simply have pulled Monsieur Rothschild's teeth out by way of inducing him to consent to a loan. Ah well, the naïve ethic of the middle ages has happily been carried downstream by the Revolution, and now Rothschild the baron and Knight of the Order of Isabella can calmly go for a walk in the Tuileries whenever he is so disposed, without fearing that the hard-pressed monarch will touch a single one of his teeth."

What gave him particular joy, however, was to sit in a quiet corner at the counting house and watch the daily procession of hopeful speculators doing homage. "Best I like to call on him at his office in the bank, where as a philosopher I can look on at the people—not merely God's chosen, but those of all races—kneeling and abasing themselves before him. Such a doubling and contortioning of backbones as you would hardly expect acrobats to achieve! Some I have seen who on catching a glimpse of the great baron are seized with a nervous twitching as if they had unawares stepped on an electric cable. Others have but to approach the door to succumb to a tremor of awe, such as Moses must have felt when he suddenly realized on Mount Horeb that he was standing on holy ground. . . . This inner office is in truth a remarkable place. . . . It impresses one with the insignificance of man and the greatness of the Lord. For money is the god of our age and Rothschild is his prophet."

Another German-Jewish writer was less amused. Ludwig Boerne had known the Rothschild boys in Frankfort before their days of glory. It was after him and not after them that the city fathers later named the metamorphosed Judengasse. In spite of common origin, however—or it may have been because of it—Boerne took little pride in the magnificence that had come to his fellow-townsmen. Gifted with a sardonic pen, he rarely missed an occasion for lampooning their activities. As early as 1832 he reported to his paper: "Louis-Philippe, if he is still king next year, will have himself crowned—not, however, in the church of St. Remi at Rheims but in Paris in Notre Dame de la Bourse and Rothschild will officiate as archbishop."

II

But in truth Boerne was doing James an injustice. For James had no ambition to be a king-maker. The monarch was safely where he wanted him to be, and he turned his attention to seats of power which, for all that they came in smaller containers, were none the less worth subduing. Railroads were a bigger thing than loans now, and to his chagrin France had gone in for a policy of state construction and operation. Louis-Philippe was well-disposed; but in this matter the decision rested not so much with the king as with the people's representatives in parliament and in the press. In 1845, therefore, when plans were in the making for the great new line to link Paris with the industrial regions of the North, James set to work systematically to secure the concession. With a suddenness which took Frenchmen off their feet, the staunchest advocates of public ownership all at once perceived the error of their ways. Ministers, deputies and journalists alike agreed that in the interests of economy, of efficiency and of the public weal the Chemin de Fer du Nord ought to be built and run by the banking firm of de Rothschild Frères. Only one newspaper, the National, stuck by its guns, and it subsequently explained how its colleagues as well as the gentlemen in parliament were converted.

The company launched the enterprise with a capital stock issue of one hundred and fifty millions, divided into three hundred thousand shares nominally worth five hundred francs each. According to the recalcitrant journal one-tenth of the securities were distributed freely and gratis among the membership of the chambers and the press, in all seven and one-half millions' worth, to each according to his merit and the weight of his support. The National itself was not slighted; it duly received its proportionate parcel; only, so it boasted, it preferred the distinction of a clear conscience and the pleasure of enlightening the world. The materialists, on the other hand, had nothing to complain of. With nearly the entire press behind him, James now proceeded to make the shares worth having. By a series of alternate bulling and bearing operations they gradually rose from 500 to nearly 850. Repeatedly he unloaded his holdings so as to depress prices and secure the outstanding parcels. In the end he emerged as the majority stockholder. He retained the presidency of the road till his death, and the property continues in the hands of his descendants to this day.

The line was opened with appropriate ceremonies at Amiens on June 15, 1846, and Monsieur Rothschild was hailed by representatives of the crown and the chambers as a public benefactor. Not many weeks later the public rejoicings were overshadowed by a deplorable accident in which a score or so of travelers were killed and many more injured. A terrific storm broke about the public benefactor's head, who was now denounced as a monster sacrificing human flesh to the golden calf. Old resentments, hatreds, jealousies, long pent-up, took advantage of the occasion to vent themselves in violent tirades. A flood of pamphlets poured forth from the press, with echoes of the Viennese polemists from whom poor Salomon had suffered so long. A disappointed journalist who had been overlooked in the stock distribution of the year before unearthed old Hormayr's venomous phrase and addressed James pseudonymously as "Rothschild I, King of the Jews." The doggerel artists did their share. Ancient canards about the unaris-tocratic antecedents and the early performances of the family, and the malodorous origin of its fortune, were revived and spread before an eager public. The uproar mortified James and made him nervous. This sort of thing was something quite new in his experience, and he was at a loss how to handle it. He appealed to his newspaper and literary friends to help him, and a pamphlet entitled "The Reply of Rothschild I to Satan the Last" was hastily gotten out, in the evident hope that it would end the discussion. But it had, of course, the opposite effect; the scurrilous broadsides swelled in volume and in intensity. Then James redoubled his endeavors on behalf of the poor and outdid himself in good works; whereupon his adversaries warned the public that the cheap bread issuing from the Rothschild bakeries was made of adulterated flour mixed with poison, and called upon the authorities to stop its distribution. There seemed to be no limit to the malice of the wicked.

But James soon found something vastly more disturbing to occupy him. Within little more than a year after the accident on the Nord railroad, signs of the most alarming variety began to appear everywhere in the country. Republicanism, which was believed exorcised forever, suddenly raised its menacing head once more. The apparently solid edifice of monarchy creaked, swayed and displayed symptoms of breaking up. On the second of February it fell in a heap. The Citizen King, scorned, discredited and abandoned by his supporters, fled the country in terror of his life. For a little time James refused to recognize the gravity of the situation, certain that the fury would spend itself, or that some savior would arise to divert it into reasonable channels. It was not long, however, before he realized that this was not 1830. When a mob descended upon his suburban château at Suresnes, pillaged it and only by a miracle was prevented from setting it on fire, and when the following day his eldest son Meyer Alphonse was seized by the Republican Guard, ordered into a uniform and with a musket on his shoulder detailed to stand sentinel on the ramparts, James reluctantly came to the conclusion that this time it was Revolution in real earnest.

III

It was more serious than he could bring himself to admit. The Second Republic, it speedily developed, was animated by a temper hostile not only to the old European political order; it had a social and economic lining. Strange, disreputable, wholly preposterous ideas of the state, of property, of the nature of wealth, of the relative worth of classes and services, distilled out of the destructive preachments of a band of wild-eyed doctrinaires in France and abroad—Louis Blanc, Engels, Marx, Fourier, St. Simon—had taken possession of the new rulers. They did not stop there, however. The upheaval sent out waves, which spread with lightning speed to all the ends of the Continent. East, North and South crowns were rolling off monarchical heads, and the pillars of civilization toppled into the dust. Here in France it looked as if the Revolution were largely a device for hacking away the bases upon which the House of Rothschild had risen and grown strong. One of the first reforms of the republicans addressed itself to the matter of state financing. The good old system was consigned bodily to limbo. Loans were no longer to be handled through any single firm or syndicate. For capital, according to the revolutionary philosophers, was a national resource; and that being the case, the nation could just as well act as its own contractor. Therefore the amount to be borrowed, the price at which the securities were to be floated, and the commissions of the agents and brokers, must be fixed by the state beforehand. The bankers could participate to whatever extent they desired, each house according to its ability, but all on the same footing. The vicious innovation, originating in France, presently gained converts among all the governments of Europe. A curtain descended upon the brilliant scene in which Rothschild's had for so long played a leading rôle.

Nor did it lift again when the Second Republic, after a brief and agitated existence lasting barely three years, turned into the Second Empire. Louis Napoleon was a totally different breed from Louis Philippe. A free-lance and a playboy prior to 1848, flying from one fantastic adventure after another, half the time an exile or a prisoner, he had been scarcely more than a name in France. James had thus had no opportunity to form any sort of ties with him, even if the notion had ever occurred to him that this obscure heir of a buried tradition would some day wear the crown of France. But there he was lording it in the Tuileries. And James, indelibly tarred with the Louis Philippe brush, found himself out in the cold.

What made this depressing state of affairs all the harder to bear was that the imperial court, by no means unfriendly to men of money—not even to Jewish ones—had thrown its favor to the rising young firm of the brothers Péreire, and Emil Péreire was a product and a whilom protégé of Rothschild's. It was enough to make one lose faith in humanity. Heine, it seemed, had spoken truer than he knew. "This remarkable man," he said of James, "has the rare gift of discovering men with extraordinary capacities and attaching them to himself . . . in contrast to his colleagues who prefer to surround themselves with nonentities." Yes, but the difficulty was that he was too good at it. Péreire was only one instance of the danger of encouraging excessively clever men: there were others, as will be seen presently. Péreire at least did not betray his protector's confidence. He learned what he could from him about the usefulness of friends at court, and then went ahead to apply the instruction. Young, alert, ambitious, and enjoying the friendship of influential people in the new régime, he had early made it his business to gain the confidence of the emperor. Within a few months of the coup d'état he had contrived to secure a charter from Napoleon III for the erection of a new kind of financial institution. It was called the Crédit Mobilier, and was the first bank in France organized on a joint-stock basis.

Then he went energetically toward his goal, which was nothing less than to supplant his former employer. There ensued a violent and bitter struggle, with no quarter given or taken. For a time the odds weighed heavily on the side of the challenger. Péreire pushed his influence into the provinces, and in a remarkably short time he had the nucleus of a powerful syndicate all his own. When Russia began building her network of railways, it was he who snatched off the concession, though James brought to bear all the pressure of his own and his nephew Lionel's prestige. Presently he carried the war into Austria and came within an ace of annexing the domain of Salomon's heirs. For fifteen years the furious contest raged. In the end, it is true, Péreire was beaten, but the victory cost the Rothschilds more than it was worth.

In the interval James experienced an even more grievous disappointment in his faith in mankind. For ten years he had entrusted the post of chief cashier on the Nord Railroad to one of his favorite understudies, a Frenchman named Carpentier. Few of his employees were so close to him or enjoyed so much of his confidence. He took Carpentier with him when he traveled, he invited him to the less brilliant entertainments in the Rue Laffitte; he even spoke to him freely about his operations and his winnings. Doubtless, that was his mistake; he overdid things somewhat. It did not occur to him that a gifted and modestly-incomed young man was apt to have temptations which the friendship and confidence of his enormously wealthy employer, coupled with tantalizing opportunities, might tease beyond resistance. Early in September 1856, James was on a journey with Carpentier, and in the course of conversation mentioned to him that he had just made a coup on the exchange which had netted him a gain of five million francs. Some hint of the relationship between magnate and subordinate may be gathered from the detail that Carpentier, upon hearing the good news, inquired what share of the proceeds the president of the road intended to bestow upon the chief cashier. James, so the newspapers afterwards reported, took the hint good-naturedly, and replied: "No, I cannot give you any of my five millions, but, here, take my chain, as a souvenir of this day which has brought me so much pleasure and profit." Carpentier pocketed the gift, and requested a leave of absence for several days. It was the last that was seen of him.

At first no particular notice was taken of the man's extended absence. When, however, pay-day came round, and a queue of employees lined up in front of the company's wicket without anyone appearing to hand them their wages, the officials suddenly recalled that Carpentier had not been seen for some little time. It became necessary to notify the president; for Carpentier had taken with him the keys of the safes, and James alone had duplicates. But when the safes were opened, they were found to be empty. An indeterminate quantity of cash, as well as mass of records, had been removed. James was not long in coming to the conclusion as to what had happened; but his first order was characteristic: beyond a bare statement that a robbery had occurred, all details were to be withheld from the public. There was the effect on the company's stock to be thought of. The French press readily acquiesced to hush up the affair. The foreign correspondents, however, were less obliging; and it is due to them that something like the real magnitude of the crime became known.

Carpentier, it developed, had had accomplices—one Grellet, a young man "of very good family," in addition to a number of clerks in the company's employ. In cash alone the sum abstracted amounted to six million francs. So much the directors were, after considerable questioning, induced to admit. That, however, was a small item of the total. Counting in the shares, the entire loss was estimated at the immense figure of "between thirty and thirty-two millions." The thieves had planned and executed the job with a skill and cunning worthy of the booty. Stock certificates deposited with the company being kept in packets of one thousand, the gang withdrew from each parcel two or three hundred shares, tied up the remainder and replaced them in their containers. In this way they had succeeded in carrying on their operations for a long time, without discovery. Six months before their disappearance they had bought a steamer in England for about two million francs, and some time later they acquired a house in New York. Early in September they decided they had enough. Thereupon Carpentier, having obtained his leave of absence, proceeded to Liverpool, where the boat was anchored, had her got ready, and steamed out to keep tryst with his companions. The president and directors were so put out by the faithlessness of their trusted subordinates that they offered to spend ten millions for the capture of Carpentier. But he had got such a good head-start that he was never caught.

IV

For its part the Nord Railroad survived the incident, and James continued to preside over its destinies to the day of his death. Had he been a mere king of France, such a display of bad judgment might have cost him his throne; but stockholders are more forgiving. Nevertheless, the disappointment over Carpentier and the weary struggle with Péreire did their part toward hastening his end. He died the year after the crash of the Crédit Mobilier. The Grand Rabbi of France, the Chief Rabbi of Paris, the head of the Jewish charities, and one or two officials of the Railroad, made moving speeches at the grave in the Père Lachaise cemetery; all the leading newspapers of the capital printed long editorials on his extraordinary career, his generosity to the poor and his devotion to the best interests of the country. A notable procession of diplomats and members of parliament followed the bier, and among the mourners were several hundred uniformed employes of the railway company. In deference to Jewish tradition, no military escort was provided by the government, though the deceased, as a commander of the Legion of Honor, was entitled to it. He was survived by his wife, a daughter and four sons. Three of the sons, Alphonse Meyer, Gustave and Edmond, took over the direction of their father's affairs.

The young men had barely had time to get their bearings when a series of political, financial and social crises in the affairs of France gave them ample opportunity to show their mettle. Less than two years after James's death the country embarked upon its disastrous war with Prussia. There followed in quick succession the capture and abdication of the Emperor, the siege of Paris, the Commune, and the huge indemnity imposed by the victor. Alphonse and his brothers acquitted themselves creditably, even brilliantly, in every instance. The invaders made their headquarters in the Rothschild estate at Ferrières; but as Bismarck was an old friend of the family, strict orders were given that the château and grounds were in no way to be treated as enemy property; the hungry soldiery were not to kill so much as a single partridge in the park; and it was in Ferrières that Jules Favre met the Iron Chancellor to receive the terms of peace. The departure of Napoleon III was accepted by the banking House with resignation if not with relief; Rothschild's had had better friends among the nation's rulers. As for the five billions demanded by the foe, Gambetta felt about it as Disraeli had felt about the purchase of the Khedive's shares: "there was only one firm could do it—Rothschild's." The raising and transfer of the fabulous sum was left to Alphonse, though his cousins in Frankfort and notably Lionel in London gave valuable assistance in carrying out the firm's guarantee that the exchanges should be maintained.

Even the terrible siege was somehow endured. Most Parisians were so hungry that they killed rats for food; but though proper edibles were costly and hard to get, people with the necessary price need not starve. It was the unspeakable mobs within the walls that almost made life unbearable. The Communards, like their brethren of 'forty-eight, rioted, seized wealthy men's homes, and under threat of violence, forced their owners to stand guard on the ramparts. Happily, the fury was short-lived. The decent and orderly elements of the city presently asserted themselves, and the subversive movement was drowned in blood.

With the establishment of the Third Republic James's heirs breathed freely again. The old system of loans, which had made their father the real power in the government as well as in the commercial life of the country, never returned, it is true; nor did the young men possess either the single-minded concentration of purpose or the healthy detachment from local concerns and local opinion, to bend parliament to their will, as their father had done in the matter of the Nord Railroad. No amount of parental solicitude to endow them with an international outlook could quite contrive to neutralize the influences of environment; born and reared and educated in France, they belonged. With all their intermarriages within the family and their complex ties abroad, they could not help thinking and feeling as Frenchmen. Like their cousins in England, also, they were conscious of a deterrent responsibility and dignity which, while it sprang from the past, conflicted with the spirit and methods of the past.

Fortunately for them, there were still countries in Europe where the upsetting ideas of France had not penetrated. There was Russia, for instance, a land wholly untouched by the Revolution. There concessions and operations on the classical lines were still possible; there the name and prestige of the House of Rothschild shone with its old glamour; and there, above all, the second generation need feel no compunction about walking in the footsteps of the founders. Twice within five years Alphonse and his brothers planted their flags in the vast empire. In 1883 the Tsar, embarrassed financially by the consequences of an expensive war and unable to raise funds in the regular way, was persuaded to grant the French House of Rothschild a concession in the Baku petroleum region so comprehensive as to make that firm the chief competitor of the Rockefeller interests. Oil, to be sure, was in those primitive days, not the stake of empire which it has since become; its sole use was as a substitute for candles; but as gas-lighting was still in its infancy in most places, and the incandescent lamp hardly more than a scientific toy at Menlo Park, the profits of the new Bnito Petroleum Company were not to be despised. As for Russia, the concession yielded only temporary relief, and in 1887 she addressed herself again to the capital markets of Europe for a loan. It was the period when statesmanship was busy projecting the Drei-Kaiser-Bund—the "natural" alliance of the three imperial powers of Austria, Germany and Russia against the democratic forces further West. But Bismarck had other plans, and he forbade the Reichsbank to give any financial support to the Tsar. The result was that Russia was obliged to turn to France, the loans were floated by the Paris Rothschilds, and the Oriental autocracy became the "cordial" ally of the Republic.

But this ability of James's heirs to keep going on their momentum was a thorn in the flesh of their rivals. Despite the failure of the Péreire challenge, joint-stock banking corporations continued to arise and to flourish, and ever-new combinations went on forming to break the power of Rothschild's. In 1876, the picturesque French financier, Bontoux, conceived the idea of enlisting religious and racial sentiment in the service of business. His Union Générale, founded that year, was designed primarily to deliver France and the world from the Semitic exploitation and incidentally to divert the proceeds into the pockets of deserving Catholics. The fact that the Holy See itself was a client of the unbelievers, did not disturb the logical Frenchman. His scheme was hailed with enthusiasm by the clerical, royalist, reactionary elements. All the aristocratic families that still had money to invest brought him their nest-eggs and the concern was floated with an initial capital of four million francs. The experiment might have succeeded had not Bontoux been too ambitious. Unwarned by the fate of Péreire, he yielded to the temptation of making a clean sweep by spreading his net to Vienna also. He was, in consequence, caught between the upper and nether millstones, and the Union Générale, which had begun under such hopeful auspices, came to a disastrous end after a brief career lasting barely six years. Hundreds of noble French families were reduced to beggary by the crash; while Bontoux, finding himself equipped with both leisure and emotion, took to the pen and in a pamphlet entitled "Le Krach de l'Union Générale; la finance juive et les francs-maçons" enlightened the world about the methods whereby the allied monsters of Judaism and Free-Masonry despoil honest but rather futile Catholics of their wealth.

It is difficult to tell how much the bitterness caused by the Rothschild-Bontoux struggle and its dire consequences contributed to the growth of anti-Semitism in France. Certain it is that the legacy of hatred and mistrust survived the episode for many years and affected people who had never so much as seen a stock-certificate. When one considers the line-up of the contestants in the violent Dreyfus battle a dozen years later, it appears not unlikely that the dynamite for that extraordinary explosion was planted on the bourses of Paris and Vienna on Black Sunday, 1882. In any event, it was while Dreyfusards and anti-Dreyfusards assaulted each other on the boulevards that the French House of Rothschild went through its stormiest period. The very name of the bankers became a sort of symbol in the fierce controversy; and although the dominance of the House was by that time hardly more than a memory, the mass of literature in French dealing with the antecedents of the family and the origins of its fortune dates from that period. Nor did their enemies stop at verbal weapons. The property and the very lives of the descendants of James were in constant peril during the years 1896–1903; and Edouard, the only son of Alphonse, was actually forced to resort to a duel in defense of his life.

The long-drawn out struggle had just come to an end when Alphonse died at the age of 76. Though his two brothers Gustave and Edmond, who had all along been associated with him in the firm, survived, they were too old to take over the direction of its affairs; and the succession fell to their sons—Robert Philippe (Gustave) and

James and Maurice (Edmond). Their administration has been notable for a progressive contraction of the family's interests. In 1911 they took a spectacular step in the liquidation process by selling the Bnito Petroleum Company to the Royal Dutch-Shell combine. While in London St. Swithin's Lane is to this day an institution, the French House is nothing more than an office through which the various members handle their investments and their charitable endeavors.

CHAPTER XVIII

TWILIGHT

GENTZ, racked with maladies, disappeared; Prince Metternich saw his laborious system crash to earth, and fled, a terrified mummy in his night-clothes, with the howling mob clamoring for his head; the emperor of Austria laid down his crown and put it on again; but all the while Salomon carried on, watchful but unperturbed. All the props and buttresses of his House trembled and gave way, but its foundations held firm. The death of Gentz, indeed, removed an associate whose services he only now fully appreciated. "He was a friend," he wrote regretfully to James, "whose like I shall not surely ever meet again. He cost me something frightful; you have no idea. He would just simply write down on a scrap of paper what he required, and the amount would be handed to him without further ado. Yet now he is gone I can see how valuable he was to us. Gladly would I give three times as much if I could but have him back." He did not get him back, alas! and so Salomon was obliged to collaborate with other men who, if they were neither as discreet nor as useful, were less expensive.

Times changed, and he adapted himself to them with astonishing ease. State financing struck out into unwonted paths; competitors of a new and formidable species arose; railroads came, and industrial expansion, and mining; he made the best of a difficult period. His zest for toil continued unabated, and so did his appetite for distinctions.

Already away back in 1831 he had begun to see the new drift. Therefore when that year the Austrian government was once again struggling with its budget, he proposed that in lieu of a loan it might obtain somewhat more enduring relief by leasing to him for a term of years the state domain of Idria with its mercury deposits. He knew nothing of the mines and metals; it was enough that mercury had a field to itself in certain manufactures and in pharmacopœia, and that the trade was ill-organized so that the mineral was commanding a low price. Idria alone, however, would not enable its possessor to control the market. As it happened, the other great deposit was in Spain, and Nathan being at the moment in touch with the authorities of that country, Salomon urged him to secure the concession on Almaden as well. And thus the House of Rothschild established one of the first great monopolies of modern times. Mirror-makers, physicians and philanthropists protested loudly; the hostile press charged that the sick and dying were deprived of necessary medicines while an international band devoid of human feelings was getting rich; but Salomon, known throughout the empire as a generous giver to charities and as the protector of the poor, need only reply by pointing to his record; and mercury went on rising in price.

As in France, Austria began with a policy of state railroad construction. The difficulty was to finance the undertakings. When the plans for the Nordbahn came up for consideration, it was found that, the best resolutions notwithstanding, the bankers would have to be appealed to. The political pattern of the empire (and, individuals apart, the moral tone, too) was very different from that in Louis Philippe's France, and there is no indication that the grant to Rothschild was accompanied with the methods employed by James. On the other hand, the flotation of the stock on the bourses was reminiscent of the days of the lottery loan. Now it was that Salomon felt the absence of Gentz most keenly. Still, the Augsburger Allgemeine Zeitung and the late Baron Meseritz' syndicate did their best. The shares were offered to the public before so much as a spade of ground was turned; and although the project was new and risky, the propaganda was so skilfully handled that within a short time the entire issue of twelve million florins was absorbed and quotations soared to fifteen points above par. Afterwards, to be sure, the operating company had all it could do to stay out of bankruptcy, dividends were passed year after year, and the security was a drug on the market. But long before that time Salomon had disposed of his holdings. He is to this day remembered in Austria as the "builder" of the Kaiser-Ferdinand-Nordbahn, but in reality he had neither part nor concern in the actual construction. The heirs of James remain in control of the Chemin de Fer du Nord, but their Viennese cousins are in no sense rail magnates.

On the other hand, what is still left of the Rothschild power and prestige in present-day Austria consists in the main of the Oesterreichische Kredit-Anstalt, an institution founded by Salomon in the 'forties of last century. The success of the joint-stock banks abroad, and especially of the Crédit Mobilier in Paris, gave the Austrian authorities the idea of organizing the capital forces of their own dominions in like manner and thus weaken the stranglehold of the House of Rothschild upon the national finances and the economic life of the country. In this latter hope, as the event showed, they were to be disappointed, for a time at least; but the new type of bank did arise in Austria. Bruck, the finance minister, first entered into negotiations with the young Franco-Jewish wizards, the Péreire brothers, and he did his utmost to turn the concession their way. It was they who had begun the movement in France and had made themselves the most powerful rivals the Rothschilds had over there. Nevertheless he did not dare run the risk of antagonizing Salomon, and Salomon was pulling wires in high quarters to secure the charter for himself. It then occurred to Bruck to try a compromise. He called in the two principal bidders, and suggested that they compose their differences and found the institution jointly. Neither side welcomed the proposal; but Salomon, knowing perfectly well that his competitor could not accept unconditionally, made a show of agreeing. Péreire said that he would be willing to enter the combine, providing the Rothschilds would cease their hostilities against the Crédit Mobilier. This was dragging in foreign and irrelevant matters, as Salomon was quick to point out and as Bruck was obliged to concede. Péreire was thus outmanœuvred, and the charter was awarded to Rothschild.

All in all, then, Salomon was getting on well enough, in spite of his great age (he was over seventy), the changed times and even the loss of Gentz. And yet he was discontented. His brothers, or their heirs, were citizens of the places in which they lived, and great landed proprietors. He was neither. All his power and influence had not sufficed to remove the disabilities of the Jews in Austria. He himself was a foreigner in the country, and only his status as a citizen of Frankfort made it possible for him to enjoy such civil liberties as he had. Indigenous Jews were still restricted in their movements and occupations. Even he was obliged to reside in a hotel, and the only way he could live comfortably was by renting all the rooms. But he did not own even that improvised home; Jews were not permitted to buy property. If he or his family wanted to spend a week or a summer in the country, they must go to a public inn—he, the most powerful private man in the empire—while the most poverty-stricken and improvident of his debtors, by the mere accident of the "noble" and Christian birth, spread themselves out on their sumptuous, if mortgaged, estates. It irritated and embittered him. He hinted to Metternich, he exerted pressure on the imperial finances, he relapsed into ominous silences, he begged and protested openly. His efforts seemed to go for naught. He gave munificently to the poor and to public institutions, until his benevolences became the talk and admiration of the community, and his fellow-philanthropists were moved to appeal to the authorities, pointing out the absurdity and injustice of so generous a public benefactor being treated as a pariah. This, at last, had the desired effect, and the City of Vienna made Salomon in 1843 an honorary citizen. Some time later, Salomon having endowed a hospital for the insane in Brünn, the Emperor by a special dispensation permitted him to acquire the castle and park of Schillersdorf in Silesia.

II

But the great disappointment of his life was Anselm, his only son and the heir of his firm and fortune. The boy did not seem to be a Rothschild at all. He was extravagant, a high liver, fond of show, he got into scrapes, he was wild, he had not the smallest inclination to toil and save,—a typical scion of a great house. At least that was how he appeared by the parental criteria. Salomon did everything he could to lead him into the path of righteousness. He sent him to be educated at the University of Berlin. He cut down his allowance; whereupon the young man made debts. To check his flightiness he married him off at twenty-three to Nathan's oldest daughter, hoping that responsibility and the soberer ways of the London cousins would have a good influence upon him. Before that, when Anselm had had an escapade at college, his father had called him home, and after a review of his misdeeds and dark prognostications of what future delinquencies might have in store, he apprenticed him to his uncle James in Paris. That move proving ineffectual,—Paris being scarcely the place to tame young prodigals—Anselm was exiled to Copenhagen and Berlin and put under strangers. But he was incorrigible and Salomon was in despair about what to do next. The great foreign capitals seemed to be demoralizing the young scamp, and to bring him home was out of the question, the tension between father and son being what it was. It therefore occurred to him to get Anselm a berth in the ancestral House at Frankfort. Old Amschel was lonely, having lately lost his wife, and his simple, austere, and very pious example should, if anything could, bring his too spirited nephew to a conviction of sin. Anselm remained in Frankfort for seven years. He was still there on January 27, 1855, when Salomon, on a visit to his daughter Betty, died in Paris, and Anselm came into his inheritance.

But really Salomon might have spared himself many a gray hair and many a sleepless night; for, after all, his successor proved himself worthy of the traditions of the family. He was fifty-two, to be sure, at his accession, and doubtless the long wait for his patrimony and the varied training he had received from his uncles had served to sober him; but he seems to have had the makings of a Rothschild from the start. The very year after his father's death he paralleled Salomon's railroad coup by taking over from the state the "construction" of the Südbahn, and made a better thing of it than his father had made of the Nordbahn. So successful, indeed, was this venture that presently he became a specialist in this type of financing, and engaged in extensive railroad operations in Italy. His very prodigality was an asset. Known from boyhood as a blood and a spendthrift, he easily gained entry to social circles in which his predecessor had been barely tolerated. While Salomon had been obliged to manœuvre endlessly for a mere honorary citizenship, Anselm the gay and irresponsible lightly stepped into the Imperial House of Lords, an unprecedented distinction for a man whose coreligionists had not the right to marry or to change their address without the special consent of the police.

Yet it is not to be supposed that Anselm had it easy. For all that he was standing, as it were, on his parent's shoulders, getting on in the 1860's and '70's was very markedly a more arduous business than it had been in the '20's and up to the middle of the century. It was not so much that an inherited fortune and a university training tended to paralyze initiative—Anselm was not suffering from those advantages as much as his cousin Lionel—nor was he irked by Victorian scruples. It was that times were not the same. The sheer glamour of the Rothschilds had produced a crop of determined aspirants for a like destiny. Thus, for instance, there arose a veritable plague of joint-stock banks in imitation of Salomon's Kredit-Anstalt. In their wake followed an immense wild-cat speculation not unlike that of the early 'twenties. The new financial institutions were incredibly successful, and for a time it looked as if they would attain their avowed goal—to break the Rothschild supremacy. Anselm watched the movement with apprehension. It was small comfort that most of the multifarious industrial enterprises underwritten by his rivals were unsound. Every sane man on the bourse knew that, and his rivals were manifestly in the secret; for they were disposing of their holdings in the classic Rothschild style. At first Anselm played with the idea of gaining control of his competitors. He ordered his brokers to buy for him every loose share of stock they could get their hands on. But no sooner did he have the inside grip on the situation than he changed his mind. What did he want with a brace of new banks? It was so much simpler to destroy them. He struck swiftly and hard. At the height of the boom his agents all at once began unloading. Men on the bourse could hardly believe that it was Rothschild who was bearing the market. They decided they had better find out. When Anselm's representative appeared on the exchange a broker went up and asked him whether he would be interested in half a million florins' worth of bank securities. "Half a million!" exclaimed the Rothschild man loudly. "Why! all the banks put together are not worth half a million." The echoes of that statement reverberated on every bourse in Europe, and the terrible panic of 1873 was its consequence.

It was not the last time that the heirs of Salomon were to play the part of destiny. Henceforth, however, they are fighting a defensive battle. Anselm died the next year, and his youngest son Albert reigned in his stead. Nathan, his first-born, had long ago wandered from the ancestral path, devoting himself to sports, travel and authorship. No more was Ferdinand, his next of age, a true Rothschild. Having married Evelina, a daughter of Lionel, and lost her soon after, he settled in England, where he occupied himself with politics (when Lord Nathan went to the House of Lords, Ferdinand inherited his seat in the House of Commons), with the management of the Evelina Hospital which he had founded in his wife's memory, and with the writing of a book on "Personal Characteristics from French History." Albert was not the absolute monarch his predecessors had been. He went on losing ground in Austria, and he tried with a good deal of spirit to compensate himself by annexing the finances of Hungary. One final flicker of the old Rothschild fire he did manifest in 1881–82. When Bontoux, the moving genius of the Union Générale, shifted his line of attack from Paris to Vienna and organized a coalition there around the Austrian Laenderbank, Albert, reinforced by his father-in-law Alphonse, made a vigorous assault first on the Union itself and then on one of its allies, the Banque de Lyon et de la Loire, which was only too successful; for the crash brought on still another European panic, and Albert was obliged to come to the aid of his enemies lest he and the entire financial structure of the Continent be dragged down to ruin with them. For his unselfishness he was rewarded with the honor which his father and his grandfather had coveted in vain—he was invited to court functions.

Thereafter the Vienna House relapsed into the splendid innocuousness which had come over London, and after Albert's death in 1911 even the fortune of his descendants underwent a painful contraction. This and the suicide of one of Albert's sons and the diminished vitality of the present generation as a whole has caused eugenical people to speak of degeneration and to lay the cause of it to inbreeding. Be the biological case what it might, the fact is indisputable that of the three remaining branches of the family the Austrian is the feeblest. Its preponderance vanished decades ago, and—as is credibly reported—its losses during the late war have been so immense as to destroy its significance even in the capital market.

III

For only three of the establishments erected by the sons of Meyer are still standing. Naples and Frankfort barely survived their heads of the first generation.

The last to open, Naples was also the first to close. So long as Karl was alive and Italy remained an agglomeration of petty states and foreign dependencies, affairs went along satisfactorily enough. The glamour of London, Paris and Vienna never came to it. It shone chiefly in reflected glory. Yet Karl lived and died a happier man than any of his brothers. Gentler than they, mediocre, simple-minded, he did not fall a prey to that consuming ambition which gnawed at the vitals of Nathan and James. With his clever and beautiful wife by his side, he was furthermore spared the snubs which made all their success turn to gall. Adelaide was from the start a brilliant success in Naples society. For Italy knew nothing of anti-Semitism.

The progress of the Naples House was, by comparison with that of its fellows in the North, singularly undramatic. Karl ended as he began—a runner-up for his more brilliant and more ambitious brothers. The fierce upheaval which was so soon to rock the Peninsula from end to end and bring about the birth of a united Italy, was reserved for his successor. The dark year 1855 came and removed Karl along with two of his brothers from the scene. Of his sons the eldest and the third had for some time past been associated with their uncle Amschel in the old home office at Frankfort; the succession, therefore, fell to his second-born, Adolph. He was not destined to enjoy it for long. Five years after Karl's death Garibaldi and his Red Shirts entered Naples, the Bourbon dynasty was abolished, and the ancient and inglorious Kingdom of the Two Sicilies soon afterwards became part of a new nation. Young Adolph—gently nurtured, easy-going, timorous—lacked the energy, the self-assurance and the political detachment which had enabled his uncle James to work and feel at home with such a variety of personages as Villèle and Polignac, Louis Philippe and Louis Napoleon. The departure of his father's old friends from power made him feel lonely and uncomfortable. He decided he would go with them. Why should he stay on and expose himself to all the risks and worries attendant upon revolution? He was enormously rich, he bore a great and distinguished name, a welcome awaited him in any one of three or four stable countries, and anyhow he loved books and flowers and art a great deal more than finance. And so, in 1861, the Naples House of Rothschild, after a quiet existence lasting forty years, was liquidated and closed.

IV

Exactly forty years more elapsed before the parent-House at Frankfort, too, disappeared. It has been moribund, however, for a long time, and its final liquidation was scarcely more than an official act. Amschel, like Karl, was (in Gentz's phrase) one of the weaker Rothschilds. Had it not been for his brothers in London, Paris and Vienna, the firm which he conducted would surely not have achieved anything more than a local importance. Even as it was, its affairs were curiously limited. In his capacity as the head of his own concern, Amschel occupied himself for the most part with money-lending to petty German principalities and impoverished nobles. The great and spectacular operations with which the name of his family became synonymous were neither conceived nor executed in Frankfort. Even in Germany itself, ranking states like Prussia addressed themselves directly to London when they needed loans, and when Nathan died the leadership reverted not to the oldest but to the youngest of his brothers.

Yet so long as Amschel lived the rôle of the paternal house, while subordinate, was far from insignificant. A plain, unassuming, mediocre man, quite devoid of the extraordinary gifts of Nathan and James, Amschel none the less had qualities that fitted him to fill a useful place in the family organization. His very simplicity was an asset; he did not chafe at the contradiction of being nominally the head of the House and in practice the agent of his younger and more brilliant brothers. Geographically his position was strategic: Frankfort not only lay on the trade route between Paris and Vienna, it was the leading security market in the Northern sector of the Continent and thus the natural distributing point for Germany West of the Danube and the small countries contiguous to it. Every great operation originating in London, Paris, Vienna, reached the investors in those markets through Amschel's hands; and the Frankfort bourse, as the outlet of the Rothschild world consortium, attained an importance it had never had before.

Thus Frankfort, though the mother of all the other Houses, was greatly overshadowed by its sturdy offspring. It was the dependency, the branch; they the central offices, the main trunks. But, thanks to its location, it was a branch through which the whole system must communicate. Unlike Karl's far-away outpost, Amschel's was a point of convergence. In his own territory, at any rate, his lustre was unrivaled. He was the first-born son and the testamentary heir of old Meyer, the creditor of countless states and nobles, and the potentate of the homeland from which all the powerful Rothschild colonies had issued forth. To the business world in Germany and to the official world as well, he was still the head of the family and the representative of its might and glory. Save for a finance minister here and there in some major capital, few people were aware of the actual distribution of power within the family council; and Amschel enjoyed a prestige fantastically out of proportion to his personal importance. Thus, for instance, the North German Confederation—the parent of the modern German empire—kept its funds on deposit with him; and when it needed a loan to lay the foundations of that imperial navy which was one day destined to be one of the main causes of the Great War, the Federal Council, sitting in Frankfort, almost inevitably turned again to him.

It was this contact of Amschel with the Frankfort Diet which led to his acquaintance with Bismarck, then merely Prussia's delegate to the Confederation. Characteristically, their first meeting was a clash. Amschel proposed that the naval loan be guaranteed by the Federal's bank deposits in his keeping. Prussia, supported by several of the smaller states, protested strenuously. Speaking in the Diet, Bismarck declared it was an insult to ask for guarantees at all, that the Rothschild plan would in effect oblige the Confederation to pay interest on its own money, and that unless a more equitable offer were made Prussia would move for the withdrawal of the funds altogether. Upon this Amschel stepped down; and once their differences were composed, the future Chancellor showed that he could be generous as well as pugnacious. At his instance the king of Prussia conferred upon Amschel the title of Royal Court Banker. Personally, it would seem, the hard, unyielding Junker was much attracted to the aged and somewhat pathetic son of the Ghetto; or perhaps he was sorry for him.

"A man of small stature," he wrote later, "slight, silver-haired, the oldest of his generation; but a poor man in his palace. Childless, a widower, robbed by his subordinates, badly treated by his Frenchified and Anglicized nephews and nieces, who inherit his treasures and return him neither thanks nor affection."

Toward the family generally Bismarck was less sympathetic. "I have known many members of this House," he said. "The most striking thing about them is their chasing after gold. This is due to the fact that they all want to leave to each of their children as much as they have themselves inherited; which is, of course, absurd."

Amschel was the third Rothschild to die in the fateful year 1855; and just as Garibaldi and Cavour had through their work in Italy undermined the Naples branch, so Bismarck's labors for the unification of Germany eventually did for the House in Frankfort. Karl's two sons, Meyer Karl and Wilhelm, inherited their uncle's business and fortune; and though the elder of them was a very able man, he was too deeply interested in the political movement which all through the 'fifties and 'sixties so agitated the country, to devote himself wholly to his private affairs. Elected to the assembly of the North German Confederation, he left the conduct of the firm more and more to his morose and slightly eccentric brother. Then, as the last stage in unification was being accomplished through the war with France, Prussia appointed him a member of her House of Lords and he virtually transferred his residence to Berlin. With the proclamation of the new German empire Frankfort began gradually losing its commercial importance, and the capital of the united nation supplanted it as the center of banking and finance. In the heyday of the firm the situation would have been readily met by following the flag. But Meyer Karl was otherwise occupied, "Baron Willy" was moping over the cruel fate which had sent him six daughters and not a single son, and both were men past middle age.

So the antiquated House dragged out its last days amid the lengthening shadows of a city which, like itself, had outlived its glory. Meyer Karl died in 1887. For fourteen years more his brother kept up appearances, but there was no vitality left in the ancient shell. The Houses in Vienna, Paris, London, no longer sent daily couriers to Frankfort. It was not so much that the stream of affairs had cut a new channel; decline had set in all along the route. Upon "Baron Willy's" death in 1901 the family council resolved to lop off the decayed branch. Fifty years earlier such a step would have shaken the foundations of the city's commerce, and might even have wakened echoes on the bourses of Europe; now it was hardly remarked. The only person to whom the decision came as a sad blow was the Baroness Mathilde, Wilhelm's widow. She appealed to her brother Albert, the head of the Vienna office, pleading in the name of their great-grandfather Meyer and dwelling on the sentimental bonds with the past. But what could he or anyone else do? The Rothschilds of the fourth generation were preoccupied with their yachts, their racing stables, their social obligations, or else with art, philanthropy and politics. Few of them had either the inclination or the training for business, and those who had could hardly be blamed for preferring livelier capitals than Frankfort. Frankfort, where old Amschel had after the passing of his mother Guetele turned the House with the Green Sign into a center of Rothschild charities—Frankfort was a precious family shrine teeming with glorious memories, and the younger folk were willing to come there on occasional pilgrimages. They could not see themselves rooted there again. One might as well ask them to return to Palestine, even though many of them were Zionists. And no more was it possible to allow strangers to govern in the old place; the entire policy and tradition of the family made against that. There was no choice but to put a lock on the door.*

* Of late years a son-in-law of the Baroness Mathilde, Herr Maximilian Goldschmidt, better known as Max Goldschmidt-Rothschild, piously turned the clock back by reviving the Frankfort House as a branch of his Berlin banking fi[illegible]. Since his death both places have been under the direction of a Madame Frahnburger, his niece.

CHAPTER XIX

RETROSPECT

WE do not know—no one will probably ever know—all the factors that went into the making of the House of Rothschild. This much only may be said with certainty: its founders, or at least three of them, were extraordinary men who happened along at a period in the world's history which was peculiarly susceptible to their endeavors. They themselves had not the remotest inkling of the broader causes of their success, as Nathan's naïve gropings on the subject make sufficiently plain. Originally small merchants, then blockade runners and general war speculators, they had gained a fortune and much valuable experience during the years of their apprenticeship. Then, with the close of the Napoleonic era, came their great opportunity and their epic rise. For that struggle had been something more than a series of wars; it had been, in effect, a European Revolution. When it began Europe, and especially the Continent [illegible]st of the Rhine, was still living under a patriarchal [illegible]ne. By 1815, when it was over, [illegible]

[illegible]d definitely emerged. [illegible]
[illegible]childs thus came [illegible]
[illegible]r rôle had [illegible]

as the head of a family runs his household. If he was virtuous, provident and thrifty, he paid his way as he went along, spending no more than he took in, and laying by a little for a rainy day. If, however, he was extravagant or when, despite his best efforts, extraordinary expenses came up, he borrowed quietly—just as any reputable citizen would—from some private capitalist like the Elector of Hesse, and usually paid fancy rates of interest. The idea of extorting loans from their own people occurred only to the most despotic monarchs; and even they resorted to it only under the severest pressure. The consequence of all this was—notably in the German lands—an arrested development of the economic and financial mechanism of the state. The Continental bourses were, by comparison with the London Royal Exchange, quite rudimentary; capital was unconcentrated, mistrustful, and prone to emigrate; credit was unorganized, haphazard and expensive; and the banks were primitive and lacked effective connections abroad. When, therefore, the long and bitter struggle with France came at the turn of the century, the German states were caught almost helpless. Forced into a stupendous modern enterprise, in which their existence was at stake, they must fight, economically speaking, with rusty and antiquated weapons. Inevitably they were beaten; fearfully overburdened, their credit collapsed, and they went into bankruptcy; England at last came to the rescue, but they had not the machinery even to obtain the proffered subsidies safely, cheaply and expeditiously. The money, handled by their own inadequate banks, reached them in dribbles, at incredible cost and only with the greatest risks.

It was at this stage that the Rothschilds first lent an efficient hand. Fresh from their hard training in Wellington's campaigns on the Peninsula and in France, keen, energetic and supremely self-confident, they had besides, the unique advantage of their numbers and their geographical distribution. With Nathan in London and the rest of them mobilized for service wherever the contingencies demanded, they functioned like a kind of natural syndicate. Without ever having heard the word, they had by pure accident set up the first clearing house. Their long and varied experience in trade, in contraband, in bullion shipping, and their complex interests on both sides of the Channel, had led them to stumble on what may appear to us as the obvious enough idea of remitting funds from one country to another without the actual movement of coin. It was at the time a revolutionary innovation; and coupled with Nathan's influence in London, it enabled them to perform services for the Continental Allies which no one else could perform, and in the process to make contacts for times to come.

But it was in the period next ensuing that their spectacular spurt forward came. The fighting over, Europe must set her house in order. Politically, to be sure, what with Metternich and his cronies in the saddle, the new order was roundly snubbed. The Bourbons were restored, the Revolution was declared a mistake, and East of the Rhine monarchs whom Napoleon had sent packing returned home from exile to rule virtuously or extravagantly, as their temperaments dictated and as if nothing had happened. But the economic hard facts could not be cold-shouldered so cavalierly. Not only must the damage of the quarter-century junket be repaired; the future must be faced; and to do either or both of these things, money, unheard-of quantities of money, were needed. Economically it mattered little whether one faced backward and harped on legitimacy, or forward and acknowledged that the patriarchal régime had been hopelessly superseded by the nation. The days of subsidies were gone; the era of peace-time national armies had arrived. To pay for this expensive establishment necessitated a complete reorientation in ways and means. And all the while there was the heritage of the past to liquidate. The veterans must be paid off and seen to their homes. Hosts of widows and orphans must be provided for. Devastated regions, ruined industries, disrupted trade, must be rehabilitated. And before anything else could be done, it was imperative that the mass of unsecured paper currency be withdrawn from circulation and the vast accumulation of floating debts be funded. The whole complex of problems, that is to say, when closely examined, reduced itself to one basic problem: how to reorganize the national economy in such a way as to uplift the credit of the state and obtain the required wherewithal.

In finding a solution the Rothschilds were aided as all along, by circumstances. For it so happened that England, the world's leading capital market, had emerged from the war with her prestige enormously enhanced. Throughout the preceding quarter of a century, Consols, depressed and fluctuating, had been a favorite security of speculators both native and foreign. With the return of peace they had become stabilized and unprofitable; and the consequence was that the Continental investor turned his attention to fields nearer home, where he was presently joined by his British colleague. Nathan and his brothers were the first to perceive this drift, and they did everything they could to speed it up and to exploit it. Until their time Continental government bonds were virtually unknown on the London exchange. By persuading the borrowers to accept a low flotation figure and pay a temptingly high rate of interest and redeem coupons in sterling, they made Prussian, Austrian, Neapolitan and even Papal issues nearly as popular in England as the British "Stocks" themselves.

Undoubtedly the posture of events played it into their hands. But the same can be said of Napoleon and of every other significant figure in history. Genius, after all, is the capacity to make the most of opportunity. At least, that is true of genius in affairs. Other men of their time—Baring in England, Ouvrard in France, and David Parish in Austria—came before them and enjoyed opportunities that were closed to them. As individuals it may even be doubted whether the Rothschilds were a match for those three. It was as a group that they were unexcelled and unbeatable. Their pooled resources had, as early as the Congress of Aix in 1818, made them, according to Gentz, the wealthiest concern in the world. Working harmoniously together, letting no stranger gain a foothold of responsibility in their oganization, their respective abilities dovetailing like the organs of some super-body, they formed a unique corporation.

Their very limitations served to advance them. They were foreigners in all but one of the lands in which they resided, and in none did they ever acquire so much as a respectable command of the language, let alone a citizen's feeling for the traditions and aspirations of the country. But it was precisely that detachment, that aloofness from temporary and partisan concerns, that very colorlessness, which gave them the international character they needed, enabled them to work with successive governments and even (as in France) with constantly changing régimes, and to put their resources at the disposal of a Continent made up of mutually warring states. And wherever they were and whoever was in power, it was rarely they were at a loss as to who was the man or the group likely to be useful. Considering their lowly origin, their uncouthness, their ignorance, surely the most remarkable of their faculties was their uncanny knowledge of men. From Buderus to Metternich, from the Manchester weavers to Herries, from the police prefect at Dunkirk to Villèle and Louis Philippe, they almost always knew who was who and how to make him their own.

Coarse-grained, unscrupulous, determined to win at all costs, they resorted freely to corruption. Utterly innocent of the processes that work in history, even in so far as they concerned their own amazing success, they were keenly alive to the significance of individuals in the inner councils of government; and appreciating the value of direct and reliable information, they bought men as they bought stocks. But in justice to them it should be borne in mind that they did not invent bribery. They invented nothing and they created nothing, not even corruption. In this as in everything else they were content to work with the instruments which they found ready to their hand. After more than a century of dazzling eminence, the House of Rothschild has, excepting only the Northern Railway of France, left not a single industry, not a single significant or original landmark which identifies their name with the great period in which they flourished.

II

They bequeathed their fortunes and the luster of their names to their heirs. But as might have been expected they could not hand on to them their singular gifts, and still less the exceptional times and the curious combination of accidents by which they had become great. The Rothschild family has, therefore, for many years past, been going the way of all human institutions.

The causes of the decline are as varied and complex as were those of the rise. In Italy and in Germany they have been political; elsewhere they have been economic and social; but all along the line the essential factor has been a change in the mental bent, the outlook and the interests of the succeeding generations. With the disappearance of Naples and Frankfort as capitals the five original Houses were reduced to three; the improvement of the methods of state financing in Europe after the Revolution of 1848 and the introduction of joint-stock banking a little later seriously weakened the power of the rest; but in the long run it is the human element far more than external circumstance that is making for disintegration.

The incentives of the fathers do not spur the descendants. Inherited wealth, education, refinement, a secure social position, are softening influences. They breed scruples, morbid ideas of responsibility, squeamishness about methods, over-sensitiveness toward public opinion. Still more destructive of the will are roots in the soil; and the later Rothschilds let patriotic and party considerations interfere with business interests. Their international outlook becomes clouded, and their very relations to their cousins beyond the frontiers are, in times of stress, troubled with doubts and questionings. All the sturdy directnesses of the founders are turned into hampering "advantages" with the heirs. And that leading principle, the unity and exclusive control of the family, becomes a dynastic superstition infinitely more rigid than it is with royal houses; since monarchs, limited by constitutions, are at least obliged to admit new blood to the state and yield their powers and privileges to ministers and generals.

So the luster of the House of Rothschild is sadly dimmed, and but for the survival of its fortune the latter-day banking corporations would hardly think it worth consulting. But, speaking humanly, can there really be any rational talk of a decline? Suppose Nathan and his brothers had been soldiers or poets or statesmen. Would anyone consider that there had been degeneration because their descendants had taken to painting or exploration? The parallel is exact. There is not the slightest sign that the sturdy Rothschild stock is dying out, or that healthy-minded and even highly talented men are lacking in the family. Only the talents and the tastes are of a different kind from what they used to be. An astonishing quota of Rothschilds in this and the preceding generation are to be found in the ranks of science (insects, snakes), sport, philanthropy, art, book, snuff-box, even flea-collecting, and in other fields of human endeavor. Who is there so wise as to say that such interests do not require as high an order of physical stamina, intelligence and moral character as that necessary for floating international bond-issue?

The ADL

The Rothschilds have been in control of the world for a very long time, their tentacles reaching into many aspects of our daily lives, as is documented in the following timeline. However, before you jump to the timeline, please read this invaluable introduction which will tell you who the Rothschilds are as oppose to who they claim to be.

The Rothschilds claim that they are Jewish, when in fact they are Khazars. They are from a country called Khazaria, which occupied the land locked between the Black Sea and the Caspian Sea which is now predominantly occupied by Georgia. The reason the Rothschilds claim to be Jewish is that the Khazars under the instruction of the King, converted to the Jewish faith in 740 A.D., but of course that did not include converting their Asiatic Mongolian genes to the genes of the Jewish people.

You will find that approximately 90% of people in the world today who call themselves Jews are actually Khazars, or as they like to be known, Ashkenazi Jews. These people knowingly lie to the world with their claims that the land of Israel is theirs by birthright, when in actual fact their real homeland is over 800 miles away in Georgia.

So, next time you hear an Israeli Prime Minister bleating about the so-called persecution of the Jews, consider this, every Prime Minister of Israel has been an Ashkenazi Jew. Therefore when all these Prime Ministers have curried favour with the West for their re-establishment of a Jewish homeland, they have knowingly and deliberately lied to you, as they were never from that region, and they well know it, because it is they who call themselves Ashkenazi Jews.

The Book of Revelation, Chapter 2, Verse 9, states the following which would appear to be about these Ashkenazi Jews:

> "I know thy works, and tribulation and poverty, (but thou art rich) and I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan."

The most wealthy bloodline in the world bar none and the leader of the Ashkenazi Jews in the world today is the Rothschild family. As you will see in the timeline, the Rothschilds have obtained this position through lies, manipulation and murder. Their bloodline also extends into the Royal Families of Europe, and the following family names: Astor; Bundy; Collins; duPont; Freeman; Kennedy; Morgan; Oppenheimer; Rockefeller; Sassoon; Schiff; Taft; and Van Duyn.

However, these are not the only bloodlines to worry about. You are probably aware of the centuries old pratice undertaken by many Ashkenazi Jews whereby they would change their name, in order for them to appear part of the dominant race of the country in which they lived, so as they could obtain influential positions in that country, which they would then exploit to serve their real masters elsewhere. There is plenty of evidence to prove the Rothschilds continue that deceptive tradition.

Furthermore the Rothschilds are known to sire many children secretly that they can put into positions of power when required. This started with the very first man who took the name Rothschild, who had a secret sixth son. Finally, remember the world is a diverse place, I could if I wanted change my name to Rothschild, or any of the names listed above, and that would not make me part of this family anymore than converting to Judaism in 740 A.D. will make these Ashkenazis Jewish.

Please, therefore, do not automatically assume someone you see with the name Rothschild or any of the names listed above are part of the Rothschild criminal network. Furthermore and most importantly, the majority of Ashkenazi Jews are innocent and not part of this network. Check the facts out for yourself first, this article is designed to inform people who the enemy is, not single out people of a particular race or people with a particular surname, who may have nothing to do with this Rothschild criminal network.

1743: Mayer Amschel Bauer, an Ashkenazi Jew, is born in Frankfurt, Germany, the son of Moses Amschel Bauer, a money lender and the proprietor of a counting house.

Moses Amschel Bauer places a red sign above the entrance door to his counting house. This sign is a red hexagram (which geometrically and numerically translates into the number 666) which under Rothschild instruction will end up on the Israeli flag some two centuries later.

1753: Gutle Schnaper, an Ashkenazi Jew (future wife of Mayer Amschel Bauer), born to respected merchant, Wolf Salomon Schnaper.

1760: During this decade Mayer Amschel Bauer works for a bank owned by the Oppenheimers' in Hanover, Germany. He is highly successful and becomes a junior partner. Whilst working at the bank he becomes acquainted with General von Estorff.

Following his father's death, Bauer returns to Frankfurt to take over his father's business. Bauer recognises the significance of the red hexagram and changes his name from Bauer to Rothschild, after the red hexagram or sign signifying 666 hanging over the entrance door ("Rot," is German for, "Red," "Schild," is German for, "Sign").

Now Mayer Amschel Rothschild, he discovers that General von Estorff is now attached to the court of Prince William IX of Hesse-Hanau, one of the richest royal houses in Europe, which gained its' wealth by the hiring out of Hessian soldiers to foreign countries for vast profits (a practice that continues today in the form of exporting, "peacekeeping," troops throughout the world).

He therefore makes the General's re-acquaintance on the pretext of selling him valuable coins and trinkets at discounted prices. As he plans, Rothschild is subsequently introduced to Prince William himself who is more than pleased with discounted prices he charges for his rare coins and trinkets, and Rothschild offers him a bonus for any other business the Prince can direct his way.

Rothschild subsequently becomes close associates with Prince William, and ends up doing business with him and members of the court. He soon discovers that loaning money to governments and royalty is more profitable than loaning to individuals, as the loans are bigger and are secured by the nation's taxes.

1769: Mayer Amschel Rothschild is given permission by Prince William to hang a sign on the front of his business premises declaring that he is, "M. A. Rothschild, by appointment court factor to his serene highness, Prince William of Hanau."

1770: Mayer Amschel Rothschild draws up plans for the creation of the Illuminati and entrusts Ashkenazi Jew, Adam Weishaupt, a Crypto-Jew who was outwardly Roman Catholic, with its organization and development. The Illuminati is to be based upon the teachings of the Talmud, which is in turn, the teachings of Rabbinical Jews. It was to be called the Illuminati as this is a Luciferian term which means, keepers of the light.

Mayer Amschel Rothschild marries Gutle Schnaper.

1773: Amschel Mayer Rothschild born, the first of Mayer Amschel Rothschild's sons. He like all his brothers who follow him, will enter the family business at the age of 12.

1774: Salomon Mayer Rothschild born.

1776: Adam Weishaupt officially completes his organisation of the Illuminati on May 1 of this year. The purpose of the Illuminati is to divide the goyim (all non-Jews) through political, economic, social, and religious means. The opposing sides were to be armed and incidents were to be provided in order for them to: fight amongst themselves; destroy national governments; destroy religious institutions; and eventually destroy each other.

Weishaupt soon infiltrates the Continental Order of Freemasons with this Illuminati doctrine and establishes lodges of the Grand Orient to be their secret headquarters. This was all under the orders and finance of Mayer Amschel Rothschild and the concept has spread and is followed within Masonic Lodges worldwide to the present day.

Weishaupt also recruits 2,000 paid followers including the most intelligent men in the field of arts and letters, education, science, finance,and industry. They were instructed to follow the following methods in order to control people.

1) Use monetary and sex bribery to obtain control of men already in high places, in the various levels of all governments and other fields of endeavour. Once influential persons had fallen for the lies, deceits, and temptations of the Illuminati they were to be held in bondage by application of political and other forms of blackmail, threats of financial ruin, public exposure, and fiscal harm, even death to themselves and loved members of their families.

2) The faculties of colleges and universities were to cultivate students possessing exceptional mental ability belonging to well-bred families with international leanings, and recommend them for special training in internationalism, or rather the notion that only a one-world government can put an end to recurring wars and strife. Such training was to be provided by granting scholarships to those selected by the Illuminati.

3) All influential people trapped into coming under the control of the Illuminati, plus the students who had been specially educated and trained, were to be used as agents and placed behind the scenes of all governments as experts and specialists. This was so they would advise the top executives to adopt policies which would in the long-run serve the secret plans of the Illuminati one-world conspiracy and bring about the destruction of the governments and religions they were elected or appointed to serve.

4) To obtain absolute-control of the press, at that time the only mass-communications media which distributed information to the public, so that all news and information could be slanted in order to make the masses believe that a one-world government is the only solution to our many and varied problems.

1777: Nathan Mayer Rothschild born.

1784: Adam Weishaupt issues his order for the French Revolution to be started by by Maximilien Robespierre in book form. This book was written by one of Weishaupt's associates, Xavier Zwack, and sent by courier from Frankfurt to Paris. However en route there, the courier is struck by lightning, the book detailing this plan discovered by the police, and handed over to the Bavarian authorities.

As a consequence, the Bavarian government orders the police to raid Weishaupt's masonic lodges of the Grand Orient, and the homes of his most influential associates. Clearly, the Bavarian authorities were convinced that the book that was discovered was a very real threat by a private group of influential people, to use wars and revolutions to achieve their political ends.

1785: The Bavarian government outlaw the Illuminati and close all the Bavarian lodges of the Grand Orient.

Mayer Amschel Rothschild moves his family home to a five storey house in Frankfurt which he shares with the Schiff family.

1786: The Bavarian government publish the details of the Illuminati plot in a document entitled, "The Original Writings of The Order and Sect of The Illuminati." They then send this document to all the heads of church and state throughout Europe, but sadly their warning is ignored.

1788: Kalmann (Carl) Mayer Rothschild Born.

1789: Due to the European ignorance of the Bavarian government's warning, the Illuminati's plan for a French Revolution succeeded from this year to 1793. This revolution was a bankers' dream, it established a new constitution and passed laws that forbade the Roman Church from levying tithes (taxes) and also removed its exemption from taxation.

1790: Mayer Amschel Rothschild states,

> "Let me issue and control a nation's money and I care not who writes the laws."

1791: The Rothschilds get, "control of a nation's money," through Alexander Hamilton (their agent in George Washington's cabinet) when they set up a central bank in the USA called the First Bank of the United States. This is established with a 20 year charter.

1792: Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild born.

1796: Amschel Mayer Rothschild marries Eva Hanau.

1798: John Robison publishes a book entitled, "Proofs of a Conspiracy Against All the Religions and Governments of Europe Carried on in the Secret Meetings of Freemasons, Illuminati and Reading Societies." In this book, Professor Robison of the University of Edinburgh, one of the leading intellects of his time, who in 1783 was elected general secretary of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, gave details of the whole Rothschild Illuminati plot.

He advised how he had been a high degree mason in the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry, and had been invited by Adam Weishaupt to Europe, where he had been given a revised copy of Weishaupt's conspiracy. However, although he pretended to go along with it, Professor Robison did not agree with it and therefore published his aforementioned book. The book included details of the Bavarian government's investigation into the Illuminati and the French Revolution.

That same year on July 19th, David Pappen, President of Harvard University, lectured the graduating class on the influence illuminism was having on American politics and religion.

At the age of 21, Nathan Mayer Rothschild leaves Frankfurt for England, where with a large sum of money given to him by his father, he sets up a banking house in London.

1800: Salomon Mayer Rothschild marries Caroline Stern.

1806: Napolean states that it is his,

> "object to remove the house of Hess-Cassel from rulership and to strike it out of the list of powers."

On hearing this, Prince William IX of Hesse-Hanau, flees Germany, goes to Denmark and entrusts his fortune valued at $3,000,000 at that time to Mayer Amschel Rothschild for safekeeping.

Nathan Mayer Rothschild marries Hannah Barent Cohen the daughter of a wealthy London merchant.

1808: Nathan Mayer Rothschild has his first son born Lionel Nathan de Rothschild.

1810: Sir Francis Baring and Abraham Goldsmid die. This leaves Nathan Mayer Rothschild as the remaining major banker in England.

Salomon Mayer Rothschild goes to Vienna, Austria and sets up the bank, M. von Rothschild und Söhne.

1811: The charter for the Rothschilds Bank of the United States runs out and Congress votes against its renewal. Nathan Mayer Rothschild is not amused and he states,

> "Either the application for renewal of the charter is granted, or the United States will find itself involved in a most disastrous war."

However the United States stands firm and the Charter is not renewed, which causes Nathan Mayer Rothschild to issue another threat,

> "Teach those impudent Americans a lesson. Bring them back to colonial status."

1812: Backed by Rothschild money, and Nathan Mayer Rothschild's orders, the British declare war on the United States. The Rothschilds plan was to cause the United States to build up such a debt in fighting this war that they would have to surrender to the Rothschilds and allow the charter for the Rothschild owned First Bank of the United States to be renewed.

Mayer Amschel Rothschild dies. In his will he lays out specific laws that the House of Rothschild were to follow: all key positions in the family business were only to be held by family members; only male members of the family were allowed to participate in the family business, this included a reported sixth secret bastard son (It is important to note that Mayer Amschel Rothschild also has five daughters, so today the spread of the Rothschild Zionist dynasty without the Rothschild name is far and wide, and Jews believe the mixed offspring of a Jewish mother is solely Jewish); the family was to intermarry with it's first and second cousins to preserve the family fortune (of the 18 marriages by Mayer Amschel Rothschild's grandchildren, 16 were between first cousins - a practice known today as inbreeding); no public inventory of his estate was to be published; no legal action was to be taken with regard to the value of the inheritance; the eldest son of the eldest son was to become the head of the family (this condition could only be overturned when the majority of the family agreed otherwise).

This was straightaway the case and Nathan Mayer Rothschild was elected head of the family following his father, Mayer Amschel Rothschild's death.

Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild goes to Paris, France to set up the bank, de Rothschild Frères.

Nathaniel de Rothschild, the son in law of Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild, born.

1814: With regard to the $3,000,000 Prince William IX of Hesse-Hanau had entrusted to Mayer Amschel Rothschild for safekeeping, for an account of what happened next we turn to the Jewish Encyclopaedia, 1905 edition, Volume 10, page 494, which states,

> "According to legend this money was hidden away in wine casks, and, escaping the search of Napoleon's soldiers when they entered Frankfurt, was restored intact in the same casks in 1814, when the elector (Prince William IX of Hesse-Hanau) returned to the electorate (Germany). The facts are somewhat less romantic, and more businesslike."

This last line indicates the money was never returned by Rothschild to Prince William IX of Hesse-Hanau. The encyclopaedia goes on to state,

> "Nathan Mayer Rothschild invested this $3,000,000 in, gold from the East India Company knowing that it would be needed for Wellington's peninsula campaign."

On the stolen money Nathan made,

> "no less than four profits:
>
> i) On the sale of Wellington's paper which he bought at 50 cents on the dollar and collected at par;
> ii) on the sale of gold to Wellington;
> iii) on its repurchase; and
> iv) on forwarding it to Portugal."

1815: The five Rothschild brothers work to supply gold to both Wellington's army (through Nathan in England) and Napoleon's army (through Jacob in France), and begin their policy of funding both sides in wars. The Rothschilds love wars because they are massive generators of risk free debt.

This is because they are guaranteed by the government of a country, and therefore the efforts of the population of that country, and it doesn't matter if that country loses the war because the loans are given on the guarantee that the victor will honour the debts of the vanquished.

Whilst the Rothschilds are funding both sides in this war, they use the banks they have spread out across Europe to give them the opportunity to set up an unrivalled postal service network of secret routes and fast couriers. The post these couriers carried was to be opened up by these couriers and their details given to the Rothschilds so they always were one step ahead of current events.

Furthermore, these Rothschild couriers were the only merchants allowed to pass through the English and French blockades. It was these couriers who also kept Nathan Mayer Rothschild up to date with how the war was going so he could use that intelligence to buy and sell from his position on the stock exchange in accordance with that intelligence.

One of Rothschild's couriers was a man named Rothworth. When the outcome of the Battle of Waterloo was won by the British, Rothworth took off for the Channel and was able to deliver this news to Nathan Mayer Rothschild, a full 24 hours before Wellington's own courier.

At that time British bonds were called consuls and they were traded on the floor of the stock exchange. Nathan Mayer Rothschild instructed all his workers on the floor to start selling consuls. The made all the other traders believe that the British had lost the war so they started selling frantically.

Therefore the consuls plummeted in value which was when Nathan Mayer Rothschild discreetly instructed his workers to purchase all the consuls they could lay their hands on.

When news came through that the British had actually won the war, the consuls went up to a level even higher than before the war ended leaving Nathan Mayer Rothschild with a return of approximately 20 to 1 on his investment.

This gave the Rothschild family complete control of the British economy, now the financial centre of the world following Napolean's defeat, and forced England to set up a new Bank of England, which Nathan Mayer Rothschild controlled.

Interestingly 100 years later the New York Times would run a story stating that Nathan Mayer Rothschild's grandson had attempted to secure a court order to suppress publication of a book which had this insider trading story in it. The Rothschild family claimed the story was untrue and libellous, but the court denied the Rothschilds request and ordered the family to pay all court costs.

Back to 1815, this is the year Nathan Mayer Rothschild makes his famous statement,

> "I care not what puppet is placed upon the throne of England to rule the Empire on which the sun never sets. The man who controls Britain's money supply controls the British Empire, and I control the British money supply."

He would go onto brag that in the 17 years he had been in England he had increased the £20,000 stake given to him by his father, 2500 times to £50 million.

The Rothschilds also use their control of the Bank of England to replace the method of shipping gold from country to country and instead used their five banks spread across Europe to set up a system of paper debits and credits, the banking system of today.

By the end of this century, a period of time that was known as the,

"Age of the Rothschilds," it is estimated that the Rothschild family controlled half the wealth of the world.

However something that did not go well for the Rothschilds this year was the Congress of Vienna, which started in September, 1814 and concluded in June of this year. The reason for this Congress of Vienna, was for the Rothschilds to create a form of world government, to give them complete political control over much of the civilized world.

Many of the European governments were in debt to the Rothschilds, so they figured they could use that as a bargaining tool. However the Tsar Alexander I of Russia, who had not succumbed to a Rothschild central bank, would not go along with the plan, so the Rothschild world government plan failed.

Enraged by this, Nathan Mayer Rothschild swore that some day he or his descendants would destroy the Tsar Alexander I's entire family and descendants. Unfortunately he was true to his word and 102 years later Rothschild funded Bolsheviks would act upon that promise.

Interestingly, world government fanatic and Ashkenazi Jew, Henry Kissinger, did his doctoral dissertation on the Congress of Vienna.

1816: The American Congress passes a bill permitting yet another Rothschild dominated central bank, which gives the Rothschilds control of the American money supply again. This is called the Second Bank of the United States and is given a twenty year charter. The British war against the America therefore ends with the deaths of thousands of British and American soldiers, but the Rothschilds get their bank.

1818: Following the French securing massive loans in 1817 in order to help rebuild after their disastrous defeat at Waterloo, Rothschild agents bought vast amounts of French government bonds causing their value to increase.

On November 5th they dumped the lot on the open market causing their value to plummet and France to go into a financial panic. The Rothschilds then stepped in to take control of the French money supply. This was the same year the Rothschilds were able to loan £5,000,000 to the Prussian government.

1821: Kalmann (Carl) Mayer Rothschild was sent to Naples, Italy. He would end up doing a lot of business with the Vatican and Pope Gregory XVI subsequently conferred upon him the Order of St. George.

Also, whenever the Pope received Kalmann, he would give him his hand rather than the customary toe to kiss, which showed the extent of Kalmann's power over the Vatican.

1822: The emperor of Austria made the five Rothschild brothers Barons. Nathan Mayer Rothschild chose not to take up the title.

1823: The Rothschilds take over the financial operations of the Catholic Church, worldwide.

1827: Sir Walter Scott publishes his nine volume set, The life of Napolean and in volume two he states that the French Revolution was planned by the Illuminati (Adam Weishaupt) and was financed by the money changers of Europe (The Rothschilds).

1832: President Andrew Jackson (the 7th President of the United States from 1829 to 1837), runs the campaign for his second term in office under the slogan, "Jackson And No Bank!" This is in reference to his plan to take the control of the American money system to benefit the American people, not for the profiteering of the Rothschilds.

1833: President Andrew Jackson starts removing the government's deposits from the Rothschild controlled, Second Bank of the United States and instead deposits them into banks directed by democratic bankers.

This causes the Rothschilds to panic and so they do what they do best, contract the money supply causing a depression. President Jackson knows what they are up to and later states,

> "You are a den of thieves vipers, and I intend to rout you out, and by the Eternal God, I will rout you out."

1834: The Italian revolutionary leader, Guiseppe Mazzini, is selected by the Illuminati to direct their revolutionary program throughout the world and would serve in that capacity until he died in 1872.

1835: On January 30, an assassin tries to shoot President Jackson, but miraculously both of the assassin's pistols misfired. President Jackson would later claim that he knew the Rothschilds were responsible for that attempted assassination. He is not the only one, the assassin, Richard Lawrence, who was found not guilty by reason of insanity, later bragged that powerful people in Europe had hired him and promised to protect him if he were caught.

The Rothschilds acquire the rights in the Almadén quicksilver mines in Spain. This was at the time the biggest concession in the world and as quicksilver was a vital component in the refining of gold or silver this gave the Rothschilds a virtual world monopoly.

1836: Following his years of fighting against the Rothschilds and their central bank in America, President Andrew Jackson finally succeeds in throwing the Rothschilds central bank out of America, when the bank's charter is not renewed. It would not be until 1913 that the Rothschilds would be able to set up their third central bank in America, the Federal Reserve, and to ensure no mistakes are made, this time they will put one of their own bloodline, Jacob Schiff, in charge of the project.

Nathan Mayer Rothschild dies and the control of his bank, N. M. Rothschild & Sons is passed on to his younger brother, James Mayer Rothschild.

1837: The Rothschilds send one of their own, August Belmont, an Ashkenazi Jew, to America to salvage their banking interests defeated by President Andrew Jackson.

1840: The Rothschilds become the Bank of England's bullion brokers. They set up agencies in California and Australia.

1841: President John Tyler (the 10th President of the United States From 1841 to 1845) vetoed the act to renew the charter for the Bank of the United States. He goes on to receive hundreds of letters threatening him with assassination.

1844: Salomon Mayer Rothschild purchases the United Coal Mines of Vítkovice and Austro-Hungarian Blast Furnace Company that would go on to be one of the top ten global industrial concerns.

Benjamin Disraeli, an Ashkenazi Jew (who would go on to become British Prime Minister twice - the only admitted Ashkenazi Jew to do so) publishes Coningsby, in which he characterises Nathan Mayer Rothschild as,

> "the Lord and Master of the money markets of the world, and of course virtually Lord and Master of everything else. He literally held the revenues of Southern Italy in pawn, and Monarchs and Ministers of all countries courted his advice and were guided by his suggestions."

1845: The Great American Patriot, Andrew Jackson (7th President of the United States) dies.

Before his death he is asked what he regarded his as greatest achievement. He replies without hesitation,

"I Killed The Bank,"

This is in reference to the fact he banished the Rothschilds Second Bank of the United States in 1836.

Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild (who by now had married his niece, Betty, Salomon Mayer Rothschild's daughter), now known as Baron James de Rothschild, wins the contract to build the first major railway line across the country.

This was called the Chemin De Fer Du Nord and ran initially from Paris to Valenciennes and then joined with the Austrian rail network built by his brother (and wife's father - all sounds a bit sordid doesn't it) Salomon Mayer Rothschild.

1847: Lionel De Rothschild now married to the daughter of his uncle, Kalmann (Carl) Mayer Rothschild, is elected to the parliamentary seat for the City of London.

A requirement for entering parliament was to take an oath in the true faith of a Christian. Lionel De Rothschild refused to do this as he was Jewish and his seat in parliament remained empty for 11 years until new oaths were allowed. He must have been an invaluable representative for his constituency, bearing in mind he could never vote on any bill as he never entered parliament! I wonder how he managed to keep his parliamentary seat for 11 years?

1848: Karl Marx, an Ashkenazi Jew, publishes, "The Communist Manifesto." Interestingly at the same time as he is working on this, Karl Ritter of Frankfurt University was writing the antithesis which would form the basis for Freidrich Wilhelm Nietzsche's, "Nietzscheanism." This Nietzecheanism was later developed into Fascism and then into Nazism and was used to forment the first and second world wars.

Marx, Ritter, and Nietzsche were all funded and under the instruction of the Rothschilds. The idea was that those who direct the overall conspiracy could use the differences in those two so-called ideologies to enable them to divide larger and larger factions of the human race into opposing camps so that they could be armed and then brainwashed into fighting and destroying each other, and particularly, to destroy all political and religious institutions. The same plan put forward by Weishaupt in 1776.

Eva Hanau, Amschel Mayer Rothschild’s wife dies.

1849: Gutle Schnaper, Mayer Amschel Rothschild’s wife dies. Before her death she would nonchalantly state,

"If my sons did not want wars, there would be none."

1850: Construction begins this decade on the manor houses of Mentmore in England and Ferrières in France, more Rothschilds Manors will follow throughout the world, all of them filled with works of art.

Jacob (James) Rothschild in France is said to be worth 600 million francs, which at the time was 150 million francs more than all the other bankers in France put together.

1852: N.M. Rothschild & Sons begins refining gold and silver for the Royal Mint and the Bank of England and other international customers.

1853: Nathaniel de Rothschild, the son in law of Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild, purchases Château Brane Mouton, the Bordeaux vineyard of Mouton, and renames it Château Mouton Rothschild.

1854: Caroline Stern, Salomon Mayer Rothschild's wife, dies.

1855: Amschel Mayer Rothschild dies.

Salomon Mayer Rothschild dies.

Kalmann (Carl) Mayer Rothschild dies.

1858: Lionel De Rothschild finally takes his seat in parliament when the requirement to take an oath in the true faith of a Christian is broadened to include other oaths. He becomes the first Jewish member of the British parliament.

1861: President Abraham Lincoln (16th President of the United States from 1860 till his assassination in 1865) approaches the big banks in New York to try to obtain loans to support the ongoing American civil war. As these large banks were heavily under the influence of the Rothschilds, they offer him a deal they know he cannot accept, 24% to 36% interest on all monies loaned.

Lincoln is very angry about this high level of interest and so he prints his own debt free money and informs the public that this is now legal tender for both public and private debts.

1862: By April $449,338,902 worth of Lincoln's debt free money has been printed and distributed. He states of this,

> "We gave the people of this republic the greatest blessing they ever had, their own paper money to pay their own debts."

That same year The Times of London publishes a story containing the following statement,

> "If that mischievous financial policy, which had its origin in the North American Republic, should become indurated down to a fixture, then that government will furnish its own money without cost. It will pay off debts and be without a debt. It will have all the money necessary to carry on its commerce.
>
> It will become prosperous beyond precedent in the history of civilized governments of the world. The brains and the wealth of all countries will go to North America. That government must be destroyed or it will destroy every monarchy on the globe."

1863: President Abraham Lincoln discovers the Tsar of Russia, Alexander II (1855 – 1881), was having problems with the Rothschilds as well as he was refusing their continual attempts to set up a central bank in Russia. The Tsar then gives President Lincoln some unexpected help.

The Tsar issued orders that if either England or France actively intervened in the American Civil War, and help the South, Russia would consider such action a declaration of war, and take the side of President Lincoln. To show that he wasn't messing about, he sent part of his Pacific Fleet to port in San Francisco and another part to New York.

The Rothschild banking house in Naples, Italy, C. M. de Rothschild e figli, closes following the unification of Italy. The Rothschilds use one of their own in America, John D. Rockefeller, to form an oil business called Standard Oil which eventually takes over all of its competition.

1864: Rothschild, August Belmont, who by now is the Democratic Party's National Chairman, supports General George McClellan as the Democratic nominee to run against President Abraham Lincoln in this year's election. Much to the anger of Belmont, President Lincoln wins the election.

1865: In a statement to Congress, President Abraham Lincoln states,

> "I have two great enemies, the Southern Army in front of me, and the financial institutions in the rear. Of the two, the one in my rear is my greatest foe."

Later that year, on April 14, President Lincoln is assassinated, less than two months before the end of the American Civil War.

Following a brief training period in the Rothschilds London Bank, Jacob Schiff, a Rothschild, born in their house in Frankfurt, arrives in America at the age of 18, with instructions and the finance necessary to buy into a banking house there. The purpose of this was to carry out the following tasks.

1. Gain control of America's money system through the establishment of a central bank.
2. Find desirable men, who for a price, would be willing to serve as stooges for the Illuminati and promote them into high places in the federal government, the Congress, Supreme Court, and all the federal agencies.
3. Create minority group strife throughout the nations, particularly targeting the whites and blacks.
4. Create a movement to destroy religion in the United States, with Christianity as the main target.

Nathaniel de Rothschild becomes Member of Parliament for Aylesbury in Buckinghamshire.

1868: Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild dies, shortly after purchasing Château Lafite, one of the four great premier grand cru estates of France. He is the last of Mayer Amschel Rothschild's sons to die.

1870: Nathaniel de Rothschild dies.

1871: An American General named, Albert Pike, who had been enticed into the Illuminati by Guissepe Mazzini, completes his military blueprint for three world wars and various revolutions throughout the world, culminating into moving this great conspiracy into its final stage.

The first world war is to be fought for the purpose of destroying the Tsar in Russia,as promised by Nathan Mayer Rothschild in 1815. The Tsar is to be replaced with communism which is to be used to attack religions, predominantly Christianity. The differences between the British and German empires are to be used to forment this war.

The second world war is to be used to forment the controversy between facism and political zionism with the slaughter of Jews in Germany a lynchpin in bringing hatred against the German people. This is designed to destroy fascism (which the Rothschilds created) and increase the power of political zionism. This war is also designed to increase the power of communism to the level that it equalled that of united Christendom.

The third world war is to be played out by stirring up hatred of the Muslim world for the purposes of playing the Islamic world and the political zionists off against one another. Whilst this is going on, the remaining nations would be forced to fight themselves into a state of mental, physical, spiritual and economic exhaustion.

On August 15th of this year, Albert Pike writes a letter (now catalogued in the British Museum) to Guiseppe Mazzini in which he states the following,

> "We shall unleash the nihilists and the atheists and we shall provoke a great social cataclysm which in all its horror will show clearly to all nations the effect of absolute atheism; the origins of savagery and of most bloody turmoil.
>
> Then everywhere, the people will be forced to defend themselves against the world minority of the world revolutionaries and will exterminate those destroyers of civilization and the multitudes disillusioned with Christianity whose spirits will be from that moment without direction and leadership and anxious for an ideal, but without knowledge where to send its adoration, will receive the true light through the universal manifestation of the pure doctrine of Lucifer brought finally out into public view.
> A manifestation which will result from a general reactionary movement which will follow the destruction of Christianity and Atheism; both conquered and exterminated at the same time."

Pike, who having been elected as Sovereign Grand Commander of the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry's Southern Jurisdiction in 1859, was the most powerful Freemason in America. He would retain that post for 32 years until his death in 1891. He also published a book on the subject in 1872 entitled, "Morals and Dogma of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry," in which he candidly states the following,

> "LUCIFER, the Light-bearer! Strange and mysterious name to give to the Spirit of Darknesss! Lucifer, the Son of the Morning! Is it he who bears the Light, and with its splendors intolerable blinds feeble, sensual or selfish Souls? Doubt it not!"

1872: Prior to Guiseppe Mazzini's death this year, he makes another revolutionary leader named Adrian Lemmy his successor. Lemmy will be subsequently succeeded by Lenin and Trotsky, then by Stalin. The revolutionary activities of all these men are financed by the Rothschilds.

1873: The loss making Rio Tinto copper mines in Spain, are purchased by a group of foreign financiers including the Rothschilds. These mines represented Europe's largest source of copper.

1875: On January 1 of this year Jacob Schiff, now Solomon Loeb's son-in-law after marrying his daughter, Teresa, takes control of the banking house, Kuhn, Loeb & Co. He goes on to finance John D. Rockefeller's Standard Oil Company, Edward R. Harriman's Railroad Empire, and Andrew Carnegie's Steel Empire. This is all with Rothschild money.

He then identifies the other largest bankers in America at that time. They are, J.P. Morgan who controls Wall Street, and the Drexels and the Biddles of Philadelphia. All the other financiers, big and little, danced to the music of those three houses. Schiff then gets the European Rothschilds to set up European branches of these three large banks on the understanding that Schiff, and therefore Rothschild, is to be the boss of banking in New York and therefore America.

N M Rothschild & Sons undertake a share issue to raise capital for the first channel tunnel project to link France to England, with half of its capital coming from the Rothschild owned Compagnie du Chemin de Fer du Nord.

This year Lionel De Rothschild also loans Prime Minister Benjamin Disraeli the finance for the British government to purchase the shares in the Suez Canal, from Khedive Said of Egypt. This was done as the Rothschilds needed this access route to be held by a government they controlled, so they could use that government's military to protect their huge business interests in the Middle East.

1876: Otto von Bismarck states,

> "The division of the United States into two federations of equal force was decided long before the civil war by the high financial power of Europe. These bankers were afraid that the United States, if they remained in one block and as one nation, would attain economical and financial independence, which would upset their financial domination over the world.
>
> The voice of the Rothschilds predominated. They foresaw the tremendous booty if they could substitute two feeble democracies, indebted to the financiers, to the vigorous Republic, confident and self-providing.
>
> Therefore they started their emissaries in order to exploit the question of slavery and thus dig an abyss between the two parts of the Republic."

1879: Lionel de Rothschild dies.

1880: Rothschild agents begin formenting a series of pogroms predominantly in Russia, but also in Poland, Bulgaria and Romania. These pogroms resulted in the slaughter of thousands of innocent Jews, causing approximately 2 million to flee, mainly to New York, but also to Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston and Los Angeles.

The reason these pogroms were initiated, was to create a large Jewish base in America, who when they arrived, would be educated to register as Democrat voters. Some twenty years later, this would result in in a massive Democratic power base in the United States and be used to elect Rothschild front men such as Woodrow Wilson, to the Presidency, to carry out the bidding of the Rothschilds.

1881: President James A. Garfield (The 20th President of the United States who lasted only 100 Days) states two weeks before he is assassinated,

> "Whoever controls the volume of money in our country is absolute master of all industry and commerce…and when you realize that the entire system is very easily controlled, one way or another, by a few powerful men at the top, you will not have to be told how periods of inflation and depression originate."

Edmond James de Rothschild has a son Maurice de Rothschild.

1883: After 6,000 feet of tunnel in the channel tunnel project being excavated, the British government halt the project citing the fact that it would be a threat to Britain's security.

1885: Nathaniel Rothschild, son of Lionel De Rothschild, becomes the first Jewish peer and is takes the title of Lord Rothschild.

1886: The French Rothschild bank, de Rothschild Frères obtains substantial amounts of Russia's oil fields and forms the Caspian and Black Sea Petroleum Company, which quickly becomes the world's second largest oil producer.

1887: Opium trafficker in China, Edward Albert Sassoon, marries Aline Caroline de Rothschild, the grand-daughter of Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild. Aline Caroline's father, Gustave, together with his brother, Alphonse, took over the Rothschild's french arm following their father Jacob's death.

The Rothschilds finance the amalgamation of the Kimberley diamond mines in South Africa. They subsequently become the biggest shareholders of this company, De Beers, and mine precious stones in Africa and India.

1888: Noémie Halphen, future wife of Maurice de Rothschild born.

1891: The British Labour Leader makes the following statement on the subject of the Rothschilds,

> "This blood-sucking crew has been the cause of untold mischief and misery in Europe during the present century, and has piled up its prodigious wealth chiefly through fomenting wars between States which ought never to have quarrelled.
>
> Whenever there is trouble in Europe, wherever rumours of war circulate and men's minds are distraught with fear of change and calamity you may be sure that a hook-nosed Rothschild is at his games somewhere near the region of the disturbance."

Comments like this worry the Rothschilds and towards the end of the 1800's they purchase Reuters news agency so they can have some control of the media.

1895: Edmond James de Rothschild the youngest son of Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild visits Palestine and subsequently supplies the funds to found the first Jewish colonies there, this is to further their long term objective of creating a Rothschild owned country.

1897: The Rothschilds found the Zionist Congress to promote Zionism (a political movement with the sole aim of moving all Jews into a singularly Jewish nation state) and arrange its first meeting in Munich. However due to extreme opposition from local Jews, who are quite happy where they are, this meeting has to be moved to Basle, Switzerland and takes place on 29 August. The meeting is chaired by Ashkenazi Jew, Theodor Herzl, who would state in his diaries,

> "It is essential that the sufferings of Jews….become worse….this will assist in realization of our plans….I have an excellent idea….I shall induce anti-Semites to liquidate Jewish wealth….The anti-Semites will assist us thereby in that they will strengthen the persecution and oppression of Jews. The anti-Semites shall be our best friends."

Herzl is subsequently elected President of the Zionist Organisation which adopts the, "Rothschild Red Hexagram or Sign," as the Zionist flag which 51 years later will end up as the flag of Israel.

Edward Henry Harriman becomes a director of the Union Pacific Railroad and goes on to take control of the Southern Pacific Railroad. This is all financed by the Rothschilds.

1898: Ferdinand de Rothschild dies.

1901: The Jews from the colonies set up in Palestine by Edmond James de Rothschild, send a delegation to him which tell him,

> "If you wish to save the Yishuv (The Jewish settlement) first take your hands from it, and…for once permit the colonists to have the possibility of correcting for themselves what needs correcting."

Edmond James de Rothschild is very angry about this and states,

> "I created the Yishuv, I alone. Therefore no men, neither colonists nor organisations have the right to interfere in my plans."

The Rothschild banking house in Frankfurt, Germany, M. A. von Rothschild und Söhne, closes as there is no male Rothschild heir to take it on.

1902: Philippe de Rothschild born.

1905: A group of Rothschild backed Zionist Jews led by Georgi Apollonovich Gapon attempt to overthrow the Tsar in Russia in a Communist Coup. They fail and are forced to flee Russia only to be given refuge in Germany.

The Jewish Encyclopaedia (Vol. 2, p.497) states,

> "It is a somewhat curious sequel to the attempt to set up a Catholic competitor to the Rothschilds that at the present time the latter are the guardians of the papal treasure."

1906: The Rothschilds claim that due to growing instability in the region and increasing competition from Rockefeller (the Rockefeller family are Rothschild descendants through a female bloodline) owned Standard Oil, this is why they sell their Caspian and Black Sea Petroleum Company to Royal Dutch and Shell. This is another example of the Rothschilds trying to hide their true wealth.

1907: Rothschild, Jacob Schiff, the head of Kuhn, Loeb and Co., in a speech to the New York Chamber of Commerce, warns that,

> "Unless we have a Central Bank with adequate control of credit resources, this country is going to undergo the most severe and far reaching money panic in its history."

Suddenly America finds itself in the middle of another typical run of the mill Rothschild engineered financial crisis, which ruins as usual ruins the lives of millions of innocent people throughout America and makes billions for the Rothschilds.

1909: Jacob Schiff founds the National Advancement for the Association of the Coloured People (NAACP). This was done to incite black people into roiting, looting and other forms of disorder, in order to cause a rift between the black and white communities. Jewish historian, Howard Sachar, states the following in his book, "A History of the Jews in America,"

> "In 1914, Professor Emeritus Joel Spingarn of Columbia University became chairman of the NAACP and recruited for its board such Jewish leaders as Jacob Schiff, Jacob Billikopf, and Rabbi Stephen Wise."

Other Ashkenazi Jew co-founders included Julius Rosenthal, Lillian Wald and Rabbi Emil G. Hirsch. It was not until 1920 that the NAACP appointed its first black president, James Weldon Johnson.

Maurice de Rothschild marries Ashkenazi Jew, Noémie Halphen.

1911: Werner Sombart, in his book, "The Jews and Modern Capitalism," stated that from 1820 on, it was the,

> "Age of the Rothschild," and concluded that there was, "Only one power in Europe, and that is Rothschild."

1912: In the December issue of, "Truth," magazine, George R. Conroy states of banker Jacob Schiff,

> "Mr Schiff is head of the great private banking house of Kuhn, Loeb, and co, which represents the Rothschilds interests on this side of the Atlantic.
>
> He has been described as financial strategist and has been for years the financial minister of the great impersonal power known as Standard Oil.
> He was hand in glove with the Harrimans, the Goulds, and the Rockefellers in all their railroad enterprises and has become the dominant power in the railroad and financial power of America."

1913: On March 4, Woodrow Wilson is elected the 28th President of the United States. Shortly after he is inaugurated, he is visited in the White House by Ashkenazi Jew, Samuel Untermyer, of law firm, Guggenheim, Untermyer, and Marshall, who tries to blackmail him for the sum of $40,000 in relation to an affair Wilson had whilst he was a professor at Princeton University, with a fellow professor's wife.

President Wilson does not have the money, so Untermyer volunteers to pay the $40,000 out of his own pocket to the woman Wilson had had the affair with, on the condition that Wilson promise to appoint to the first vacancy on the United States Supreme Court a nominee to be recommended to President Wilson by Untermyer. Wilson agrees to this.

Jacob Schiff sets up the Anti Defamation League (ADL) in the United States. This organisation is formed to slander anyone who questions or challenges the Rothschild global conspiracy as, "anti-semitic."

Strangely enough, the same year that they do this they also set up their last and current central bank in America, the Federal Reserve. Congressman Charles Lindbergh stated following the passing of the Federal Reserve Act on December 23,

> "The Act establishes the most gigantic trust on earth. When the President signs this Bill, the invisible government of the monetary power will be legalized.....The greatest crime of the ages is perpetrated by this banking and currency bill."

It is important to note that the Federal Reserve is a private company, it is neither Federal nor does it have any Reserve. It is conservatively estimated that profits exceed $150 billion per year and the Federal Reserve has never once in its history published accounts.

1914: The start of World War I. In this war, the German Rothschilds loan money to the Germans, the British Rothschilds loan money to the British, and the French Rothschilds loan money to the French.

Futhermore, the Rothschilds have control of the three European news agencies, Wolff (est. 1849) in Germany, Reuters (est. 1851) in England, and Havas (est. 1835) in France.

The Rothschilds use Wolff to manipulate the German people into a fervour for war. From around this time, the Rothschilds are rarely reported in the media, because they own the media.

1916: On June 4, Ashkenazi Jew, Louis Dembitz Brandeis is appointed to the Supreme Court of the United States by President Wilson as per his agreed blackmail payment to Samuel Untermyer some three years earlier. Justice Brandeis is also the elected leader of the Executive Committee for Zionist Affairs, a position he has held since 1914.

The middle of World War II. Germany were winning the war as they were being financed by the Rothschilds to a greater extent than France, Italy and England, because Rothschilds, did not want to support the Tsar in Russia, and of course Russia was on the same side as France, Italy and England.

Then a significant event occurred. Germany, although they were winning the war and not one foreign soldier had set foot on their soil, offered armistice to Britain with no requirement of reparations. The Rothschilds were anxious to make sure this didn't happen as they were expecting to make far more money off this war, so they played another card they had up their sleeve.

Whilst the British were considering Germany's offer, Rothschild agent Louis Brandeis sends a Zionist delegation from America to Britain to promise to bring America into the war on the side of the British, provided the British agree to give the land of Palestine to the Rothschilds.

The Rothschilds wanted Palestine for the following reason. They had great business interests in the far east and desired their own state in that area along with their own military which they could use as an aggressor to any state that threatened those interests.

The British subsequently agree to the deal for Palestine and the Zionists in London contact their counterparts in America and inform them of this fact. Suddenly all the major newspapers in America that up to that point had been pro-German turned on Germany running propaganda pieces such as: German soldiers were killing Red Cross Nurses; German soldiers were cutting off babies hands, etc, in order to manipulate the American public against the Germans.

This same year, President Woodrow Wilson, ran a re-election campaign under the slogan, "Re-Elect The Man Who Will Keep Your Sons Out Of The War."

On December 12, Germany and her allies offer peace terms to end the war.

1917: As a result of Germany's offer of peace the Rothschild war machine goes into overdrive in America, spreading propaganda which leads to President Wilson under the instructions of American Zionist leader and Supreme Court Justice, Louis Dembitz Brandeis, reneging on his promise to the electorate and taking America into the first world war on April 6.

As per the Rothschild Zionist promise to the British, to take America into the war, they decide they want something in writing from the British to prove that they will uphold their side of the bargain. The British Foreign Secretary, Arthur James Balfour therefore drafts a letter which is commonly known as the, "Balfour Declaration," which is reprinted below.

> Foreign Office
>
> November 2nd, 1917
>
> Dear Lord Rothschild,
>
> I have much pleasure in conveying to you, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, the following declaration of sympathy with Jewish Zionist aspirations which has been submitted to, and approved by, the Cabinet.
>
> His Majesty's Government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavours to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.
>
> I should be grateful if you would bring this declaration to the knowledge of the Zionist Federation.
>
> Yours sincerely,
>
> Arthur James Balfour

The Rothschilds order the execution by the Bolsheviks they control, of Tsar Nicholas II and his entire family in Russia, even though the Tsar had already abdicated on March 2. This is both to get control of the country and an act of revenge for Tsar Alexander I blocking their world government plan in 1815 at the Congress Of Vienna, and Tsar Alexander II siding with President Abraham Lincoln in 1864.

It is extremely important for them to slaughter the entire family including women and children in order to make good on the promise to do so made by Nathan Mayer Rothschild in 1815. It is designed to show the world what happens if you ever attempt to cross the Rothschilds.

U.S. Congressman Oscar Callaway informs Congress that J. P. Morgan is a Rothschild front and has taken control of the American media industry. He states,

> "In March, 1915, the J.P. Morgan interests, the steel, shipbuilding, and powder interest, and their subsidiary organizations, got together 12 men high up in the newspaper world and employed them to select the most influential newspapers in the United States and sufficient number of them to control generally the policy of the daily press...
>
> ...They found it was only necessary to purchase the control of 25 of the greatest papers...An agreement was reached. The policy of the papers was bought, to be paid for by the month, an editor was furnished for each paper to properly supervise and edit information regarding the questions of preparedness, militarism, financial policies, and other things of national and international nature considered vital to the interests of the purchasers."

1919: In January, Ashkenazi Jews, Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg, are killed as they attempt to lead another Rothschild funded Communist coup, this time in Berlin, Germany.

The Versailles peace conference is held to decide reparations that the Germans need to pay to the victors following the end of the first world war. A delegation of 117 Zionists headed up by Ashkenazi Jew, Bernard Baruch, bring up the subject of the promise of Palestine for them. At this point the Germans realised why America had turned on them and under whose influence, the Rothschilds.

The Germans, naturally, felt they had been betrayed by the Zionists. This is because, at the time the Rothschilds made their deal with Britain for Palestine, in exchange for bringing America into the war, Germany was the most friendly country in the world towards the Jews, indeed the German Emancipation Edict of 1822 guaranteed Jews in Germany all civil rights enjoyed by Germans.

Also, Germany was the only country in Europe which did not place restrictions on Jews, even giving them refuge when they had to flee from Russia after their first attempted Communist coup failed there in 1905.

Nevertheless, the Rothschilds had held up their side of the bargain to spill the blood of millions of innocents and as a result, Palestine is confirmed as a Jewish homeland, and whilst its handover to the Rothschilds takes place it is to remain under the control of Britain as the Rothschilds control Britain. At that time less than one percent of the population of Palestine was Jewish. Interestingly, the host of the Versailles peace conference is its boss, Baron Edmond de Rothschild.

The Versailles peace conference is also used as an attempt by the Rothschilds to set up a world government under the pretext of ending all wars (which they create). This was called the, "League of Nations." Fortunately not enough countries accepted it and so it soon died.

On March 29th The Times of London reports on the Bolsheviks in Russia,

> "One of the curious features of the Bolshevist movement is the high percentage of non Russian elements among its leaders. Of the twenty or thirty commissaries, or leaders, who provide the central machinery of the Bolshevist movement, not less than 75% were Jews."

It is reported that the Rothschilds were angry with the Russians because they were not prepared to allow them to form a central bank within their nation. They therefore gathered groups of Jewish spies and sent them into Russia to drum up a revolution for the benefit of the common man, which was actually a takeover of Russia by a Rothschild controlled satanic elite.

These Jewish spies were, in age old deceptive Ashkenazi tradition, given Russian names, for example Trotsky was a member of the first group and his original name was Bronstein. These groups were sent to areas throughout Russia to incite riots and rebellion.

The Jewish Post International Edition, week ending January 24th 1991, confirms Vladimir Lenin was Jewish. Lenin is also on record as having stated,

These Jewish, Rothschild funded Bolsheviks would go on in the course of history to slaughter 60 million Christians and Non-Jews in Soviet controlled territory. Indeed the author Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn in his work, “Gulag Archipelago, Vol 2,” affirms that Zionist Jews created and administered the organized Soviet concentration camp system in which these tens of millions of Christians and Non-Jews died.

On page 79 of this book he even names the administrators of this the greatest killing machine in the history of the world. They are Aron Solts, Yakov Rappoport, Lazar Kogan, Matvei Berman, Genrikh Yagoda, and Naftaly Frenkel. All six are Zionist Jews. In 1970 Solzhenitsyn would be awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for literature.

N. M. Rothschild & Sons' are given a permanent role to fix the world's daily gold price. This takes place in the City of London offices, daily at 1100 hours, in the same room until 2004.

1920: Winston Churchill (whose mother, Jenny (Jacobson) Jerome, was Jewish – meaning he is Jewish under Ashkenazi law as he was born of a Jewish mother) writes in an article in the Illustrated Sunday Herald, dated February 8th,

> "From the days of Illuminati leader Weishaupt, to those of Karl Marx, to those of Trotsky, this worldwide conspiracy has been steadily growing.
> And now at last this band of extraordinary personalities from the underworld of the great cities of Europe and America, have gripped the Russian people by the hair of their heads and become the undisputed masters of that enormous empire."

1921: Under the orders of Jacob Schiff the Council on Foreign Relations (CFR) is founded by Ashkenazi Jews, Bernard Baruch and Colonel Edward Mandell House. Schiff gave his orders prior to his death in 1920, as he knew an organisation in America needed to be set up to select politicians to carry on the Rothschild conspiracy,and the formation of the CFR was actually agreed in a meeting on May 30, 1919 at the Hotel Majestic in Paris, France.

The CFR membership at the start was approximately 1000 people in the United States. This membership included the heads of virtually every industrial empire in America, all the American based international bankers, and the heads of all their tax free foundations. In essence all those people who would provide the capital required for anyone who wished to run for Congress, the Senate or the Presidency.

The first job of the CFR was to gain control of the press. This task was given to John D. Rockefeller who set up a number of national news magazines such as Life, and Time. He financed Samuel Newhouse to buy up and establish a chain of newspapers all across the country, and Eugene Meyer also who would go on to buy up many publications such as the Washington Post, Newsweek, ant The Weekly Magazine.

The CFR also needed to gate control of radio, television and the motion picture industry. This task was split amongst the international bankers from, Kuhn Loeb, Goldman Sachs, the Warburgs, and the Lehmanns.

1925: This year's Jewish Encyclopaedia, states of the existence of Ashkenazi Jews (who represent approximately 90% of so-called world Jewry), with the startling admission that the so called enemy of the Jews, Esau (also known as Edom, see Genesis 36:1), now actually represents the Jewish race, when on page 42 of Volume V it is stated,

> "Edom is in modern Jewry."

So what they're basically saying is that these Ashkenazi Jews, who represent 90% of the so-called Jewish population, are actually gentiles or goyim themselves.

1926: N. M. Rothschild & Sons refinance the Underground Electric Railways Company of London Ltd which has a controlling interest in the entire London Underground transport system.

Maurice de Rothschild has a son, Edmond de Rothschild.

1929: The Rothschilds crash the United States economy by contracting the money supply.

1930: The first Rothschild world bank, the, "Bank for International Settlements (BIS)," is established in Basle, Switzerland. The same place as where 33 years earlier the first ever World Zionist Congress was held.

1933: On January 30, Adolf Hitler becomes Chancellor of Germany. He drives Jews, many of which were Communist out of Governmental positions within Germany. As a result of this, in July, the Jews hold a World Conference in Amsterdam during which they demand that Hitler re-instate every Jew back to his former position.

Hitler refuses and as a result of this, Samuel Untermyer, the Ashkenazi Jew who blackmailed President Wilson,and is now the head of the American delegation and the president of the whole conference, returns to the United States, and makes a speech on radio which was transcribed in the From the New York Times, Monday, August 7, 1933. In the speech he made the following statements,

> "...the Jews are the aristocrats of the world...Our campaign is...the economic boycott against all German goods, shipping and services...What we are proposing...is to prosecute a purely defensive economic boycott that will undermine the Hitler regime and bring > the German people to their senses by destroying their export trade on which their very existence depends...

>
> ...Each of you, Jew and Gentile alike...must refuse to deal with any merchant or shopkeeper who sells any German-made goods or who patronizes German ships or shipping."

As two thirds of Germany's food supply had to be imported, and could only be imported with the proceeds of what they exported, if Germany could not export, two thirds of Germany's population would starve, as there would be not enough food for more than one third of the population.

As a result of this boycott, Jews throughout America, would protest outside and damage any stores in which they found any products with, "Made in Germany," printed on them, causing stores to have to dump these products or risk bankruptcy.

Once the effects of this boycott began to be felt in Germany, the Germans, who had demonstrated no violence towards the Jews up to this point, simply began boycotting Jewish stores in the same way the Jews had done to stores selling German products in America.

Rothschild financed IBM, supply machines to the Nazis which produce punch cards to help organize and manage the initial identification and social expulsion of Jews, the confiscation of their property and their extermination.

On November 16, President Roosevelt recognizes the Zionist regime of Stalin in Russia without consultation with Congress even as 8,000 Ukrainians march in protest in New York.

Also this year, President Roosevelt, born of a Jewish mother, therefore satisfying Ashkenazi rules of being Jewish, orders the all-seeing eye to be placed upon all new dollar bills along with the motto, "Novus Ordo Seclorum." This is latin for, "A New Order of the Ages."

1934: Swiss banking secrecy laws are reformed and it becomes an offence resulting in imprisonment for any bank employee to violate bank secrecy. This is all in preparation for the Rothschild engineered Second World War in which as usual they will fund both sides.

Edmond de Rothschild dies.

1936: With regard to the increase in anti-semitism in Germany, Samuel Landman (at the time, secretary to the World Zionist Organisation), in his 1936 book, Great Britain, The Jews, and

Palestine states the following of the United States entry into World War 1,

> "The fact that it was Jewish help that brought USA into the War on the side of the Allies has rankled ever since in German – especially Nazi – minds, and has contributed in no small measure to the prominence which anti-Semitism occupies in the Nazi programme."

1938: On 7th November, a Jew, Herschel Grynszpan, assassinated Ernst vom Rath, a minor official at the German Embassy in Paris. As a result of this German hostility towards Jews in Germany started to turn violent.

The Rothschilds Austrian banking house in Vienna, S. M. von Rothschild und Söhne, closes following the Nazi occupation of Austria.

1939: I.G. Farben the leading producer of chemicals in the world and largest German producer of steel dramatically increases its production. This increased production is almost exclusively used to arm Germany for the Second World War. This company was controlled by the Rothschilds and would go on to use Jews and other disaffected peoples as slave labour in the concentration camps. I.G. Farben also created the lethal Zyklon B gas that was used to exterminate the Jews.

On 1 September, the Second world war starts when Germany invades Poland. This was because the German leadership were a Christian leadership, who understood that Soviet Russia was led by Rothschild funded Communists, and they feared that as the Soviet Union grew in strength, these Jewish Communists would invade and wipe all the Christians off the map.

1940: Hansjurgen Koehler in his book, "Inside The Gestapo," states the following, of Maria Anna Schicklgruber, Adolf Hitler's grandmother,

> "A little servant girl…….came to Vienna and became a domestic servant…….at the Rothschild mansion…….and Hitler's unknown grandfather must be probably looked for in this magnificent house."

This is backed up by Walter Langer in his book, "The Mind Of Hitler," in which he states,

> "Adolf's father, Alois Hitler, was the illegitimate son of Maria Anna Schicklgruber…….Maria Anna Schicklgruber was living in Vienna at the time she > conceived. At that time she was employed as a servant in the home of Baron Rothschild. As soon as the family discovered her pregnancy she was sent back home…….where Alois was born."

On the surface, it would appear Hitler was unlikely to be a Rothschild, but then again, when you discover the benefits that the Rothschilds got out of this war, both financially and politically, a Rothschild connection does not appear as outlandish as it may initially seem.

1941: President Roosevelt takes America into the second world war by refusing to sell Japan any more steel scrap or oil. Japan was in the midst of a war against China and without that scrap steel and oil, Japan would be unable to continue that war. Japan was totally dependent upon the United States for both steel scrap and oil. Roosevelt knew this action would provoke the Japanese to attack America, which they subsequently did at Pearl Harbor.

1942: Prescott Bush, father of future American Presidents' George Herbert Walker and George W, has his company seized under the, "Trading With The Enemy," Act. He was funding Hitler from America, whilst American soldiers were being killed by German soldiers.

Jews are also being slaughtered by these same soldiers. Interestingly the ADL never criticizes any of the Bushes for this.

1943: February 18th, Zionist, Izaak Greenbaum, head of the Jewish Agency Rescue Committee, in a speech to the Zionist Executive Council states,

> "If I am asked, could you give from the UJA (United Jewish Appeal) monies to rescue Jews, I say, no and I say again no!"

He would go onto state,

> "One cow in Palestine is worth more than all the Jews in Poland!"

This is not a surprise, the whole idea of Zionist support for the slaughter of innocent Jews was to scare the survivors into believing that their only place of safety was Israel. How else do you think the Zionists could ensure Jews leave the beautiful European cities in which they live, in order to settle in a desert!

1944: On 6 November Lord Moyne, British Minister Resident in the Middle East was assassinated in Cairo by two members of the Jewish terrorist group, the Stern Gang, led by future Prime Minister of Israel, Yitzhak Shamir. He is also responsible for an assassination attempt against Harold MacMichael, the High Commissioner of the British Mandate of Palestine, this same year.

Interestingly he also masterminds another successful assassination this year against the United Nations representative in the Middle East, Count Folke Bernadotte who, although he had secured the release of 21,000 prisoners from German camps during World War II, was seen by Yitzak Shamir and his terrorist collaborators as an anti-Zionist.

In Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, two further Rothschild world banks are created. The International Monetary Fund (IMF), and the World Bank.

1945: The end of the Second World War. It is reported that I.G. Farben plants were specifically not targeted in the bombing raids on Germany. Interestingly at the end of the war, they were found to have only sustained 15% damage.

The tribunals held at the end of the Second World War, to investigate Nazi War Crimes, censored any materials recording Western assistance to Hitler.

The Rothschilds take a giant step towards their goal of world domination when the second, "League of Nations," called the, "United Nations," was approved this year.

1946: On July 22 the future Prime Minister of Israel, Ashkenazi Jew, David Ben-Gurion, orders another future Prime Minister of Israel, Ashkenazi Jew, Menachem Begin, to carry out a terrorist attack on the King David Hotel in Palestine, to try and drive out the British. As a result of this 91 people were killed, most of them civilians: 28 British, 41 Arabs, 17 Jews, and 5 others. Around 45 people are injured.

Menachem Begin went on to proudly proclaimed himself as, "the father of modern terrorism." Just to put the gravity of the attack on the King David Hotel into perspective, it was at the time the biggest death toll as a result of single terrorist action ever and was only surpassed over forty years later by the Bombing of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie.

1947: The British who prior to World War 2 declared that there would be no more immigration of Jews to Palestine in order to protect the Palestinians from their acts of terror against both them and British soldiers, transfer control of Palestine to the United Nations. The United Nations resolve to have Palestine partitioned into two states, one zionist and one arab, with Jerusalem to remain as an international zone to be enjoyed by all religious faiths.

This transfer was scheduled to take place on May 15, 1948. The United Nations had no right to give Arab property to anyone, as indeed even thought the Jews owned 6% of Palestine at that time, resolution 181 granted the Jews 57% of the land leaving the Arabs who at that time had 94% with only 43%.

Information collected by the ADL in its spy operations on US citizens is used by the House Select Committee on Unamerican Activities. Subcommittee Chair Clare Hoffman dismisses the ADL's reports on suspected communists as "hearsay."

1948: In the Spring of this year, the Rothschilds bribe President Harry S. Truman (33rd President of the United States 1945 – 1953) to recognise Israel (Rothschild owned Zionist not Jewish territory) as a sovereign state with $2,000,000 which they give to him on his campaign train.

They then declare Israel to be a sovereign Jewish state in Palestine and within half an hour President Truman declared the United States to be the first foreign nation to recognise it.

The Flag of Israel is unveiled. Despite tremendous opposition the emblem on the flag is a blue coloured version of the Rothschild, "Red Hexagram or Sign."

This angers many Jews who realise this Hexagram was used in the ancient mystery religions as the symbol of, "Moloch," (described as a demon of unwilling sacrifice and is also interestingly the name of the stone owl the elite worship at Bohemian Grove), and, "Astaroth," (described as the Lord Treasurer of Hell).

The Hexagram was also used to represent Saturn, which has been identified as the esoteric name for, "Satan." This indicates that anyone killed in the name of Israel is actually a sacrifice to Satan. These dissenting Jews believe the, "Menorah," the oldest Jewish symbol should be used and pointed out that the Hexagram is not even a Jewish symbol, but of course as the Rothschild Zionists use it that is what ends up on the Rothschild, I mean Zionist, I mean Israeli flag.

In the early hours of April 19, 132 Jewish terrorists from the Irgun gang, led by future Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin, and the Stern gang, led by future Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, brutally massacre 200 men, women and children as they are sleeping peacefully in the Arab village of Deir Yassin.

Following the United Nations transfer of Palestine to an independent Jewish state and an independent Arab state on May 15, the Israelis launched a military assault on the Arabs with blaring loudspeakers on their trucks informing the Arabs that if they did not flee immediately, they would be slaughtered.

800,000 Arabs with the recent memory of the Deir Yassin massacre at the forefront of their minds, fled in panic. They asked for help from nighbouring Arab states, but those states did not get involved as they were no match for the Israelis whose up to date military hardware had been supplied by the Jewish Stalinist regime in Russia. Following this assault, the Jews now controlled 78% of the former Palestine as oppose to the 57% that had been given to them illegally by the United Nations.

The Palestinians, many of them Christians, were never paid compensation for their homes, property and businesses stolen from them during this illegal Jewish assault, and these people ended up in slum refugee cities of tents. Futhermore at least half of the Palestinians in their hurry to flee, left their birth certificates behind. The State of Israel then passed a law that only those who could prove citizenship were allowed to return to Israel, thus meaning these 400,000 Palestinians could not return and lost all their property they had left there.

Ashkenazi Jew, David Ben-Gurion, one of the father founders of Israel and its first Prime Minister, candidly describes Zionist aims in his diary (21 May 1948) as follows,

> "The Achilles heel of the Arab coalition is the Lebanon. Muslim supremacy in this country is artificial and can easily be overthrown. A Christian State ought to be set up there, with its southern frontier on the river Litani.
>
> We would sign a treaty of alliance with this State. Thus when we have broken the strength of the Arab Legion and bombed Amman, we could wipe out Trans-Jordan, after that Syria would fall. And if Egypt still dared to make war on us, we would bomb Port Said, Alexandria and Cairo.
> We should thus end the war and would have but paid to Egypt, Assyria and Chaldea on behalf of our ancestors."

1949: On October 1, Mao Tse Tsung declares the founding of the People's Republic Of China in Tiananmen Square, Beijing. He is funded by Rothschild created Communism in Russia and also the following Rothschild agents: Solomon Adler, a former United States Treasury official who was a Soviet Spy; Israel Epstein, the son of a Jewish Bolshevik imprisoned by the Tsar in Russia for trying to forment a revolution there; and Frank Coe, a leading official of the Rothschild owned IMF.

1950: Israel passes their law of return, guaranteeing every Jew worldwide the right to dwell in the state of Israel, however the Palestinians even though they had lived there for 1300 years, were denied that right.

John Davitt, former chief of the Justice Department's internal security section notes that the Israeli intelligence service is the second most active in the United States after the Soviets and of course both Israel and the Soviet Union are run by an Ashkenazi Jewish leadership.

1951: On 1 April the Israeli Secret Intelligence Agency the Mossad, which will go on to terrorize the world, is formed. The motto of the Mossad is probably the most disgusting secret service motto in the world, it is,

"By Way Of Deception,
Thou Shalt Do War."

1953: N. M. Rothschild & Sons found the British Newfoundland Corporation Limited to develop 60,000 square miles of land in Newfoundland, Canada, which comprised a power station to harness the power of the Hamilton (later renamed Churchill) Falls. At the time this was the largest construction project ever to be undertaken by a private company.

1954: "The Lavon Affair." Israeli agents recruit Egyptian citizens of Jewish descent to bomb Western targets in Egypt, and plant evidence to frame Arabs, in an apparent attempt to upset American/Egyptian relations. Israeli defense minister, Ashkenazi Jew, Pinhas Lavon is eventually removed from office, though many think real responsibility lay with David Ben-Gurion.

A hidden microphone planted by the Israelis is discovered in the Office of the US Ambassador in Tel Aviv.

1955: Edmond de Rothschild founds Compagnie Financiere, Paris.

1956: Telephone taps are found connected to two telephones in the residence of the US military attaché in Tel Aviv.

1957: James de Rothschild dies and it is reported (by the Rothschild owned media) that he bequeaths a large sum of money to the state of Israel to pay for the construction of their parliament building, the Knesset. He states that the Knesset should be,

> "a symbol, in the eyes of all men, of the permanence of the State of Israel."

On page 219 of his book, "Tales of the British Aristocracy," L.G. Pine, the Editor of Burke's Peerage, states that the Jews,

> "have made themselves so closely connected with the British peerage that the two classes are unlikely to suffer loss which is not mutual. So closely linked are the Jews and the lords that a blow against the Jews in this country would not be possible without injuring the aristocracy also."

Maurice de Rothschild dies in Paris.

1962: de Rothschild Frères establishes Imétal as an umbrella company for all their mineral mining interests.

Frederic Morton publishes his book, The Rothschilds, in which he states,

> "Though they control scores of industrial, commercial, mining and tourist corporations, not one bears the name Rothschild. Being private partnerships, the family houses never need to, and never do, publish a single public balance sheet, or any other report of their financial condition."

This attitude reveals the true aim of the Rothschilds, to eliminate all competition and create their own worldwide monopoly.

1963: On June 4th President John F. Kennedy (the 35th President of the United States 1961 – 1963) signs Executive Order 11110 which returned to the U.S. government the power to issue currency, without going through the Rosthchilds owned Federal Reserve.

Less than 6 months later on November 22nd , president Kennedy is assassinated by the Rothschilds for the same reason as they assassinated President Abraham Lincoln in 1865, he wanted to print American money for the American people, as oppose to for the benefit of a money grabbing war mongering foreign elite.

This Executive Order 11110, is rescinded by President Lyndon Baines Johnson (the 36th President of the United States 1963 to 1969) on Air Force One from Dallas to Washington, the same day as President Kennedy was assassinated.

Another, and probably the primary, reason for Kennedy's assassination is however, the fact that he made it quite clear to Israeli Prime Minister, David Ben-Gurion, that under no circumstances would he agree to Israel becoming a nuclear state. The Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz on February 5, 1999, in a review of, Avner Cohen's book, "Israel and the Bomb," states the following,

> "The murder of American President John F. Kennedy brought to an abrupt end the massive pressure being applied by the U.S. administration on the government of Israel to discontinue the nuclear program...The book implied that, had Kennedy remained alive, it is doubtful whether Israel would today have a nuclear option."

Edmond de Rothschild establishes La Compagnie Financière Edmond de Rothschild (LCF), in Switzerland as a venture capital house. This later develops into an investment bank and asset management company with many affiliates. He also marries his wife Nadine and they have a son, Benjamin de Rothschild.

1965: Israel illegally obtains enriched uranium from NUMEC (Nuclear Materials and Equipment Corporation).

1967: The treatment of the Palestinians by the Zionist Jews, finally ignites enough anger in the Arab world for Egypt, Jordan and Syria to mobilise on Israel's borders. All of these three countries are suddenly attacked by Israel and as a result the Sinai which included Gaza was stolen from Egypt, and the West Bank and the Jordan River stolen from Jordan.

As a result of this, on June 8, the Israelis launch an attack on the USS Liberty with Israeli aircraft and motor torpedo boats, in an effort to blame it on Egypt, to bring America into the war on their side, and of course follow to the letter, their Mossad motto,

"By Way Of Deception,
Thou Shalt Do War."

As a result of their attack, 34 American servicemen were killed and 174 wounded. Israel lies as usual, claiming it mistook this warship that was flying a large United States flag, for an ancient out-of-service Egyptian horse carrier El Quseir, that was 180 feet shorter. They also claim the ship was in the war zone, when it was actually in international waters, far from any fighting. The Israeli's attack on this warship lasts for 75 minutes during which time they shoot up one of the United States flags, resulting in the sailors desperately raising another one.

In the aftermath of this attack, the American sailors who survived are warned by the United States military not to discuss the matter with anyone due to, "national security." This story gets no prominence in the Rothschild controlled mainstream media and as usual Israel is in no way even rebuked for their crimes by their subservient country of America.

The following day, June 9th, Israel illegally occupies the Golan Heights which it seizes from Syria. This area goes on to provide Israel with one third of its fresh water.

Israeli General Matityahu Peled, is quoted in Ha'aretz (19 March 1972) with the following statement,

> "The thesis that the danger of genocide was hanging over us in June 1967 and that Israel was fighting for its physical existence is only bluff, which was born and developed after the war." Another sickening and deceptive statement but again at least he's consistent with the Mossad motto, "By Way Of Deception, Thou Shalt Do War."

de Rothschild Frères is renamed Banque Rothschild.

1968: Noémie Halphen, wife of Maurice de Rothschild dies.

1970: While working for Senator Henry “Scoop” Jackson, Ashkenazi Jew, Richard Perle is caught by the FBI giving classified information to Israel. Nothing is done.

British Prime Minister Edward Heath makes Lord Victor Rothschild the head of his policy unit. Whilst he is in that role Britain enters the European Community.

1973: In his book, None Dare Call It Conspiracy, Gary Allen states,

> "One major reason for the historical blackout on the role of the international bankers in political history is the Rothschilds were Jewish…
>
> ….The Jewish members of the conspiracy have used an organisation called The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) as an instrument to try and convince everyone that any mention of the Rothschilds and their allies is an attack on all Jews.
>
> In this way they have stifled almost all honest scholarship on international bankers and made the subject taboo within universities.
>
> Any individual or book exploring this subject is immediately attacked by hundreds of ADL communities

> all over the country. The ADL has never let the truth or logic interfere with its highly professional smear jobs…
>
> ….Actually, nobody has a right to be more angry at the Rothschild clique than their fellow Jews…
>
> ….The Rothschild empire helped finance Adolf Hitler.""

George J. Laurer an employee of the Rothschilds controlled IBM, invents the UPC (Universal Product Code) barcode which will eventually be placed upon every item traded worldwide and bear the number, 666. The Book of Revelation, Chapter 13, Verse 17 through 18, states the following in relation to this number,

> "And that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name.
>
> Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man; and his number is Six hundred threescore and six."

The whole Satanic aims of the Rothschilds are now in full view of the world, everything bought or sold carries the mark of the beast, 666.

N. M. Rothschild & Sons British Newfoundland Corporation, Churchill Falls project in Newfoundland, Canada, is completed.

N. M. Rothschild & Sons also create a new asset management part of the company which traded worldwide. This eventually became, Rothschild Private Management Limited.

Edmond de Rothschild, a great-grandson of Jacob (James) Mayer Rothschild, bought the cru bourgeois estate of Château Clarke in Bordeaux.

1976: Ashkenazi Jew, Harold Rosenthal, aide to Ashkenazi Jew, Senator Jacob Javits, states,

> "Most Jews do not like to admit it, but our god is Lucifer."

1978: Ashkenazi Jew, Stephen Bryen, then a Senate Foreign Relations Committee staffer, is overheard in a Washington D.C. hotel offering confidential documents to top Israeli military officials.

Bryen obtains a lawyer, Nathan Lewin, and the case heads for the grand jury, but is mysteriously dropped. Bryen later goes to work for Richard Perle.

1979: The Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty in 1979 was underwritten by United States aid which pledged $3 billion annually to Israel from the United States taxpayer (not even a drop in the ocean when you consider the amount they make off the Federal Reserve).

Shin Bet (the Israeli internal security agency) tries to penetrate the US Consulate General in Jerusalem through a “Honey Trap”, using a clerical employee who was having an affair with a Jerusalem girl.

Baron and Baroness Phillipi de Rothschild in a joint venture with Robert Mondavi, begin the construction of a pyramid in Napa Valley, California, where the leader/founder of the Church Of Satan, Ashkenazi Jew, Anton LaVey, was based. This is known as Opus 1 (which means, the first work), and the front for this temple is that it is a winery.

1980: The global phenomenon of privatisation starts. The Rothschilds are behind this from the very beginning in order to seize control of all publicly owned assets worldwide.

1981: Banque Rothschild is nationalised by the French government. The new bank is called, Compagnie Européenne de Banque. The Rothschilds subsequently set up a successor to this French bank, Rothschild & Cie Banque (RCB), which goes on to become a leading French investment house.

1982: From September 16 to 18, future Prime Minister of Israel and then Defence Minister, Ashkenazi Jew, Ariel Sharon, orchestrates Israel's invasion of Lebanon, which provided ariel lighting in order to facilitate the killing of between 1000 and 2000 men, women and children in the Sabra and Shatila massacres.

1985: Eustace Mullins publishes, "Who Owns The TV Networks," in which he reveals the Rothschilds have control of all three major U.S. Networks, which are: NBC; CBS; and ABC.

The New York Times reports the FBI is aware of at least a dozen incidents in which American officials transferred classified information to the Israelis, quoting (former Assistant Director of the F.B.I.) Raymond Wannal. The Justice Department does not prosecute.

Richard Smyth, the owner of MILCO, is indicted on charges of smuggling nuclear timing devices to Israel.

N. M. Rothschild & Sons advise the British government on the privatisation of British Gas. They subsequently advise the British government on virtually all of their other privatisations of state owned assets including: British Steel; British Coal; all the British regional electricity boards; and all the British regional water boards.

A British MP heavily involved in these privatisations is future Chancellor of the Exchequer, Norman Lamont, a former Rothschild banker.

1986: Mordechai Vanunu a technician at Dimona, Israel's nuclear installation, from 1976 to 1985, discovers that the plant was secretly producing nuclear weapons.

His conscience made him speak out and in 1986 he provided the London Sunday Times with the facts and photos they used to tell the world about Israel's nuclear weapons programme.

His evidence showed that Israel had stockpiled up to 200 nuclear warheads, with no debate or authorisation from it own citizens. On 30th September 1986, Vanunu was lured from London to Rome. There he was kidnapped, drugged and shipped to Israel.

After a secret trial he was sentenced to 18 years for, "treason," and, "espionage," (something Israel are very familiar with) though he had received no payment and had communicated with no foreign power.

He goes on to be held in complete isolation for 11 years, only allowed occasional visits from his family, lawyer and a priest, conducted through a metal screen. Although he completes his sentence, the Israeli government continues to hold him against his will.

1987: Edmond de Rothschild creates the World Conservation Bank which is designed to transfer debts from third world countries to this bank and in return those countries would give land to this bank. This is designed so the Rothschilds can gain control of the third world which represents 30% of the land surface of the Earth.

On April 24 the Wall Street Journal reveals the, "Role of Israel in Iran-Contra Scandal Won't be Explored in Detail by Panels."

1988: The ADL initiate a nationwide competition for law students to draft anti-hate legislation for minority groups. That competition is won by a man named, Joseph Ribakoff, whose thesis proposes that not only must hate motivated violence be banned, but also any words which stimulate: supiscion; friction; hate; and possible violence, these must also be criminalised.

This ADL prize-winning paper suggests that not only should state-agencies monitor and restrict free speech in general, but they should also censor all films that criticize identifiable groups. Furthermore, even if the person making the statement can justify it, for example Christians criticizing homosexuality because the bible expressly forbids it, Ribakoff asserts that the truth is to be no defence in court.

The only proof a court will need in order to secure a conviction of hate speech is that something has been said, and a minority group or member of such group has felt emotionally damaged as a result of such criticism. Therefore, under these proposals which the ADL will have forced into law all over the world less than 15 years later, Jesus Christ would have been arrested as a hate criminal.

This law is designed to protect the Rothschild conspiracy from being revealed in that if you criticize the Rothschilds criminal cabal, you will be targeted as anti-semitic, and thus risk imprisonment.

Philippe de Rothschild dies.

1989: Many of the satellite states in Eastern Europe, through the influence of Glasnost, become more open in their demands of freedom from Communist governance in their Republics.

Many revolutions happen in 1989, most of them involving the overthrow of their respective Communist governments and the replacement of them with Republics.

Thus, the hold the Communists had over Eastern Europe (the Iron Curtain) becomes very weak. Eventually, as a result of Perestroika and Glasnost, Communism collapses, not only in the Soviet Union but also in Eastern Europe.

In Russia, Boris Yeltsin (whose wife is the daughter of Joseph Stalin's marriage to Rosa Kaganovich) and the Republican government takes steps to end the power of the Communist party by suspending and banning the party and seizing all their property.

This symbolised the fall of Communism in Russia, and resulted in the start of a mass exodus of 700,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union to Israel.

In the Israeli Journal, Hotam (24 November 1989), there is a report of a speech that then Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister, Ashkenazi Jew, Binyamin Netanyahu, gave to students at Bar Ilan University in which he states,

> "Israel should have exploited the repression of the demonstrations in China, when world attention focused on that country, to carry out mass expulsions among the Arabs of the territories."

The London and Paris Rothschilds announce the launch of a new subsidiary, Rothschild GmbH, in Frankfurt, Germany.

1991: Following the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait on August 2, 1990, on January 16 of this year the United States and Britain began an aerial bombing campaign of targets within Iraq. On 24 February the ground campaign commenced which was to last 100 hours until on February 28 when a horrendous war crime occurred.

This crime was the slaughter of 150,000 Iraqi troops with fuel air bombs. These Iraqis were fleeing on a crowded highway from Kuwait to Basra. President George Herbert Walker Bush ordered United States military aircraft and ground units to kill these surrendering troops, they were then bulldozed into mass unmarked graves in the desert, some still alive.

President Bush then ordered a cessation of hostilities. What was the significance of this slaughter and President Bush declaring the war over on this day? Well it was the day the, "Day of Purim," fell on this year. This the day the Jews celebrate their victory over Ancient Babylon, now based within the borders of Iraq and a day when the Jews are encouraged to get bloody revenge against their perceived enemies.

At the Bilderberg Conference on June 6 to 9 of this year, in Baden-Baden, Germany, David Rockefeller (a Rothschild) made the following statement,

> "We are grateful to the Washington Post, the New York Times, Time Magazine, and other great publications whose directors have attended our meetings and respected their promises of discretion for almost 40 years. It would have been impossible for us to develop our plan for the world, if we had been subjected to the lights of publicity during those years.
>
> But the world is now more sophisticated and prepared to march towards a world government. The super-national sovereignty of an intellectual elite and world bankers is surely preferable to the national auto-determination practised in past centuries."

1992: In March, former Federal Reserve Board Chairman, Paul A. Volker became Chairman of the European banking firm, J. Rothschild, Wolfensohn and Co.

Stephen Bryen, caught offering confidential documents to Israel in 1978, is serving on board of the pro-Israeli Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs while continuing as a paid consultant, with security clearance, on exports of sensitive US technology.

"The Samson Option," by Seymour M. Hersh reports,

> "Illicitly obtained intelligence was flying so voluminously from LAKAM (a secret Israeli intelligence unit, a Hebrew acronym for Scientific Liaison Bureau) into Israeli intelligence that a special code name, JUMBO, was added to the security markings already on the documents. There were strict orders, Ari Ben-Menashe recalled, "Anything marked JUMBO was not supposed to be discussed with your American counterparts."

The Wall Street Journal reports that Israeli agents apparently tried to steal Recon Optical Inc's top-secret airborne spy-camera system.

On September 16th Britain's pound collapses when currency speculators led by Rothschild agent, Ashkenazi Jew, George Soros, borrow pounds and sell them for Deutsche Marks, in the expectation of being able to repay the loan in devalued currency and to pocket the difference.

This results in the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, Norman Lamont, announcing a rise in interest rates of 5% in one day and as a result drives Britain into a recession which lasts many years as large numbers of businesses fail and the housing market crashes.

This is right on cue for the Rothschilds, after they had privatised Britain's state owned assets during the 1980's, driven the share price up, and then collapsed the markets so they could buy them up for pennies on the pound, a carbon copy of what Nathan Mayer Rothschild did to the British economy 180 years before, in 1812.

It cannot be overstated that the Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time, Norman Lamont, prior to becoming a MP, was a Merchant Banker with N. M. Rothschild and Sons, who he joined after reading Economics at Cambridge.

1993: Norman Lamont leaves the British government to return to N. M. Rothschild and Sons as a director, after his mission to collapse the British economy to profit the Rothschilds is accomplished.

Former Congressman, Paul Findley publishes his seminal book, Deliberate Deceptions: Facing the Facts About the U.S. Israeli Relationship.

In this book he lists the 65 United Nations Member Resolutions against Israel from the period 1955 to 1992, and the 30 United States vetoes on Israel's behalf which if not made would have seen Israel have 95 resolutions against them at this point.

No matter, even with Israel's puppet the United States helping them terrorise others, the 65 Resolutions passed against Israel are more than all the Resolutions passed against all other countries combined.

Not that Israel care too much about the views of the United Nations when you consider that less than two weeks after Israel's attack on the USS Liberty (an attack designed to sink the Liberty and blame it on Egypt prompting the USA into a war with Egypt on behalf of Israeli Lies, remember the Mossad motto, "By Way Of Deception, Thou Shalt Do War"), the Israeli Foreign Minister, Aba Eban, stated of the United Nations,

> "If the General Assembly were to vote by 121 votes to 1 in favor of, "Israel," returning to the armistice lines (pre June 1967 borders), "Israel," would refuse to comply with the decision," New York Times – 19 June 1967.

The ADL is caught operating a massive spying operation on critics of Israel, Arab-Americans, the San Francisco Labor Council, ILWU Local 10, Oakland Educational Association, NAACP, Irish Northern Aid, International Indian Treaty Council, the Asian Law Caucus and the San Francisco Police.

Data collected was sent to Israel and in some cases to South Africa. Pressure from Jewish organizations forces the city to drop the criminal case, but the ADL settles a civil lawsuit for an undisclosed sum of cash.

1995: Former atomic energy scientist, Dr Kitty Little claims the Rothschilds now control 80% of the world's uranium supplies giving them a monopoly over nuclear power.

The Defense Investigative Service circulates a memo warning US military contractors that,

> "Israel aggressively collects (US) military and industrial technology."

The report stated that Israel obtains information using,

> "ethnic targeting, financial aggrandizement, and identification and exploitation of individual frailties," of US citizens.

1996: A General Accounting Office report, "Defense Industrial Security: Weaknesses in US Security Arrangements With Foreign-Owned Defense Contractors," found that according to intelligence sources, "Country A," (identified by intelligence sources as Israel, Washington Times, 22 February 1996),

> "conducts the most aggressive espionage operation against the United States of any US ally."

The Jerusalem Post (30 August 1996) quoted the report,

> "“Classified military information and sensitive military technologies are high-priority targets for the intelligence agencies of this country."

The report described, "An espionage operation run by the intelligence organization responsible for collecting scientific and technologic information for (Israel) paid a US government employee to obtain US classified military intelligence documents."

The Washington Report on Middle East Affairs (Shawn L. Twing, April 1996) noted that this was,

> "a reference to the 1985 arrest of Jonathan Pollard, a civilian US naval intelligence analyst who provided Israel's LAKAM espionage agency an estimated 800,000 pages of classified US intelligence information."

The GAO report also noted that, "Several citizens of (Israel) were caught in the United States stealing sensitive technology used in manufacturing artillery gun tubes."

An Office of Naval Intelligence document, "Worldwide Challenges to Naval Strike Warfare" reported that,

> "US technology has been acquired (by China) through Israel in the form of the Lavi fighter and possibly SAM (surface-to-air) missile technology."

Jane's Defense Weekly (28 February 1996) noted that, "until now, the intelligence community has not openly confirmed the transfer of US technology (via Israel) to China." The report noted that this, "represents a dramatic step forward for Chinese military aviation." (Flight International, 13 March 1996).

Amschel Rothschild, 41, is strangled with the heavy cord of his own towel robe in his hotel room in Paris. French Prime Minister orders the French Police to close their investigation, and, Rupert Murdoch, born of a Jewish mother and so a Jew by Ashkenazi standards, instructs his editors and news managers around the world to report it as a heart attack, if they need to report it at all.

On 12 May United Nations Ambassador and Ashkenazi Jew, Madeleine Albright, when appearing on 60 Minutes, was asked the following by correspondent Lesley Stahl, in reference to the years of United States led economic sanctions against Iraq,

> "We have heard that half a million children have died. I mean, that is more children than died in Hiroshima. And, you know, is the price worth it?"

To which Ambassador Albright replied,

> "I think that is a very hard choice, but the price, we think, the price is worth it."

Her comments cause no public outcry. In fact, the holocaust of half a million Iraqi children is positively admired by the United States government when you consider less than 8 months later, President Clinton appointed Albright as secretary of state. Whilst appearing before the Senate Committee, who were considering her appointment, Albright is literally chomping at the bit for the blood of more Iraqi children and she states,

> "We will insist on maintaining tough UN sanctions against Iraq unless and until that regime complies with relevant Security Council resolutions."

1997: An Army mechanical engineer, Ashkenazi Jew, David A. Tenenbaum, "inadvertently," gives classified military information on missile systems and armored vehicles to Israeli officials (New York Times, 20 February 1997).

The Washington Post reports US intelligence has intercepted a conversation in which two Israeli officials had discussed the possibility of getting a confidential letter that then-Secretary of State Warren Christopher had written to Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

One of the Israelis, identified only as, “Dov,” had commented that they may get the letter from, “Mega,” the code name for Israel’s top agent inside the United States.

US ambassador to Israel, Martin Indyk, complains privately to the Israeli government about heavy-handed surveillance by Israeli intelligence agents.

Israeli agents place a tap on Ashkenazi Jew and daughter of a Rabbi, Monica Lewinsky’s, phone at the Watergate and record phone sex sessions between her and President Bill Clinton. The Ken Starr report confirms that Clinton warned Lewinsky their conversations were being taped and ended the affair. Interestingly, at the same time, the FBI’s hunt for, "Mega," is called off.

On 29 October Edmond de Rothschild dies in Geneva. Interestingly on the exact same day Anton Szandor LaVey, the founder of the Church of Satan also dies, who in his book, "Satan Speaks," he states in relation to The Protocols Of The Elders Of Zion,

> "The first time I read the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, my instinctive reaction was, So what's wrong with THAT? Isn't that the way any master plan should work? Doesn't the public deserve - nay, demand - such despotism?"

Kofi Annan becomes Secretary General to the United Nations. He is married to Nane Lagergren, a Rothschild, who he wed in 1984.

1998: The European Central Bank is set up in Frankfurt, the city from which the Rothschilds originate.

2000: George W. Bush is elected (so they tell me) President of the United States. Bush and his family claim to be descendants of the House of Plantagenet which is descended from the Royal House of Judah.

2001: On September 11th the attack on the World Trade Center is orchestrated by Israel with the complicity of Britain and America, under the orders of the Rothschilds as a pretext for removing the liberty of people worldwide in exchange for security, just as happened with the Reichstag fire in Germany where the citizens were lied to in order to give up liberty for security.

They also will use the attacks to gain control of the few nations in the world who don’t allow Rothschild central banks and so less than one month after these attacks, US forces attack Afghanistan, one of only 7 nations in the world who don’t have a Rothschild controlled central bank.

Less than a week before the 9-11 attack on 5 September, the so-called lead hijacker Mohamed Atta and several other hijackers made a still-unexplained visit onboard one of Pro Israeli lobbyist, Ashkenazi Jew, Jack Abramoff’s casino boats.

No investigation is undertook as to what they were doing there. It is discovered that US drug agents’ communications have been penetrated. Suspicion falls on two companies, AMDOCS and Comverse Infosys, both owned by Israelis. AMDOCS generates billing data for most US phone companies and is able to provide detailed logs of who is talking to whom.

Comverse Infosys builds the tapping equipment used by law enforcement to eavesdrop on all American telephone calls, but suspicion forms that Comverse Infosys, which gets half of its research and development budget from the Israeli government, has built a back door into the system that is being exploited by Israeli intelligence and that the information gleaned on US drug interdiction efforts is finding its way to drug smugglers.

The investigation by the FBI leads to the exposure of the largest foreign spy ring ever uncovered inside the United States, operated by Israel. Half of the suspected spies have been arrested when 9-11 happens.

On 9-11, 5 Israelis are arrested for dancing and cheering while the World Trade Towers collapse. Supposedly employed by Urban Moving Systems, the Israelis are caught with multiple passports and a lot of cash.

Two of them are later revealed to be Mossad. As witness reports track the activity of the Israelis, it emerges that they were seen at Liberty Park at the time of the first impact, suggesting a foreknowledge of what was to come. The Israelis are interrogated, and then eventually sent back to Israel.

The owner of the moving company used as a cover by the Mossad agents abandons his business and flees to Israel. The United States Government then classifies all of the evidence related to the Israeli agents and their connections to 9-11.

All of this is reported to the public via a four part story on Fox News by Carl Cameron. Pressure from Jewish groups, primarily AIPAC, forces Fox News to remove the story from their website. Two hours prior to the 9-11 attacks, Odigo, an Israeli company with offices just a few blocks from the World Trade Towers, receives an advance warning via the internet.

The manager of the New York Office provides the FBI with the IP address of the sender of the message, but the FBI does not follow this up. The FBI is investigating 5 Israeli moving companies as possible fronts for Israeli intelligence.

It is revealed that prior to the attack millions of dollars of put options on both American Airlines and United Airlines, were traded. The FBI have promised to followed the purchasers up, but have never revealed their findings. That is because this would lead directly to Israel, the state behind the 911 attacks.

Following the World Trade Center attack, anonymous letters containing anthrax are sent to various politicians and media executives. Like the 9-11 attack this is immediately blamed on Al-Qaeda , until it is discovered that the anthrax contained within those letters is a specific type of weaponized anthrax made by a United States military laboratory.

The FBI then discover that the main suspect for these anthrax letters is a Ashkenazi Jew, Dr. Philip Zack, who had been reprimanded several times by his employers due to offensive remarks he made about Arabs. Dr. Philip Zack, was caught on camera entering the storage area where he worked at Fort Detrick which is where the Anthrax was kept. At this point, both the FBI and the mainstream media stopped making any public comments on the case.

Jewish Defence League Chairman since 1985, Ashkenazi Jew, Irv Rubin is jailed for allegedly plotting to bomb a mosque and the offices of a Arab-American congressman. He dies shortly after slitting his throat in a suicide attempt, before he can be brought to trial.

One week prior to the WTC attack, the Zim Shipping Company moves out of its offices in the WTC, breaking its lease and costing the company $50,000. No reason has ever been given, but Zim Shipping Company is half owned by the State of Israel (The Rothschilds).

On October 3, Israeli Prime Minister, Ariel Sharon, makes the following statement to Ashkenazi Jew, Shimon Peres, as reported on Kol Yisrael radio.

> "Every time we do something you tell me America will do this and will do that....I want to tell you something very clear, don't worry about American pressure on Israel. We, the Jewish people, control America, and the Americans know it."

2002: Webster's Third New International Dictionary (Unabridged), re-printed in 2002, provides a new definition of Anti Semitism which has not been updated since 1956. It reads,

> "Anti-Semitism: (1) hostility toward Jews as a religious or racial minority group, often accompanied by social, political or economic discrimination (2) opposition to Zionism (3) sympathy for the opponents of Israel."

It was definition (2) and (3) that were added in the 2002 edition, just before the USA decide to invade Iraq under orders from the State of Rothschild, I mean Israel. Also this year, the Prime Minister of Israel, war criminal, Ariel Sharon, orders the massacre in the Jenin refugee camp in the West Bank. Best get that definition updated to protect these criminals.

The DEA issues a report that Israeli spies, posing as art students, have been trying to penetrate US Government offices. Police near the Whidbey Island Naval Air Station in southern Washington State stop a suspicious truck and detain two Israelis, one of whom is illegally in the United States. The two men were driving at high speed in a Ryder rental truck, which they claimed had been used to, "deliver furniture."

The next day, police discovered traces of TNT and RDX military-grade plastic explosives inside the passenger cabin and on the steering wheel of the vehicle. The FBI then announces that the tests that showed explosives were, "false positived," by cigarette smoke, a claim test experts say is ridiculous.

Based on an alibi provided by a woman, the case is closed and the Israelis are handed over to INS to be sent back to Israel. One week later, the woman who provided the alibi vanishes.

2003: The United States invade Iraq on 19 March, which this year is the holy, "Day of Purim," in the Jewish calendar. This, "Day of Purim," is a day the Jews celebrate their victory over Ancient Babylon, now based within the borders of Iraq, how interesting.

What is also significant is that the previous U.S. led invasion of Iraq ended on the Day of Purim ten years earlier with the slaughter of 150,000 fleeing Iraqis under the current President's father, George Herbert Walker Bush. Purim is also the time when the Jews are encouraged to get bloody revenge against their perceived enemies.

Ancient Babylon, I mean Iraq, is now one of six nations left in the world who don't have a Rothschild controlled central bank. This war is mainly about stealing Iraq's water supply for Israel and is being fought with the blood of the American military which the State of Rothschild, I mean Israel control.

Israel has always struggled for water, it had to steal the Golan Heights from Syria which provided Israel with one third of its fresh water 36 years before, yet still in Israel water extraction has surpassed replacement by 2.5 billion metres in the last 25 years.

This means the water is far more precious to them than the oil reserves which are the second largest reserves of oil on the planet.

Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir Mohamed states in a speech,

> "Jews rule the world by proxy. They get others to fight and die for them."

The Police Chief of Cloudcroft stops a truck speeding through a school zone. The drivers turn out to be Israelis with expired passports. Claiming to be movers, the truck contains junk furniture and several boxes.

The Israelis are handed over to immigration. The contents of the boxers are not revealed to the public.

Israel deploys assassination squads into other countries, including the United States. The US Government does not protest.

2004: Two years into an investigation of AIPAC's (The American Israel Public Affairs Committee – the largest political lobbying group in the USA with over 65,000 members whose only purpose is to use the USA for the purposes of Israel) possible role as a spy front for Israel, Ashkenazi Jew, Larry Franklin, a mid-level Pentagon Analyst is observed by the FBI giving classified information to two officials of AIPAC suspected of being Israeli spies.

AIPAC hires lawyer Nathan Lewin to handle their legal defense, the same lawyer who defended suspected Israeli spy Stephen Bryen in 1978. Larry Franklin worked in the Pentagon Office of Special Plans, run by Richard Perle, at the time Perle (who was caught giving classified information to Israel back in 1970) was insisting that Iraq was crawling with weapons of mass destruction requiring the United States to invade and conquer Iraq.

There were no WMDs, of course, and Perle has dumped the blame for the, "bad intelligence," on George Tenet. But what is known is that the Pentagon Office of Special Plans was coordinating with a similar group in Israel, in Ariel Sharon's office.

With two suspected Israeli spies (at least) inside the office from which the lies that launched the war in Iraq originated, it appears that the people of the United States are the victims of a deadly hoax, a hoax that started a war using the blood and money of American citizens for the purposes of Israeli oppression.

The leaking of the investigation of AIPAC to the media on August 28th, 2004 gave advance warning to other spies working with Franklin. The damage to the FBI's investigation was completed when United States Attorney General John Ashcroft ordered the FBI to stop all arrests in the case.

Like the Stephen Bryen case and the hunt for, "Mega," this latest spy scandal seems destined by officials who have their own secret allegiances to protect, barring a massive public outcry.

Police near the Nuclear Fuel Services plant in Tennessee stop a truck after a three mile chase, during which the driver throws a bottle containing a strange liquid from the cab. The drivers turn out to be Israelis using fake identifications. The FBI refuses to investigate and the Israelis are released.

Two Israelis try to enter Kings Bay Naval Submarine Base, home to eight Trident submarines. The truck tests positive for explosives.

The National Director of the ADL, Abraham H. Foxman, publishes a book entitled, "Never Again? The Threat Of The New Anti-Semitism," in which he states that the New Testament's "lie," that the ancient Pharisees were responsible for the death of Christ, has been responsible for anti-semitism throughout the millennia and thus the New Testament of the bible is, "hate speech," and should be censored or banned.

2005: On January 20, President Bush makes the following statement as part of his second inaugural address, "When our Founders declared a new order of the ages." This is not true. The founders did not declare a, "new order of the ages," President Roosevelt did when in 1933, he put it's latin translation, "Novus Ordo Seclorum," on the dollar bill.

On 7 July the London Underground Network is bombed. Israel's Finance Minister, Binyamin Netanyahu is in London on the morning of the attacks in order to attend an economic conference in a hotel over the underground station where one of the blasts occurred, but stayed in his hotel room instead after he had been informed by Israeli intelligence officials attacks were expected.

There are now only 5 nations on the world left without a Rothschild controlled central bank: Iran; North Korea; Sudan; Cuba; and Libya.

Physics Professor, Stephen E. Jones of Brigham Young University publishes a paper in which he proves the World Trade Center buildings could have only been brought down in the manner they were by explosives. He receives no coverage in the mainstream media for his scientific and provable claims.

2006: The Edmond De Rothschild Banque, a subsidiary of Europe's Edmond De Rothschild family bank group in France, becomes the first foreign family bank that has obtained approval of the China Banking Regulatory Commission and entered China's financial market.

The ADL ruthlessly leans on governments throughout the world to pass hate crimes legislation, as they are scared that the criminal cabal that is Israel and the Rothschilds is being exposed more and more on a daily basis, predominantly on the internet. Their job is to protect this criminal network and what better way to do it than by passing laws in which anyone who exposes a Jewish criminal becomes a criminal.

David Irving is sentenced to three years in jail in Austria, for denying the holocaust. It is important to note that the only historical event you can be arrested for questioning is the holocaust. This is because this has been the Rothschilds greatest weapon in brainwashing YOU, THE STUPID GOY! is that the Jews are so poor and persecuted when in actual fact they control the vast majority of international finance and international corporations throughout the world.

The Rothschilds

THE ROTHSCHILD DYNASTY

(Condesced from "Descent Into Slavery" by Des Griffin, Chapter Five)

For many years the words international banker, Rothschild, Money and Gold have held a mystical type of fascination for many people around the world but particularly in the United States.

Over the years in the United States, the international bankers have come in for a great deal of criticism by a wide variety of individuals who have held high offices of public trust - men whose opinions are worthy of note and whose responsibilities placed them in positions where they knew what was going on behind the scenes in politics and high finance.

President Andrew Jackson, the only one of our presidents whose administration totally abolished the National Debt, condemned the international bankers as a "den of vipers" which he was determined to "rout out" of the fabric of American life. Jackson claimed that if only the American people understood how these vipers operated on the American scene "there would be a revolution before morning."

Congressman Louis T. McFadden who, for more than ten years, served as chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, stated that the international bankers are a "dark crew of financial pirates who would cut a man's throat to get a dollar out of his pocket... They prey upon the people of these United States."

John F. Hylan, then mayor of New York, said in 1911 that "the real menace of our republic is the invisible government which, like a giant octopus, sprawls its slimy length over our city, state and nation. At the head is a small group of banking houses, generally referred to as 'international bankers.'"

Were these leading public figures correct in their assessment of the situation, or were they the victims of some exotic form of paranoia?

Let's examine history analytically and unemotionally and uncover the facts. The truth, as it unfolds, will prove to be eye-opening and educational to those who are seeking to more clearly understand the mind-boggling events that have been (and are) taking place on the national and international scenes.

HUMBLE BEGINNINGS

Europe, towards the end of the eighteenth century or at the time of the American Revolution, was very different from what we know in the same area today. It was composed of a combination of large and small kingdoms, duchies and states which were constantly engaged in squabbles among themselves. Most people were reduced to the level of serfs - with no political rights. The meager 'privileges' that were granted to them by their 'owners' could be withdrawn at a moment's notice.

It was during this period of time that a young man appeared on the European scene who was to have a tremendous impact on the future course of world history; his name was Mayer Amschel Bauer. In later years his name, which he had changed, became synonamous with wealth, power and influence. He was the first of the Rothschilds - the first truly international banker!

Mayer Amschel Bauer was born in Frankfurt-On-The-Main in Germany in 1743. He was the son of Moses Amschel Bauer, an itinerant money lender and goldsmith who, tiring of his wanderings in Eastern Europe, decided to settle down in the city where his first son was born. He opened a shop, or counting house, on Judenstrasse (or Jew Street). Over the door leading into the shop he placed a large Red Shield.

At a very early age Mayer Amschel Bauer showed that he possessed immense intellectual ability, and his father spent much of his time teaching him everything he could about the money lending business, and the lessons he had learned from many sources. The older Bauer originally hoped to have his son trained as a Rabbi but the father's untimely death put an end to such plans.

A few years after his father's death Mayer Amschel Bauer went to work as a clerk in a bank owned by the Oppenheimers in Hannover. His superior ability was quickly recognized and his advancement within the firm was swift. He was awarded a junior partnership.

Shortly thereafter he returned to Frankurt where he was able to purchase the business his father had established in 1750. The big Red Shield was still displayed over the door. Recognizing the true significance of the Red Shield (his father had adopted it as his emblem from the Red Flag which was the emblem of the revolutionary minded Jews in Eastern Europe), Mayer Amschel Bauer changed his name to Rothschild; in this way the House of Rothschild came into being.

The base for a vast accmulation of wealth was laid during the 1760s when Amschel Rothschild renewed his acquaintance with General von Estorff for whom he ran errands while employed at the Oppenheimer Bank.

When Rothschild discovered that the general, who was now attached to the court of Prince William of Hanau, was interested in rare coins he decided to take full advantage of the situation. By offering valuable coins and trinkets at discount prices he soon ingratiated himself with the general and other influential members of the court.

One day he was ushered into the presence of Prince William himself. His Highness bought a handel of his rarest medals and coins. This was the first transaction between a Rothschild and a head of state. Soon Rothschild was doing business with other princes.

Before long Rothschild tried another ploy to secure an 'in' with various local princes - and to further his own aims! He wrote them letters that played on their princely vanity while asking them for their patronage. A typical letter would read:

Telling the Truth Archives

"It has been my particular high and good fortune to serve your lofty princely Serenity at various times and to your most gracious satisfaction. I stand ready to exert all my energies and my entire fortune to serve your lofty princely serenity whenever in future it shall please you to command me. An especially powerful incentive to this end would be given me if your lofty princely serenity were to distinguish me with an appointment as one of your Highness' Court Factors. I am making bold to beg for this with the more confidence in the assurance that by so doing I am not giving any trouble; while for my part such a distinction would lift up my commercial standing and be of help to me in many other ways that I feel certain thereby to make my own way and fortune here in the city of Franfurt."

His tactics paid off. On September 21, 1769, Rothschild was able to nail a sign bearing the arms of Hess-Hanau to the front of his shop. In gold characters it read: "M. A. Rothschild, by appointment court factor to his serene highness, Prince William of Hanau."

In 1770 Rothschild married Gutele Schnaper who was aged seventeen. They had a large family consisting of five sons and five daughters. Their sons were Amschel, Salomon, Nathan, Kalmann (Karl) and Jacob (James).

History records that William of Hanau, "whose crest had been famous in Germany since the Middle Ages," was a dealer in human flesh. For a price the Prince, who was closely related to the various royal families of Europe, would rent out troops to any nation. His best customer was the British government which wanted troops for such projects as trying to keep the American colonists in line.

He did exceptionally well with his 'rent-a-troop' business. When he died he left the largest fortune ever accumulated in Europe to that time, $200,000,000. Rothschild biographer Frederic Morton describes William as "Europe's most blue-cold blooded loan shark" (The Rothschilds, Fawcett Crest, 1961, p. 40).

Rothschild became an agent for this 'human cattle' dealer. He must have worked diligently in his new position of responsibility because, when William was forced to flee to Denmark, he left 600,000 pounds (then valued at $3,000,000) with Rothschild for safekeeping.

According to the late Commander William Guy Carr, who was an Intelligence Officer in the Royal Canadian Navy, and who had excellent contacts in intelligence circles around the world, the founder of the House of Rothschild drew up plans for the creation of the Illuminati and then entrusted Adam Weishaupt with its organization and development.

Sir Walter Scott, in the second volume of his Life of Napoleon, states that the French Revolution was planned by the Illuminati and was financed by the money changers of Europe. Interestingly enough, the above book (which this author has both seen and read) is the only book written by Scott that is not listed under his name in any of the 'authoritative' reference works. It is now a 'non book'!

"MORE BUSINESSLIKE" FACTS

For an account of what happened next we turn to the Jewish Encyclopedia, 1905 edition, Volume 10, p. 494: "According to legend this money was hidden away in wine casks, and, escaping the search of Napoleon's soldiers when they entered Frankfort, was restored intact in the same casks in 1814, when the elector returned to the electorate. The facts are somewhat less romantic, and more businesslike."

Pay particular attention to the last nine words. They are loaded with significance. Here the leading Jewish authority states that what Rothschild actually did with the $3,000,000 was "more businesslike," from a Jewish point of view, than what was stated in the legend.

The simple truth of the matter is that Rothschild embezzled the money from Prince William. But even before the money reached Rothschild it was not 'clean' (or Kosherl). The vast sum had been paid to William of Hess by the British government for the services of his soldiers. The money was originally embezzled by William from his troops who were legally entitled to it.

With the twice embezzled money as a solid foundation, Mayer Amschel Rothschild decided to vastly expand his operations - and become the first international banker.

A couple of years earlier Rothschild had sent his son, Nathan, to England to take care of the family business in that country. After a brief stay in Manchester, where he operated as a merchant, Nathan, on instructions from his father, moved to London and set up shop as a merchant banker. To get the operation under way Rothschild gave his son the three million dollars he had embezzled from William of Hess.

The Jewish Encyclopedia for 1905 tells us that Nathan invested the loot in "gold from the East India company knowing that it would be needed for Wellington's peninsula campaign." On the stolen money Nathan made "no less than four profits; (1) On the sale of Wellington's paper [which he bought at 50 cents on the dollar and collected at par; (2) on the sale of gold to Wellington; (3) on its repurchase; and (4) on forwarding it to Portugal. This was the beginning of the great fortunes of the house" (p. 494).

Yes, the Jewish Encyclopaedia claims that the great fortune accumulated by the Rothschilds over the years was based on the "businesslike" method of fraud.

With their huge accumulation of ill-gotten gain the family established branches of the House of Rothschild in Berlin, Vienna, Paris and Naples. Rothschild placed a son in charge of each branch. Amschel was placed in charge of the Berlin branch; Salomon was over the Vienna branch; Jacob (James) went to Paris and Kalmann (Karl) opened up the Rothschild bank in Naples. The headquarters of the House of Rothschild was, and is, in London.

NATHAN

An anonymous contemporary described Nathan Rothschild as he leaned against the 'Rothschild Piller' at the London Stock Exchange, hung his heavy hands into his pockets, and began to release silent, motionless, implacable cunning:

"Eyes are usually called the windows of the soul. But in Rothschild's case you would conclude that the windows are false ones, or that there was no soul to look out of them. There comes not one pencil of light from the interior, neither is there one gleam of that which comes from without reflected in any direction. The whole puts you in mind of an empty skin, and you wonder why it stands upright without at least something in it. By and by another figure comes up to it. It then steps two paces aside, and the most inquisitive glance that you ever saw, and a glance more inquisitive than you would ever have thought of, is drawn out of the fixed and leaden eye, as if one were drawing a sword from a scabbard. The visiting figure, which has the appearance of coming by accident and not by design, stops just a second or two, in the course of which looks are exchanged which, though you cannot translate, you feel must be of most important meaning. After these the eyes are sheathed up again, and the figure resumes its stony posture.

During the morning numbers of visitors come, all of whom meet with a similar reception and vanish in a similar manner. Last of all the figure itself vanishes, leaving you utterly at a loss." (Frederic Morton, The Rothschilds, p. 65)

MAYER AMSCHEL'S WILL

When he died on September 19, 1812, the founder of the House of Rothschild left a will that was just days old. In it, he laid down specific laws by which the House that bore his name would operate in future year.

The laws were as follows:

(1) All key positions in the House of Rothschild were to be held by members of the family, and not by hired hands. Only male members of the family were allowed to participate in the business.

The eldest son of the eldest son was to be the head of the family unless the majority of the rest of the family agreed otherwise. It was for this exceptional reason that Nathan, who was particularly brilliant, was appointed head of the House of Rothschild in 1812.

(2) The family was to intermarry with their own first and second cousins, thus preserving the vast fortune. This rule was strictly adhered to early on but later, when other rich Jewish banking houses came on the scene, it was relaxed to allow some of the Rothschilds to marry selected members of the new elite.

(3) Amschel forbade his heirs "most explicitly, in any circumstances whatever, to have any public inventory made by the courts, or otherwise, of my estate .... Also I forbid any legal action and any publication of the value of the inheritance .... Anyone who disregards these provisions and takes any kind of action which conflicts with them will immediately be regarded as having disputed the will, and shall suffer the consequences of so doing."

(4) Rothschild ordered a perpetual family partnership and provided that the female members of the family, their husbands and children should receive their interest in the estate subject to the management of the male members. They were to have no part in the management of the business. Anyone who disputed this arrangement would lose their interest in the Estate. (The last stipulation was specifically designed to seal the mouths of anyone who might feel like breaking with the family. Rothschild obviously felt that there were a lot of things under the family 'rug' that should never see the light of day).

The mighty strength of the House of Rothschild was based on a variety of important factors:

(A) Complete secrecy resulting from total family control of all business dealings;

(B) An uncanny, one could almost say a supernatural ability to see what lay ahead and to take full advantage of it. The whole family was driven by an insatiable lust for the accumulation of wealth and power, and

(C) Total ruthlessness in all business dealings.

Biographer Frederic Morton, in The Rothschilds, tells us that Mayer Amschel Rothschild and his five sons were "wizards" of finance, and "fiendish calculators" who were motivated by a "demonic drive" to succeed in their secret undertakings.

TALMUDIC INFLUENCE

From the same authoritative source we learn that "on Saturday evenings, when prayer was done at the synagogue, Mayer would inveigle the rabbi into his house. They would bend towards one another on the green upholstery, sipping slowly at a glass of wine and argue about first and last things deep into the night. Even on work days...Mayer...was apt to tear down the big book of the Talmud and recite from it...while the entire family must sit stock still and listen" (p. 31).

Telling the Truth Archives

It could be said of the Rothschilds that the "family that preys together stays together." And prey they did! Morton states that it is difficult for the average person to "comprehend Rothschild nor even the reason why he having so much, wanted to conquer more." All five brothers were imbued with this same spirit of cunning and conquest.

The Rothschilds formed no true friendships or alliances. Their associates were but mere acquaintances who were used to further the interests of the House of Rothschild, and then thrown on the garbage heap of history when they had served their purpose or outlived their usefulness.

The truth of this statement is demonstrated by another passage from Frederic Morton's book. He relates how, in 1806, Napoleon declared that it was his "object to remove the house of Hess-Cassel from rulership and to strike it out of the list of powers."

"Thus Europe's mightiest man decreed erasure of the rock on which the new Rothschild firm had been built. Yet, curiously, the bustle didn't diminish at the house of the [Red] Shield.... Rothschilds still sat, avid and impenetrable, portfolios wedged between body and arm.

"They saw neither peace nor war, neither slogans or manifestos, nor orders of the day, neither death nor glory. They saw none of the things that blinded the world. They saw only steppingstones. Prince William had been one. Napoleon would be the next" (pp. 38,39).

'Curious'? Not exactly! The House of Rothschild was helping to finance the French dictator and, as a result, had free access to French markets at all times. Some years later, when both France and England were blockading each other's coast lines, the only merchants who were allowed to freely run the blockades were - yes, you guessed it, the Rothschilds. They were financing both sides!

"The efficiency which powered Mayer's sons brought on enormous economic spring cleaning: a sweeping away of fiscal dead wood; a renovation of old credit structures and an invention of new ones; a formation - implicit in the sheer existence of five different Rothschild banks in five different countries - of fresh money channels via clearing-houses; a method of replacing the old unwieldy shipping of gold bullion by a worldwide system of debits and credits.

"One of the greatest contributions was Nathan's new technique for floating international loans. He didn't much care to receive dividends in all sorts of strange and cumbersome currencies.

"Now Nathan attracted him - the most powerful investment source of the nineteenth century - by making foreign bonds payable in Pounds Sterling" (p. 96).

THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO

As the wealth and power of the Rothschilds grew in size and influence so did their intelligence gathering network. They had their 'agents' strategically located in all the capitals and trading centers of Europe, gathering and developing various types of intelligence. Like most family exploits, it was based on a combination of very hard work and sheer cunning.

Their unique spy system started out when 'the boys' began sending messages to each other through a networh of couriers. Soon it developed into something much more elaborate, effective and far reaching. It was a spy network par excellence. Its stunning speed and effectiveness gave the Rothschilds a clear edge in all their dealings on an international level.

"Rothschild coaches careened down the highways; Rothschild boats set sail across the Channel; Rothschild agents were swift shadows along the streets. They carried cash, securities, letters and news. Above all, news - the latest exclusive news to be vigorously processed at stock market and commodity bourse.

"And there was no news more precious than the outcome at Waterloo..." (The Rothschilds p. 94).

Upon the battle of Waterloo depended the future of the European continent. If the Grande Armée of Napoleon emerged victorious France would be undisputed master of all she surveyed on the European front. If Napoleon was crushed into submission England would hold the balance of power in Europe and would be in a position to greatly expand its sphere of influence.

Telling the Truth Archives

Historian John Reeves, a Rothschild partisan, reveals in his book The Rothschilds, Financial Rulers of the Nations, 1887, page 167, that "one cause of his [Nathan's] success was the secrecy with which he shrouded, and the tortuous policy with which he misled those who watched him the keenest."

There were vast fortunes to be made - and lost - on the outcome of the Battle of Waterloo. The Stock Exchange in London was at fever pitch as traders awaited news of the outcome of this battle of the giants. If Britain lost, English consuls would plummet to unprecedented depths. If Britain was victorioug, the value of the consul would leap to dizzying new heights.

As the two huge armies closed in for their battle to the death, Nathan Rothschild had his agents working feverishly on both sides of the line to gather the most accurate possible information as the battle proceeded. Additional Rothschild agents were on hand to carry the intelligence bulletins to a Rothschild command post strategically located nearby.

Late on the afternoon of June 15, 1815, a Rothschild representative jumped on board a specially chartered boat and headed out into the channel in a hurried dash for the English coast. In his possession was a top secret report from Rothschild's secret service agents on the progress of the crucial battle. This intelligence data would prove indispensable to Nathan in making some vital decisions.

The special agent was met at Folkstone the following morning at dawn by Nathan Rothschild himself. After quickly scanning the highlights of the report Rothschild was on his way again, speeding towards London and the Stock Exchange.

COUP OF COUPS

Arriving at the Exchange amid frantic speculation on the outcome of the battle, Nathan took up his usual position beside the famous 'Rothschild Pillar.' Without a sign of emotion, without the slightest change of facial expression the stony-faced, flint eyed chief of the House of Rothschild gave a predetermined signal to his agents who were stationed nearby.

Telling the Truth Archives

Rothschild agents immediately began to dump consuls on the market. As hundred of thousands of dollars worth of consuls poured onto the market their value started to slide. Then they began to plummet.

Nathan continued to lean against 'his' pillar, emotionless, expressionless. He continued to sell, and sell and sell. Consuls kept on falling. Word began to sweep through the Stock Exchange: "Rothschild knows." "Rothschild knows." "Wellington has lost at Waterloo."

The selling turned into a panic as people rushed to unload their 'worthless' consuls or paper money for gold and silver in the hope of retaining at least part of their wealth. Consuls continued their nosedive towards oblivion. After several hours of feverish trading the consul lay in ruins. It was selling for about five cents on the dollar.

Nathan Rothschild, emotionless as ever, still leaned against his pillar. He continued to give subtle signals. But these signals were different. They were so subtly different that only the highly trained Rothschild agents could detect the change. On the cue from their boss, dozens of Rothschild agents made their way to the order desks around the Exchange and bought every consul in sight for just a 'song'!

A short time later the 'official' news arrived in the British capital. England was now the master of the European scene.

Within seconds the consul skyrocketed to above its original value. As the significance of the British victory began to sink into the public consciousness, the value of consuls rose even higher.

Napoleon had 'met his Waterloo.' Nathan had bought control of the British economy. Overnight, his already vast fortune was multiplied twenty times over.

THE JEWISH ENCYCLOPEDIA VOLUME X, 1905 (P. 494)

Owing to Napoleon's seizure of Holland in 1803, the leaders of the anti-Napoleonic league chose Frankfort as a financial center where-from to obtain the sinews of war. After the battle of Jena in 1806 the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel fled to Denmark, where he had already deposited much of his wealth through the agency of Mayer Amschel Rothschild, leaving in the hands of the latter specie and works of art of the value of 600,000 pounds. According to legend, thse were hidden away in wine-casks, and, escaping the search of Napoleon's soldiers when they entered Frankfort, were restored intact in the same casks in 1814, when the elector returned to his electorate (see Marbot, "Memoirs," 1891, i. 310-311). The facts are somewhat less romantic, and more business-like. Rothschild, so far from being in danger, was on such good terms with Napoleon's nominee, Prince Dalberg, that he had been made in 1810 a member of the Electoral College of Darmstadt. The elector's money had been sent to Nathan in London, who in 1808 utilized it to purchase 800,000 pounds worth of gold from the East India Company, knowing that it would be needed for Wellington's Peninsular campaign. He made no less than fonr profits on this: (1) on the sale of Wellington's paper, (2) on the sale of the gold to Wellington, (3) on its repurchase, and (4) on forwarding it to Portugal. This was the beginning of the great fortunes of the house,

Telling the Truth Archives

CLEAN UP IN FRANCE

Following their crushing defeat at Waterloo, the French struggled to get back on their feet financially. In 1817 they negotiated a substantial loan from the prestigious French banking house of Ouvrard and from the well-known bankers Baring Brothers of London. The Rothschilds had been left on the outside looking in.

The following year the French government was in need of another loan. As the bonds issued in 1817 with the help of Ouvrard and Baring Brothers were increasing in value on the Paris market, and in other European financial centers, it appeared certain that the French governmant would retain the services of these two distinguished banking houses.

The Rothschild brothers tried most of the gimmicks in their vast repertoire to influence the French government to give them the business. Their efforts were in vain.

The French aristocrats, who prided themselves on their elegance and superior breeding, viewed the Rothschilds as mere peasants, upstarts who needed to be kept in their place. The fact that the Rothschilds had vast financial resources, lived in the most luxurious homes and were attired in the most elegant and expensive clothes obtainable cut no ice with the highly class conscious French nobility. The Rothschilds were viewed as uncouth - lacking in social graces. If we are to believe most historical accounts, their appraisal of the first generation Rothschilds was probably valid.

One major piece of armament in the Rothschild arsenal the French had overlooked or ignored - their unprecedented cunning in the use and manipulation of money.

On November 5, 1818, something very unexpected occurred. After a year of steady appreciation the value of the French government bonds began to fall. With each passing day the decline in their value became more pronounced. Within a short space of time other government securities began to suffer too.

The atmosphere in the court of Louis XVIII was tense. Grim faced aristocrats pondered the fate of the country. They hoped for the best but feared the worst! The only people around the French court who weren't deeply concerned were James and Karl Rothschild. They smiled - but said nothing!

Slowly a sneaking suspicion began to take shape in the minds of some onlookers. Could those Rothschild brothers be the cause of the nation's economic woes? Could they have secretly manipulated the bond market and engineered the panic?

They had! During October 1818, Rothschild agents, using their masters' limitless reserves, had bought huge quantities of the French government bonds issued through their rivals Ouvrard and Baring Brothers. This caused the bonds to increase in value. Then, on November 5th, they began to dump the bonds in huge quantities on the open market in the main commercial centers of Europe, throwing the market into a panic.

Suddenly the scene in the Aix palace changed. The Rothschilds, who were patiently biding their time and waiting quietly in an ante room, were ushered into the presence of the king. They were now the center of attention. Their clothes were now the height of fashion. "Their money [was] the darling of the best borrowers." The Rothschilds had gained control of France...and control is the name of the game!

Benjamin Disraeli, who was the prime minister of Britain, wrote a novel titled Coningsby. The Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol. 10, pp. 501, 5O2 describes the book as "an ideal portrait" of the Rothschild Empire. Disraeli characterized Nathan (in conjunction with his four brothers) as "the lord and master of the money markets of the world, and of course virtally lord and master of everything else. He literally held the revenues of southern Italy in pawn, and monarchs and ministers of all countries courted his advice and were guided by his suggestions."

GROOMED "INAUDIBILITY AND INVISIBILITY"

The financial coups performed by the Rothschilds in England in 1815, and in France three years later, are just two of the many they have staged worldwide over the years.

There has, however, been a major change in the tactics used to fleece the public of their hard earned money. From being brazenly open in their use and exploitation of people and nations, the Rothschilds have shrunk from the limelight and now operate through and behind a wide variety of fronts.

Their 'modern' approach is explained by biographer Frederic Morton: "Rothschilds love to glisten. But to the sorrow of the socially ambitious, Rothschilds glisten only in camera, for and among their own kind.

"Their penchant for reticence seems to have grown in recent generations. The founder of the house enjoined it a long time ago; but some of his sons, while storming Europe's innermost bastions of power, wrapped their hands around every weapon, including the rawest publicity. Today the family grooms the inaudibility and invisibility of its presence. As a result, some believe that little is left apart from a great legend. And the Rothschilds are quite content to let legend be their public relations.

"Though they control scores of industrial, commercial, mining and tourist corporations, not one bears the name Rothschild. Being private partnerships, the family houses never need to, and never do, publish a single public balance sheet, or any other report of their financial condition" (The Rothschilds. pp. 18, 19).

Throughout their long history the Rothschilds have gone to great lengths to create the impression that they operate within the framework of 'democracy.'

Telling the Truth Archives

This posture is calculated to deceive, to lead people away from the fact that their real aim is the elimination of all competition and the creation of a world-wide monopoly. Hiding behind a multitude of 'fronts' they have done a masterful job of deception.

ROTHSCHILDS AND AMERICA

It would be extraordinarily naïve to even consider the possibility that a family as ambitious, as cunning and as monopolistically minded as the Rothschilds could resist the temptation of becoming heavily involved on the American front.

Following their conquest of Europe early in the 1800s, the Rothschilds cast their covetous eyes on the most precious gem of them all - the United States.

America was unique in modern history. It was only the second nation in history that had ever been formed with the Bible as its law book. [The United States was not formed with the Bible as its law book. It was founded by Masonic deists. Only low rank Masons respect the Bible and consider it their law book; the Founders were high rank Masons, and many professed their lack of respect for the Bible. The writer probably means that the Colonies were formed with the Bible as their law book, and this is basically true. -Ed.] Its uniquely magnificent Constitution was specifically designed to limit the power of government and to keep its citizens free and prosperous. Its citizens were basically industrious immigrants who 'yearned to breath free' and who asked nothing more than to be given the opportunity to live and work in such a wonderfully stimulating environment.

The results - the 'fruit' - of such a unique experiment were so indescribably brilliant that America became a legend around the globe. Many millions across the far flung continents of the world viewed America the Beautiful as the promised land.

The Big Bankers in Europe - the Rothschilds and their cohorts - viewed the wonderful results borne by this unique experiment from an entirely different perspective; they looked upon it as a major threat to their future plans. The establishment Times of London stated: "If that mischievous financial policy which had its origin in the North American Republic [i.e. honest Constitutionally authorized no debt money] should become indurated down to a fixture, then that government will furnish its own money without cost. It will pay off its debts and be without a debt [to the international bankers]. It will become prosperous beyond precedent in the history of the civilized governments of the world. The brains and wealth of all countries will go to North America. That government must be destroyed or it will destroy every monarchy on the globe."

The Rothschilds and their friends sent in their financial termites to destroy America because it was becoming "prosperous beyond precedent."

The first documentable evidence of Rothschild involvement in the financial affairs of the United States came in the late 1820s and early 1830s when the family, through their agent Nicholas Biddie, fought to defeat Andrew Jackson's move to curtail the international bankers. The Rothschilds lost the first round when in 1832, President Jackson vetoed the move to renew the charter of the 'Bank of the United States' (a central bank controlled by the international bankers). In 1836 the bank went out of business.

PLAN OF DESTRUCTION

In the years following Independence, a close business relationship had developed between the cotton growing aristocracy in the South and the cotton manufacturers in England. The European bankers decided that this business connection was America's Achilles Heel, the door through which the young American Republic could be successfully attacked and overcome.

The Illustrated University History, 1878, p. 504, tells us that the southern states swarmed with British agents. These conspired with local politicians to work against the best interests of the United States. Their carefully sown and nurtured propaganda developed into open rebellion and resulted in the secession of South Carolina on December 29, 1860. Within weeks another six states joined the conspiracy against the Union, and broke away to form the Confederate States of America, with Jefferson Davis as President.

The plotters raided armies, seized forts, arsenals, mints and other Union property. Even members of President Buchanan's Cabinet conspired to destroy the Union by damaging the public credit and working to bankrupt the nation. Buchanan claimed to deplore secession but took no steps to check it, even when a U.S. ship was fired upon by South Carolina shore batteries.

Shortly thereafter Abraham Lincoln became President, being inaugurated on March 4, 1861. Lincoln immediately ordered a blockade on Southern ports, to cut off supplies that were pouring in from Europe. The 'official' date for the start of the Civil War is given as April 12, 1861, when Fort Sumter in South Carolina was bombarded by the Confederates, but it obviously began at a much earlier date.

In December, 1861, large numbers of European Troops (British, French and Spanish) poured into Mexico in defiance of the Monroe Doctrine. This, together with widespread European aid to the Confederacy strongly indicated that the Crown was preparing to enter the war. The outlook for the North, and the future of the Union, was bleak indeed.

In this hour of extreme crisis, Lincoln appealed to the Crown's perennial enemy, Russia, for assistance. When the envelope containing Lincoln's urgent appeal was given to Czar Nicholas II, he weighed it unopened in his hand and stated: "Before we open this paper or know its contents, we grant any request it may contain."

Unannounced, a Russian fleet under Admiral Liviski, steamed into New York harbor on September 24, 1863, and anchored there. The Russian Pacific fleet, under Admiral Popov, arrived in San Francisco on October 12. Of this Russian act, Gideon Wells said: "They arrived at the high tide of the Confederacy and the low tide of the North, causing England and France to hesitate long enough to turn the tide for the North" (Empire of "The City," p. 90).

History reveals that the Rothschilds were heavily involved in financing both sides in the Civil War. Lincoln put a damper on their activities when, in 1862 and 1863, he refused to pay the exorbitant rates of interest demanded by the Rothschilds and issued constitutionally-authorized, interest free United States notes. For this and other acts of patriotism Lincoln was shot down in cold-blood by John Wilkes Booth on April 14, 1865, just five days after Lee surrendered to Grant at Appomattox Court House, Virginia.

Booth's grand-daughter, Izola Forrester, states in This One Mad Act that Lincoln's assassin had been in close contact with mysterious Europeans prior to the slaying, and had made at least one trip to Europe. Following the killing, Booth was whisked away to safety by members of the Knights of the Golden Circle. According to the author, Booth lived for many years following his disappearance.

INTERNATIONAL BANKERS PURSUE THEIR GOAL

Undaunted by their initial failures to destroy the United States, the international bankers pursued their objective with relentless zeal. Between the end of the Civil War and 1914, their main agents in the United States were Kuhn, Loeb and Co. and the J. P. Morgan Co.

A brief history of Kuhn, Loeb and Co. appeared in Newsweek magazine on February 1, 1936: "Abraham Kuhn and Solomon Loeb were general merchandise merchants in Lafayette, Indiana, in 1850. As usual in newly settled regions, most transactions were on credit. They soon found out that they were bankers... In 1867, they established Kuhn, Loeb and Co., bankers, in New York City, and took in a young German immigrant, Jacob Schiff, as partner. Young Schiff had important financial connections in Europe. After ten years, Jacob Schiff was head of Kuhn, Loeb and Co., Kuhn having retired. Under Schiff's guidance, the house brought European capital into contact with American industry."

Schiff's "important financial connections in Europe" were the Rothschilds and their German representatives, the M. M. Warburg Company of Hamburg and Amsterdam. Within twenty years the Rothschilds, through their Warburg-Schiff connection, had provided the capital that enabled John D. Rockefeller to greatly expand his Standard Oil empire. They also financed the activities of Edward Harriman (Railroads) and Andrew Carnegie (Steel).

At the turn of the 20th century the Rothschilds, not satisfied with the progress being made by their American operations, sent one of their top experts, Paul Moritz Warburg, over to New York to take direct charge of their assault upon the only true champion of individual liberty and prosperity - the United States.

At a hearing of the House Committee on Banking and Currency in 1913, Warburg revealed that he was "a member of the banking firm of Kuhn, Loeb and Co. I came to this country in 1902, having been born and educated in the banking business in Hamburg, Germany, and studied banking in London and Paris, and have gone all around the world...."

In the late 1800s, people didn't study banking in London and "all around the world" unless they had a special mission to perform!

Early in 1907, Jacob Schiff, the Rothschild-owned boss of Kuhn, Loeb and Co., in a speech to the New York Chamber of Commerce, warned that "unless we have a Central Bank with adequate control of credit resources, this country is going to undergo the most severe and far reaching money panic in its history."

Shortly thereafter, the United States plunged into a monetary crisis that had all the earmarks of a skillfully planned Rothschild 'job.' The ensuing panic financially mined tens of thousands of innocent people across the country - and made billions for the banking elite. The purpose for the 'crisis' was two-fold:

(1) To make a financial 'killing' for the Insiders, and (2) To impress on the American people the 'great need' for a central bank.

Paul Warburg told the Banking and Currency Committee: "In the Panic of 1907, the first suggestion I made was, 'let us have a national clearing house' [Central Bank]. The Aldrich Plan [for a Central Bank] contains many things that are simply fundamental rules of banking. Your aim must be the same...."

Digging deep into their bag of deceitful practices, the international bankers pulled off their greatest coup to date - the creation of the privately owned Federal Reserve System, which placed control of the finances of the United States securely in the hands of the power-crazed money monopolists. Paul Warburg became the 'Fed's' first chairman!

Congressman Charles Lindbergh put his finger firmly on the truth when he stated, just after the 'Federal' Reserve Act was passed by a depleted Congress on December 23, 1913: "The Act establishes the most gigantic trust on earth. When the President [Wilson] signs this Bill, the invisible government of the monetaary power will be legalized....The greatest crime of the ages is perpetrated by this banking and currency bill."

Telling the Truth Archives

PLAN TO CONQUER THE WORLD

Having consolidated their financial grip on most of the European nations by the middle of the last century, the international bankers worked feverishly to extend their sphere of influence to the ends of the earth in preparation for their final assault on the United States - a nation which, through its unique Constitution, remained free.

In the decades that followed it became apparent that, in order to achieve their goal of world domination, they would have to instigate a series of world wars which would result in leveling of the old world in preparation for the construction of the New World Order. This plan was outlined in graphic detail by Albert Pike, the Sovereign Grand Commander of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry and the top Illuminist in America. In a letter to Guisseppe Mazzini dated August 15, 1871. Pike stated that the first world war was to be fomented in order to destroy Czarist Russia - and to place that vast land under the direct control of Illuminati agents. Russia was then to be used as a 'bogey man' to further the aims of the Illuminati worldwide.

World War II was to be fomented through manipulation of the differences that existed between the German Nationalists and the Political Zionists. This was to result in an expansion of Russian influence and the establishment of a state of Israel in Palestine.

The Third World War was planned to result form the differences stirred up by Illuminati agents between the Zionists and the Arabs. The conflict was planned to spread worldwide. The llluminati, said the letter, planned to "unleash the Nihilists and Atheists" and "provoke a formidable social cataclysm which in all its horror will show clearly to the nations the effect of absolute atheism, origin of savagery and of the most bloody turmoil. Then everywhere, the citizens, obliged to defend themselves against the world minority of revolutionaries, will exterminate those destroyers of civilization, and the multitude, disillusioned with Christianity, whose deistic spirits will from that moment be without compass [directionl, anxious for an ideal, but without knowing where to render its adoration, will receive the true light through the universal manifestation of the pure doctrine of Lucifer, brought finally out in the public view, a manifestation which will result from the general reactionary movement which will follow the destruction of Christianity and atheism, both conquored and exterminated at the same time."

At the time Pike wrote this remarkable leaflet there were five different ideologies extant on the world scene and involved in a "struggle for space and power." These were:

1. The secret ideology of the international bankers or the Illuminati as laid out in Fourth Reich Of The Rich. Their aim was the creation of a One World Government to be ruled over by the "Illuminated ones" at the top.

2. The Russian "Pan-Slavic" ideology which was originally conceived by William the Great and expounded in his will. According to A.H. Granger, the author of England World Empire, 1916, p. 173, this ideology called for the elimination of Austria and Germany, then the conquest of India and Persia and ends with the words: "...which will ensure the subjugation of Europe."

3. The ideology of "Asia for the Asiatics" as expounded by the Japanese. This called for a confederation of Asian nations dominated by Japan.

4. The ideology of Pan Germanism which called for German political control over the European continent, freedom from the Crown's restrictions on the high seas and the adoption of an "open door" policy in trade and commerce with the rest of the world.

5. Pan-American or the ideology of "America for the Americans." This called for "trade and friendship with all, alliances with none." Secretary of State Root stated in 1906 that, under this ideology which was given expression in the Monroe Doctrine of 1823, we are "debarred from sharing in the political aims, interests, or responsibilities of Europe, just as by the equally potential doctrine, now nearly a century old, the European powers are excluded from sharing or interfering in the political concerns of the sovereign states of the Western Hemisphere."

If the plans of the international banker/llluminati cabal were to be brought to fruition Russia, Germany, Japan and the United surrender, poverty and ignominy.

The llluminati plan for world conquest, referred to by Albert Pike, was a diabolical masterpiece of Luciferian ingenuity that would take the lives of hundreds of millions of human beings and cost hundred of billions of dollars in its accomplishment.

Telling the Truth Archives

The plan that the Illuminati devised to accomplish their world conquering goal is as simple as it is effective. Along the way towards the accomplishment of their final objective this plan has been adapted by the international bankers and their comrades in arms around the globe to amass vast fortunes in real estate. As we shall see. the implimentation of the plan has been so smoothly executed that it has frequently won applause from the ranks of those it is destroying. Their plan can be called Urban Renewal.

It has been said that there are three types of people:

1. Those who make things happen. 2. Those who watch things happen, and 3. Those who wonder what happened.

The vast majority of mankind find themselves in the last two categories. Most have "eyes to see" but don't "see" what is happening. Most have "ears that hear" but don't "understand" what IS happening - LOCALLY, NATIONALLY OR INTERNATIONALLY.

Taking $6 billion (and assuming no erosion of the wealth base) and compounding that figure at various returns on investment (a conservative range of 4% to 8%) would suggest the following net worth of the Rothschild family enterprise:

London Bullion Marketing Association (LBMA)

Gold-based financing of jewellers, using consignment stocks, in third country markets is a speciality of a minority of the international bullion banks, including Bank of Nova Scotia and UBS. The former is particularly active in Dubai, France, Italy, and Spain. UBS has a strong presence in Hong Kong and Saudi Arabia. Local bullion banks are also very active in many markets, though where there has been tight regulation on gold imports (as in Italy), local banks in jewellery manufacturing areas have been slow to challenge the trading position of the international giants and have been content to use their consignment stocks. In the USA, the Republic National Bank of New York and the Fleet National Bank are among the more active, as are NM Rothschild and Midland Bank, in the UK. In France Societe Generale has some interest. Rothschilds is also strong in South East Asia. (source: www.gold.org/Studies)
The London Financial Times in its Thursday, January 30, 1997 edition, revealed the extent of the gold trading taking place daily through the London Bullion Marketing Association (LBMA). The LBMA is run predominantly by the house of N. M. Rothschild.
"Deals involving about 30 million troy ounces, or 930 tonnes, of gold valued at more than $10 billion are cleared every working day in London, the international settlement center for gold bullion." "This is the first authoritative indication of the size of the global gold market, and was revealed yesterday by the London Bullion Market Association. "The volume of gold cleared every day in London represented nearly twice the production from South African mines in a year, Mr. Alan Baker, chairman of the association, pointed out. "The size of the gold market will surprise many observers, but traders insisted the association's statistics were only part of the picture because matched orders are cleared without appearing in the statistics. Mr. Jeffrey Rhodes, of Standard Bank, London, said the 30m ounces should be 'multiplied by three, and possibly five, to give the full scope of the global market'."
